RANNAZZISI: I think they're moving to more rural areas where there's less law enforcement presence. I think the operators understand. I have a great video that I love to show on you -- of a clinic, and what happens as soon as the clinic opens. I think that they're adapting. The clinic owners are adapting very well. And we just -- they're one step ahead of us right now. But in the end, local law enforcement's doing a phenomenal job. And they are moving people out of the Tampa Bay Area and out of the three -- county south -- three county area. But, it's still there. It's just moving to more rural areas where they can't address the problem as quickly.

CASTOR: So in this very sad e-mail from my friend that I got yesterday, she said she has read now about the FDA approval of Zohydro, a pure hydrocodone, non-tamper resistant, 10 times stronger than Vicodin -- the Vicodin prescription opiate. I know that the advisory committee to FDA had some very serious concerns with this, yet, it has been approved. Dr. Volkow, could you give me your opinion on whether this drug should be readily available?

VOLKOW: Well, I mean, I think we clearly have an -- a very large number of opioid medications and we are over prescribing them. I wouldn't point my finger one or the other. I do think that the feasibility of getting formulations that are -- that cannot be diverted is something that is very powerful and the FDA should be commended because it came up pharmaceuticals can come up with an indication for a medication that is deterrent proof. And that is incentivizing to the development of these types of medications.

So, his role (ph) is a hydrocodone, slow delivery over 12 hours, and it actually does not have acetaminophen. And because the way that you have hydro -- currently which is Vicodin, the white (ph) that (inaudible) combined with acetaminophen which causes liver toxicity which lead the FDA to consider. If someone needs hydrocodone, do you need to give them acetaminophen? I need work in (ph) that context that they approved it. But ...

CASTOR: And could I ask, since my time is short. Mr. Botticelli, do you agree with FDA's approval or have -- do you have concerns?

BOTTICELLI: I think the important point and, you know, again, I don't think, you know, the FDA has their own process in terms of what they -- how they approve medications. I only agree that how we continue to make sure that we have abuse-deterrent formulation is really important. And I also think that this really underscores the importance of prescribing and training on prescribing because I think the point is that we have many medications that are open for potential to abuse. And we want to make sure that physicians and other prescribers really understand the risk associated with these drugs.

CASTOR: And Mr. Rannazzisi, local law enforcement has expressed concern about this new drug on the street because it is so potent. And because of -- it's likely if a child takes it, it could cause death. What's your view?

RANNAZZISI: Local law enforcement and DEA and our federal partners have all expressed. We all live through the OxyContin problem back in, you know, the '90s and into the 2000s. And we just don't want history to repeat it. So, too many people passed from circumventing that delivery system.

BURGESS: The gentlelady's time expired. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia. Mr. Griffith, five minutes for your questions please.

GRIFFITH: Well, let me pick up there. You're concern about this newer drug. And so, my question is, how -- what do you all do, and I would ask it to all of you, but I'll start with you Mr. Rannazzisi. Thank you. And that would be, how do we do a better job of predicting where we're going to see spikes and abuse on drugs as they come forward because some people say that we should have probably seen the increase in the prescription drug abuse of opioids and heroin.

RANNAZZISI: Well, we monitor the amount of drug going into a particular state where through our host (ph) system. But in the end, what we generally see is the drug being abused in the Minneapolis (ph) area of the country and then it spreads out from there. So when we were looking at OxyContin for instance, the OxyContin abuse epidemic started in that area, Kentucky, Tennessee, Southern Ohio.

GRIFFITH: Southwest Virginia.

RANNAZZISI: Yes, Southwest Virginia. Well, yes, absolutely. And then, spread out. And that's -- and we believe that patterns going to happen again with this new drug. It's just a matter of time. We know that product is now on the pharmacies and being dispensed, so.

GRIFFITH: And now, for the people that we -- that you've identified, I think that one of the other speakers said abuse- deterrent formulations. Once we know somebody's abusing, I have always like the lock-in where you lock-in to a pharmacy and you lock- in to the doctor, because one of the problems in Southwest Virginia that you mentioned a minute ago is that you can be in West Virginia, Tennessee, Kentucky, and North Carolina all within -- no matter where you are in Southwest Virginia, within an hour or two hours, you can be in anyone of those states, because the way of the geography is, and you can go from one rural area to another.

So what do we do no matter we're looking at that as a possible means? Dr. Clark, if you want to answer, that's fine. Just trying to find the answers.

CLARK: Apparently, there is no simple answer in your questions. A very important one in this committee is trying to address it. We are working with the Association of State and Territorial Health Officers, in the Federation of State Medical Boards, and the Boards of Pharmacy. We do collect surveillance data from our household survey and working with our colleagues in the CDC.

So, part of the issue is monitoring the movement of individuals. Getting practitioners whether they're pharmacist, nurse practitioners, or physicians to monitor what is it that they're doing. Getting people to access and actually use the PDMPs and having interoperability as was pointed out. So -- and then involving community coalitions because -- it was just pointed out from the Representative from Florida. People know where the places are and what we need to do ...

GRIFFITH: Sure.

CLARK: ... is to get community coalitions (inaudible) ...

GRIFFITH: Well, that's why -- that kind of why I like that lock- in because then you lock them into a doctor and to a pharmacy if you know -- and I don't want to do that to the folks who haven't been identified as having a problem. But once you know they have a problem, then that gives you a better handle on what they're doing if you lock them in and that's the only place they can go. Wouldn't you agree then -- I need to hurry because I've got other things I want to ask.

CLARK: That is one strategy that can be employed. So you want to make sure that if you do that that they have access to the resources necessary to be a measure.

GRIFFITH: Sure. And here's the dilemma that we have because one of the things the DEAs has done -- and we talked about this the last time you were here, is that they are asking the distributors to, you know, say "OK, don't sell so much to a pharmacy if that pharmacy looks like they're above the average or if you see some sign that they maybe abusing." And I have told the story about what happened when I went to my local pharmacy. And there were two people in there who were both being told you have to come back next month which is not -- but a few days away because we use the (inaudible) intuitive that maybe they only had one supplier. And that supplier said, "Oh, he's above average for other people who may have more than one supplier." I went back and check and that's exactly what's going on. He didn't know that was the problem, but I said, "You only have one supplier, don't you?" He said, "Yes, I use one distributor." And I think that's the problem.

Is there -- so down on the one hand, we want to lock out people who are abusing it. On the other hand, we'll make sure people who've need it, get it. So, I guess what I'm saying in that second regard -- second matter is, for the rural areas, it maybe a problem because that's -- it's less law enforcement and we recognized that. And one of -- a lot of my region has different haida (ph) designations. At the same time, you want to make sure people are getting the drugs they need. And if you're in a rural area and you may only -- you have smaller pharmacy, you may only be using one distributor, while the DEA doesn't have a quota, the distributor then just put the quota (ph) because based on other pharmacies, that particular pharmacist or drugstore is ordering more drugs. But it's because they're only using one supplier supposed of using two or three. How do we solve that problem? And I think Volkow wants answer (ph) on this.

VOLKOW: Then I was smiling because the notion is we have situations where a patient cannot get their medication. And yet, at the same time, the DEA has to collect this massive amount of pills that people are not using, which tells you we are over prescribing the number of pills that are necessary. So, coming back to the point that has been discussing, we really need to educate the healthcare system on the optimal way of prescribing them. Not just when they need them. But the number of tablets that you need -- that you are given, I mean, all of us have the idea of going to the dentist, two weeks of opioid prescriptions. I mean, you need one day. So, it is the cold (ph) notion of educating the healthcare system and educating the late public. And making the responsibility tools are we not -- why do we need to provide so many pills and the insurer's can get involved to this type of solutions.

(UNKNOWN): And the lack in approach works as part of a treatment plan.

GRIFFITH: That's right. (UNKNOWN): That the -- with someone who suffers from chronic pain, the practitioner develops treatment plan, the patient agrees and that actually benefits everyone.

GRIFFITH: Oh, very good.

BURGESS: The given time has expired. And we will give an perhaps for second round. But, I wanted to go to Mr. Scalise because he's been waiting so long.

GRIFFITH: Absolutely.

SCALISE: Thank you for that Mr. Chairman and for our panelists for this important discussion. I know in my home parish of Jefferson, Louisiana where you've seen spikes and increase of drug related deaths over the last few years and each year just seem to be going up higher. When I talk to my coroner in Jefferson (inaudible) who works very closely in trying to, you know, of course, they see the end result of it, but they also try to work on a front end in doing some of the education that Dr. Clark has talked about.

In others, they've seen that that heroin is the one that seems to be popping out the most. I think last year, our heroin deaths accounted for a majority of all the drug-related deaths, over a hundred of those in my home parish. So Jefferson, like it's overseen as (ph) across the board. One of the things I do work on is just trying to educate people in the community. And I knew Dr. Clark, you've talked about this. In your testimony in alluding to work with, but not just pharmacist, but others, what is the, you know, what is the different things that you've been doing and then you've had success on the education front, especially not just within the medical community, but then the targeted populations of those folks that might have the highest likelihood of being exposed to heroin.

CLARK: Again, one of the things -- a comprehensive strategy becomes critical and that's when I talk with a prevention working with community coalitions so that we would got that message. We've already heard about the issue of chronic pain management. And people moving from the use of a prescription opioids to drugs like heroin. So having good strategies for pain treatment, working with state health -- the territorial health officers, federation of state medical boards, nursing organizations, dental organizations, and even veterinarians, because they too have access to prescription opioids, that we can address that end of the agenda. And then ...

(INAUDIBLE)

SCALISE: Mr. Rannazzisi ...

CLARK: ... like probably for the DEA.

SCALISE: ... answer this too because you, I know you talked about this in your testimony as well. So, if you can touch on your experiences there.

RANNAZZISI: We never turned down the opportunity to go out and speak to professional organizations. We have a very good relationship with -- a fine relationship in the associates and boards of pharmacy, the individual pharmacy associations, in the medical associations, when they ask us, we will come out. The Pharmacies Diversion Awareness Conference, we go out and we've been to 14 states and trained over 6,000 pharmacists in their corresponding responsibility. There have been trends (ph) in trafficking for pharmaceuticals to make them aware of what's going on so they know how to deal with this when a bad prescription comes in and what they're supposed to do.

We have industry conferences. We bring industry in. October of last year, we brought the distributors in to talk about what we're seeing trend wise and what they need to do as far as their legal obligations under the act. We bring the manufactures and importers in April or May of last year. We brought them in and we do this on a regular basis to show the trends in (ph) trafficking. We are out there educating as much as possible because it is one of the pillars in the pharmaceutical initiative that the White House is pushing for.

SCALISE: One of the things when you talk to the people on the ground or local and whether to its corners of law enforcement. There are lot of different federal programs out there and I do want to touch on that GAO report because there are some concerning issues that they raise that have been touched on a little bit but I want to get in to a little bit more. But, on that front, when you look at all the grants that are out there, I know in Louisiana, I think grants come in from five different departments through 30 different programs for some of these treatment programs. So there's lot of overlapping duplication.

But, is there a better way maybe to block grantees to put them together in a way that would be more flexible, and maybe Dr. Clark you can answer, are we giving states enough flexibility today? And with the duplication, can we do a better job and maybe consolidating those grants in a way that allow the states to do what they do best without having to go through so many different processes to so many different agencies where you have this duplication.

CLARK: Clearly, we have to work with the states in their exercises (ph), their discretion, and how to prioritize what it is that they've view as important epidemiologically in their jurisdiction. And so, we have supported the use of block grant funds to the discretion of the states and work with both the individual state authorities and the national organizations associated with that. We're also working with recovery-oriented organizations so that we've got peers, people who are recovering for substance use disorders to help speak up and carry out the message working with community coalitions and others, because indeed, they can tell a better story than professionals or regulators, et cetera. So the comprehensive ...

SCALISE: Let me apologize my time's about to go. I do want to at least ask for the record if I can get this information on the GAO report because it then identified you got the 115 different federal agencies, 76 different federal programs that all have abuse (ph) for prevention to treatment programs. And they also identified overlap of 59 of the 76 programs.

And so, I think Dr. Gingrey earlier asked Mr. Botticelli and Dr. Clark to talk about what your agencies are doing to address that overlap -- those problems that were identified in the GAO report if Mr. Sosin or Dr. Sosin, I'm sorry, Dr. Volkow, and Mr. Rannazzisi can also get me their information to just show what you all are doing to try to address the overlap problems that were raised in the GAO report. And with that all ...

BURGESS: Well, the gentleman's time has expired. I think that information will be generally interesting to the Committee. So, I hope the Committee staff will provide that information to ...

SCALISE: Would that be OK with getting that to the Committee. Thank you.

BURGESS: And the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas. Mr. Green, five minutes for your questions please.

GREEN: Thank you Mr. Chairman. And thank you all in the (ph) Committee for having this hearing. Prescription drug abuse is real growing and public threat that must be addressed. The consequence and reviews and addictions to opioids such as prescription pain relievers and heroin has a devastating effect on our communities. We comprehend a solution that protects public health, reserves patient access to the needed therapies and improved access to treatment.

Last week, an article was published in the New England Journal of Medicine discussing the Department of Health and Human Services efforts to address the prescription opioid overdose epidemic including improving access to the addiction treatment services.

Dr. Volkow, you are one of the authors of this article and Dr. Clark and Dr. Sosin, the heads of your respective agencies also are -- authored this article. The article makes it clear that the treatment addiction to prescription drugs and other opioids with proven approaches like Methadone and other medication assisted therapy is of crucial importance. It describes the importance of the Affordable Care Act in increasing access to care for many Americans including those who are struggling with addiction disorders.

Dr. Volkow, can you elaborate on how the ACA builds on the Mental Health Parity and Addiction Equity Act to improve on insurance coverage for people who are addicted to prescription drugs, heroin or other substance?

VOLKOW: Yes. The problem is that, as I mentioned in my testimony, is that less than one-third of patients that require that could benefit from opioid medications are getting them for the treatment of their addiction. And this reflects among other things the fact that many of the people that are addicted to drugs do not have an insurance and rely on the state funding to get their treatment.

And as a result of that, we have removed the healthcare system for a position where they could not just act in preventing substance use disorders but on treating them. The healthcare act by providing insurance to those that currently don't have it, will give them the opportunity in to be treated in the healthcare system for substance use disorders as well as in those instances where the addiction has not to cure for the healthcare system to intervene in prevention. So that's why it's so important.

GREEN: Dr. Clark, do you agree with that?

CLARK: Indeed. One of the -- when people who are -- who present for treatment can't get treatment or asked why they couldn't get treatment, of the largest reason is cost and access to treatment.

GREEN: Thank you. I understand the ACA provision creates an optional Medicaid state plan benefits for states to establish health homes for the coordination of beneficiaries with chronic conditions has also supported some states in their effort to address the drug abuse. Dr. Clark, can you elaborate on how the health home program has been official in tackling the problem of abuse?

CLARK: We've actually -- with regards to opioids, we've got several jurisdictions that are looking at health homes as a way of dealing with opioids. So, for months, one jurisdiction I think ruled out and I'll have to clarify that is also taking that approach. Comprehensive services being offered where persons care is adequately monitored offers us an opportunity to reduce some of the complexities associated with opioid misuse.

GREEN: Thank you. It's clear from the counter (ph), it's the Affordable Care Act makes it possible for many people with substance abuse disorders whether it's addiction to prescription drugs, heroin, and other substance access to treatment they so desperately need (ph).

Mr. Chairman, I know we've had our differences over the Affordable Care. I hope we all share the goal of writing more robust treatments to those who are working to overcome these addictions. And I'll yield back my time.

BURGESS: Gentlemen yields back. Our discussion with the Affordable Care Act will continue at a later date.

GREEN: I'm sure it will.

BURGESS: We have now I think heard from all members who wanted to ask a question. I would ask unanimous consent that a follow up question be allowed for those of us who remain.

(UNKNOWN): I don't have any problem with that. I can't stay but ...

BURGESS: Very well. But I wanted to get that unanimous consent agreed to before you left. So it's not just on my shoulders.

(UNKNOWN): I trust you Chairman.

BURGESS: Mr. Griffith, I interrupted you before. Do you have -- would you like to follow up on your line of questioning?

GRIFFITH: Well, I would just like to give an opportunity Mr. ...

RANNAZZISI: Rannazzisi.

GRIFFITH: Rannazzisi. Thank you. I'm sorry. I have such a hard time with it this morning. But Mr. Rannazzisi was about to comment on the dilemma that we have with the small rule pharmacist or pharmacy that has one distributor.

RANNAZZISI: Yes. And I want to thank you for clarifying that DEA has not set a quota downstream from the distributors. The distributors are working through their issues regarding due diligence to determine, you know, what -- if there's a problem pharmacy or it's not a problem pharmacy. I think that the rural of pharmacy present a specific problem because they do need to get medication to their patients. And they need that downstream supply. We're hoping that the distributors are on site looking at their operations before they completely cut off the distributor or limit -- pharmacy or limit the pharmacy. But again, it's a business practice and unfortunately, you know, I have no control over that business practices.

GRIFFITH: Well, I would just say, it's because of the concerns and the -- I'm sure some memos have been put out by the DEA trying to do -- we're all trying to do the right thing that has caused the distributor be concerned. And maybe, if there could be some acknowledgment from the DEA to the distributors, hey, you know, keeping an eye out of its rogue (ph). But if it's just you're looking at, you know, this pharmacy is more than another pharmacy, find out if they have just one distributor because that makes a huge difference in whether or not they're truly distributing more of the opioid than somebody else. And if you all could do that, that would greatly appreciated.

BURGESS: The gentleman yields back. I thank the gentleman for his follow up. Dr. Volkow, you made a statement that was really fairly provocative a few moments ago. And I just wanted to follow up on just a little bit with you with -- when you were discussing the effect of nicotine, alcohol on developing, but I guess you were talking about developing brains or. And then you added the liquidation (ph) of marijuana.

And as you not to say anything about the rightness or wrongness of the public policy, but as you know, this nation is right now engaged in a significant experiment where some states have legalized marijuana. Are you all studying that in the affect of this decriminalization in some states? Are we prepared for what might happen next?

VOLKOW: Yes. I mean, definitively and unfortunately, it's one of those experimental situations that is happening whether we like it or not. So, what we have done is provided, identify the grantees, our researchers in those communities where there has been legalization for recreational or medical purposes to actually give them a supplement money so that they can look at the consequences of these changes in policy in the educational systems, in accidents, in emergency room admissions, in productivity in the workforce.

We need to have evidence that can then hopefully can guide policy as suppose to doing policy in darkness on the beliefs of people. And what -- since you brought up the issue to one of the things that is also concerned as -- discussing the prescription, people are using prescriptions because they feel that are prescribed by physicians they cannot be so harmful. The notion that marijuana has so called medical purposes is also changing the perception of this broken (ph) not to be so harmful if it has medicinal properties. And the whole perception of risk is changing which again is open. The -- I mean, the willingness of drunk people to take marijuana and to consume it regularly.

BURGESS: Well, I do hope that you are monitoring the situation since society has provided you the experimental situation. I also hope that you're preparing to deal with what the downstream effects are from this rather bold social experiment to some of the states are undertaking right now. And I hope that's more than just sending more money to those states. I hope that is something that you are -- that oversight is happening at your level that there will be a national monitoring of this.

VOLKOW: We -- I mean, the way that we oversee research protocol is very, very rigorous. If the scientist is not producing or the methodology is not adequate, we do not fund them.

BURGESS: Let me -- I'm just speaking of downstream effects. There's also the issue and it was been brought up several times this morning. And if you feel free to comment on this, the issue of course the device by which the drug is administered and the possibility for exposure to hepatitis B or C or HIV are from a public health perspective, are we preparing ourselves for any differences in the incidents of these illnesses as a consequence of the delivery device?

(UNKNOWN): I'll start in that. You know, one of the main concerns of HHS has been obviously the increase of viral hepatitis and hepatitis C among the very young cohort of injection drug users. So, we're even working in concert with the Health and Human Services whereas to put forth actually an action plan to diminish viral hepatitis. And clearly, there's a lot of overlap in terms of the issues that we're talking about here. So, this is obviously a significant public health concern. So we want to make sure that we're dealing with this in a concerted way.

BURGESS: Yeah. And then of course the good news right now is hepatitis C is one of those things that -- make looks (ph) very well like there maybe a cure. It's not just on the horizon, but it's here. One problem is it's very expensive. And my differences -- Mr. Green over the Affordable Care Act to side (ph), they ultimately, there's someone is got to pay for that. So I hope we're doing the necessary -- I hope for monitoring and doing the necessary preventive things to keep that in check and to prevent the disease rather than just simply now being able to cure it with a very expensive therapy that thankfully is available.

Mr. Botticelli, did you have some additional observations on the issue of the states that are legalizing marijuana?

BOTTICELLI: I do. And what I wanted you to know is that in addition to that -- additional meta (ph) grants out there. Our office has actually convened a group of federal partners to look at that each criteria that the Department of Justice has laid out for Colorado and Washington and are really committed to gathering data on the Federal State and local level looking at what is the impact in terms of legalization in Colorado and Washington have on both the public health and public safety consequences that we have.

So in addition to some of the public health related work that Dr. Volkow has funded, we're also looking at what are the public safety consequences things like increase in drug driving, interstate transportation of marijuana from Colorado to other states. So our office has really been committed in terms of ensuring that we have good public health and public safety data to monitor what's happening in Colorado and Washington.

BURGESS: And Mr. Rannazzisi, I would assume that your agency is participating in that as well?

RANNAZZISI: It still has a schedule on control substance. We're still doing investigations concerning marijuana downstream.

BURGESS: And are you monitoring the downstream effects in neighboring states in the incidents as Mr. Botticelli talked about. The incidents who drive you all impaired (ph), the incidents of even just crime. Are you compiling those statistics so they will be available to policy makers in subsequent hearings?

RANNAZZISI: We are talking to our state and local counterparts in all the surrounding states. And we are gathering information. I don't know how -- all inclusive that information is because quite frankly the reporting, some of the state and locals are not keeping that type of information. But we are keeping tamps (ph) with our state, locals on what's going on within their states.

BURGESS: Very well ...

GRIFFITH: Mr. Chairman.

BURGESS: Yeah. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia.

GRIFFITH: I'd be reminiscing (ph) -- since we've taking on marijuana, not to mention that I've just introduced the bill to legalize the use of marijuana in medicinal circumstances that came (ph) to the Virginia plan that was passed in 1979. That requires a doctor's prescription thus changing the scheduling. The bill actually cost was changing in the scheduling. DEA is in a tough spot. Some of the states are doing it, but it's still scheduled one which means that the DEA has a hard time collecting the data that you just asked for without stumbling across felons that they're not prosecuting.

So they're in a catch 22 (ph). I think it's much better to have doctors and pharmacists and the regular system working, because then you get real data for your scientist to look at and see if it isn't effective as they designed it to be. So the bill doesn't go as far as Colorado or Washington might want it or the crazy California plan as I often call it. But it allows real doctors with real pharmacist and real distributors controlled that in under the laws of the United States to use true marijuana if it can be used in a real way medicinally.

BURGESS: Very good. The gentleman yields back. I'm all for (ph) giving doctors more power. That actually concludes all of the questions that we have from members. I've neglected to mention at the start of the hearing asking (inaudible) consented members written opening statements be introduced into the record without objection. The documents will be entered into the record.

In conclusion, I would like to thank all of our witnesses. I thank the members that have participated in today's hearing. I'll remind members they have 10 business days to submit questions for the record. And I'll ask the witnesses that all agreed to respond promptly to the question submitted in writing. That the subcommittee is adjourned, thank you for your attendance today.

White Sands' needs trump SunZia's wants

SECTION: EDITORIALS; Pg. A6

LENGTH: 454 words

On the national-security-prevails side of the debate, you have the U.S. Department of Defense, former White Sands Commander Brig. Gen. Gwen Bing-ham, U.S. Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M, and Gov. Susana Martinez.

On the green-energy-trumps-all side, you have SunZia, the U.S. Bureau of Land Management, Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., and a mysterious late entry - Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

On the fence are Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M, and Reps. Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham.

It's fair to say all acknowledge the importance of national security and green energy. At issue is whether there is a reasonable compromise to stringing 45 of SunZia's proposed 515 miles of electrical transmission lines across White Sands' call-up zone .

But at the end of the day, national security and the future of White Sands Missile Range and its 9,000-orso employees should not be up for compromise. Especially on a speculative private sector endeavor that would enrich private investors and a few high plains ranchers who lease their land for solar and wind farms.

SunZia would transport renewable energy from central New Mexico to Arizona, and the Land of Enchantment is uniquely situated to provide sun and wind power. But White Sands is a unique post, with ground-to-infinity unrestricted air space, top-notch infrastructure, thousands of trained workers and the experience and ability to test forward-looking military systems to defend the nation.

As Martinez points out in a letter to President Obama and Interior Secretary Sally Jewell, "the planned route for the project poses an unacceptable national security risk" and the lines should either be moved or buried.

According to Pearce, move or bury is also the conclusion of a still-classified report commissioned at Heinrich's request from MIT Lincoln Laboratory. Heinrich and SunZia maintain it says just the opposite, but since it has yet to be released, it's another he-said/he-said situation.

Then there's Reid, who might just be a real efficiency/green-energy guy. The first paragraphs of his letter supporting SunZia touts the Rapid Response Team for Transmission, created to help solve permitting and other problems with renewable energy projects. Then again, this is the same guy who has kept Yucca Mountain shuttered while WIPP takes government nuclear waste and public criticism. A cynic might wonder if Reid now could be trying to strengthen the positions of Nevada's four military bases should another Defense Base Closure and Realignment Commission come along.

It is unfortunate the SunZia project has been couched as a choice between green energy and national security. But if the power line truly can't be moved or buried, national security should be the choice.

LUJAN HIGHLIGHTS IMPORTANT IMPACT OF PRESCRIPTION DRUG TAKE-BACK DAY;
Commends Santa Fe County for Collecting 600 Pounds of Medication;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 342 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District highlighted the impact that National Prescription Take-Back Day had in New Mexico, where more than 600 pounds of medication was collected in Santa Fe County. Lujan commended the county and all those who participated by bringing their unwanted medications to one of the many locations for safe disposal.

"By collecting more than 600 pounds of prescription drugs, in Santa Fe County alone, and much more throughout the state, New Mexicans who participated in National Prescription Drug Take-Back Day have played an important role the fight against prescription drug abuse," Congressman Lujan said. "While Prescription Drug Take-Back Day is only a small part of what must be a larger effort to combat drug abuse, it is encouraging to see its success in Santa Fe County, and know that a significant amount of prescription drugs have been properly disposed of."

Last week, Rep. Lujan encouraged New Mexicans to take the opportunity on Saturday to dispose of unneeded or expired medicine in an effort to ensure these prescription drugs don't end up in the wrong hands. In 2012, over 60 percent of people who used prescription drugs for non-medical purposes obtained them from family or a friend - which highlights the importance of disposing of unneeded medication.

"As we continue to come together as a community and encourage our family, friends, and neighbors to live a healthy lifestyle, it is critical that we recognize the role prescription drugs have in people's lives. Every year we see an increasing number of lives claimed by prescription drug abuse," added Lujan. "Prescription Drug Take-Back events not only reduce the amount of unwanted drugs, but draw attention to the fact that we all have a role to play in this effort. Every step we take to safely dispose of prescription drugs has the potential to save lives in our communities."

TEXT:

BURGESS: Good morning. I now convene the hearing of the Subcommittee of Oversight Investigations entitled "Examining the Growing Problems of Prescriptions Drug and Heroine Abuse."

Just a brief housekeeping detail for those of you who are expecting to see Dr. Murphy here in the Chair, he was called away back to his district for a family issue, so you're stuck me as the saying goes, but we will get through this together.

On the issue of prescription drug and heroine abuse, these separate and distinct problems, but unfortunately they do share a common endpoint addiction abuse, overdose and death.

As we know the abuse of prescription drugs and illegal drugs such heroine have plagued our nation for decades. However, over the last several months, there have been increasing reports that prescription drug and heroine abuse in communities around the country continues to grow. Sadly, those reports indicate that overdose deaths as a result of prescription drug and heroine are also on the rise. Families have lost sons and daughters, mothers and fathers to this addiction.

Data from the Federal agencies charged with addressing drug abuse paint a startling picture of the severity of the public health crisis. Prescription drug abuse kills more than 16,000 people a year. From 2007 to 2012, heroine use rose by almost 80 percent in this country and 3,000 people died each year from heroine overdoses.

The United States Attorney General Eric Holder declared recently that heroine abuse constitutes "An urgent and growing public health crisis". Certainly, there is a law enforcement aspect to solving this problem and stopping the bad actors who illegally distribute prescription drugs or traffic heroine. But the other part of the equation is treating the addiction, the addiction to prescription drug and heroine and preventing deaths. The answer to a burgeoning heroine epidemic, as the administration has called it, is not to wage war on all opioids. To address a complex to solution cannot be simple.

The purpose of today's hearing is to examine the federal response, including the public health response to prescription drug and heroine abuse. Our oversight has revealed that this is a complex problem. Those who abuse drugs also have often an underlying mental illness. Treating their addiction means that the underlying mental illness must be successfully diagnosed and treated.

As testimony of Mr. Botticelli states, the substance abuse is a "progressive disease." Those who suffer from addiction often started at young age with alcohol, maybe marijuana move on to other drugs like opioids. In examining opioid abuse, we must also consider the factors that lead people to abuse and what we are doing to address those factors.

Many Americans also suffer from chronic and debilitating pain. It's important to remember that the millions of individuals who safely use opioid narcotics under the guidance of their physicians, pain and we that a loved one would never have to suffer is involved.

As Dr. Volkow of NIH recognizes in her testimony, we need to recognize the special character of prescription drug abuse. On the one hand, we have a growing prescription drug and opiate addiction. On the other, we have a very real need for these drugs to treat chronic pain, treat acute pain and alleviate suffering where it exists, especially in patients with chronic conditions who are suffering from illnesses like cancer. These drugs are safe when used as directed. It is their improper use that leads to abuse, overdose and death.

Over recent years, we've heard a great deal about doctor shopping, about pill mills, and about the efforts of the Prescription Drug Monitoring Plans to address these problems. We need to ensure that doctors and pharmacists have the tools at their disposal to adequately fill their role in ensuring appropriate prescribing. But addicts also get these drugs through illegal channels, such as rogue Internet pharmacies, off the street and obtaining them through family members who may have out dated prescription. Although some question whether federal efforts to crackdown and prevent prescription drug abuse have contributed to the recent rise in heroine abuse and whether this should have been anticipated, there's no question that both are on the rise. And as a consequence we have a responsibility to recognize and solve that problem.

While most prescription drug abusers do not go on to abuse heroine there is data from the Whitehouse Office of National Drug Control Policy and the Substance Abuse in Mental Health Services Administration that indicates over 80 percent of people who started using heroine in 2008 to 2010 had previously abused prescription drugs.

The federal government is devoting resources to drug control programs. Some would say significant--some would say significant resources over $25 billion annually, of which about $10 billion goes towards drug abuse, prevention and treatment programs across 19 different federal agencies. We will ask today's witnesses to identify the specific policies to programs, the initiatives that have the most effective in combating prescription drug and heroine abuse and which have not. With 19 agencies having a hand in over 70 drug controlled programs we need to know what is working and what is not. What can we do better? Is oversight by the federal agencies also an important issue as a significant funding a block granted to the states for their treatment programs.

Testifying before us today are representatives of five the agencies with lead roles in addressing opiate abuse. Mr. Michael Botticelli, the Acting Director of the White House Office national Drug Control Policy, Mr. Daniel Sosin of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, Dr. Nora Volkow of the National Institute on Drug Abuse, Dr. Westley Clark of the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration and Mr. Joseph Rannazzisi of the Drug Enforcement Agency. This is a prestigious panel, and we are very grateful for you presence here today. We certainly look forward to your testimony. I would now like to recognize for five minutes for the purposes of opening statement the Ranking Member Ms. DeGette of Colorado.

DEGETTE: Thank you so much Mr. Burgess and we're glad to have you presiding today.

Prescription drug and heroine abuse is a public health crisis, and its growing everyday. In many communities across the country, we're seeing an epidemic of opioid overdose deaths. I'm interested in learning from the panel about what more we can do to prevent the abuse of these drugs and also to save lives. The non-medical use of opiates has escalated in recent years. In 2011, hospitals tallied nearly half a million emergency room visits related to these medications, the number of these visits nearly tripled over a seven-year period. The link between prescription opioid use and heroine abuse is also deeply troubling. And as the chairman noted, only a small percentage of people who used pain relievers go on to abuse heroine but the opposite is not true. The vast majority of those who abuse heroine previous abused prescription drugs.

While far more people can continue to abuse prescription drugs, the number of individuals who reported using heroine nearly doubled between 2007 and 2012. There's also evidence to suggest the people who abuse prescription drugs move on to heroine as pain relievers become less available or too costly. At 2012 study in the New England Journal of Medicine found heroine use rose dramatically after the introduction of an abused deterrent form of Oxycotin. The use of drugs that ultimately lead to addiction and abuse often begins innocently.

The majority of people who illegally use a prescription drug get that drug from a friend or a family member often and sometimes the drug has been stolen. But in other times, a parent may even give the drug to a child unaware of the risks. We must educate patients on the dangers of abuse of these drugs as well as the need to properly store and dispose of them. If we could reduce inappropriate access to drugs, we can also reduce the incidence of their abuse. We must change the public perception of the prescription opioids. We face the inaccurate perception that just because the drug legal, it is somehow less harmless, less addictive and less risky.

Providers should also be better educated on the use and potential abuse of these drugs, so they can be more effective in recognizing problems of abuse and in turn more effective in educating and treating the patients. Study show that even brief interventions by health care providers can be successful in reducing or eliminating substance abuse by patients who began abusing prescription opioids but have not yet become addicted to them.

When prescribed appropriately, these medicines provide much needed relief and many patients have had their suffering reduced by opiate pain killers. However, a patient with an acute short-term pain may be able to find relief from a less addictive pain killer. Prescription drug abuse is a public health problem and it's not just law enforcement problem. Reducing this abuse will require a multi- faceted approach and partnership among federal state and local agencies. Every state should effectively use prescription drug monitoring programs.

These databases help states identify and address drug diversion so they should be as robust and effective as possible. State should be able to share information with due regard for privacy expectations. Information should be added to the databases regularly including by encouraging prescribers and pharmacist to use the databases. When used, they can help doctors and public health authorities to prevent and respond to the potential devastating effects of prescription drug abuse.

I'm interested in learning from our witnesses today about the effects of this medication assisted treatment that we're hearing about, and also whether we have the resources to meet the demand for these treatment programs. I'm also interested in learning about the state of research into new medications with lower abuse potential and how we can expand access to over doors interventions like Nexium.

Prescription opioid and heroine abuse as you said Mr. Chairman is a serious public health treat. I look forward to hearing from all of the witnesses and to working with all of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to ensure that Congress plays a vital role in protecting families from the growing danger of these drugs and yield back the bouncing my time.

BURGESS: The young lady yields back. The Chair now recognizes gentlelady from Tennessee. Five minutes for purposes of opening statement, please.

BLACKBURN: Thank you Mr. Chairman. And I know we are all cheering for Congressman Murphy and his daughter as they are about to welcome that new baby into their family. What an exciting, exciting time. I can only tell you the joys of being a grandparent are marvelous. It is a big part of my day.

Well, I thank you for the attention that we are putting on this issue. Prescription drug and heroine abuse are epidemic in our country. And I think you can tell by what is being said in this room this morning. It is an issue that our Committee is concerned about. And I applaud the efforts of the committee to take a very thoughtful approach in process as how we move forward. It is clear that we need to understand the factors that have contributed to the rise and prescription drug and heroin abuse.

We need to understand which prevention treatment and law enforcement efforts are the most effective in reducing the abuse of prescription drug and heroin. Another side of this issue are the millions of Americans who have legitimate need for prescription medication for the control of pain. Reduction of anxiety began the overall improvement of their lives. These medications must be available to them. HR 4069 the Ensuring Patient Access and Effective Drug Enforcement Act to the 2013 that is a bill by Representative Marino and I. It will establish a combating prescription drug abuse working group.

This group will include members from the DEA, FDA, ONDCP, state Attorney Generals, patient groups, pharmacies industry, healthcare providers and others. Within one year of enactment, the working group shall provide. They must do this provide recommendation is a congress on initiatives to reduce prescription drug diversion and abuse. We think this is the right approach. We welcome each about were witnesses we look forward to hearing your testimony and to the discussion. And with that, Mr. Chairman, I yield back my time or to anyone who is seeking time.

BURGESS: Seem no one seeking time. Gentlelady yields back. The Chair now recognizes the Ranking Member of the Full Committee, Mr. Maxman, five minutes for opening statement, please.

WAXMAN: Thank you Mr. Chairman for holding this important hearing today.

We're here to discuss the epidemic of opioid abuse. The numbers of stark each year approximately 17,000 people die from prescription opioid overdoses, and 3,000 died from heroin overdoses.

For far too long, prescription opioid pain relievers were prescribed too easily, without enough attention paid to the potential risks, and a large number people became addicted. Some of those who became addicted to prescription opioid eventually moved on to heroin, because that's a cheaper alternative offering the same high.

Fortunately, there are steps that we can take to fight this problem. I appreciate our witnesses being here today to discuss their efforts to educate the public and providers about the dangerous of abusing these drugs. We'll also hear how we can change prescribing practices monitor the use opioids, effectively treat those who are addicted, and investigate and prosecute those involve in diverting and trafficking these drugs.

Our five witnesses Mr. Rannazzisi from DEA, Mr. Botticelli from ONDCP, Mr. Sosin from CDC, Mr. Volkow from NIH, and Dr. Clark from SAMHSA represent an all-star panel of experts. We're delighted that you're here.

There are many reasons that be thankful for the launch of the Affordable Care act. Let me repeat that, there are many reasons to be thankful for the launch of the Affordable Care Act. One that is often overlooked is the help the law offers to individuals addicted to prescription opioids and heroin. The lack of insurance and the high cost of treatment can presented an insurmountable barrier to receiving the health they need.

The Affordable Care Act addresses this problem by expanding insurance coverage and requiring all policies to cover the concepts substance abuse services. This will mean that millions of individuals with addiction disorders will have access to the tools they need to have break their addictions.

We need to build upon this hopeful step and increase our efforts to comeback this epidemic.

And Mr. Chairman at this point, I wish to yield the balance of my time to Welch from Vermont.

WELCH: I thank the member from California for yielding. And I thank the Committee for having this hearing. But I want to give some credit to Governor Peter Shumlin of Vermont. He just something extremely unusual. He dedicated his entire stay to the state address to the single problem. And that was of all his decision for two reasons. One, most of the times the state to the state is a under lists objectives and hopes. This got very specific about one topic.

But second, in taking this on, he made public what people new was real but didn't want to acknowledge. And what we seen in Vermont as a result in that, was that we're facing what is the terrible problem but it creates enormous anxiety for the folks that are in the grip of this addiction. But their families -- and before we begin talking about this, it was restricted to our law enforcement folks and our mental health folks who are dealing with these isolated individuals, as though, they were the only ones in the world that face this incredible challenge.

And what Governor Shumlin did is he brought out in the open and that was enlarged part because he's travels around and governors do get around. Just talking to our law enforcement people like Chief Taylor in St. Albans, like Chief Baker in Rutland. And they were dealing on the street with kids that they knew and with adults that they knew who had jobs. But have this horrible addiction and they have to deal with it.

And what our police kept saying who have front line responsibilities, you can not arrest your way out of this. And there is a distinction that they make between the dealers who came from out of state and starts deflecting our kids and other with this opioid addiction, you know, throw to book at them and forget about them.

But a lot of the kids who are in the grip, they are kids. They got a future. They got a challenge. And what has happen in our communities with the leadership of our police and our mental health people, and our Mayor like Liz Gamache in Saint Albans and like Chris Louras in Rutland is that by bringing this out into the open, it helped us talk about this in concrete ways so that there's not only the treatment program the (inaudible) program which I hope you might talk about. But it also is allowing parents in the community to see this is something where we all have to be engage to provide some basis to support for these kids and adults who want not to be in the grip of this horrible opioid addiction. So, I thank you the committee for having this hearing and making it a collective effort to try to bring our resources together to help people get hold. Thank you.

BURGESS: The gentleman yields back. I would now like to introduce the witnesses on the panel for today's hearing. Mr. Michael Botticelli is the Acting Director of the Office Of National Drug Control Policy in the Executive Office of the President, Dr. Daniel Sosin, he is the Acting Director of the National Center for Injury Prevention and Control at the Center For Disease Prevention, Dr. Nora Volkow is the Director of the National Institute on Drug Abuse at the National Institute of Health, Dr, Wesley Clark is the Director of the Center for Substance Abuse Treatment within the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, and Mr. Joseph Rannazzisi is the Deputy Assistant Administrator in the Office Diversion Control within the Drug Enforcement Agency at the United States Department of Justice.

I will swear in the witnesses as you're aware to committee is holding -- this committee is holding an investigative hearing, and when doing so has have the practice of taking testimony under oath. Do you have any objections to testifying under oath this morning?

Seeing a negative response from the witnesses, the Chair then advises that under the rules to the House or the rules to the Committee, you are entitled to be advised by council. Do any of our witnesses desired to be advised by council during testimony today? And negative response was received from the panel witnesses. In that case, if you would please rise and raise your right hand I will swear you in.

Do you swear that the testimony you are about to give this the truth the whole truth and nothing by the truth.

Let it be noted that the witnesses answer affirmatively. You're now under oath. In subject to penalty set forward in Title 18, Section 1001 of the United States Code. We would now welcome a five-minute summary of your written statements. We will start with Mr. Botticelli and moved down the table.

BOTTICELLI: Chairman Burgess, Ranking Member DeGette, and members of the Subcommittee. I want to thank you for the opportunity to appear today to discuss the tremendous public health and safety issues surrounding the diversion and abuse of opioid drug, including many prescription pain killers and heroin in the United States.

I know that given reason media attention to overdose test. There was high in public interest in the threat of opioid drug use. But this is something many communities have been dealing with her very long time and it's a matter of great concern for this administration.

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, drug overdose deaths primarily driven by prescription opioids, now surpass homicides and traffic crashes and the number of injury deaths in America.

In 2010 the latest here (ph) for which nationwide data are available. Approximately, 100 Americans died on average from overdose everyday. Prescription analgesics were involved, you know, most 17,000 of those deaths that year and heroin was involved in about 3,000.

In more recent data posted by several states indicates that death from heroin continue to increase. While heroin use remains relatively low in the United States as compared to other drugs, there has been a troubling increase in the number of people using heroin in recent years, from 373,000 past year users in 2007 to 669,000 in 2012.

It is clear that we cannot arrest our way out of the drug problem. Science has shown us that drug addiction is the disease of the brain, a disease that can be prevented, treated and from which one, can recover.

We know that substance use disorders include those driven by opioids are progressive disease. Many people who develop a substance use disorder begin using at a young age and often start with alcohol, tobacco, and or marijuana. We know that as an individual's abuse of prescription opioids becomes more frequent or chronic, that person is more inclined to purchase the drugs from dealers or obtain prescriptions from multiple doctors rather than simply getting it from a friend or relative for free or without asking.

This progression of an opioid use disorder may lead an individual to pursue a lower cost alternatives such as heroin. With these circumstances in mind, we release the Obama administration's inaugural National Drug Control Strategy in 2010 in which we set out a wide array of actions to expand public health interventions and criminal justice reforms to reduce drug use and its consequences in the United States. That strategy noted opioid overdose as a growing national crisis and set specificals for reducing drug use including heroin.

Three years ago, the Administration released the first comprehensive action plan to combat the prescription drug abuse epidemic. The Prescription Drug Abuse Prevention Plan strikes a balance between the need to prevent diversion and abuse and the need to ensure legitimate access to prescription pain medications.

The plan expands on the National Drug Control Strategy and brings together a variety of federal state, local and tribal partners to support one, the expansion of state based prescription drug monitoring programs, two, more convenient and environmentally responsible disposal methods for removing expired or unneeded medication from the home, three, education for patients and training of healthcare providers in the proper prescribing practices and treatment of substance use disorders, and four, reducing the prevalence of pill mills and doctor shopping through enforcement efforts.

This work has been paralleled by efforts to address heroin trafficking and use. The Administration is also focusing on several key areas to reduce and prevent opioid overdoses including educating the public about overdose risk and interventions, increasing access to naloxone and emergency overdose reversal medication. And working with states to promote Good Samaritan laws and other measures that can help save lives, because police are often the first on seen of an overdose, the Administration strongly encourages local law enforcement agencies to train and equip their personnel with this life-saving drug.

It is not enough, however, to save a life from an overdose. A smart public health approach requires us to catch the signs and symptoms of substances early before it develops into a chronic disorder. We have been encouraging the use of screening and brief intervention to catch risky substance use before it becomes an addiction.

And since only 11 percent of those who need substance use disorder treatment in 2012 actually received it, the Administration has dramatically expanding access to treatment. The Affordable Care Act and Federal parity law are extending access to substance use disorders and mental health benefits for an estimated 62 million Americans helping to close the treatment gap and integrate substance use treatment into mainstream healthcare. This represents the largest expansion of treatment access in the generation and can help guide millions into successful recovery.

The standard of care for treating substance use disorder is driven by heroin or prescription opioids involves the use of medication-assisted treatment, and approach to treating opioid addiction that utilizes behavioral therapy along with FDA approved medications either methadone, buprenorphine or nalterxone.

Medication-assisted treatment has already helped thousands of people in long-term recovery. And I applaud the recent comment carried by my HHS colleagues and the New England Journal of Medicine to expand the use of medications to treat opioid addiction and reduce overdose deaths.

There are sometimes that our national efforts are working. The number of Americans 12 and older initiating the nonmedical use of prescription opioids in the past year has decreased significantly since 2009. Additionally, according to the latest Monitoring the Future survey, the rate of past year use of OxyContin or Vicodin among high school seniors in 2013 is at its lowest since 2002.

And recent studies have shown that implementation of robust naloxone distribution programs and the expansion of medication- assisted treatment can reduce mortality and also be cost effective.

However, continuing challenges with prescription opioids and the reemergence of heroin use underscore the need for leadership at all levels of government. We will, therefore, continue to work with our federal state tribal and community partners to continue to reduce and prevent the health and safety consequences of prescription opioids and heroin.

Thank you for the opportunity to address the Committee today.

BURGESS: The gentleman yields back. The Chair recognizes Dr. Sosin for purposes of five-minute opening statement, please.

SOSIN: Good morning, Chairman Burgess and members of the Subcommittee. Thank you for the opportunity to testify about the public health issues related to prescription drug overdoses and the Centers for Disease Control and Preventions role in preventing them.

It is an honor to be with you today to talk about CDC's approach to prescription drug overdoses and the prevention of them.

Drug overdose death rates are higher than they have ever been. With prescription opioids being a key driver of this trend, more than 125,000 Americans have died from prescription opioid overdoses in the last decade. CDC has played an important role in raising the visibility of the health impact of prescription opioid overdoses in helping to identify the role of increased opioid prescribing and fueling this epidemic.

Research also suggests that the growth in heroin use maybe due impart to the increase addiction cost by the rise in prescribing of opioid pain relievers.

The doubling in heroin use in the past six years is worrisome trend and undoubtedly has a relationship to prescription opioids, reducing inappropriate opioid prescribing as one of the approaches needed to keep people from becoming addicted to opioids and preventing them from later transitioning to heroin. Because of the complexity of these issues, the response demands engagement from a diverse group of federal state and local partners. The partners at this table are all critical in the overall goal to reduce abuse and overdose of opioids while ensuring that patients with pain are safely and effectively treated.

As the nation's health protection agency, CDC is focused on upstream drivers of this epidemic and this instance, the prescribing behaviors that created and continued to fuel this crisis. Our approach fits into three pillars that leverage CDC's unique expertise. One, improving data quality and use to monitor the trends and causes of the epidemic, timely drug specific information on prescribing and the health of facts of prescription drugs is critical. We generate, use and improve data to identify threats, assess local trends and evaluate the impact of prevention measures.

Two, strengthening state prevention efforts. States maintain Prescription Drug Monitoring Programs or PDMPs. They regulate healthcare professionals and institutions. They monitor the problem through their health departments and they run large public insurance programs including Medicaid. CDC provides resources and technical assistance to states to implement interventions and evaluate and adapt their approach to have the most impact.

And three, improving patient safety by supporting healthcare providers and systems with tools and data needed to respond effectively. For example, CDC is working to promote responsible opioid prescribing through guidelines and decision support tools. While CDC has ongoing work in each of these areas, we are focusing this year on accelerating state prevention efforts. We will be funding 45 state health departments for up to a total of $2 million per year to implement and evaluate the strategies I just outlined.

The 2015 President's Budget includes a request for $15.6 million in new funds to expand CDC's Core Violence and Injury Prevention Program, which is a state based program addressing injury and violence prevention. This will allow us to include additional states with a high burden of prescription drug overdose to prevent injuries and violence and expand the investments of these programs on reducing prescription drug overdose.

In conclusion, prescription drug abuse and overdose is a serious public health problem in United States. The burden of prescription drug abuse and overdose affects people of all walks of life and many sectors of our economy. Addressing this complex problem requires a multi-faceted approach and collaboration.

CDC is committed to tracking and understanding the epidemic, supporting states working on the frontlines of this crisis, and rigorously evaluating what works to improve patient safety, prevent overdoses and save lives.

Thank you again for the opportunity to be here today.

BURGESS: Thank you, the gentleman yields back. The Chair recognizes Dr. Volkow for five minutes for an opening statement. Thank you.

VOLKOW: These are component of the NIH to speak about the value of science in helping address the problem from the diversion and abuse of prescription opioid pain killers and the related rising abuse of heroin.

Opioid medications are the most effective intervention we currently have for management severe pain. Unfortunately, these drugs, not only inhibit pain centers in the brain, but they are also potently activate brain reward regions which is why they are abuse and they can cause addiction.

So we face the unique challenge of preventing their abuse while safeguarding their value for managing severe pain which, if untreated, is terribly debilitating.

It is estimated that 2.1 million Americans are addicted to opioid pain killers which reflects in part the wide spread availability of these drugs.

Indeed, the number of yearly prescriptions for opioids has more than double over the past 20 years from 76 million to 207 million prescriptions per year. During that period, that in parallel, so a fourfold increase in overdoses -- death overdoses from prescription opioids.

Pain killers like OxyContin and Vicodin affect the brain similarly to heroin. They interact with exactly the same opioid receptors. Their difference depends on their potency, that is how strongly they activate those receptors and how rapidly they do so. So as for heroin, they can produce euphoria which some abusers of prescription medications intensify by taking higher doses, crushing the pills so that they can snort them or inject them, or taking them in combination with other drugs like alcohol and benzodiazepines.

These practices make opioids far more dangerous, not only because they are more addictive, but also because they increase the risk for respiratory depression which is the main cause of death from overdoses.

Recent trends, as the other witnesses have mentioned, also indicate the rising heroin abuse which currently affects more than half million Americans and this rise is possibly driven in part by people switching from prescription opioids to heroin because it is cheaper and some instances more available.

Heroin is dangerous, not just because of its high addictiveness and overdose risk that it posses, but also because it is frequently injected which increases the risk of diseased like HIV and hepatitis C predominantly from the use of contaminated injection material.

So what is NIDA doing about the problem? We're funding research in three major areas. One, research that will allow us to manage pain more effectively, research that will allow us to in -- prevent deaths from overdoses, from opioids, and our research will allow us to treat substance use disorders more effectively including prescription medications.

As it relates to the safe management of pain, we still don't know enough about the risk for addiction among chronic pain patients or about how pain mechanisms in the brain interrupt with prescriptions opioid to influence their addictive potential, but ongoing research will help us clarify some of these issues.

So with respect to treatment, we're funding research to develop non-opioid based analgesics that are nonaddictive. Opioid medications that have less risk for diversion and abuse as -- given by different formulations or different ways of administering them. And finally, non-medication strategies for such as transcranial magnetic stimulation or electrical brain stimulation for the management of pain.

Research related to preventing overdoses making the effective opioid overdose antidote naloxone, which is very safe, more available, will help prevent many deaths. The FDA recently approved the hand- held auto-injector of naloxone that patients and others can use easily.

NIDA is supporting the development of user-friendly naloxones in the form of nasal spray to be used by non-medical personnel or the overdose victim.

Also, since many overdoses of when no one is around or during sleep, NIDA is supporting the development of self-activated systems that initiate an emergency response when wireless ends or signal than of an overdose is abhorring (ph).

As it relates to opioid addiction, methadone, buprenorphine or nalterxone have been shown to be effective in treating opioid addiction and in preventing overdoses. But these medications are not dangerous widely. NIDA is working to overcome the barriers that interfere with their adoption.

In parallel, research of new interventions such as vaccines for heroin will allow us to treat this problem in a different way and to prevent it.

Additionally, we work with our partner, CDC, SAMHSA, ONDCP and ONC in implementing and evaluating evidence based interventions.

Again, I want to thank you for recognizing the urgency of the problem post by the abuse of prescription opioids and for inviting NIDA to this (inaudible) science and help address this problem.

BURGESS: The Chair thanks the doctor, gentlelady yields back. The Chair recognizes Dr. Clark five minutes for the purposes of summarizing your opening statement, please.

Your microphone, sir.

CLARK: Thank you for inviting Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration to participate in this panel. I echoed (ph) the testimony of my colleagues regarding the importance of the topics of this hearing. I'll focus on census, programs and activities, but I want to point out that we've worked with our federal partners with states, tribes and local communities.

According to the National Survey on Drug Use and Health which SAMHSA conducts 4.9 million people reported non-medical use of pain relievers during the past month in 2012. 335,000 reported past month use of heroin, it figured that has more than doubled in six years.

In 2012, more than 1.89 million people reported initiating non- medical use of pain relievers. And 156,000 reported initiating the use of heroin. One challenge in combating the misuse of pain relievers is educating the public on dangerous of sharing medications.

According to our national survey, 54 percent of those who obtained pain relievers or non-medical use in the past year received them from a friend or relative for free. Another 14.9 percent either bought them or took them from a friend or relative. Thus, we have both a public health problem intertwined with the cultural problem. SAMHSA has several programs focused on educating the public including the not worth the risk even if it's legal campaign which encourages parents to talk to their teens about preventing prescription drug abuse.

Our prevention of prescription abuse in the workplace effort supports programs who are employers, employees and their families. Our partnership for success grant includes prescription drug abuse prevention as one of the capacity building activities in communities of high need. Our Screening, Brief Intervention and Referral to Treatment program include screening for illicit drugs including heroin and other opioids. We've developed programs to help physicians maintain a balance between providing appropriate pain management and minimizing the risk of pain medication misuse.

Our SBIRT Medical Residency program includes the modules of prescription opioids for pain management and opioid misuse. Over 6,000 medical residents and over 13,700 non-residents have been trained nationally. Our Physician Clinical Support System for Medication Assisted Treatment training is available via live in- person, live online and recorded modules accessible at anytime.

SAMHSA funds the Prescriber's Clinical Support System for opioids therapist in collaborative project led by the American Academy of Addictions Psychiatry with six other leading medical societies. We will be funding a Provider's Clinical Support System on the appropriate use of opioids in the treatment of pain in opioid related addiction this fiscal year.

Last week's article in the New England Journal of Medicine authored by HHS leadership, including Dr. Volkow and SAMHSA's administrator, describes the underutilization of vital medications and addiction treatment services, and discusses ongoing efforts by major public health agencies to encourage their use.

Medication-assisted treatment includes three strategies. Agonist therapy which includes methadone maintenance. Partial agonist therapy which includes buprenorphine. And antagonist therapy which uses an extended release injectable nalterxone or vivitrol.

SAMHSA is responsible for overseeing the regulatory compliance of certified Opioid Treatment Programs which use methadone and or buprenorphine for treatment of opioid addiction.

We estimate that there are approximately 300,000 people receiving methadone maintenance. There are currently 26,000 physicians with a waiver prescribe buprenorphine of this 7,700 unauthorized to prescribe up to a hundred patients.

We estimate that there are 1.2 million people receiving buprenorphine. SAMHSA also issued an advisory encouraging drug cohorts to utilize vivitrol in their treatment programs.

In August of 2013, we published the Opioid Overdose Toolkit to educate families and first respondents, individuals, prescribing providers and community members about steps to take, to prevent and treat opioid overdose including the use of naloxone. When administered quickly and effectively, naloxone restores breathing to a victim in the throes of an opioid overdose. This can be use as a teachable moment to asses treatment need and refer the person to the appropriate resources.

We inform states and jurisdictions that the Substance Abuse Prevention and Treatment Block Grant primary prevention set-aside funds maybe utilized to support overdose prevention education and training.

In addition, we notified jurisdiction, the block grants other than the primary prevention set-aside funds maybe used to purchase naloxone. And then necessary materials to assemble overdose kits to cover the cost associated with the dissemination of such kits.

SAMHSA continues to focus on our mission of reducing the impact of substance abuse and mental illness on America's communities. We thank the Subcommittee Chairman and members for conveying this important hearing, and providing SAMHSA with the opportunity to address these very critical issues.

BURGESS: The gentleman yields back. The Chair now recognizes Mr. Rannazzisi five minutes for purposes of summarizing your test testimony, please sir.

RANNAZZISI: Thank you Chairman Burgess, distinguished Members of the Subcommittee, on behalf of DE Administrator Michelle Leonhart, the men and women of the Drug Enforcement Administration, I want to thank you for the opportunity to discuss today the relationship between prescription opioids and heroin and how DEA is addressing the public health problem.

First, let me say that the President State of Affairs is not a surprise. DEA has been concerned about the connection between the rising prescription, opioid diversion and abuse problem in rising heroin trafficking use for several years. The DEA believes that increased heroin use is driven by many factors including the increase in the misuse and abuse of prescription opioids. The science had been there for sometime now.

Law enforcement agencies across the country have been reporting an increase in heroin use by teens and young adults who began their cycle of abuse with prescription opioids. Treatment providers report that opioid addicted individuals switched between prescription opioids and heroin depending on price and availability. Non-medical prescription opioid is used particularly by teens and young adults who can easily lead to heroin use, heroin traffickers know all this. And a relocating to areas with prescription drug abuse is on the rise.

To give you an example, we know that many teens and young adults first get their prescription opioids for free from medicine cabinets or friends. But assume that a teenager gets hydrocodone schedule III prescription opioid. And also most -- the most prescribed drug in the United States from a family medicine cabinet or a friend. Once that free source runs out, it could cost just a little between $5 and $7 a tablet on the street. But then the teen will eventually need more opioid to get the same effect that he's trying to achieve.

Black market sales for prescription drugs are typically five to ten times the retail value. On the street, a schedule II prescription opioid can cost anywhere from $40 to $80 per tablet depending on the relative strike of the drug. These increasing costs make it difficult to continue purchasing especially for teens and young adults who don't have steady sources of income.

Given the high cost to maintain this high, the teenager turns to heroin at a street cost of generally $10 a bag. The teenager gets a high similar the one he got when he abused prescription drugs. It's just that easy. Any long-term solution or reduced opioid abuse must include actions to address prescription drug diversion and misuse, while also educating the public about the dangerous of non-medical use of pharmaceuticals educating prescribers and pharmacists in treating those individuals who have moved from misuse and abuse to addiction.

The DEA currently operates 66 Tactical Diversion Squads in 41 states, the Districts of Columbia and the Caribbean. These groups capitalized or combined law enforcement authorities of task force officers and DEA agents to conduct criminal investigations in the diversion of pharmaceutical drugs. The DEA regulates more than 1.5 million registrants. DEA diversion groups concentrate on the regulatory aspects of enforcing the Controlled Substances Act, utilizing the increase compliance inspections.

This oversight enables DEA to proactively educate registrants and ensure that DEA registrants understand and comply with the law. The Tactical Diversion Squads and the diversion groups have brought their skills to barren (ph) what was previously known as ground zero for prescription drug use, Florida based internet pharmacies and pain clinics.

As the current pill mill threat is driven out of Florida and moves North and Northwest, DEA will continue to target the threat with the tactical diversion groups proven law enforcement skills, the diversion groups regulatory expertise and by educating registrants.

DEA and our law enforcement partners have aggressively targeted both prescription drug diversion and heroin trafficking. From 2001 to 2012, there's been a staggering increase in drug analysis of opioid pain medications, 275 percent for oxycodone, 197 percent for hydrocodone, and 334 percent for morphine.

This has also been a significant increase in heroin cases. From 2008 to 2012, there's a 35 percent increase. If the data for the first half of 2013 remains constant, the increase from 2008 to 2013 would be approximately 51 percent.

The increase in heroin abuse and trafficking is a symptom of our countries appetite for prescription opioids, that'll eventually lead to abuse and addiction. It's a natural progression from the abuse of prescription opioids. There's a dangerous misperception that abusing prescription drugs is safer than abusing heroin. Both abuse of prescription opioids and heroin can lead to addiction and death.

Preventing the availability of pharmaceutical controlled substances to non-medical users and educating practitioners, pharmacist, and public about pharmaceutical diversion, trafficking and abuse of priorities at DEA. As such, DEA will continue to work as a -- with a cooperative effort with other federal state and local officials, law enforcement, professional organizations and community groups to address this epidemic.

Thank you for your invitation to appear today. And I look forward to answering any questions that you may have. Thank you.

BURGESS: The gentleman yields back, and thanks the gentlemen for his testimony.

Now, hear from the -- from the members for questions. Five minutes for each member. I'll begin -- well, Mr. Rannazzisi, you just gave some rather startling statistics, (inaudible) Mr. Botticelli. You said at your testimony, we can't rest our way out of this problem. So let me just ask you from a federal perspective, we put a lot of money, a lot of effort on behalf of taxpayers into this, what is it that is -- what is it about this that is not working?

Mr. Botticelli, we'll start with you. And maybe we can just go down the line and just answer the question. How has this become the problem that it is?

BOTTICELLI: You know, I think in number of my federal panelist have articulated some of the problems and I think, you know, first and foremost, a lot of this issue is driven by the vast overprescribing of prescription pain medication. You know, a recent report by the GAO showed that the vast majority of physicians get little to no training in substance use disorders and little to no training in safe opioid prescribing. And a part of our ...

BURGESS: Let me stop you there, because this is not a new problem. I mean, this was a problem 40 years ago when I was in medical school. And I would disagree with the statement that we got no training, but OK the training may not be adequate to the scope of the problem. But honestly, can we say that this is something that just happened to us as if we were completely unaware that this was an issue? I mean, how can you possibly make a statement like that?

BOTTICELLI: I think, you know, part of what the balance has been and I think it's been out of kilter is, you know, that physicians quite honestly were pushed in terms of making sure that we adequately treated pain in the United States. And we absolutely need to make sure that we do that. I think we need to have a balance strategy that understand the tremendous addiction potential of these drugs.

The risky patients that we have before is in terms of who should be prescribed with prescription medication, as well as monitoring those who are developing our problem. So I do think that this is a balance approach in terms of both making sure that we are adequately treating pain. But we're also not inadvertently creating a problem by overprescribing these medications to people who are developing our problem or who are at risk.

BURGESS: Well, I don't want to words as rough (ph), Mr. Rannazzisi seemed to imply that we are overprescribing, is that a fair assessment of your testimony?

RANNAZZISI: I think that if you're talking about 99.5 percent of the prescribers, no, they're not overprescribing. But, we're dealing -- our focus is in both pain clinics and road doctors, who are overprescribing. Actually, they're prescribing illegally, they're not overprescribing, they're illegally prescribing. So, yes, concerning that overprescribing, yes.

BURGESS: Well, that's your job, your law enforcement so you need to close them down, right?

RANNAZZISI: And we're trying, they're overwhelming us with numbers.

BURGESS: All right, I do want everyone response of that because the interest of time and wanted to keep to the five minute. Therefore, I'm going to submit that in writing to each of you.

I want to bring up something for each -- several of you have brought it up and that's the issue of making naloxone much more available, maybe we should also be talking about making imovax (ph) available for people who are going to overdose. I mean, it's hard to know who's going to overdose. But -- Mr. Botticelli, you brought it up, I think Mr. Sosin, you brought it up as well. But, what is the issue here with making this available?

BOTTICELLI: You know, I think that we've tremendously hard in both at the federal level as Dr. Volkow talked about in terms of the approval of new delivery devices for doing that. One of the main areas that ONDCP has been working with our state partners is the passage of state legislation to look at naloxone distribution. And so, I think we have now 17 states had been acted, naloxone distribution legislation which I think has really been helpful here. We've also been in quite honestly working with many law enforcement agencies across the state.

BURGESS: Pardon me for a moment, but it is a federally controlled substance, is it not? Naloxone?

BOTTICELLI: It's not a controlled substance, if I remember it correctly ...

BURGESS: OK, is there a cost issue?

BOTTICELLI: There is a cost issue. And one of things, Chairman, that you asked is what are the opportunities that we have in terms of looking at this. And again, I think, you know, the -- and, you know, again, we're really helpful that SAMHSA looked at existing -- how we might use existing federal funds.

But I think if there's an area that we can continue to explore together is how we might enhance resources for many overdose prevention efforts. One of the things that I've heard as I've traveled around the country is that having state legislation and having these devices is a great start. But that many states and local areas are under resource in terms of implementing ...

BURGESS: Yeah. And again, I may submit that in -- for answer in writing as well. Ms. Volkow, let me just ask you, you mentioned in your testimony to address this problem. We have to recognize special character of this phenomenon and part of which is the -- that opioids play a key role in relieving suffering. So, as providers and policy makers, are we doing a good job of walking this line?

VOLKOW: I -- based on the numbers, I don't think we can say we are. And the reality that in this country, we have both under treatment of pain and overprescription of medications, these are not exclusive.

And one of the issues that we have in face and Mr. Botticelli has been discussing it. In 2000, when I joined the Committee for accreditation of hospital demanded that you'll treat pain if you see a steep increase in the number of prescriptions. So what you are doing in parallel, there has not been an increase in education in medical schools.

So, it's seven hours outreaching the United States, there's a diversity of opioid medications that are currently available. And there are many indications where actually patients are being given the opioids when it's not severe or pain. And this, for example, this is the case in many case for drunk people with dentist that are prescribing the opioid mediation. So there is a room for improvement on the education of providers.

The other issue too that we have not understood very much when we were -- I mean, certainly, when I was in medical school, they'll tell you if you prescribe an opioid medication with someone that is suffering from pain, they are not going to become addicted. Now, we can come to recognize that it's not the case that there are patients that are taking the medication as prescribed and they can become addicted. So the issue is who are they, how do we recognize them so we can prevent that transition. And ...

BURGESS: Yeah, and my time has expired. I would just offer the observation 40 years ago, I was given the admonition by a professor in anesthesiology, "This stuff is so good, don't even try at once." So, clearly it was known 40 years ago.

Recognize Mr. Welch five minutes for questions, please.

WELCH: OK, I want to thank the panel and the Chairman as well, you know, and for mine, as I mentioned in my opening statement, we're just trying to face this directly which is, I think, a much better approach than denial. And it's engaged the community in some very effective ways and it's developed, I think -- it's helped our providers develop what they call, I haven't spoke (ph) system, where there's an emphasis on medication which really does seem to be helping some folks who are willing to help.

And then some wrap around treatment services for people who can benefit by that. And a lot of our ability to do that is because we're getting some federal health. We get about $6 million out of the Substance Abuse Prevention and Treatment Block Grant, that's been level funded.

And my question, really, to Mr. Clark, can you explain the decision -- I guess, this is administration decision not to propose an increase in that program given the intensity of the crisis. And I think with this discussion occurring all around the country, obviously, you're going to have many more states that are willing to roll up their sleeves and try to get engaged which would suggest the resource need is there in order to help make thid successful. Dr. Clark?

CLARK: Mr. Welch, we are working very closely with state authorities with organizations like NASDAD and NASBED (ph) to address these issues. But we also, as Mr. Botticelli pointed out, approaching this from a comprehensive approach rather than simply using a single funding mechanism to address the issue. We need to keep in mind that we need multiple strategies to address this problem.

And with those multiple strategies, we believe that we can make an impact. So, relying indeed on the Affordable Care Act and other strategies we can leverage the block grant funding to target this.

We're also allowing jurisdictions to prioritize using our prevention efforts as well as our treatment efforts the problems that they experience in their respective jurisdiction ...

WELCH: All right, thank you, but no more money. Money is tight, I get it.

And Botticelli, your predecessor came up and had a great visit with us in Vermont, it's tremendous to have him there. And we've expanded the use of naloxone, and how do you say that?

BOTTICELLI: Naloxone.

WELCH: Naloxone, yeah. And we've have some success with that, we've had a number of instances of it being, you know, successfully just recently about 15 times. But do you think that the FDA should consider making that an over-the-counter medication?

BOTTICELLI: So, first of all, like, I really want to applaud you and Governor Shumlin in terms of calling significant attention to this issue. I spent a better part of career at Massachusetts and very familiar with heroin issue that we've had in New England for a long, long time.

You know, our office as part of our prescription drug abuse plan and overdose had looking for a continued ways to expand the use of naloxone. Again, I think, you know, we are hardened by this delivery device.

Our partners at NIDA are looking at and researching the expansion of -- and use of other way. So we're having conversations with both federal partners and quite honestly, some external stakeholders who are really, really, really interested in terms of looking at how do we increase the -- not only the availability of naloxone, but continue to promote easier to use and quite honestly, if we have some cheaper versions of naloxone.

WELCH: I got one time for one more question. Dr. Volkow, I want to ask you about this issue with doctors and with patients, you know, I've known close friends who've had serious medical issues and have been in a lot of pain. And once that line is crossed where they're getting the prescription medication, it almost it seems like there's an undertow where the answer to the paying question always is essentially to get more medication and more powerful medication.

And a patient in that moment is pretty vulnerable. And how does the -- and the doctor gets really persistent advocacy by the patient and sometimes the patients family. You've got to do something.

So, how do we help the doctors deal with what, you know, Dr. (inaudible), of course, yeah, another doctor here, how do they -- you know, there's a lot of doctors around here. So how the doctors really have to be in the frontline and it's very tough, because they've got a patient who's in pain, they've got a family who's saying we do something. But there's something that is getting done in many cases is resulting in long-term problems.

VOLKOW: Yeah, and they're torching on one of the hardest -- the issues to deal with clinically, how do you manage severe chronic pain. What many people don't know is that the risk of suicide for patients with chronic pain is double that of the general population. So it takes extraordinary rehabilitating.

And the strongest medication we have are opioids, the problem with opioids apart from addictiveness is that you become tolerant very rapidly. And so that requires that you increase the dose. So chronically and then you have to shift to something more potent. And that's exactly where the whole problem lies around, they are not ideal. But it's what we have and it can relieve the patients in a moment that they need them.

The strategies, what other alternatives we can use just -- other than just relying us in opioids as the only alternative. And that's where researches ongoing to see -- that's what I was mentioning in the whole area of (plain) neuroscience. The feasibility of devices that can actually be used potentially to handle unmanaged pain will be a break through, you will rely less on medications.

And I also think that aspect of we, as a society, have created the expectation that anything that's wrong with you should be treated with a medication. So, zero tolerance for pain and I think that as a culture, we need to revision that also.

WELCH: Thank you, I yield back. Thank you very much.

BURGESS: Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Welch. And I'm sitting in an obvious little board, Dr. Burgess. Let me just make up a brief statement and then I'll ask my question. You know, as physician of many years, I don't think that even back in the day, we were given the proper training in regard to pain medication.

You know, also, I'll say this, there's been a lot of emphasis over the past 10 years or so, about advance directives and the necessity (inaudible) across the hospice programs that have developed in that sort of thing. But I don't hear hardly any discussion about patients given their wishes in regard to how they want their pain control in a thermal situation, where there's no chance for recovery. I don't know that people really understand in many instances pain medication has started because the family members don't want their loved one to suffer. That's quite natural and appropriate.

But before you know what the patient has gone beyond the stage where they can say, "Oh, look, I don't want to be totally zoomed (ph) out at the time of my demas (ph)."

So that's just, I guess, food for thought in a way.

I'm going to ask my specific question, Mr. Rannazzisi. You said earlier in your testimony that you're just get -- the DEA just get overwhelmed about all this road pain clinics that are popping out everywhere. How was that happening? How do these places just pop up, as you put it, and why is it happening, why are you getting overwhelmed?

RANNAZZISI: Well, that's a great question, sir. It's not just DEA that's overwhelmed. Our state and local counterparts are overwhelmed. Think about this, prior to Ryan Haight Act, the internet drug bill that was passed. There was, we'll say, seven clinics, pain clinics in Broward County. In 2010, there was 142 clinics in Broward County. Now, if you look, when we moved our enforcement groups down there and we move 10 tactical diversion squats to work with our state and local counterparts and we started knocking of these road pain clinics.

They moved up in New Georgia, if you look at the 75 corner (ph), there was over a hundred pain clinics going at 75 corner (ph). Some of them are right off the inner state and we just get off and get back on. Then they moved in the Tennessee, Tennessee now has approximately 300 clinics.

Now, if you think that the state and local law enforcement and DEA doesn't have the capacity to go after everyone of these clinics quickly because these are illegal drugs that they're peddling, and we have to establish that that doctor is prescribing outside the usual course professional practice and not for legitimate medical purpose that takes time.

These cases take time. So what they're doing is they're just counting on the fact that they're going to run the clinic that's not being hit by DEA. So, we're all overwhelmed, everyone in law enforcements.

BURGESS: And what percentage would use lie (ph) of these clinics are fraudulent?

RANNAZZISI: In Florida, the vast majority of them. In Georgia, I believe that the vast majority of those clinics had popped out were (ph), they were good pain clinics. No, don't get me wrong, every pain clinic is not bad.

BURGESS: Yeah.

RANNAZZISI: But the pain clinics that we're looking at are absolutely atrocious, there is no medical care.

BURGESS: Yeah.

RANNAZZISI: It's modern day crack outs.

BURGESS: Let me -- and thank you for that answer. And any of you could answer this. About last year, GAO, the Government Accountability Office found an overlap in 59 of the 76 programs it identified in the drug abuse and prevention area. What steps or any of your agencies taken to minimize overlap and more efficiently spend our taxpayer dollars? I mean, you would think that we could get some efficiency here. Anybody?

(UNKNOWN): Sure Chairman. You know our office has looked at that report and has been working with our federal partners to look at the breath (ph) of our prevention programs and to make sure that we are not quite honestly duplicating programs. You know, I do think that however, if you talk to many, many people at the local level, they will tell you however that we don't have enough prevention. And I think you heard from many, many folks up here that while we may have programs that are addressing the same issue, they're reaching not the entirety of the population. So we really want to make sure that one, that we are not kind of duplicating the programs that we have already.

BURGESS: Well, very important. I would think that you guys are talking to each other, of course. Others, I've got a little time left, two seconds, one second. Well, wait a minute. I'm the Chair now, aren't I? I've got five minutes left. Mr. Clark.

CLARK: Well ...

BURGESS: Dr. Clark, excuse me.

CLARK: One of the things we are concerned about in the administration is the issue of fragmentation overlap and duplication. And then we do -- we're very closely with our federal partners to make sure that we minimize fragmentation overlap and duplication and working under the persistence of ONDCP, we are able to address that. As was pointed out, communities need multiple resources and you find it -- sometimes, you cannot completely eliminate some overlap because indeed the unique issues of individual communities require that there'd be some overlap. But we are very sensitive to both the PDAO (ph) concerns and OMB's concerns about fragmentation overlap and duplication and insidiously try to avoid that.

BURGESS: Thank you all. I thank the panel. My time has expired. And your five minutes now to Mr. Lujan.

LUJAN: Mr. Chairman, doctor thank you so very much for the time today. And I'm glad to see that we're having this hearing. This is important. By the Chairman and the Committee staff acknowledging that this hearing needed to take place, we're acknowledging there's a problem across the country. The question after this hearing today though is, are we going to sweep this under the rug again or are we going to do something significant with recommendations that are going to come from experts? This is a problem plaguing America. The case in New York brought more attention to what was happening with heroin abuse and overdoses. But we've been losing lives across the country for years. And what are we going to do?

There's recommendations that have been put on the table by many experts that's been studied over and over and over. There's a program from 2011 to -- on the prescription drug side to reduce abuse significantly over five years. I'll be asking the question where are we with that. But every life that's lost as a result of this is one life too many. There's only so many parts of the world that are growing poppies. Do we not know as United States of America where poppies are being grown and where there -- how they're migrating into the United States in the form of heroin and illegal substances? It seems to me we should. And what are doing to stop that flow? That's very troubling.

Now going back to the prescription drug side, there's been presentations that we've seen in New Mexico that have been together by some people that I respect very much that show a correlation with drug overdoses with increased prescriptions that are coming up, not just pain medication facilities that are popping up. And so, one of the questions that I have is, is there data that's reported to any of you that you do analysis on where there is a core -- where there -- at least with the data that I've seen, there's -- showing that there's a correlation between overdoses and increased prescriptions that are being administered. And what do we do with that data? Are we able to go in or is that an area where we don't have enough support now between the federal and the state partners. And I'd asked anyone that like to tackle that.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you Congressman Lujan. You mentioned the New Mexico report. Dr. Pelosi (ph) from CDC worked with scientist in New Mexico, health department staff there, to analyze and demonstrate those relationships. And absolutely, there's a very tight relationship between the volume of opioid prescribing and opioid overdose deaths. That information does get used at a national level. I'm thinking about the areas to intervene. But also, at the state and local level, where it has to be to better understand how the problems in each individual jurisdiction and the factors that are influencing the prescribing practices are being addressed there.

One of the ways that CDC in particular works is by trying to liberate data by working with state and local health departments to understand the context of prescribing of health system data and of mortality data to put a better picture and understand the context within which overdose deaths are occurring and abuses occurring, and then be able to target programs like through their PDMP's, like restriction programs, et cetera that address those problems.

VOLKOW: If I may, but first of all, I want to thank you for bringing up the issue because the void (ph) that I view that this is an urgent issue and we cannot put it under the rule (ph) under no conditions. And I feel passionate because I do get the parents coming to me says "When we went to wake up our child, it was dead." And they wouldn't even know that they were abusing opioids. The other issue is that we do have the tools to actually address the problem of opioid prescription abuse and opioid deaths. We need to implement them.

We have treatments that work for drug addiction that can decrease the number of overdoses. But also, we need to address the problem that we have with chronic pain in this country. How many people suffer chronic pain in this country? Estimated IOM, a hundred million, a hundred million. There is a notion on that one hand that there is an increase in chronic pain and that needs to be addressed. So, from the healthcare perspective we need to address it.

LUJAN: And Dr. Volkow, as my time expires, there is some questions that I'll be submitting into the record, but I would welcome your response as well. And Mr. Chairman I just wanted to share with you that there is a program in New Mexico that appears to be working with the distribution of Narcan where there's been a reversal of more than 250 overdoses last year where they're getting it to the hands of first responders and nurses. So it's not necessarily on the street, but it's with those that are responding to these accidents. And there maybe a way for us to work on that with some ideas down the road.

Mr. Chairman, again, I share before you a return to that hearing how much we appreciate that you're doing this and you brought this hearing. But I certainly hope that there's more that will be done and this hearing won't be the last of hearings and conversations and an approach that we can take as a Congress to work with our state partners to do something. This is a bad problem across the country but it's also plaguing New Mexico. Thank you for your attention to this Mr. Chairman.

BURGESS: The Chair thanks the gentleman and does also observe that further hearings are likely to be necessary and as Mr. Welch put it up to hear from governors. And I'd like to hear from some of our mayors because they are on the -- they are on the first lines of this battle. The Chair now recognizes the gentlelady from North Carolina. Ms. Ellmers, five minutes for questions please.

ELLMERS: Thank you Mr. Chairman. And thank you to our panel for being here today addressing this very important issue. I'd like to start by asking a question of Mr. Botticelli and Dr. Volkow. Understanding the path of addiction, there is, and I think you have both identified a genetic basis for that. One of the things I would like to know is again the progression. Is there something that starts with tobacco use, smoking, use of alcohol drinking? And then how does it progress and how do you feel not (ph). I'll just start with Mr. Botticelli and then have Dr. Volkow comment.

BOTTICELLI: Just about everything that this field knows about this has come from the work of Dr. Volkow. You know, clearly, we know that there's a genetic predisposition for many people in terms of family history of substance abuse. But we also know that there's like many diseases. There are environmental factors that go into that issue. You know, we know that substance use disorder is a disease that have early onset, so that many people who do develop, left untreated, left undiagnosed developed a substance use disorder largely because of starting alcohol, tobacco and or marijuana use at a very young age.

Clearly, there are some particular issues as it relates to the addiction potential of prescription drug medication. But the vast majority of people that at least I have talked to in the data show that those folks who do have a significant opioid use disorder have started from a very young age and, you know, if you saw Philip Seymour Hoffman story, he actually started with alcohol abuse at a very young age. So we know that there are prevention and intervention opportunities that we can have along the way to really make sure that we're identifying people early in their disease progression. And then we're intervening in this issue.

You know, the other piece that you talked about, and again, I think it still warrants further work is what about the progression from prescription drug use to a heroin addiction. Clearly, we know that it is a progressive disease and people left untreated will often progress to more significantly harmful used patterns. But we also know that price plays a role as the DEA mentioned in terms of the progression. So, we know that there is multiple factors that really affect people's progression not only in terms of overall development of a substance use disorder but from prescription medication to heroin.

ELLMERS: Dr. Volkow.

VOLKOW: Yes. And the questions you asked has intrigued many scientists and it's called -- had lead to the term of gateway hypothesis because all of the epidemiological stories have repeatedly corroborate that most individuals that become addicted to illicit substances started with nicotine or alcohol then transitioning to marijuana and then the other drugs. So the question is that just because it's more accessible that you start with nicotine or alcohol or could it be that these drugs including nicotine and alcohol and marijuana are changing your brain in such a way that it makes it more receptive to the addictiveness of drugs.

And there is data now from genetic studies and from studies in animals that suggest at least for the case of nicotine and alcohol and also marijuana that it is changing the sensitivity of the brain rewash (ph) sequence in a way that primes you to the addictiveness of these other drugs. And in the case of prescription opioids, that's also what they are observing that most of the individual that end up addicted to prescription opioids had a history of nicotine addiction earlier or has started abusing alcohol.

ELLMERS: Thank you. My last question is for Mr. Rannazzisi. You know, obviously, your agency is working with many other agencies on this issue. And I'm going to ask you a question that really falls under the FDA. But from your opinion in the work that your are doing, do you believe that some of the prescription drugs, the deterrent formulas such as, you know, for OxyContin, some of the deterrent formulas -- will that make a difference and is it feasible that if we take this approach that that is going to help on the wide and broad scope that you have outlined if we're using these deterrent forms.

RANNAZZISI: Absolutely. The abuse-deterrent formulations will make a difference. Those drugs will still be abused orally with a potentiator like a muscle relaxant or a benzo. But in the end, it's going to stop them from crushing and snorting or crushing and injecting. And we know that when you crush and inject or crush and snort, you're raising the risk of overdosing death just in that method of delivery. So yes. Do I think it's important? Absolutely, it's important.

Look at what happened with the OxyContin product. When it went from the OC to OP, you could bang that tablet with the hammer and it's not going to break. It balls up in your noise when you try and snort it. It's crazy that, you know, if you try to abuse that drug. But what did we see everybody doing? Immediately, they started moving to the oxymorphone product or the immediate release Oxy Thirties. OK. So they're adapting. If we could figure a way to get an abuse- deterrent formulation across the board, then we're going to see some significant results. Absolutely.

ELLMERS: Thank you so much for your answers and your insight on this issue. And Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

BURGESS: Gentlelady yields back. The gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Yarmuth, recognize five minutes for your questions please.

YARMUTH: Thank you very much Mr. Chairman. And I thank the panel as well for the testimony and for what is obviously a very committed effort across the spectrum of government to deal with this problem.

I'm glad to know that in a sense -- I shouldn't say glad, but it's somewhat reassuring to know that this is not just a Kentucky problem. Certainly, in my travels in my district and around the state and talking about law enforcement and with mental health professionals and everyone who's involved in this area, we have a huge problem in Kentucky.

During the first three quarters of 2013, there were at least 170 Kentuckians who died from heroin overdoses. And that was 41 more people have died the entire previous year. And it's actually 200 plus percent increase since 2011. So, we have problem that was there and growing.

And one of the young people who died was the nephew of a Kentucky State Representative Joni Jenkins, a good friend of mine, and a great representative. Her nephew Wes was -- they suspected began with prescription drugs and then moved to heroin because of expense. He died in May of 2013. And she told her story in the Courier-Journal and Op-Ed and the local Courier-Journal, and I'd like to read one of the things she said because it's -- prompts a question.

She said, "For an entire year, our family kept the addiction private. They were well aware that she had been in and out of treatment and they were working with him. But they kept it private so Wes would not suffer the social stigma of being a drug addict. I know -- now know that there is a terrible shame attached to this illness, but we have to break through the silence to find a cure." And she says "I also know that I will search for answers the rest of my life for that."

Is this is a problem that you've seen -- you're just nodding your head Mr. Botticelli? So respond to that that much of that -- or the access to treatment or the willingness to treatment is deterred because of a social stigma?

BOTTICELLI: You know -- and many of us have heard that story countless times from parents. Many of us were just in Atlanta with a conference sponsored by Chairman Rogers. And, you know, we hear that story repeatedly. And I think our collective efforts have really been to raise the visibility of ensuring that people know that addiction is disease. And this is not about chain, this is not about guilt. We know that one of the reasons why people don't seek treatment and why parents don't ask for help is because of the shame and embarrassment that's related to that. And so, part of what I think all of our federal partners are doing, is how do we raise the understanding and visibility, and quite honestly, the compassionate treatment of people with addiction -- of addictive disorders into this work.

And I think that we're seeing quite honestly a movement in terms of like we did with other disorders that were shameful and stigmatized that we have to kind of elevate the voice of parents and people in recovery so that we do know that hope is possible and that it would be easier for them to come forward and ask for help. But, you know, unfortunately, we've heard that story way too many times from parents and people who are affected.

YARMUTH: What -- have you come up with any great answers? I mean, what can we do to help that just as individual members? We do stand (ph) the country anyway.

BOTTICELLI: I mean, I think there are a couple of things that we're doing. A lot of our work -- at the Office of National Drug Control Policy, we actually established an office of recovery to really promote the fact -- we are looking at the development of recovery support services so that people in the community can see that recovery is possible. I think we have been promoting those of us who are in recovery talking very publicly about the fact that we're in recovery because it shows to other people that this is not just about death and destruction that there really is hope on the other side of this.

So, I think all of us play a role in terms of destigmatizing that. You know, just having these hearings, really show the fact that we have leadership in this country who are concerned about this. And it's not a shame. This is not a moral choice. This is not a moral failing. This is about a disease and that we have to deal with it from a public health perspective. So, I really appreciate your acknowledgment of that -- those challenges.

YARMUTH: Well, it seems to me that much of this problem involves education. I mean, I assume that when these young people or whether it's young or not, but predominantly young people began on prescription drugs. They have no idea that this is the course that they could likely be on. And I don't know whether that's a school issue, PTA issue, or what it is. But, it seems to me like information is the -- one of the greatest avenues for combatting this problem.

Anyway, Mr. Chairman, I would request unanimous consent that this Op-Ed that I mentioned from Joni Jenkins be -- made a part of the record.

BURGESS: So objections orders (ph).

YARMUTH: Thank you and I yield back.

BURGESS: Gentleman yields back his time. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Ohio. Mr. Johnson, five minutes for your questions please.

JOHNSON: Thank you Mr. Chairman. And I really appreciate the opportunity to hear from the panel today on this very, very important issue. You know, prescription drug and heroin abuse are very serious -- is a very serious epidemic in Ohio. And parts of my district in Eastern and South Eastern Ohio are some of the worse hit.

In 2012, five Ohioans died everyday from unintentional drug overdose with opioids both prescription and heroin as the driving factor. Attorney General Mike DeWine identified heroin as contributing to as many as 11 fatal overdoses a week. It's a major public health crisis. However, prescription opioids continue to be the lead contributor to fatal overdoses in the state.

In 2012, for example, an average of 67 doses of opioids were dispensed for every Ohio resident. Lawmakers, nonprofit organizations, medical industry leaders, communities and parents across the state have been working to coordinate their response to this epidemic. But in the corner of Ohio that shares borders with three other states, communities are struggling to get drug abuse under control. Individuals identified as abusing in one state may cross state lines to escape detection and abuse in another. A non- integrated system also makes it harder to identify prescribing providers and pill mills.

So, for all of you on the panel, anyone that wants to try and respond to this, I realized that states are largely in charge of implementing their own prescription drug monitoring programs. But, in multistate areas, like I serve, the importance of working together to curb abuse cannot be emphasized enough. So, what's being done at the federal level to encourage states to share information compiled by their respective PDMP's?

BOTTICELLI: Thank you Congressman. And as you articulated, both the establishment of vibrant prescription drug monitoring programs, and quite honestly, the interstate interoperability of those programs has been key for much of the work that we've been doing on federal level. So, you know, we're happy that in 2006, we only had about 20 operable prescription drug monitoring programs in the United States. And now, we have 48. They are operable, one, in the process and unfortunately, one state that doesn't have a prescription drug monitoring program.

And as part of the strategy, we've been working with the Bureau of Justice Assistance and the Boards of Pharmacy to really look at interstate operability so that those states that share a border can make sure that they're sharing data. So now, we have 20 states that are able to share information across borders. And clearly, we have a goal of making sure that all of these programs are shared data among particularly neighboring state.

JOHNSON: I will share with you that, you know, as a 30-year I.T. professional myself, I can tell you that architecture and data standardization, interface standards, those are very, very critical components. If you don't know where you're going, any road will get you there. And it's one thing to have a monitoring system. It's quite something else to have a monitoring system that adheres to standards so that it can be effectively used. How do we make the nationwide PDMP system more effective? And what still needs to be done to fully achieve a fully integrated network?

(UNKNOWN): Congressman Johnson, thank you for your question. Clearly, the PDMP in the ability to achieve successful, effective PDMP's is critical to the law enforcement side, the public health side as well, the clinical side as well. And as Mr. Botticelli commented, we're making progress, meaning that we are better understanding the components of these PDMP's and what it is that needs to be shared and how to share them. The work that you all are doing in bracing disability, that governors and mayors are doing, saying that this is an issue that they're going to address also allows this opportunity to set the standards for what we need to share and how we will share that information across borders.

The CDC working with the FDA and the Bureau of Justice Assistance has been funding at -- randomize (ph) the prescription behavioral surveillance system which takes from 20 states, the PDMP data. They have to better understand what these factors are that increase the success of PDMPs.

JOHNSON: Let me get to one more quick question. I've got to move quickly. How can we shift drug abuse prevention efforts from the collection of silo data like we're talking about to a system in which this information isn't lost every time an individual realizes that they're being tracked and takes evasive measures like leaving a health plan for example, because not only do you have working across state lines, but an abuser that goes from one health plan to another can also hide. So, how do we solve that problem?

(UNKNOWN): And some of my colleagues can add on to this. But, you know, part of what we've been really trying to focus on is make sure that we're treating an integrating substance use issues as part of mainstream healthcare. Have really looking at things like making sure that people are getting screened and intervened as part of their over all health plan.

So that, you know, for very, very long time we had two systems of care in the United States. We've had medical care over here and behavioral healthcare over here. And that we haven't necessarily really looked at how we make sure that we are treating substance use disorders as a medical condition. So part of our goal is how, you know, more theory integration of mental health and substance use services within our primary care of settings.

JOHNSON: Sure.

(UNKNOWN): Because it's really important that we not see this as two separate issues.

JOHNSON: Mr. Chairman, I have many, many more questions obviously. This is a complex and sensitive issue for many Americans, but I ran out of time. So I yield back.

BURGESS: Thanks. The gentleman yields at this time. The Chair recognizes the gentlelady from Florida. Ms. Castor, five minutes for your questions please.

CASTOR: Thank you Mr. Chairman. And thank you to the panel very much. Just as this hearing is really heading home for me today because yesterday, I learned that the death of our friend last month was tied to her long-term opioid addiction. Her sister sent me an e- mail. I got it just yesterday. And she committed suicide. And she -- her sister said, because of her long-term addiction. So she left a daughter and a husband and an entire family. And the sister is asking, "Please, do more."

So, I hope we can all come together to tackle this. It is causing so much pain for so many families. And the State of Florida has really been at the heart of the problem. And instilling Florida, they say that every 78, every -- I can't believe it. 78 minutes, someone overdoses in the State of Florida. I'm also hearing from my local hospitals. They've had to add rooms in the NICU units of hospitals because of babies being born addicted. And these babies typically will cost a million dollars to take care of and they're in the hospital for months. So, we better invest in prevention or else, we're going to be spending a lot on the outside.

So, Mr. Rannazzisi, you know, Florida -- the general talking points are, well, Florida has improved, we -- there was huge law enforcement crack down. We have adapted a prescription drug tracking systems, the PDMP. The problem is that doctors are not using it. The last statistics that I saw, only 3.5 percent of all prescriptions being written are being checked on that database. What's your view right now in Florida? Have we made progress? What's left to do?

RANNAZZISI: I think under the leash of Attorney General Bondi and law enforcement leaders down in Florida, yes, we've made progress. Absolutely. The problem is the -- again, we're overwhelmed by the numbers. There's so many people down there in Florida. We actually have cases where Florida -- rogue pain clinic operators were funding clinics in Northern states. So when the heat is on, then they going to move up into another state. I think that we're making progress. But again, it's going to take time.

Now, the PDMP issue -- I would love to see mandated PDMP use. At any BPs (ph), the National Association of Boards of Pharmacy had gone out of their way to ensure that there's interoperability and interconnectivity between the PDMPs. I think they have 25 states that are already connected. And they've done a phenomenal job. But if no one is looking at that PDMP or very few are looking at that PDMP, it's not going to help.

CASTOR: The -- and so, do you agree that the local law enforcement efforts, I mean, what I see on the ground in my community in the Tampa Bay Area, we used to have these long lines with cars from out of state, people waiting outside in the ally for these pill mills to open up. You don't really see that anymore. But with the statistics on the rate of deaths from overdose, if something else is happening, we're not really making attempt there as it -- is it shifted to the internet, are they going out of state, is it at fault (ph), what's going on?

RANNAZZISI: I think they're moving to more rural areas where there's less law enforcement presence. I think the operators understand. I have a great video that I love to show on you -- of a clinic, and what happens as soon as the clinic opens. I think that they're adapting. The clinic owners are adapting very well. And we just -- they're one step ahead of us right now. But in the end, local law enforcement's doing a phenomenal job. And they are moving people out of the Tampa Bay Area and out of the three -- county south -- three county area. But, it's still there. It's just moving to more rural areas where they can't address the problem as quickly.

CASTOR: So in this very sad e-mail from my friend that I got yesterday, she said she has read now about the FDA approval of Zohydro, a pure hydrocodone, non-tamper resistant, 10 times stronger than Vicodin -- the Vicodin prescription opiate. I know that the advisory committee to FDA had some very serious concerns with this, yet, it has been approved. Dr. Volkow, could you give me your opinion on whether this drug should be readily available?

VOLKOW: Well, I mean, I think we clearly have an -- a very large number of opioid medications and we are over prescribing them. I wouldn't point my finger one or the other. I do think that the feasibility of getting formulations that are -- that cannot be diverted is something that is very powerful and the FDA should be commended because it came up pharmaceuticals can come up with an indication for a medication that is deterrent proof. And that is incentivizing to the development of these types of medications.

So, his role (ph) is a hydrocodone, slow delivery over 12 hours, and it actually does not have acetaminophen. And because the way that you have hydro -- currently which is Vicodin, the white (ph) that (inaudible) combined with acetaminophen which causes liver toxicity which lead the FDA to consider. If someone needs hydrocodone, do you need to give them acetaminophen? I need work in (ph) that context that they approved it. But ...

CASTOR: And could I ask, since my time is short. Mr. Botticelli, do you agree with FDA's approval or have -- do you have concerns?

BOTTICELLI: I think the important point and, you know, again, I don't think, you know, the FDA has their own process in terms of what they -- how they approve medications. I only agree that how we continue to make sure that we have abuse-deterrent formulation is really important. And I also think that this really underscores the importance of prescribing and training on prescribing because I think the point is that we have many medications that are open for potential to abuse. And we want to make sure that physicians and other prescribers really understand the risk associated with these drugs.

CASTOR: And Mr. Rannazzisi, local law enforcement has expressed concern about this new drug on the street because it is so potent. And because of -- it's likely if a child takes it, it could cause death. What's your view?

RANNAZZISI: Local law enforcement and DEA and our federal partners have all expressed. We all live through the OxyContin problem back in, you know, the '90s and into the 2000s. And we just don't want history to repeat it. So, too many people passed from circumventing that delivery system.

BURGESS: The gentlelady's time expired. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia. Mr. Griffith, five minutes for your questions please.

GRIFFITH: Well, let me pick up there. You're concern about this newer drug. And so, my question is, how -- what do you all do, and I would ask it to all of you, but I'll start with you Mr. Rannazzisi. Thank you. And that would be, how do we do a better job of predicting where we're going to see spikes and abuse on drugs as they come forward because some people say that we should have probably seen the increase in the prescription drug abuse of opioids and heroin.

RANNAZZISI: Well, we monitor the amount of drug going into a particular state where through our host (ph) system. But in the end, what we generally see is the drug being abused in the Minneapolis (ph) area of the country and then it spreads out from there. So when we were looking at OxyContin for instance, the OxyContin abuse epidemic started in that area, Kentucky, Tennessee, Southern Ohio.

GRIFFITH: Southwest Virginia.

RANNAZZISI: Yes, Southwest Virginia. Well, yes, absolutely. And then, spread out. And that's -- and we believe that patterns going to happen again with this new drug. It's just a matter of time. We know that product is now on the pharmacies and being dispensed, so.

GRIFFITH: And now, for the people that we -- that you've identified, I think that one of the other speakers said abuse- deterrent formulations. Once we know somebody's abusing, I have always like the lock-in where you lock-in to a pharmacy and you lock- in to the doctor, because one of the problems in Southwest Virginia that you mentioned a minute ago is that you can be in West Virginia, Tennessee, Kentucky, and North Carolina all within -- no matter where you are in Southwest Virginia, within an hour or two hours, you can be in anyone of those states, because the way of the geography is, and you can go from one rural area to another.

So what do we do no matter we're looking at that as a possible means? Dr. Clark, if you want to answer, that's fine. Just trying to find the answers.

CLARK: Apparently, there is no simple answer in your questions. A very important one in this committee is trying to address it. We are working with the Association of State and Territorial Health Officers, in the Federation of State Medical Boards, and the Boards of Pharmacy. We do collect surveillance data from our household survey and working with our colleagues in the CDC.

So, part of the issue is monitoring the movement of individuals. Getting practitioners whether they're pharmacist, nurse practitioners, or physicians to monitor what is it that they're doing. Getting people to access and actually use the PDMPs and having interoperability as was pointed out. So -- and then involving community coalitions because -- it was just pointed out from the Representative from Florida. People know where the places are and what we need to do ...

GRIFFITH: Sure.

CLARK: ... is to get community coalitions (inaudible) ...

GRIFFITH: Well, that's why -- that kind of why I like that lock- in because then you lock them into a doctor and to a pharmacy if you know -- and I don't want to do that to the folks who haven't been identified as having a problem. But once you know they have a problem, then that gives you a better handle on what they're doing if you lock them in and that's the only place they can go. Wouldn't you agree then -- I need to hurry because I've got other things I want to ask.

CLARK: That is one strategy that can be employed. So you want to make sure that if you do that that they have access to the resources necessary to be a measure.

GRIFFITH: Sure. And here's the dilemma that we have because one of the things the DEAs has done -- and we talked about this the last time you were here, is that they are asking the distributors to, you know, say "OK, don't sell so much to a pharmacy if that pharmacy looks like they're above the average or if you see some sign that they maybe abusing." And I have told the story about what happened when I went to my local pharmacy. And there were two people in there who were both being told you have to come back next month which is not -- but a few days away because we use the (inaudible) intuitive that maybe they only had one supplier. And that supplier said, "Oh, he's above average for other people who may have more than one supplier." I went back and check and that's exactly what's going on. He didn't know that was the problem, but I said, "You only have one supplier, don't you?" He said, "Yes, I use one distributor." And I think that's the problem.

Is there -- so down on the one hand, we want to lock out people who are abusing it. On the other hand, we'll make sure people who've need it, get it. So, I guess what I'm saying in that second regard -- second matter is, for the rural areas, it maybe a problem because that's -- it's less law enforcement and we recognized that. And one of -- a lot of my region has different haida (ph) designations. At the same time, you want to make sure people are getting the drugs they need. And if you're in a rural area and you may only -- you have smaller pharmacy, you may only be using one distributor, while the DEA doesn't have a quota, the distributor then just put the quota (ph) because based on other pharmacies, that particular pharmacist or drugstore is ordering more drugs. But it's because they're only using one supplier supposed of using two or three. How do we solve that problem? And I think Volkow wants answer (ph) on this.

VOLKOW: Then I was smiling because the notion is we have situations where a patient cannot get their medication. And yet, at the same time, the DEA has to collect this massive amount of pills that people are not using, which tells you we are over prescribing the number of pills that are necessary. So, coming back to the point that has been discussing, we really need to educate the healthcare system on the optimal way of prescribing them. Not just when they need them. But the number of tablets that you need -- that you are given, I mean, all of us have the idea of going to the dentist, two weeks of opioid prescriptions. I mean, you need one day. So, it is the cold (ph) notion of educating the healthcare system and educating the late public. And making the responsibility tools are we not -- why do we need to provide so many pills and the insurer's can get involved to this type of solutions.

GRIFFITH: That's right.

(UNKNOWN): That the -- with someone who suffers from chronic pain, the practitioner develops treatment plan, the patient agrees and that actually benefits everyone.

GRIFFITH: Oh, very good.

BURGESS: The given time has expired. And we will give an perhaps for second round. But, I wanted to go to Mr. Scalise because he's been waiting so long.

GRIFFITH: Absolutely.

SCALISE: Thank you for that Mr. Chairman and for our panelists for this important discussion. I know in my home parish of Jefferson, Louisiana where you've seen spikes and increase of drug related deaths over the last few years and each year just seem to be going up higher. When I talk to my coroner in Jefferson (inaudible) who works very closely in trying to, you know, of course, they see the end result of it, but they also try to work on a front end in doing some of the education that Dr. Clark has talked about.

In others, they've seen that that heroin is the one that seems to be popping out the most. I think last year, our heroin deaths accounted for a majority of all the drug-related deaths, over a hundred of those in my home parish. So Jefferson, like it's overseen as (ph) across the board. One of the things I do work on is just trying to educate people in the community. And I knew Dr. Clark, you've talked about this. In your testimony in alluding to work with, but not just pharmacist, but others, what is the, you know, what is the different things that you've been doing and then you've had success on the education front, especially not just within the medical community, but then the targeted populations of those folks that might have the highest likelihood of being exposed to heroin.

CLARK: Again, one of the things -- a comprehensive strategy becomes critical and that's when I talk with a prevention working with community coalitions so that we would got that message. We've already heard about the issue of chronic pain management. And people moving from the use of a prescription opioids to drugs like heroin. So having good strategies for pain treatment, working with state health -- the territorial health officers, federation of state medical boards, nursing organizations, dental organizations, and even veterinarians, because they too have access to prescription opioids, that we can address that end of the agenda. And then ...

(INAUDIBLE)

SCALISE: Mr. Rannazzisi ...

CLARK: ... like probably for the DEA.

SCALISE: ... answer this too because you, I know you talked about this in your testimony as well. So, if you can touch on your experiences there.

RANNAZZISI: We never turned down the opportunity to go out and speak to professional organizations. We have a very good relationship with -- a fine relationship in the associates and boards of pharmacy, the individual pharmacy associations, in the medical associations, when they ask us, we will come out. The Pharmacies Diversion Awareness Conference, we go out and we've been to 14 states and trained over 6,000 pharmacists in their corresponding responsibility. There have been trends (ph) in trafficking for pharmaceuticals to make them aware of what's going on so they know how to deal with this when a bad prescription comes in and what they're supposed to do.

We have industry conferences. We bring industry in. October of last year, we brought the distributors in to talk about what we're seeing trend wise and what they need to do as far as their legal obligations under the act. We bring the manufactures and importers in April or May of last year. We brought them in and we do this on a regular basis to show the trends in (ph) trafficking. We are out there educating as much as possible because it is one of the pillars in the pharmaceutical initiative that the White House is pushing for.

SCALISE: One of the things when you talk to the people on the ground or local and whether to its corners of law enforcement. There are lot of different federal programs out there and I do want to touch on that GAO report because there are some concerning issues that they raise that have been touched on a little bit but I want to get in to a little bit more. But, on that front, when you look at all the grants that are out there, I know in Louisiana, I think grants come in from five different departments through 30 different programs for some of these treatment programs. So there's lot of overlapping duplication.

But, is there a better way maybe to block grantees to put them together in a way that would be more flexible, and maybe Dr. Clark you can answer, are we giving states enough flexibility today? And with the duplication, can we do a better job and maybe consolidating those grants in a way that allow the states to do what they do best without having to go through so many different processes to so many different agencies where you have this duplication.

CLARK: Clearly, we have to work with the states in their exercises (ph), their discretion, and how to prioritize what it is that they've view as important epidemiologically in their jurisdiction. And so, we have supported the use of block grant funds to the discretion of the states and work with both the individual state authorities and the national organizations associated with that. We're also working with recovery-oriented organizations so that we've got peers, people who are recovering for substance use disorders to help speak up and carry out the message working with community coalitions and others, because indeed, they can tell a better story than professionals or regulators, et cetera. So the comprehensive ...

SCALISE: Let me apologize my time's about to go. I do want to at least ask for the record if I can get this information on the GAO report because it then identified you got the 115 different federal agencies, 76 different federal programs that all have abuse (ph) for prevention to treatment programs. And they also identified overlap of 59 of the 76 programs.

And so, I think Dr. Gingrey earlier asked Mr. Botticelli and Dr. Clark to talk about what your agencies are doing to address that overlap -- those problems that were identified in the GAO report if Mr. Sosin or Dr. Sosin, I'm sorry, Dr. Volkow, and Mr. Rannazzisi can also get me their information to just show what you all are doing to try to address the overlap problems that were raised in the GAO report. And with that all ...

BURGESS: Well, the gentleman's time has expired. I think that information will be generally interesting to the Committee. So, I hope the Committee staff will provide that information to ...

SCALISE: Would that be OK with getting that to the Committee. Thank you.

BURGESS: And the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas. Mr. Green, five minutes for your questions please.

GREEN: Thank you Mr. Chairman. And thank you all in the (ph) Committee for having this hearing. Prescription drug abuse is real growing and public threat that must be addressed. The consequence and reviews and addictions to opioids such as prescription pain relievers and heroin has a devastating effect on our communities. We comprehend a solution that protects public health, reserves patient access to the needed therapies and improved access to treatment.

Last week, an article was published in the New England Journal of Medicine discussing the Department of Health and Human Services efforts to address the prescription opioid overdose epidemic including improving access to the addiction treatment services.

Dr. Volkow, you are one of the authors of this article and Dr. Clark and Dr. Sosin, the heads of your respective agencies also are -- authored this article. The article makes it clear that the treatment addiction to prescription drugs and other opioids with proven approaches like Methadone and other medication assisted therapy is of crucial importance. It describes the importance of the Affordable Care Act in increasing access to care for many Americans including those who are struggling with addiction disorders.

Dr. Volkow, can you elaborate on how the ACA builds on the Mental Health Parity and Addiction Equity Act to improve on insurance coverage for people who are addicted to prescription drugs, heroin or other substance?

VOLKOW: Yes. The problem is that, as I mentioned in my testimony, is that less than one-third of patients that require that could benefit from opioid medications are getting them for the treatment of their addiction. And this reflects among other things the fact that many of the people that are addicted to drugs do not have an insurance and rely on the state funding to get their treatment.

And as a result of that, we have removed the healthcare system for a position where they could not just act in preventing substance use disorders but on treating them. The healthcare act by providing insurance to those that currently don't have it, will give them the opportunity in to be treated in the healthcare system for substance use disorders as well as in those instances where the addiction has not to cure for the healthcare system to intervene in prevention. So that's why it's so important.

GREEN: Dr. Clark, do you agree with that?

CLARK: Indeed. One of the -- when people who are -- who present for treatment can't get treatment or asked why they couldn't get treatment, of the largest reason is cost and access to treatment.

GREEN: Thank you. I understand the ACA provision creates an optional Medicaid state plan benefits for states to establish health homes for the coordination of beneficiaries with chronic conditions has also supported some states in their effort to address the drug abuse. Dr. Clark, can you elaborate on how the health home program has been official in tackling the problem of abuse?

CLARK: We've actually -- with regards to opioids, we've got several jurisdictions that are looking at health homes as a way of dealing with opioids. So, for months, one jurisdiction I think ruled out and I'll have to clarify that is also taking that approach. Comprehensive services being offered where persons care is adequately monitored offers us an opportunity to reduce some of the complexities associated with opioid misuse.

GREEN: Thank you. It's clear from the counter (ph), it's the Affordable Care Act makes it possible for many people with substance abuse disorders whether it's addiction to prescription drugs, heroin, and other substance access to treatment they so desperately need (ph).

Mr. Chairman, I know we've had our differences over the Affordable Care. I hope we all share the goal of writing more robust treatments to those who are working to overcome these addictions. And I'll yield back my time.

BURGESS: Gentlemen yields back. Our discussion with the Affordable Care Act will continue at a later date.

GREEN: I'm sure it will.

BURGESS: We have now I think heard from all members who wanted to ask a question. I would ask unanimous consent that a follow up question be allowed for those of us who remain.

(UNKNOWN): I don't have any problem with that. I can't stay but ...

BURGESS: Very well. But I wanted to get that unanimous consent agreed to before you left. So it's not just on my shoulders.

(UNKNOWN): I trust you Chairman.

BURGESS: Mr. Griffith, I interrupted you before. Do you have -- would you like to follow up on your line of questioning?

GRIFFITH: Well, I would just like to give an opportunity Mr. ...

RANNAZZISI: Rannazzisi.

GRIFFITH: Rannazzisi. Thank you. I'm sorry. I have such a hard time with it this morning. But Mr. Rannazzisi was about to comment on the dilemma that we have with the small rule pharmacist or pharmacy that has one distributor.

RANNAZZISI: Yes. And I want to thank you for clarifying that DEA has not set a quota downstream from the distributors. The distributors are working through their issues regarding due diligence to determine, you know, what -- if there's a problem pharmacy or it's not a problem pharmacy. I think that the rural of pharmacy present a specific problem because they do need to get medication to their patients. And they need that downstream supply. We're hoping that the distributors are on site looking at their operations before they completely cut off the distributor or limit -- pharmacy or limit the pharmacy. But again, it's a business practice and unfortunately, you know, I have no control over that business practices.

GRIFFITH: Well, I would just say, it's because of the concerns and the -- I'm sure some memos have been put out by the DEA trying to do -- we're all trying to do the right thing that has caused the distributor be concerned. And maybe, if there could be some acknowledgment from the DEA to the distributors, hey, you know, keeping an eye out of its rogue (ph). But if it's just you're looking at, you know, this pharmacy is more than another pharmacy, find out if they have just one distributor because that makes a huge difference in whether or not they're truly distributing more of the opioid than somebody else. And if you all could do that, that would greatly appreciated.

BURGESS: The gentleman yields back. I thank the gentleman for his follow up. Dr. Volkow, you made a statement that was really fairly provocative a few moments ago. And I just wanted to follow up on just a little bit with you with -- when you were discussing the effect of nicotine, alcohol on developing, but I guess you were talking about developing brains or. And then you added the liquidation (ph) of marijuana.

And as you not to say anything about the rightness or wrongness of the public policy, but as you know, this nation is right now engaged in a significant experiment where some states have legalized marijuana. Are you all studying that in the affect of this decriminalization in some states? Are we prepared for what might happen next?

VOLKOW: Yes. I mean, definitively and unfortunately, it's one of those experimental situations that is happening whether we like it or not. So, what we have done is provided, identify the grantees, our researchers in those communities where there has been legalization for recreational or medical purposes to actually give them a supplement money so that they can look at the consequences of these changes in policy in the educational systems, in accidents, in emergency room admissions, in productivity in the workforce.

We need to have evidence that can then hopefully can guide policy as suppose to doing policy in darkness on the beliefs of people. And what -- since you brought up the issue to one of the things that is also concerned as -- discussing the prescription, people are using prescriptions because they feel that are prescribed by physicians they cannot be so harmful. The notion that marijuana has so called medical purposes is also changing the perception of this broken (ph) not to be so harmful if it has medicinal properties. And the whole perception of risk is changing which again is open. The -- I mean, the willingness of drunk people to take marijuana and to consume it regularly.

BURGESS: Well, I do hope that you are monitoring the situation since society has provided you the experimental situation. I also hope that you're preparing to deal with what the downstream effects are from this rather bold social experiment to some of the states are undertaking right now. And I hope that's more than just sending more money to those states. I hope that is something that you are -- that oversight is happening at your level that there will be a national monitoring of this.

VOLKOW: We -- I mean, the way that we oversee research protocol is very, very rigorous. If the scientist is not producing or the methodology is not adequate, we do not fund them.

BURGESS: Let me -- I'm just speaking of downstream effects. There's also the issue and it was been brought up several times this morning. And if you feel free to comment on this, the issue of course the device by which the drug is administered and the possibility for exposure to hepatitis B or C or HIV are from a public health perspective, are we preparing ourselves for any differences in the incidents of these illnesses as a consequence of the delivery device?

(UNKNOWN): I'll start in that. You know, one of the main concerns of HHS has been obviously the increase of viral hepatitis and hepatitis C among the very young cohort of injection drug users. So, we're even working in concert with the Health and Human Services whereas to put forth actually an action plan to diminish viral hepatitis. And clearly, there's a lot of overlap in terms of the issues that we're talking about here. So, this is obviously a significant public health concern. So we want to make sure that we're dealing with this in a concerted way.

BURGESS: Yeah. And then of course the good news right now is hepatitis C is one of those things that -- make looks (ph) very well like there maybe a cure. It's not just on the horizon, but it's here. One problem is it's very expensive. And my differences -- Mr. Green over the Affordable Care Act to side (ph), they ultimately, there's someone is got to pay for that. So I hope we're doing the necessary -- I hope for monitoring and doing the necessary preventive things to keep that in check and to prevent the disease rather than just simply now being able to cure it with a very expensive therapy that thankfully is available.

Mr. Botticelli, did you have some additional observations on the issue of the states that are legalizing marijuana?

BOTTICELLI: I do. And what I wanted you to know is that in addition to that -- additional meta (ph) grants out there. Our office has actually convened a group of federal partners to look at that each criteria that the Department of Justice has laid out for Colorado and Washington and are really committed to gathering data on the Federal State and local level looking at what is the impact in terms of legalization in Colorado and Washington have on both the public health and public safety consequences that we have.

So in addition to some of the public health related work that Dr. Volkow has funded, we're also looking at what are the public safety consequences things like increase in drug driving, interstate transportation of marijuana from Colorado to other states. So our office has really been committed in terms of ensuring that we have good public health and public safety data to monitor what's happening in Colorado and Washington.

BURGESS: And Mr. Rannazzisi, I would assume that your agency is participating in that as well?

RANNAZZISI: It still has a schedule on control substance. We're still doing investigations concerning marijuana downstream.

BURGESS: And are you monitoring the downstream effects in neighboring states in the incidents as Mr. Botticelli talked about. The incidents who drive you all impaired (ph), the incidents of even just crime. Are you compiling those statistics so they will be available to policy makers in subsequent hearings?

RANNAZZISI: We are talking to our state and local counterparts in all the surrounding states. And we are gathering information. I don't know how -- all inclusive that information is because quite frankly the reporting, some of the state and locals are not keeping that type of information. But we are keeping tamps (ph) with our state, locals on what's going on within their states.

BURGESS: Very well ...

GRIFFITH: Mr. Chairman.

BURGESS: Yeah. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia.

GRIFFITH: I'd be reminiscing (ph) -- since we've taking on marijuana, not to mention that I've just introduced the bill to legalize the use of marijuana in medicinal circumstances that came (ph) to the Virginia plan that was passed in 1979. That requires a doctor's prescription thus changing the scheduling. The bill actually cost was changing in the scheduling. DEA is in a tough spot. Some of the states are doing it, but it's still scheduled one which means that the DEA has a hard time collecting the data that you just asked for without stumbling across felons that they're not prosecuting.

So they're in a catch 22 (ph). I think it's much better to have doctors and pharmacists and the regular system working, because then you get real data for your scientist to look at and see if it isn't effective as they designed it to be. So the bill doesn't go as far as Colorado or Washington might want it or the crazy California plan as I often call it. But it allows real doctors with real pharmacist and real distributors controlled that in under the laws of the United States to use true marijuana if it can be used in a real way medicinally.

BURGESS: Very good. The gentleman yields back. I'm all for (ph) giving doctors more power. That actually concludes all of the questions that we have from members. I've neglected to mention at the start of the hearing asking (inaudible) consented members written opening statements be introduced into the record without objection. The documents will be entered into the record.

In conclusion, I would like to thank all of our witnesses. I thank the members that have participated in today's hearing. I'll remind members they have 10 business days to submit questions for the record. And I'll ask the witnesses that all agreed to respond promptly to the question submitted in writing. That the subcommittee is adjourned, thank you for your attendance today.

LUJAN HIGHLIGHTS IMPORTANT IMPACT OF PRESCRIPTION DRUG TAKE-BACK DAY

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 330 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District highlighted the impact that National Prescription Take-Back Day had in New Mexico, where more than 600 pounds of medication was collected in Santa Fe County. Lujan commended the county and all those who participated by bringing their unwanted medications to one of the many locations for safe disposal.

"By collecting more than 600 pounds of prescription drugs, in Santa Fe County alone, and much more throughout the state, New Mexicans who participated in National Prescription Drug Take-Back Day have played an important role the fight against prescription drug abuse," Congressman Lujan said. "While Prescription Drug Take-Back Day is only a small part of what must be a larger effort to combat drug abuse, it is encouraging to see its success in Santa Fe County, and know that a significant amount of prescription drugs have been properly disposed of."

Last week, Rep. Lujan encouraged New Mexicans to take the opportunity on Saturday to dispose of unneeded or expired medicine in an effort to ensure these prescription drugs don't end up in the wrong hands. In 2012, over 60 percent of people who used prescription drugs for non-medical purposes obtained them from family or a friend - which highlights the importance of disposing of unneeded medication.

"As we continue to come together as a community and encourage our family, friends, and neighbors to live a healthy lifestyle, it is critical that we recognize the role prescription drugs have in people's lives. Every year we see an increasing number of lives claimed by prescription drug abuse," added Lujan. "Prescription Drug Take-Back events not only reduce the amount of unwanted drugs, but draw attention to the fact that we all have a role to play in this effort. Every step we take to safely dispose of prescription drugs has the potential to save lives in our communities."

Luj án encourages participation in prescription drug disposal

DATELINE: SANTA FE

SANTA FE - U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, of New Mexico's 3rd District, is encouraging New Mexicans in communities across the state to participate in National Prescription Drug Take-Back Day Saturday, according to a news release.

Saturday is the eighth annual National Prescription Drug Take-Back Day. Communities across the state and nation will have the opportunity to dispose of expired, unwanted and potentially dangerous prescription drugs and other medications between 10 a.m. and 2 p.m. at designated drop-off locations.

There are two drop-off locations in Gallup at Gallup Indian Medical Center, 516 E. Nizhoni Blvd., and the New Mexico State Police District 6 office, 4200 E. Historic Highway 66. There's one location in Window Rock, inside the front entrance of Lowe's, located on Arizona Highway 264 and Route 12. There's also one location in Grants at the Cibola County Sheriff's Office, 114 McBride Road.

In his statement, Luján warns of the potential dangers to the environment if prescription drugs are disposed of improperly.

He also emphasizes that prescription drugs are essential to treating chronic conditions and that they are meant for specific individuals, times and places.

"Every year we see an increasing number of lives claimed by prescription drug abuse; from accidental overdose, suicide and the crimes that result from people becoming dependent on prescription drugs," Luján states. "As we receive medication from doctors and pharmacies and fail to use it or dispose of it properly, the opportunity for misuse arises. From giving away pills - not appreciating the danger posed when someone uses a prescription meant for someone else - to the theft of prescription drugs, the failure to properly dispose of such medication can pose a danger that can be defeated by returning them to a designated drop off point."

Other drop-off locations in the Four Corners region can be found online through the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's website.

Democrat Tom Udall raises $1M for Senate race

BYLINE: BARRY MASSEY, Associated Press

SECTION: POLITICAL NEWS; STATE AND REGIONAL

LENGTH: 579 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

SANTA FE, N.M. (AP) - Democratic incumbent Tom Udall holds a large fundraising advantage over two Republican challengers in the race for New Mexico's U.S. Senate seat.

According to the latest Federal Election Commission reports, Udall's campaign had cash-on-hand of $3.1 million at the end of March.

Former state GOP chairman Allen Weh had a cash balance of $205,569, and Las Cruces attorney David Clements reported a campaign balance of $7,497.

In 2008, Udall spent about $7.8 million in winning the Senate seat in a hotly contested race against Republican Steve Pearce. Both were U.S. House members at the time.

During the first three months of this year, Udall raised about $1 million and spent $262,077.

Udall's top donors included leadership political action committees affiliated with other Democratic senators - Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, Mary Landrieu of Louisiana and Mark Warner of Virginia. Each of their PACs gave $5,000.

Udall is unopposed in the June 3 Democratic primary.

Weh, a retired Marine colonel who owns an aviation company in Albuquerque, raised $413,966, including personal loans and contributions of $160,300. His campaign spent $208,396.

Clements raised $40,579 and spent $44,968 from January through March. His top donors included Las Cruces business owner Randy McMillan, $3,900, and the American Gun Culture Club of Las Cruces, $1,000.

In races for the state's three House seats, Republican incumbent Steve Pearce in the 2nd Congressional District has the largest campaign account. He reported a cash balance of nearly $1.4 million.

Democratic challenger Roxanne "Rocky" Lara, a Carlsbad attorney, had cash-on-hand of $444,233.

Pearce raised $362,694 during the quarter, and Lara collected $307,259. The incumbent spent $75,272, and Lara's campaign reported expenditures of $90,068.

Pearce's top contributors included financial industry political action committees, which gave about $59,000. Included was $3,500 from the PAC of the Independent Community Bankers of America.

Labor union PACs gave $31,000 to Lara, and $10,000 came from a PAC affiliated with Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand, a New York Democrat.

In the Albuquerque-area 1st Congressional District, Democratic incumbent Michelle Lujan Grisham had cash-on-hand of $842,491. She has two GOP challengers. Retired Army officer Richard Priem reported a campaign account balance of $40,690 and Corrales business owner Michael Frese had $27,456.

Grisham raised $234,985, including about $30,000 from health-care industry PACs. Frese had total receipts of $51,795, including personal loans of $30,000. Priem is mostly self-financing his campaign. He collected $100 in contributions in the past quarter, and his campaign's cash balance stems from a $100,000 personal loan made in December.

Grisham's campaign spent $74,328 compared with $37,758 by Frese and $48,310 by Priem.

In the 3rd District of northern New Mexico, Democratic incumbent Ben Ray Lujan reported a campaign cash balance of $589,545. Democratic challenger Robert Blanch wasn't required to file a finance report with the FEC during the quarter because he hadn't raised and spent $5,000. Republican Jefferson Byrd had a cash balance of $3,445.

Lujan raised $138,703, including $12,800 from Indian tribes in New Mexico and other states. Byrd had receipts of $4,332, with the candidate accounting for $3,222 of the total. Lujan's campaign spent $65,033 compared with $1,665 by Byrd.

LUJAN URGES NEW MEXICO COMMUNITIES TO PARTICIPATE IN NATIONAL PRESCRIPTION DRUG TAKE-BACK DAY; Santa Fe, NM - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today urging New Mexicans in communities across the state to participate in National Prescription Drug Take-Back Day this Saturday.; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

LENGTH: 432 words

"This Saturday, April 26th, is the 8th annual National Prescription Drug Take-Back Day. Between 10 a.m. and 2 p.m. communities across New Mexico and across the nation will have an opportunity to dispose of expired, unwanted, and potentially dangerous prescription drugs and other medications. Last year, Americans discarded over 600,000 pounds of unneeded medication on National Prescription Drug Take-Back Day, and this Saturday we have an important opportunity to dispose of these potentially dangerous drugs that can do harm to those we love or the health of our environment when discarded improperly.

"As we continue to come together as a community and encourage our family, friends, and neighbors to live a healthy lifestyle, it is critical that we recognize the role prescription drugs have in peoples' lives. While prescribed medication from doctors can be essential in treating chronic conditions, disease, and pain, we must be aware that every prescription is meant for a certain time, place, and individual. Because these medications come from a doctor, they are sometimes viewed as less dangerous than illicit drugs, but this could not be further from the truth.

"Every year we see an increasing number of lives claimed by prescription drug abuse; from accidental overdose, suicide, and the crimes that result from people becoming dependent on prescription drugs. As we receive medication from doctors and pharmacies and fail to use it or dispose of it properly, the opportunity for misuse arises. From giving away pills--not appreciating the danger posed when someone uses a prescription meant for someone else--to the theft of prescription drugs, the failure to properly dispose of such medication can pose a danger that can be defeated by returning them to a designated drop off point.

"I encourage everyone to take this opportunity on Saturday, April 26th, and dispose of unneeded or expired medicine at a drop off location, which can be found at the DEA's website here http://www.deadiversion.usdoj.gov/drug_disposal/takeback/index.html, or by calling the DEA Call Center at: 1-800-882-9539. We must all work together to ensure that substance abuse doesn't claim the lives of the people we care about, or that prescription drugs don't end up in the wrong hands due to their improper disposal. I hope you will join me in decreasing the availability of unwanted and expired medication, and encourage others to do the same."

LUJAN URGES NEW MEXICO COMMUNITIES TO PARTICIPATE IN NATIONAL PRESCRIPTION DRUG TAKE-BACK DAY

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 445 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today urging New Mexicans in communities across the state to participate in National Prescription Drug Take-Back Day this Saturday.

"This Saturday, April 26th, is the 8th annual National Prescription Drug Take-Back Day. Between 10 a.m. and 2 p.m. communities across New Mexico and across the nation will have an opportunity to dispose of expired, unwanted, and potentially dangerous prescription drugs and other medications. Last year, Americans discarded over 600,000 pounds of unneeded medication on National Prescription Drug Take-Back Day, and this Saturday we have an important opportunity to dispose of these potentially dangerous drugs that can do harm to those we love or the health of our environment when discarded improperly.

"As we continue to come together as a community and encourage our family, friends, and neighbors to live a healthy lifestyle, it is critical that we recognize the role prescription drugs have in peoples' lives. While prescribed medication from doctors can be essential in treating chronic conditions, disease, and pain, we must be aware that every prescription is meant for a certain time, place, and individual. Because these medications come from a doctor, they are sometimes viewed as less dangerous than illicit drugs, but this could not be further from the truth.

"Every year we see an increasing number of lives claimed by prescription drug abuse; from accidental overdose, suicide, and the crimes that result from people becoming dependent on prescription drugs. As we receive medication from doctors and pharmacies and fail to use it or dispose of it properly, the opportunity for misuse arises. From giving away pills-not appreciating the danger posed when someone uses a prescription meant for someone else-to the theft of prescription drugs, the failure to properly dispose of such medication can pose a danger that can be defeated by returning them to a designated drop off point.

"I encourage everyone to take this opportunity on Saturday, April 26th, and dispose of unneeded or expired medicine at a drop off location, which can be found at the DEA's website here, or by calling the DEA Call Center at: 1-800-882-9539. We must all work together to ensure that substance abuse doesn't claim the lives of the people we care about, or that prescription drugs don't end up in the wrong hands due to their improper disposal. I hope you will join me in decreasing the availability of unwanted and expired medication, and encourage others to do the same."

Art competition deadline looms

SECTION: TODAY'S NEWS

LENGTH: 273 words

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District announced today that entries in this year's Congressional Art Competition will be displayed in an exhibit open to the public at the City of Santa Fe Arts Commission Community Gallery May 2 and May 3. Luján will announce the winners of the competition during a reception on Saturday.

"Every year, I am impressed with the quality and creativity of the high school students who participate in this competition, and I am sure this year will be no different," Luján said. "I am excited that we will have the opportunity to show off their fine work in the City of Santa Fe Arts Commission Community Gallery for all to see."

The annual competition allows members of Congress to display the talent and creativity of their high school constituents. The first-place entry from each Congressional district will be displayed as part of an exhibit in the United States Capitol for one year.

The winner will travel to Washington, D.C. for a reception honoring the national winners. Artwork that places second through seventh will be displayed in Luján's district offices across northern New Mexico.

Students interested in entering the competition can still do so. Entries must be submitted to the Santa Fe district office by 5 p.m. Friday. More information regarding the contest guidelines is available on Luján's website, www.lujan.house.gov.

All entries submitted to Luján's office by high school students in the Third District will be on display on May 2 from 5 to 7 p.m. and again during a reception at the Gallery on May 3 from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m., at which time the winners will be announced.

Luján checks out STEM at UNM-LA; Education House rep has publicly stated his support for project

BYLINE: Tris DeRoma

SECTION: TODAY'S NEWS

LENGTH: 560 words

Rep. Ben Ray Luján (D-N.M.) visited the University of New Mexico-Los Alamos recently, anxious to learn more about the programs there and how he can help further the university's immersion in STEM (Science, Technology, Engineering, Math) programming.

Luján has publicly stated his support of STEM programming, not only as a means to stabilize New Mexico's economy, but also as means of economic mobility for New Mexico's high school and college-aged students.

Accompanying him on his tour of the campus were UNM-LA's Executive Director Dr. Cedric Page, Dean of Curriculum and Instruction Dr. Cindy J. Rooney, Carole G. Rutten, the Los Alamos National Laboratory's Institutional Program Manager for Education in the Community Programs Office and others.

One goal Lujan hoped to achieve by his visit was to drive home the importance of STEM-based programming to his counterparts in Washington as well as the importance of branch campuses in general.

"In the midst of the budget debates we had just last week, the Paul Ryan budget will sadly devastate programs like this," Lujan said, talking about the budget proposal of Ryan, the Republican House Budget Committee chairman from Wisconsin. "So, what I can take back to this debate is the information I get from these types of visits with the educational leaders of New Mexico, students, as well as the small businesses that depend on STEM education. Perhaps my colleagues will begin to understand the importance of the programs they're looking to cut and their importance to the communities they serve. Hopefully they will then begin to support these programs rather than devastate them."

One of the highlights of Lujan's visit included a discussion with students involved in the programs. Sheri Lopez, a pre-engineering student who is undertaking an internship at Fermi Labs, urged Lujan to find a way to equal the playing field for women who are applying for STEM jobs.

"There has to be more educational opportunities for young women, maybe starting in elementary school," Lopez said. "The perception's always been that boys are naturally good at math. This sexist idea has been around so long it's ingrained itself, passed on from generation to generation. I think that cycle needs to be broken."

Lujan and Rutten both were impressed with Lopez's statement that they talked of starting a program doing just that, that Lopez offered to help with.

Another student, Joshua Bristol-Cossey, who is in the school's Accelerate Technical Job Training Program and is majoring in Robotics, talked about how important it's been to have a teacher that has actually worked in the field that he's planning to go into once he graduates.

"Another thing we need to expand on is teaching kids about what the job is going to look like," he said. "I thought I was going to become a miserable little worker bee for the rest of my life until I came here. Don Davis (UNM-LA Technology Chair) then told me all about the field."

Other highlights included visiting with the "Project Y" Robotics Team, as well as students enrolled in the school's EMS and Fire Science degree programs.

Page said the students at the discussion made a positive impression on Lujan.

"I was very proud to see how well they articulated and expressed their career goals as well as demonstrate to Mr. Lujan just what UNM-LA and its programs mean to them," he said.

EDITORIAL: Audiotapes reveal another Martinez

BYLINE: The Santa Fe New Mexican

SECTION: COMMENTARY

LENGTH: 795 words

April 18--Gov. Susana Martinez took center stage, if only for a brief moment, in the nation's political theater this week.

Mother Jones, the left-leaning investigative magazine, published a not-so-flattering profile of the New Mexico governor and possible Republican vice presidential contender. Even juicier than the cover article, which described Martinez as "petty" and "vindictive" under the headline, "The Next Sarah Palin," were the quotes of Martinez talking off the cuff with advisers.

Martinez, about former Lt. Gov. Diane Denish: "That little bitch."

On teachers and their pay: "During the campaign, we can't say it, I guess, because it's education, but ... [teachers] already don't work, you know, two and a half months out of the year."

On the Commission on the Status of Women: "What the hell is that? What the hell does a commission on women's Cabinet do all day long?"

More troubling, aide Matt Kennicott had this to say about the late House Speaker Ben Luján: "Somebody told me he's absolutely eloquent in Spanish, but his English? He sounds like a retard." Even in private, that is offensive language, especially for a political operative who ended up landing a cushy state job. Kennicott works for the state agency that -- wait for it -- is charged with providing services for the state's mentally disabled. He earns $84,905 as communications director for New Mexico's Human Services Department, according to the state's Sunshine Portal.

Speaker Luján's widow, Carmen, had this to say: "Ben committed his life to helping people, even while fighting cancer -- people always came first. He had an incredible mind and heart. This makes me so sad. He was a lifelong champion of working people. He used his voice and his words to make a difference."

As Mrs. Luján pointed out, "these cruel words by Matt [Kennicott] are not just about Ben, they hurt and attack the people of our State. Anyone who speaks with an accent, anyone who speaks Spanglish and uses both English and Spanish to communicate was attacked by the governor's staff."

Their son, U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, put the comments in broader context: "It is sad that a Martinez official believes that New Mexicans who speak with a Spanish accent have a disability or that they use such disparaging terms. It is troubling that Governor Martinez has allowed a culture in which these comments and other offensive remarks by her staff are deemed acceptable. It is deeply disappointing that instead of speaking out against this offensive language, Governor Martinez has tolerated it and even rewarded this type of behavior by making this individual a spokesman in her administration.

"The decision by Governor Martinez to surround herself with staff like this speaks volumes about her leadership and character. It sends a message that this behavior is acceptable. Using such derogatory terms for women or those who interchange English and Spanish when they speak should not be tolerated."

Kennicott has apologized -- sort of, saying that, "In this private conversation four years ago, I was repeating a direct quote of what someone else had said and I apologize if that offended or hurt anyone. I was relaying this to someone in private and obviously would not have used this language otherwise, as I knew full-well that the governor's sister is developmentally disabled."

Of course, Gov. Martinez has turned the attack into a drive to make money -- and the $10 donations are pouring in. She is decrying the audiotape as "stolen" and complaining about the liberal media. But the tapes, and the attitudes, are accurate. And the pleasant image of the governor who loves reading to children is smudged. She's considered a national front-runner for, at the least, a GOP vice presidential nomination. Republicans hope her face can help change the face of their party, making it more welcoming to both women and minorities. Her seemingly pleasant personality and can-do image is part of that appeal. Now, thanks to the audiotapes (presumably leaked by a former ally), we see a different Martinez.

As for whether this will stick, or whether it's another political storm that will dissipate, we'll see, left-leaning or not, Mother Jones is the same magazine that discovered and wrote about the video showing then-presidential candidate Mitt Romney bashing the "47 percent" of citizens who are nothing but "takers." That video altered the presidential race. What the audiotapes do to Gov. Martinez's carefully constructed image is unknown. But they have certainly moved the curtain aside so that voters can view more clearly the woman in the governor's seat.

Recordings surface in New Mexico governor race

BYLINE: BARRY MASSEY, Associated Press

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL; POLITICAL NEWS

LENGTH: 719 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

SANTA FE, N.M. (AP) - Democrats called Wednesday for Republican Gov. Susana Martinez to apologize after a liberal publication released recordings in which she and aides used profanity and offensive names to describe political opponents.

The governor, who's seeking re-election this year and is viewed as a possible rising star in national GOP ranks, also came under fire for making critical remarks about public school teachers while telling aides that it was a view that couldn't be expressed publicly during her campaign.

"Governor Martinez and her aides' comments are inexcusable. We have clear proof of her intent to deceive voters and her disdain for anyone who has differing views," said Lawrence Rael, one of the five Democrats running for governor in the June primary election.

Martinez campaign spokesman Chris Sanchez didn't issue an apology on behalf of the governor but acknowledged that the governor "used salty language in a private conversation four years ago with close advisers and will pay the appropriate penalty to the cuss jar."

The campaign sent an email to Martinez supporters noting that Martinez had referred to her 2010 general election opponent, then Lt. Gov. Diane Denish, "using the B-word" in a conversation with advisers.

The recordings were part of an unflattering profile of Martinez posted online by Mother Jones magazine.

Sanchez dismissed the article and Democratic criticisms.

"That the national left is trying to smear the first Hispanic woman governor in American history because they view her as a threat is about as surprising as the National Enquirer reporting that Elvis is still alive," Sanchez said in a statement.

The recordings were "private conversations undoubtedly sent to them by individuals or their allies who are either under federal indictment, or have had their homes raided by the FBI for their role in stealing or distributing Gov. Susana Martinez's email," he said.

A former campaign manager for the governor pleaded not guilty last year to federal charges that he hijacked the campaign's email system after Martinez became governor in 2011.

Martinez, in one of the recordings, privately suggests public school teachers may earn too much.

"During the campaign, we can't say it, I guess, because it's education, but I really keep going back to that ... keeping the teachers from feeling the pain when they already don't work, you know, two and a half months out of the year or three months out of the year but earn salaries at the same rate of people who do work 12 months a year," Martinez said in the recording.

Leaders of educational unions said the governor's remarks were demeaning to teachers.

"I wish the governor's words came as more of a surprise, but they don't. Gov. Martinez has been unabashed in her strategy to attack teachers and dismantle public education in New Mexico," said Stephanie Ly, president of the American Federation of Teachers New Mexico.

Educational unions have opposed many of the governor's policies, including a new teacher-evaluation system.

In another recording, Martinez asks about the purpose of the state Commission on the Status of Women and campaign aides profanely joke about the organization. Martinez laughs at the comments.

A campaign aide in another recording suggested that then House Speaker Ben Lujan's English language skills made it appear the Democratic leader had a disability - using a disparaging term to describe the condition. Lujan died in 2012.

Lujan's son, U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, said in a statement that his mother and family "are genuinely hurt and offended by what was said."

"The decision by Gov. Martinez to surround herself with staff like this speaks volumes about her leadership and character. It sends a message that this behavior is acceptable," Lujan said. "Using such derogatory terms for women or those who interchange English and Spanish when they speak should not be tolerated."

The former campaign aide, Matt Kennicott, said in a statement that he "was repeating a direct quote of what someone else had said and I apologize if that offended or hurt anyone."

"I was relaying this to someone in private and obviously would not have used this language otherwise, as I knew full well that the governor's sister is developmentally disabled," said Kennicott, the spokesman for the Human Services Department.

Gov. Martinez: Embarrassing audio tapes 'stolen'

BYLINE: Steve Terrell, The Santa Fe New Mexican

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 1392 words

April 17--A left-leaning, San Francisco-based magazine set the New Mexico political world ablaze Wednesday with a scathing cover story on Gov. Susana Martinez that publicized audio clips of Martinez and her campaign staff talking frankly, and sometimes profanely, about Democrats.

The Mother Jones article -- headlined "Is New Mexico Gov. Susana Martinez the next Sarah Palin?" -- contends that despite her reputation and public persona, "In private, Martinez can be nasty, juvenile, and vindictive. She appears ignorant about basic policy issues and has surrounded herself with a clique of advisers who are prone to a foxhole mentality."

Reporter Andy Kroll's story comes at a time when Martinez is receiving more and more attention among national Republicans -- as well as frequent chatter in national media about her being a leading contender for vice president on the GOP ticket in 2016. She currently is running for election to another four-year term as governor.

David Corn, Mother Jones' Washington bureau chief, told The New Mexican on Wednesday, "She's been abuzz in GOP circles as someone who can attract Latino and women voters. There's been some talk of her getting a position on the national ticket. A lot of people back East are interested in her."

A Martinez campaign spokesman called Mother Jones, a print magazine that has published since 1976, "an extreme left-wing blog" and said "the national Left is trying to smear the first Hispanic woman governor in American history because they view her as a threat."

Much of the material in the magazine piece wasn't new to those familiar with New Mexico politics. But the audio recordings, which were made during debate preparations during her 2010 campaign, had not had been released previously.

Among the controversial moments in the recordings:

--Martinez campaign staffer Matt Kennicott, who was later hired as spokesman for the state Human Services Department, said of the late New Mexico House Speaker Ben Luján, a Democrat from Nambé, "Somebody told me he's absolutely eloquent in Spanish, but his English? He sounds like a retard."

--During the 2010 campaign, when some thought that cutting teachers' salaries might be inevitable because of the budget crisis, Martinez said in a taped conversation, "During the campaign, we can't say it, I guess, because it's education, but ... [teachers] already don't work, you know, two and a half months out of the year or three months out of the year but earn salaries at the same rate of people who do work 12 months a year."

--Talking about how the administration could respond to criticism if Martinez cut teachers' salaries after promising not to, her chief political consultant, Jay McCleskey, suggested the campaign could post "a YouTube video that no one will ever see where you talk about making everyone feel the pain. And when you win, we say, 'See we said this ... the whole time. What are you guys talking about?' " To that, Kennicott responded: "It's on YouTube. C'mon, bitches." [After Martinez became governor, teachers' salaries didn't get cut.]

--While discussing the state's Commission on the Status of Women, Martinez asks: "What the hell is that? What the hell does a commission on women's Cabinet do all day long?" [Martinez as governor vetoed state funds for the commission's budget.]

--Watching a clip of a debate with her 2010 gubernatorial opponent, then Lt. Gov Diane Denish, Martinez referred to her as "that little bitch."

Carmen Luján, the widow of Speaker Luján, issued a statement Wednesday, saying, "When I read and heard the audio from Gov. Martinez's staff this morning it crushed my heart. I called my family in tears and felt sick to my stomach. ... these cruel words by Matt are not just about Ben, they hurt and attack the people of our State. Anyone who speaks with an accent, anyone who speaks Spanglish and uses both English and Spanish to communicate, was attacked by the governor's staff."

U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., son of the late speaker, also weighed in. "The decision by Gov. Martinez to surround herself with staff like this speaks volumes about her leadership and character. It sends a message that this behavior is acceptable."

Kennicott on Wednesday said in a statement, "In this private conversation four years ago, I was repeating a direct quote of what someone else had said and I apologize if that offended or hurt anyone. I was relaying this to someone in private and obviously would not have used this language otherwise, as I knew full-well that the governor's sister is developmentally-disabled."

Referring to the audio recordings, the Martinez campaign said the tapes were "stolen" and later said the magazine "undoubtedly" got the recordings from "individuals or their allies who are either under federal indictment, or have had their homes raided by the FBI for their role in stealing or distributing Gov. Susana Martinez's email."

Former Martinez campaign manager Jamie Estrada was indicted by a federal grand jury on a charge that he illegally took Martinez's emails. But he had been gone from the campaign nearly a year before the debate preparation recordings were made.

Another person implicated in the email case was Martinez's former personal assistant, Anissa Galassini Ford, whose Rio Rancho home was searched by the FBI last year as part of the same investigation. On Wednesday, Ford declined to confirm or deny that she was the source for Mother Jones. Ford worked for the Martinez campaign until November 2010, after Martinez won the election.

"I won't comment on anything the governor and her people accuse me of," Ford said.

Corn declined to say who gave the recordings to Kroll, but said they came after Kroll had written a first draft of his story.

Martinez, meanwhile, immediately used the Mother Jones piece to appeal to supporters for more campaign funds. She ignored most of the article's content but admitted she had called Denish "the B-word." Martinez said in the fundraising email, "I admit it -- I've had to fund the cuss jar a few times in my life."

Denish commented on her Facebook page, saying, "No one ever accused [Martinez] of having any class. One of the most telling things about the article is that she isn't surrounded by people who are personally committed to her or loyal -- as evidenced by the fact that they are willing to make these audios for future use."

The Martinez campaign tweeted Wednesday afternoon that it had raised nearly $15,000 in a few hours.

Three of the five Democrats running for governor this year -- Lawrence Rael, Alan Webber and Howie Morales -- blasted Martinez over the magazine's revelations. Rael said the recordings "reveal a side of Gov. Martinez and her aides that is offensive on so many levels. ... That she didn't reprimand Matt Kennicott is inexcusable."

Two Albuquerque Republican legislators, Reps. Monica Youngblood and Paul Pacheco, issued a news release accusing Democrats of hypocrisy, saying Rael had accepted a campaign contribution from a convicted sex offender and that Webber in a blog post had dismissed as a "sex scandal" the admission by his former boss, former Oregon Gov. Neil Goldschmidt, that he had sex with a 14-year-old baby-sitter. Webber, in an email to delegates at the Democratic pre-primary convention last month, said, "I used the wrong words. It was a terrible crime. That's what I should have called it."

Leaders of educational unions said the governor's recorded remarks were demeaning to teachers.

"Very few teachers work only nine months, very few get paid as if they worked 12 months," said Betty Patterson, NEA-New Mexico president. "During the nine months, teachers work directly with students, we put in endless hours beyond what is paid or expected."

"I wish the governor's words came as more of a surprise, but they don't," said Stephanie Ly, president of the American Federation of Teachers New Mexico. "Gov. Martinez has been unabashed in her strategy to attack teachers and dismantle public education in New Mexico."

Educational unions have opposed many of the governor's policies, including a new teacher-evaluation system.

BioScience Lab opens at Santa Fe Business Incubator

SECTION: TODAY'S NEWS

LENGTH: 932 words

The Santa Fe Business Incubator unveiled its new BioScience Lab on Tuesday to a crowd of dignitaries that included Sen. Tom Udall (D-N.M.) and Rep. Ben Ray Luján, (D-N.M.).

"What's happening now with the Santa Fe Incubator and the BioScience Lab is a shot of growth, a new opportunity, where it's not just experts and researchers and entrepreneurs here from Santa Fe, here from New Mexico," Luján said.

"It's from the surrounding states, from cities that aren't so close to us, that are looking to come here because of the investment that the Business Incubator has made with the support of the Department of Commerce and the Economic Development Administration, an investment in technology that's not readily available to everyone else."

The BioScience Lab is a state-of-the-art cell biology and molecular biology facility designed to encourage, attract and support life science companies in the biotech sector. The lab's specialized equipment includes bio-safety cabinets, ultra low temperature freezers, an ultracentrifuge, inverted fluorescence microscope and a real-time PCR system.

Companies will be able to access the facility on a short-term basis, eliminating the need to invest startup capital in expensive equipment.

Pooling resources is one of the incubator's founding principles. Since opening its doors in 1997, SFBI has spawned 125 businesses, 900 high-paying jobs and more than $100 million in revenues.

Udall praised the enterprise's accomplishments.

"This is an incredible model. It's a public/private partnership model. And for over 25 years it's been working with our national laboratories, with our universities, supporting new entrepreneurs and helping grow our economy," Udall said, vowing to use his position on the appropriations committee to support models such as this.

"This is the kind of thing we're going to have to invest in. We're going to have to support to have the economic growth we need."

New Mexico's entire congressional delegation signed a letter urging the U.S. Economic Development Administration to support the BioScience Lab project, which was awarded a $1.25 million EDA grant.

EDA Regional Director Pedro Garza, whom Udall called "the money," attended the opening.

"I read somewhere that your frame of reference should not be the past. Your frame of reference should be the future, and moving forward. And I think this BioScience Lab, their frame of reference is the future, not the past," Garza said.

Garza spoke fondly of this project and others the EDA has funded in New Mexico.

"These are the EDA's children," Garza said. "We raised them, and they grew up to be good kids, and they're hugely successful and we're very proud of them."

Los Alamos National Laboratory was also acknowledged for its role in the startup. SFBI President and CEO Marie Longserre announced that the last piece of equipment on their wish list, a flow cytometer, had been purchased with the help of a $10,000 grant from LANL.

The cytometer is an outgrowth of technology developed over four decades at LANL.

"The acoustic cytometer is our second most successful spinout from Los Alamos in the area of bioscience," said Duncan McBranch, LANL's chief technology officer. "The first most successful was the Human Genome Project, and most people don't realize that came from Los Alamos."

The cytometer also represents another important aspect of SFBI and the BioScience Lab's mission: tech transfer from the national laboratories and universities to the commercial market.

In a press release about the purchase, David Pesiri, leader of the Richard P. Feynman Center for Innovation (FCI), the laboratory's technology transfer organization, said,

"It's fitting that the technology is coming back home to help boost the high-tech economy in the region. Not only did flow cytometers revolutionize the Human Genome Project, but this technology from the national laboratories is saving lives and delivering value to the marketplace."

Sales for the flow cytometer surpassed $30 million in sales in the past five years.

"It's going to be one of the top instruments in the biotechnology industry," McBranch said.

Acoustic Cytometry, the company producing the flow cytometer, had its startup at SFBI 16 years ago.

Brian McGlynn, President and CEO of BioDirections, the lab's first client, was also on hand.

BioDirections will use the lab's facilities in its quest to develop a low cost, portable, rapid point-of-care diagnostic device to screen for mild traumatic brain injury.

"The collaborator I was already working with had found his start here, and then you put in this magnificent lab..." McGlynn said. "And, quite honestly, when you're dealing with biological and some of the processes, that lab becomes something that most private companies cannot afford. You can't put those pieces together.

"The work we're going to do here will allow us to launch next year, and there are a lot of lives that are going to be saved."

Both Udall and Luján stressed the role the BioScience Lab will play in technology transfer for commercial development.

If passed, Udall's Accelerating Technology Transfer to Advance Innovation for the Nation (ATTAIN) Act would facilitate that process.

"There's an inherent benefit from transferring this technology and opening up opportunities with our businesses and engineers, and giving them a path forward to work with entrepreneurs, making sure that business practice is going to embrace the brightest and best of what we have here in New Mexico," Luján said.

"This is critically important. This is an example of what happens when partnerships come together."

Merilee Dannemann: Grisham and gridlock

BYLINE: By Merilee Dannemann Triple Spaced Again

SECTION: OPINION

LENGTH: 644 words

This could be the worst time in all its history to be a member of the U.S. House of Representatives.

More than half of the House's time is spent wasted not on the substance of issues but on wrangling about procedural matters, said Democratic Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham, speaking last week to a hometown audience of supporters. Very little real work is getting done, and summer recess is coming up soon.

Like every other member of the U.S. House, Grisham will be home this summer campaigning for re-election as will New Mexico's other members of the U.S. House of Representatives, Democrat Ben Ray Lujan and Republican Steve Pearce. The Washington pundits have ranked all of New Mexico's districts as safe seats with the incumbents highly favored to win re-election. But Grisham takes nothing for granted. Because of national interest in our governor's race, she's assuming the state will be bombarded with big national Republican money.

Calling Grisham a bundle of energy is probably clichc by now. It's an apt description for a woman who is short, bouncy and so energetic she could be speaking from a trampoline. I can imagine her striding down hallways in the Capitol and cornering adversarial members twice her size.

She explains the term "regular order." It means the normal rules of procedure under which bills are supposed to be debated and voted upon. The House is not doing anything under regular order these days, she says. All bills are processed under special orders. Only Republican bills get to the floor for a vote, and once they reach the floor, no amendments are allowed. There is no debate.

No debate means Republicans can't debate their colleagues' bills either. They have to be in lock step all the time, which means individual thought is stifled, or just as sinister that amendments have to be worked out by private, back-room deal making. Americans have spent a century fighting for open debate of legislation, but the old smoke-filled rooms are back.

Grisham describes the latest shenanigan, a vote held a few days ago. With almost no warning and very few members on the floor, the Speaker suspended the rules, called for an immediate voice vote and pronounced the bill passed. That was how the House passed the so-called "Doc Fix." Every year this postpones the effect of a law that would make drastic cuts in doctors' reimbursements under Medicare. It's what Congress does because it can't agree on a permanent solution. It's done by a trick because it couldn't be passed by regular order.

Grisham points to two sources for optimism. The first is women members of the House. She says the female members of both parties got together and worked out a compromise to end the recent federal government shutdown.

The second reason for optimism is her fellow Congressional freshmen. Grisham says the newest members are frustrated with the stalemate, meeting together and finding common ground. She expects several bipartisan jobs bills to be rolled out later this year.

I hope she's right. Right now America is ungovernable. That is unfathomably scary.

It's been said recently that you can't expect Congress to get anything done in an election year. That's every other year. And you can't expect Congress to get anything done in a non-election year because the next year will be an election year. And you can't expect Congress to get anything done in the second term of a President or the last two years of the first term of a President. What's left?

When Grisham first ran for Congress, I hoped that if she won, she'd make use of her in-depth understanding of healthcare issues. She can't do that and neither can all the other members who arrived in Washington with expertise and energy until the insane and self-destructive gridlock is broken. I hope her optimism is justified.

Ryan budget plan panned and praised

BYLINE: Gary Gerew

LENGTH: 347 words

The members of New Mexico's House delegation split along party lines in their assessment of a bill known as the Ryan Budget Resolution.

Rep. Steve Pearce (R-2) was in the majority voting for the bill, which passed without a single Democrat in its favor by a margin of 219 to 205.

"The United States is $17 trillion in debt. Continuing to spend and budget the way we currently do is simply unsustainable," Pearce said after Thursday's vote. "The budget passed today provides a commonsense pathway for Congress and the federal government to put our spending and nation back on a sustainable, manageable path. While it will not be easy, it is the path we must take to provide our children and grandchildren with the opportunities that we all have benefited from."

That's not how Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-1) saw it.

"Today, I voted against the extreme Ryan Republican budget. This budget is bad policy for New Mexico and the country," Lujan Grisham said in a statement. "This budget makes false promises it can't keep: Their budget never truly balances, it decimates Medicare and Medicaid and does nothing to spur job growth in the country. Instead of protecting New Mexico families, this budget gives millionaires a $200,000 tax cut, while raising taxes by $2,000 on the middle class. It harms veterans, turns Medicare into a voucher program, and makes Medicaid a block grant program that hurts patients, providers, and hospitals in New Mexico."

Rep. Ben Ray Luján (D-3) also voted against the bill.

"Rather than enhance our nation's competitiveness by strengthening our investment in education and job training programs that help our workforce prepare for good jobs, the Republican budget cuts these," Luján said. "Rather than investing in clean energy, innovation, and manufacturing that has the potential to boost our economy and create jobs in our communities, the Republican budget goes in the opposite direction."

LUJAN STATEMENT ON DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE REPORT ON ALBUQUERQUE POLICE DEPARTMENT; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 193 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after the release of a Department of Justice report on the Albuquerque Police Department.

"The Department of Justice report details serious problems within the Albuquerque Police Department. Over the past few years, the use of deadly and excessive force, as well as non-lethal force, has shaken the community, and it is clear that there must be systemic changes. The report also highlights the importance of addressing mental illness in our communities and the need to have a thorough discussion about how we better care for those suffering from mental illness. As this process moves forward, it will be essential to have significant community involvement and input in order to restore trust in APD. I appreciate the work by the Department of Justice and their commitment to work with the Police Department and the community to see that critical reforms are implemented swiftly and effectively."

LUJAN: HOUSE REPUBLICAN BUDGET TAKES OUR COUNTRY IN THE WRONG DIRECTION;
Democrats Offer Budget to Strengthen the Middle Class;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 449 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after voting against House Republicans' budget for Fiscal Year 2015.

"With this budget, House Republicans have outlined their priorities and their roadmap for our country. Unfortunately, it would take us down a path that weakens the middle class at the expense of more tax breaks for those at the top. It cuts investments that are critical to growing our economy and giving the American people an opportunity to get ahead.

"Rather than enhance our nation's competitiveness by strengthening our investment in education and job training programs that help our workforce prepare for good jobs, the Republican budget cuts these. Rather than investing in clean energy, innovation, and manufacturing that has the potential to boost our economy and create jobs in our communities, the Republican budget goes in the opposite direction.

"When it comes to how the Republican budget treats the most vulnerable in our society, the impact is even worse. Approximately 69 percent of the cuts included in the Republican budget come from programs that assist low-income Americans. It slashes funding for nutrition programs at a time when too many New Mexico children are hungry, for Pell Grants that help students afford a higher education, and for Medicaid that provides health care for low-income families. In addition, this legislation would end Medicare as we know it by replacing it with a voucher that fails to cover the cost of health care for New Mexico's seniors. It shifts the costs onto the backs of seniors, leaving them to pay higher out-of-pocket costs.

"I believe that there is a better path forward and that we can give hard-working New Mexicans a better chance to succeed. It begins with a commitment to education at all levels so that our children can begin on the right foot while those already in the workforce can get the training they need to pursue a career in a new field that offers more opportunities. And it includes a framework to reform our broken immigration system - one of the best steps that we could take to strengthen our economy. A recent CBO report shows immigration reform would reduce our deficit by $900 billion while creating new jobs, increasing wages and expanding economic output. While I may not agree with 100 percent of each alternative Democratic budget that was offered, they all address the top priorities that can get our economy back on track and stand in stark contrast to House Republicans' budget plan."

LUJAN HIGHLIGHTS EQUAL PAY DAY AND IMPORTANCE OF PASSING PAYCHECK FAIRNESS ACT; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District highlighted Equal Pay Day and the importance of taking steps to close the wage gap that still exists between men and women - including passage of the Paycheck Fairness Act. Equal Pay Day symbolizes when, more than three months into the year, women's wages finally catch up to what men were paid the previous year. Lujan is a cosponsor of the Paycheck Fairness Act, legislation that strengthens and closes loopholes in the Equal Pay Act that was signed into law nearly 51 years ago.

"Equal pay for equal work is a principal that we should all support and one that we should all strive to achieve. However, nationwide, women today only early 77 cents for every dollar earned by men, and in New Mexico women make 80 percent of what men make," Congressman Lujan said. "Ensuring women earn equal pay is not just a women's issue, but a family issue. When a woman brings home less money for the same work, it means less for the essential needs of her family - groceries, rent, child care, and more. Passing the Paycheck Fairness Act would take an important step toward closing this gap."

Even when education, industry, and hours are taken into account, there remains a wage gap between men and women. A report by the American Association of University Women found that - compared to men with the same major who are working full time in the same occupation - women make 7 percent less one year out of college. Hispanic women face one of the largest wage gaps, earning on average only 53 cents for every dollar earned by white, non-Hispanic men.

The Paycheck Fairness Act protects employees from retaliation if they share their wages or ask about employers' wage practices, implements stronger deterrents to prevent discrimination in the first place, and provides effective remedies to women who are not being paid equal pay for equal work.

Grisham and gridlock

BYLINE: Merilee Dannemann

SECTION: COLUMNS

LENGTH: 647 words

This could be the worst time in all its history to be a member of the United States House of Representatives.

More than half of the House's time is spent - wasted - not on the substance of issues, but on wrangling about procedural matters, said Democratic Congresswoman Michelle Luján Grisham, speaking last week to a hometown audience of supporters. Very little real work is getting done, and summer recess is coming up soon.

Like every other member of the U.S. House, Grisham will be home this summer campaigning for re-election - as will New Mexico's other members of the U.S. House of Representatives, Democrat Ben Ray Luján and Republican Steve Pearce. The Washington pundits have ranked all of New Mexico's districts as safe seats with the incumbents highly favored to win re-election. But Grisham takes nothing for granted. Because of national interest in our governor's race, she's assuming the state will be bombarded with big national Republican money.

Calling Grisham a bundle of energy is probably cliché by now. It's an apt description for a woman who is short, bouncy and so energetic she could be speaking from a trampoline. I can imagine her striding down hallways in the Capitol and cornering adversarial members twice her size.

She explains the term "regular order." It means the normal rules of procedure under which bills are supposed to be debated and voted upon. The House is not doing anything under regular order these days, she says. All bills are processed under special orders. Only Republican bills get to the floor for a vote, and once they reach the floor, no amendments are allowed. There is no debate.

No debate means Republicans can't debate their colleagues' bills either. They have to be in lock step all the time, which means individual thought is stifled, or - just as sinister - that amendments have to be worked out by private, back-room deal making. Americans have spent a century fighting for open debate of legislation, but the old smoke-filled rooms are back.

Grisham describes the latest shenanigan, a vote held a few days ago. With almost no warning and very few members on the floor, the Speaker suspended the rules, called for an immediate voice vote and pronounced the bill passed. That was how the House passed the so-called "Doc Fix." Every year this postpones the effect of a law that would make drastic cuts in doctors' reimbursements under Medicare. It's what Congress does because it can't agree on a permanent solution. It's done by a trick because it couldn't be passed by regular order.

Grisham points to two sources for optimism. The first is women members of the House. She says the female members of both parties got together and worked out a compromise to end the recent federal government shutdown.

The second reason for optimism is her fellow Congressional freshmen. Grisham says the newest members are frustrated with the stalemate, meeting together and finding common ground. She expects several bipartisan jobs bills to be rolled out later this year.

I hope she's right. Right now America is ungovernable. That is unfathomably scary.

It's been said recently that you can't expect Congress to get anything done in an election year. That's every other year. And you can't expect Congress to get anything done in a non-election year because the next year will be an election year. And you can't expect Congress to get anything done in the second term of a President or the last two years of the first term of a President. What's left?

When Grisham first ran for Congress, I hoped that if she won, she'd make use of her in-depth understanding of healthcare issues. She can't do that - and neither can all the other members who arrived in Washington with expertise and energy - until the insane and self-destructive gridlock is broken. I hope her optimism is justified.

New Mexico Dems: Congressman Ben Ray Lujan: Time for House to Act on Unemployment Benefits Extension

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 298 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District again called on House Republican leaders to take action on an extension of unemployment insurance now that the Senate has passed legislation to extend this critical safety net. Yesterday, by a vote of 59 to 38, the Senate passed a bill extending unemployment insurance for five months. The Senate bill would assist 14,100 people in New Mexico.

"During this difficult economic time, many friends and neighbors throughout New Mexico have struggled to find work. Unemployment insurance should be there to help them weather these tough times and make end meet while they continue to look for employment," Congressman Lujan said. "For more than three months, I have called for action to extend unemployment insurance that helps families pay the rent and put food on the table. Time and again these calls have fallen on deaf ears in the Republican-led House. Now that the Senate has passed legislation to extend unemployment insurance, there is no excuse for House Republicans to continue to stand on the sidelines."

The House has failed to act on this issue since unemployment insurance began expiring for long-term unemployed Americans at the end of December. Since that time, 72,000 Americans a week have seen this important lifeline disappear. Across the country, nearly 3 million Americans have lost these benefits, including more than 9,700 people in New Mexico. Lujan has repeatedly called for a vote in the House to extend unemployment insurance, and last month he signed onto a discharge petition to try to force a vote on legislation that includes an extension through the end of the year.

BYLINE: Vida Volkert Staff writer eastnavajo@gallupindependent.com

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 1

LENGTH: 488 words

DATELINE: CHURCHROCK

CHURCHROCK - U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N. M., has released a map of the Fort Wingate Army Depot that includes land distribution - as parcels are expected to be turned over to the Zuni and Navajo tribes.

The map shows that most of the internal parcels, including the rail classification yard, will go to the Pueblo of Zuni. The Navajo Nation is expected to receive bordering parcels with Sundance, Baahaali and Fort Wingate.

Andrew Stoddard, communications director for Luján, said representatives from both tribes agreed to this distribution during a meeting July 8. The terms of the official document, released by Stoddard, state: "While this document does not reflect any official action taken by either tribe or their Councils, the representatives will move forward to draft legislation in accordance with the attached document."

The document included parcel distribution.

The agreement was signed by Navajo Nation Speaker Johnny Naize, Navajo Nation Council Delegate Edmund Yazzie, Zuni. Gov. Arlen Quetawki and Fort Wingate Coordinator Darrell Tsabetsaye, of Zuni.

Luján and Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N. M., introduced H.R. 3822, the Fort Wingate Land Division Act of 2014, to Congress Jan. 8.

The act was drafted to reflect the agreement, Stoddard said.

During a public hearing on the matter in Churchrock earlier this year, Navajo tribal members from Iyanbito, Churchrock, Pinedale and Baahaali expressed their concerns and asked NN Council Delegate Edmund Yazzie to oppose the deal.

"It's not like we hate the Zuni or have any animosity. It's not that we don't want to work with the Zuni. We just don't like the split. We want the whole thing to go to Navajo," Travis King, the vice president of Iyanbito's Land Use Committee, said. "If you see the map, (the Zuni) get the existing infrastructure and the railroad spur and the entrance to the Army Depot. Who signed the document?"

King said Navajo families of sheepherders had their camps in the area before the Army took over the land in 1940. Because those families were displaced, the Navajo should be compensated now by the Army and awarded the entire property.

"Our people were pushed off this land," he said. "We just waited this long to get it back."

The Office of Contract Archeology documented the cultural landscape within the Fort Wingate Depot Activity boundaries by cultural resources surveys conducted from 1992 through 1996. According to the report, archeological sites within the property include more than 400 sites of Navajo ancestral use including residences, sweat lodges and corrals built of wood; and 300 precontact Pueblo sites, "many that are possibly ancestral to the Zuni people, and one of which (the Fenced Up Horse Canyon ruin) is a uniquely preserved example of a Chaco affiliated outlier settlement."

According to the record, some of the Navajo sites date back to the late 1700s. The Puebloan sites, on the other hand, date back to the mid 900s.

SANTA FE - Creative high school students could earn a trip to Washington and have their art work displayed in the U.S. Capitol as part of the 2014 Congressional Art Competition.

The deadline for the art competition, which is open to two-dimensional works, is 5 p.m. April 5, U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján announced in a news release. Winners from each congressional district will earn a trip to Washington for a reception and will have their entry displayed in a yearlong exhibit at the Capitol.

"New Mexico has a long and rich tradition in the arts, and the Congressional Art Competition provides young artists the opportunity to display their fine work," Luján stated in the news release. "Every year, I am impressed with the quality and creativity of the high school students who participate in this competition, and I am sure this year will be no different. I look forward to viewing this year's submissions."

The annual competition allows members of Congress to display the talent and creativity of their high school constituents, according to the news release. The contest is open to all high school students within the 3rd Congressional District of New Mexico, which covers the northern part of the state, including Gallup, Farmington, Thoreau and Crownpoint.

Congressional Votes for New Mexico the Week of 03/28 - 04/03/2014

BYLINE: by TARGETED NEWS SERVICE, Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 1548 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON, April 5 -- There were three votes in the House in the week ending Thursday; there were six in the Senate. The most important House vote was to pass a bill that would define a workweek as 40 hours for the purpose of Obamacare's employer coverage mandate. The most important Senate vote was to pass a bill to patch Medicare's formula for paying doctors for their services.

In addition to roll call votes, the House also passed the Weather Forecasting Improvement Act (H.R. 2413), sponsored by Rep. Jim Bridenstine, R-Okla., to prioritize and redirect National Oceanic and Atmosphere Administration resources to investment in improving weather forecasting and severe weather prediction; the Coast Guard and Maritime Transportation Act (H.R. 4005), sponsored by Rep. Duncan D. Hunter, R-Calif., to authorize appropriations for the Coast Guard for fiscal 2015 and 2016; and the Children's Hospital GME Support Reauthorization Act (S. 1557), sponsored by Sen. Robert P. Casey Jr., D-Pa., to reauthorize through 2017 a program for training graduate medical students in children's hospitals.

The Senate also passed the Green Mountain Lookout Heritage Protection Act (S. 404), sponsored by Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash., to preserve the Green Mountain Lookout in the Glacier Peak Wilderness of the Mount Baker-Snoqualmie National Forest in Washington.

Here's a look at how area members of Congress voted over the previous week.

HOUSE VOTES:

House Vote 1:

AID TO UKRAINE AND RUSSIA SANCTIONS: The House has concurred in the Senate amendment to the Support for the Sovereignty, Integrity, Democracy, and Economic Stability of Ukraine Act (H.R. 4152), sponsored by Rep. Harold Rogers, R-Ky. The amendment would provide $1 billion of loan guarantees for Ukraine's new government, fund democracy, governance, and civil society programs in the country, and impose sanctions and asset freezes against Russian officials. Rogers said the bill would send "a very clear message that the United States will not tolerate the Russian incursion into Ukraine, human rights abuses, or corruption." The vote, on April 1, was 378 yeas to 34 nays.

House Vote 2:

U.S. GOVERNMENT BROADCASTS IN UKRAINE: The House has passed a bill (S. 2183), sponsored by Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., that would call for the U.S. government's Voice of America and Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty broadcast services to increase programming efforts in Crimea, Ukraine, and neighboring regions to counter Russian influence over the area. A supporter, Rep. Edward R. Royce, R-Calif., said the programming "is central to our effort to counter Russian aggression and to send the type of support we need for the democratic development of Ukraine." The vote, on April 1, was 399 yeas to 12 nays.

House Vote 3:

OBAMACARE AND THE WORKWEEK: The House has passed the Save American Workers Act (H.R. 2575), sponsored by Rep. Todd C. Young, R-Ind. The bill would define a workweek, for the purpose of the health care reform law's mandate for employers to provide health insurance for their employees, as 40 hours or more of work, replacing the current standard of 30 hours or more. Young said the 40-hour standard would help "Americans who are just trying to make ends meet. By simply repealing this provision and restoring the traditional 40-hour workweek, we can help make an America that works." An opponent of the bill, Rep. Sander M. Levin, D-Mich., said it would increase the number of uninsured Americans by half a million and add $74 billion to the deficit. The vote, on April 3, was 248 yeas to 179 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

SENATE VOTES:

Senate Vote 1:

APPEALS COURT JUDGE: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of John B. Owens to serve as a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. A supporter, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., cited Owens' experience as an assistant U.S. attorney in California, official in the Justice Department, and more recently as a partner in the Munger, Tolles & Olson law firm. Feinstein said Owens "has a sterling background and would be an excellent circuit court judge." The vote, on March 31, was 56 yeas to 34 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 2:

MEDICARE PAYMENTS TO DOCTORS: The Senate has passed the Protecting Access to Medicare Act (H.R. 4302), sponsored by Rep. Joseph R. Pitts, R-Pa. The bill would extend by 13 months measures to avert implementation of the sustainable growth rate formula for calculating Medicare payments to physicians. A supporter, Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., said the extension would set the stage for Congress to pass a reform plan to end the sustainable growth formula. An opponent of the bill, Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., said it violated by $6 billion spending limits Congress approved in December, using budget gimmicks to offset the cost of not extending the formula. The vote, on March 31, was 64 yeas to 35 nays.

Senate Vote 3:

AMENDING UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS BILL: The Senate has rejected a motion to table an amendment sponsored by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid to the Protecting Volunteer Firefighters and Emergency Responders Act (H.R. 3979). The amendment would change the enactment date of the bill. An opponent, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, said it was an effort by Senate Democrats to fill the amendment tree for the bill and thereby block Republican efforts to offer amendments that would create jobs and opportunity for workers. The vote to table the amendment, on April 2, was 46 yeas to 50 nays.

NAYS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 4:

DISABILITY AND UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS: The Senate has tabled an appeal of the ruling of the Senate Chair that an amendment sponsored by Sen. David Vitter, R-La., to the Protecting Volunteer Firefighters and Emergency Responders Act (H.R. 3979), was not in order. The amendment would have barred individuals from receiving both unemployment insurance benefits and disability benefits at the same time. Vitter said it "would save about $1 billion over 10 years" and remedy a situation in which individuals can receive benefits from two programs intended for the fundamentally different purposes of assisting those who cannot work on a long-term basis and assisting those who are temporarily unemployed. An opponent of the amendment, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, called it a diversionary tactic intended to prevent an extension of unemployment insurance benefits. The vote to table the appeal, on April 2, was 67 yeas to 29 nays.

Senate Vote 5:

THE BUDGET AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE: The Senate has agreed to a motion to waive a budgetary point of order concerning the Protecting Volunteer Firefighters and Emergency Responders Act (H.R. 3979), sponsored by Rep. Lou Barletta, R-Pa., which would extend unemployment insurance benefits for five months, retroactive to Dec. 28. A supporter of the point of order, Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., said the bill violated the Ryan-Murray spending agreement, reached last December, in multiple ways, and used spending gimmicks that would add $5 billion to the government's debt. An opponent of the point of order, Sen. Cory Booker, D-N.J., said the bill was necessary to provide the unemployed with benefits that give them "a little bit of stability so they can do what is necessary to look for work." The vote to waive the point of order, on April 3, was 60 yeas to 36 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 6:

DEBATING UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS BILL: The Senate has agreed to a cloture motion to end debate on the Protecting Volunteer Firefighters and Emergency Responders Act (H.R. 3979), sponsored by Rep. Lou Barletta, R-Pa., which would extend unemployment insurance benefits for five months, retroactive to Dec. 28. An opponent of ending debate, Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, said the bill would do nothing to help the long-term unemployed, and Republican senators were not being allowed to submit bill amendments that would "create circumstances under which the private sector can create more full-time jobs" and decrease the need for unemployment benefits. A supporter of ending debate, Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., said "to prevent this legislation from going through is to deny millions of working Americans the support they need to get through a very difficult period." The vote to end debate, on April 3, was 61 yeas to 35 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

NM Democrats vow to pursue campaign finance reform

BYLINE: Gary Gerew

LENGTH: 438 words

Members of New Mexico's Congressional delegation said they intend to seek new legislation dealing with campaign contribution following Tuesday's Supreme Court decision in McCutcheon v. FEC that removed several restrictions.

"Americans already believe the election system has been fundamentally corrupted by big money from corporate special interests. And today, the Court has confirmed their fears in its seriously misguided decision, which makes it legal for a few wealthy individuals to flood campaigns with cash, drowning out the voices of regular voters," said Sen. Tom Udall (D-NM) in a statement.

"McCutcheon should be the breaking point that forces Washington to permanently reform the campaign finance system," Udall continued. "And today, I am again calling on the Senate to support my constitutional amendment, which would enable Congress to pass campaign finance reform legislation that withstands constitutional challenges and ensures all voters continue to have a voice in our democracy."

Udall introduced S.J. Res. 19 last June to reverse the 1976 Buckley v. Valeo decision, in which the Court held that restricting independent campaign expenditures violates the First Amendment right to free speech. Udall's constitutional amendment would explicitly authorize Congress to regulate the raising and spending of money for federal political campaigns, including independent expenditures, and allow states to regulate such spending at their level.

Sen. Martin Heinrich, in a similar statement, said he would support such an amendment.

"This deeply flawed Supreme Court decision continues down a path that equates money with speech and corporations with people," Heinrich said. "Make no mistake; decisions like this one and Citizens United erode the integrity of our political process and the public's faith in our leaders to do what's right for the American people."

From the House, Rep. Ben Ray Luján (D-3) also criticized the decision.

"Once again the Supreme Court has struck a blow to our efforts to get money out of politics, and reinforces the importance of passing comprehensive reform that limits the ability of individuals, special interest groups, and corporations to spend endless amounts of money in an effort to unduly influence elections," Luján said in a statement.

Luján has cosponsored bills that would mandate more disclosure of campaign contributions and supported legislation that would overturn the Citizens United court decision.

Ruling criticized by NM delegation Dems; Republican Rep. Pearce says ruling upholds Constitution

BYLINE: Michael Coleman Journal Washington Bureau

LENGTH: 441 words

WASHINGTON - A Supreme Court ruling Wednesday eliminating overall campaign contribution limits for individuals drew fire from Democrats in New Mexico's congressional delegation who said the decision would diminish confidence in the American political process.

Meanwhile, the delegation's lone Republican, Rep. Steve Pearce, voiced support for the decision.

Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., said he hoped the ruling would revive interest in his proposed constitutional amendment that would allow Congress to regulate money in federal campaigns, including independent expenditures, and allow states to regulate such spending at the state level.

"Americans already believe the election system has been fundamentally corrupted by big money from corporate special interests," Udall said. "Today, the court has confirmed their fears in its seriously misguided decision, which makes it legal for a few wealthy individuals to flood campaigns with cash, drowning out the voices of regular voters."

Pearce said the Supreme Court decision reflected principles set out in the Constitution.

"The Supreme Court upheld our Constitution today," Pearce said. "As has been pointed out by analysts, this decision does nothing to change the individual contribution limits. They are still in effect. I do not believe it will have an impact on individual races."

Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., called the decision "deeply flawed" and like Udall, said Congress should have authority to set "sensible limits on campaign contributions."

"This deeply flawed Supreme Court decision continues down a path that equates money with speech and corporations with people," Heinrich said. "Decisions like this one and Citizens United erode the integrity of our political process and the public's faith in our leaders to do what's right for the American people."

Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., said the ruling demonstrates a need for comprehensive campaign finance reform.

"Combined with the decision in Citizens United to allow unlimited spending by special interest groups and corporations, today's ruling by the Supreme Court only serves to increase the opportunities for the richest in our country to have an outsized impact while drowning out the voices of the rest of the American people," he said.

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., said the campaign contribution system needs limits and more disclosure.

"I am deeply disappointed that the court has struck down a key safeguard of our democratic system," she said. "The court has long held that contribution limits are essential to guard against corruption and ensure that elected officials represent everyone - not just outside special interests."

LUJAN: $1 BILLION FOR URANIUM MINE CLEAN UP ON NAVAJO NATION AN IMPORTANT STEP FORWARD; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 279 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District welcomed news today that the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and the U.S. Department of Justice have secured $1 billion for the cleanup of abandoned uranium mines on the Navajo Nation.

"With the scars of uranium mining still visible in communities across the Navajo Nation, this settlement provides significant resources that will help take an important step forward in the effort to clean up the land," Congressman Lujan said. "These funds will allow progress to be made, but it is critical that we continue our efforts to secure additional funding to address the legacy of uranium mining on the Navajo Nation. We must also not forget about those whose health and homeland was impacted by uranium mining and the need to compensate workers and their families who became sick from radiation exposure."

As a result of the settlement with Anadarko Petroleum Corp. and Kerr-McGee Corp., the EPA and Navajo Nation will use these funds to clean up contamination, including radioactive waste near communities, from approximately 50 uranium mines operated by Kerr McGee during the Cold War. This amounts to 10 percent of abandoned uranium mines on the Navajo Nation. Anadarko and Kerr McGee will pay a total of $5.15 billion to resolve fraudulent conveyance claims based on allegations the defendants sought to evade their liability for environmental contamination at toxic sites around the country, with $4.4 billion going to environmental cleanup.

N.M. delegation responds to Supreme Court's campaign finance ruling

A Supreme Court ruling Wednesday that eliminates overall campaign contribution limits for individuals drew fire from Democrats in New Mexico's congressional delegation who said the decision would diminish confidence in the American political process.

Sen. Tom Udall said Wednesday he hoped the ruling would revive interest in his proposed constitutional amendment to give Congress authority to regulate money in federal political campaigns, including independent expenditures, and allow states to regulate such spending at the state level.

"Americans already believe the election system has been fundamentally corrupted by big money from corporate special interests," Udall said. "Today, the Court has confirmed their fears in its seriously misguided decision, which makes it legal for a few wealthy individuals to flood campaigns with cash, drowning out the voices of regular voters.

"Campaigns should be about the best ideas, not the biggest checkbooks," Udall added. "It's time to put elections back in the hands of American voters, and not with a tiny number of extremely wealthy people and special interests."

Pearce said the Supreme Court decision reflected principles set out in the constitution.

"The Supreme Court upheld our constitution today," Pearce said. "As has been pointed out by analysts, this decision does nothing to change the individual contribution limits. They are still in effect. I do not believe it will have an impact on individual races."

LUJAN STATEMENT ON HOUSE REPUBLICAN BUDGET; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 250 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today following the introduction of House Republicans' budget.

"If it weren't for the fact that this misguided Republican budget reflects that same policies as last year's budget I would think it's nothing more than a bad April Fools' prank. Sadly, House Republicans have introduced a budget plan that again makes deep cuts in areas that are so vital to economic growth - education, innovation, job training, and more. Gutting investments in scientific research, clean energy, and infrastructure will weaken our economic competitiveness.

"In addition, this budget fails to include one of the best steps that we could take to strengthen our economy - comprehensive immigration reform. A recent CBO report shows it would reduce our deficit by $900 billion while creating new jobs, increasing wages and expanding economic output.

"Finally, the House Republican budget would end Medicare as we know it by replacing it with a voucher that fails to cover the cost of health care for New Mexico's seniors. It shifts the costs on backs of seniors, leaving them to pay higher out-of-pocket costs.

"We need a budget that makes smart investments that strengthen the middle class and create greater economic opportunity for hard-working Americans. The Republican budget fails on all these accounts."

WASHINGTON - Today, U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, and U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan welcomed news that the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation has awarded a $19.6 million construction contract to build the Tohlakai Pumping Plant, a significant milestone and the first pumping plant for the Navajo-Gallup Water Supply Project.

"Access to drinkable water is a basic necessity for public health and economic development, and it's intolerable that many Navajos in New Mexico still must travel miles and miles to bring back water for their families to drink, bathe and cook with every day," Udall said. "We have been working for many years to advance the Navajo-Gallup Water Supply Project, and this contract is a major milestone. The Tohlaki Pumping Plant will help provide groundwater from Navajo Nation wells until the overall project construction is complete. I will keep fighting as a member of the Appropriations Committee to see this investment finished."

"This investment in the Navajo-Gallup Water Supply Project is a key milestone toward ensuring New Mexico families have access to safe drinking water," Heinrich said. "Not only will this help provide much needed long-term water security and improve public health for the Navajo Nation, the city of Gallup, and the Jicarilla Apache Nation, but will also promote economic development across the region. I will continue to work to uphold our commitments to our Native communities and ensure they have the resources they need to thrive."

"A source of clean, safe drinking water is essential to the health and wellbeing of both the residents of a community as well as their local economy," Lujan said. "The Navajo-Gallup project is essential to ensure that the Navajo Nation and its local community chapters, the city of Gallup, and the Jicarilla Apache Nation have the water resources needed to provide for their people and encourage economic growth that will create new opportunities in these communities. This latest announcement represents another important step forward in the construction of this vital project."

The Navajo-Gallup project is a major component of the historic 2010 Navajo Nation Water Rights Settlement Agreement. The project will supply water to the eastern portion of the Navajo Nation, the southwestern portion of the Jicarilla Apache Nation and the city of Gallup, serving the future water needs of approximately 250,000 people.

According to the Department of the Interior, construction of the Tohlakai Pumping Plant about eight miles north of Gallup is expected to take 26 months and create 140 direct and indirect jobs. Construction of the overall Navajo-Gallup project, which began in June 2012 and is on schedule to be finished in 2024, is expected to create over 600 jobs during that period.

The Tohlakai Pumping Plant will be used in the short term to provide groundwater from Navajo Nation wells until the overall project construction is complete, including completion of the pipeline from the San Juan River. Additional pumps will be installed to increase the total capacity to about 36.5 cfs of treated surface water from the San Juan River to Navajo communities and the cities of Gallup and Window Rock, Ariz.

Navajo want gaming restricted on Fort Wingate land

LENGTH: 445 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON - The Fort Wingate Land Division Act of 2014 is moving forward. Representatives from the Navajo Nation and the Pueblo of Zuni testified Thursday before the House Subcommittee on Indian and Alaska Native Affairs regarding the agreement both tribes made in 2013.

Andrew Stoddard, communications director for U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N. M., said witnesses on behalf of the Navajo Nation were Speaker Johnny Naize and Council Delegate Edmund Yazzie. Zuni. Gov. Arlen Quetawki represented the pueblo.

"This hearing was on legislation that was a product of a collaborative effort between the Navajo Nation and Pueblo of Zuni to resolve their differences on this longstanding issue," Stoddard stated in reply to an email inquiry Monday.

Stoddard said the effort represents a compromise between the two tribes that Yazzie, Naize, Quetawki and Fort Wingate Coordinator Darrell Tsabetsaye, of Zuni, agreed to and signed off on July 8, 2013.

"The agreement closely resembles the plan and map that negotiators and staff of the Navajo Nation, including Edmund Yazzie, presented. Moving forward, the Congressional review process will continue," Stoddard wrote. "Members of the subcommittee have a few more days to submit questions in writing for the witnesses regarding the compromise plan that is reflected in this legislation."

According to a news release issued by the Navajo Nation Washington Office, during his testimony last week, "Delegate Yazzie underscored local chapter opposition to the bill. Speaker Naize emphasized that the Navajo Nation Council has not opposed or supported the measure."

Naize suggested several changes and corrections to the bill based on community input, according to the news release. "Notably, both Speaker Naize and Delegate Yazzie emphasized the need to restrict gaming and address environmental concerns."

Luján and Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N. M., introduced H.R. 3822, the Fort Wingate Land Division Act of 2014, to Congress on Jan. 8.

The act seeks to divide approximately 21,000 acres of parceled land between the Navajo Nation and the Pueblo of Zuni that was previously used by the military to store ammunition and explosive materials.

As a result of the July 8 agreement, the Navajo Nation would receive approximately 10,000 acres and the Zuni Tribe approximately 9,000 acres of the parceled land, with the remaining 2,000 acres to remain under the U.S. Department of Defense because of high levels of contamination in the area.

During the same negotiations in Washington, representatives from the Navajo and Zuni tribes authorized Luján, Pearce and Rep. Don Young, of Alaska, to draft legislation concerning distribution of the land.

LUJAN STATEMENT ON HOUSE REPUBLICAN BUDGET

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 243 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today following the introduction of House Republicans' budget.

"If it weren't for the fact that this misguided Republican budget reflects that same policies as last year's budget I would think it's nothing more than a bad April Fools' prank. Sadly, House Republicans have introduced a budget plan that again makes deep cuts in areas that are so vital to economic growth - education, innovation, job training, and more. Gutting investments in scientific research, clean energy, and infrastructure will weaken our economic competitiveness.

"In addition, this budget fails to include one of the best steps that we could take to strengthen our economy - comprehensive immigration reform. A recent CBO report shows it would reduce our deficit by $900 billion while creating new jobs, increasing wages and expanding economic output.

"Finally, the House Republican budget would end Medicare as we know it by replacing it with a voucher that fails to cover the cost of health care for New Mexico's seniors. It shifts the costs on backs of seniors, leaving them to pay higher out-of-pocket costs.

"We need a budget that makes smart investments that strengthen the middle class and create greater economic opportunity for hard-working Americans. The Republican budget fails on all these accounts."

LUJAN STATEMENT ON CESAR CHAVEZ DAY; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 189 words

Santa Fe, NM - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District and First Vice Chair of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus released the following statement today to commemorate Cesar Chavez Day.

"As we celebrate the life and legacy of Cesar Chavez, we reflect on the contributions of a true champion for equality and justice. We are reminded of the courage and dedication he displayed in leading a movement that improved the lives of so many hard-working men and women.

"Cesar Chavez fought to secure the basic rights and dignity that all workers deserve and in doing so challenged the forces of discrimination and poverty. This lifelong pursuit that is his legacy is one that we are called to continue - for the ideals he fought for are that same ones that we must continue to strive for in order to build a brighter future for our communities. His commitment to the values of justice and equality serves as example to us all, and illustrates what is possible when we unite to work in common cause for the values we hold dear."

Pearce co-sponsors new Border Patrol bill

BYLINE: Gary Gerew

LENGTH: 657 words

Rep. Steve Pearce (R-2) and Rep. Beto O'Rourke (D-16) of Texas have introduced a new bill to increase oversight of the Border Patrol as part of immigration reform legislation.

The bill is known as the Border Enforcement, Accountability, Oversight, and Community Engagement Act of 2014.

"Today's bill is a direct response to the needs of our constituents, and is a resounding statement that the two parties can successfully work together on immigration reform," Pearce said in a statement. "This proposal will help bring accountability, transparency, and cooperation to border patrol efforts. This bill helps ensure proper training for all agents and officers, as well as providing mechanisms for greater interaction with the communities in which they serve and protect. Congressman O'Rourke and I continue to show that working on simple, one-step proposals this Congress can fundamentally reform our nations broken immigration system. Together, we can find the clear solutions our country and our communities need."

To read the text of the bill, click here.

While not directly addressing Pearce's bill, Rep. Ben Ray Luján (D-3) issued his own statement accusing Republicans of failing to move on a complete immigration reform package.

"Enough is enough - it is time to bring immigration reform to the House floor for a vote." Luján said. "There is a growing coalition - from the high tech sector to law enforcement, from the agricultural sector to the faith community - that has been calling for action on comprehensive immigration reform. The Senate has passed a comprehensive bill and House Democrats have introduced legislation and stand willing to work toward a solution. House Republicans seem to be the only ones that are unwilling to address this critical issue and pass legislation that strengthens our economy, keeps our country safer, and reflects the contributions immigrants make to communities every day. The time for action is now. And with this petition, we are demanding a vote on comprehensive reform."

Luján and Pearce also were on opposite sides in a debate over a bill that would affect how much say the federal government would have over the creation of federal monuments, such as the one being considered for the Organ Mountains.

The bill, which mandates more study before an area is declared a monument, passed in the House by a 222-201 vote.

"Monument designations must come from our local communities, not executive orders from Washington," Pearce said. "Citizens deserve a voice in the land management decisions that affect their jobs, their recreation, and their backyards. I cosponsored today's bill because it puts the power back in the hands of the people by adding a measure of accountability and transparency to the national monument designation process. Hundreds of people in Southern New Mexico stood up, and demanded that the Secretary of the Interior listen to their voice on the Organ Mountains. H.R. 1459 ensures they have a say."

Luján spoke against the bill prior to the vote.

"This issue hits close to home for me and my constituents. Last March, President Obama designated the Rio Grande del Norte in northern New Mexico as a national monument under the Antiquities Act," Luján said. "This was the result of years of work and the community coming together to find consensus on a path forward that respects our tradition and respects our culture. Protecting the Rio Grande del Norte had broad support and a strong coalition worked with the Administration and Secretary Salazar to show that protecting this land needed to be a top priority... This attack on the Antiquities Act is an attack on the preservation of lands that are a part of who we are, our rich history as a diverse nation, and our ability to enjoy these lands in the future."

House Natural Resources Subcommittee on Indian and Alaska Native Affairs Hearing; H.R.4002, to revoke the charter of incorporation of the Miami Tribe of Oklahoma at the request of that tribe; and H.R.3822, the "Fort Wingate Land Division Act of 2014."; Testimony by Rep. Young, Don - (R-AK)

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 455 words

Today, the Committee will examine two bills of great importance to three federally recognized Indian tribes.

The first bill is H.R. 4002, sponsored by our Subcommittee colleague, Mr. Mullin at the request of his constituent, the Miami Tribe of Oklahoma. The bill appears to be a non-controversial technical correction relating to the tribe's charter of incorporation, and we look forward to hearing from the Chief of the Miami to explain the need for it.

The other bill, H.R. 3822, is sponsored by Congressman Ben Ray Lujan and cosponsored by Congressman Steve Pearce. H.R. 3822 would provide an equitable division of public land in a closed Anny munitions depot known as Fort Wingate, to the Pueblo of Zuni and the Navajo Nation. The lands in question as well as significant portions ofthe Navajo reservation are located in Mr. Lujan's congressional district, while the Zuni reservation is in Congressman Steve Pearce's district.

H.R. 3822 is the culmination of intense negotiations between the Zuni and Navajo tribes, mediated by Congressmen Lujan, Pearce, and myself. Interest in dividing Fort Wingate between the tribes has a long history, but it was in the last Congress when significant strides were made toward closing a deal.

In the last Congress the Subcommittee held an oversight hearing on the status of negotiations, which at the time had resulted in an agreement between the Zuni Tribe and the President of the Navajo Nation, but not the needed endorsement of the Navajo Nation Council.

At the conclusion of the hearing, the tribes were urged in the strongest terms to reach an agreement both could support in accordance with their laws and constitutions. An undue delay in reaching a deal could have only one result: to let non-tribal individuals and entities pursue acquisition of the Fort Wingate property, which could pennanently foreclose the return oflands to which both tribes claim deep historical and cultural ties.

In reviewing the testimony, I note the Navajo Nation Council has not yet passed requisite legislation to officially endorse the bill. However, there are grounds for optimism because the remaining issues - at least as I see them -are not insunnountable.

Again, time is not on the side of the tribes. Let's hold out hope that the deal will be closed very soon. When it is achieved -and I'm confident it will be --credit is due in large part to the skill and care that Mr. Lujan has put into the effort as well as the persistence of Mr. Pearce to jump start negotiations when they were stalled.

The Zuni and Navajo should be proud to have these two Gentlemen as their Representatives in the House.

LUJAN OPPOSES ATTEMPT TO UNDERMINE ANTIQUITIES ACT AND PROTECTION OF TREASURED LANDS; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 353 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District spoke on the House floor today in opposition to H.R. 1459, legislation that undermines the Antiquities Act, one of the best tools for protecting treasured cultural, historic, and natural sites. Below are Lujan's remarks.

"Mr. Speaker, it is with great disappointment that I come to the floor today in opposition to this attempt by my Republican colleagues to undermine the Antiquities Act; a law that has resulted in the protection and preservation of some of our nation's most cherished lands. The Grand Canyon, Zion

National Park, the Cesar Chavez National Monument, and many more have all been protected under the Antiquities Act by presidents of both parties.

"This issue hits close to home for me and my constituents. Last March, President Obama designated the Rio Grande del Norte in northern New Mexico as a national monument under the Antiquities Act.

"This was the result of years of work and the community coming together to find consensus on a path forward that respects our tradition and respects our culture. Protecting the Rio Grande del Norte had broad support and a strong coalition worked with the Administration and Secretary Salazar to show that protecting this land needed to be a top priority.

"Whether it's for recreation, farming, or sustaining a way of life, the Rio Grande del Norte impacts all those who visit and all those who live off the sustenance it provides. It is one of the crowning jewels of our state, and if it were not for the Antiquities Act this majestic land that represents our culture and drives the local economy would not have received the protections that will ensure its vitality for future generations.

"This attack on the Antiquities Act is an attack on the preservation of lands that are a part of who we are, our rich history as a diverse nation, and our ability to enjoy these lands in the future. I urge my colleagues to vote no on this bill."

LUJAN CALLS FOR A VOTE ON COMPREHENSIVE IMMIGRATION REFORM;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 311 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District and First Vice Chair of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus called for a vote in the House of Representatives on comprehensive immigration reform. House Democrats have introduced a discharge petition that would require an up or down vote on H.R. 15, a bipartisan immigration bill, once a majority of the House, 218 members, sign on to the petition. Lujan signed the petition this morning.

"Enough is enough - it is time to bring immigration reform to the House floor for a vote." Congressman Lujan said. "There is a growing coalition - from the high tech sector to law enforcement, from the agricultural sector to the faith community - that has been calling for action on comprehensive immigration reform. The time for action is now. And with this petition, we are demanding a vote on comprehensive reform."

Lujan has been a strong voice on this issue with the Congressional Hispanic Caucus and is an original cosponsor of H.R. 15, which according to a recent study by the Congressional Budget Office, would reduce the deficit by $900 billion.

"The current system is broken and families are suffering," Lujan added. "We cannot afford to wait any longer, and House Republicans are out of excuses for delaying action on this urgent issue. Our communities deserve a vote on the House floor."

VFW 2528 welcomes veterans home

When the rest of the nation declared March 22 as Welcome Home Vietnam Vets day, Tucumcari's Veterans of Foreign Wars Post 2528 took it a step further.

"We decided to use this day to welcome home all veterans from all wars," said Fred Porter, president of Tucumcari's Delfinio Gonzalez post the VFW.

On Saturday, the post held ceremonies and a luncheon to welcome home two veterans of World War II, one Korean War veteran, six Vietnam vets, four Iraq war veterans and one veteran of the campaign in Afghanistan.

About 60 veterans, VFW members and guests attended the ceremony and heard two guest speakers, both colonels in the armed forces, talk about their careers and their views of military service.

Col. David Wiesner, of the U.S. Air Force, stationed at Cannon Air Force Base, Clovis, talked about his career that included duty in Germany to support the Kosovo war and supporting Operation Iraqi Freedom, the second Iraq campaign that began in 2003. He also served in Korea, as well as additional Middle East assignments.

"I got a hero's welcome," he said. "Which is not true of Vietnam veterans."

The nation, he said, learned a hard lesson with Vietnam veterans, that no matter how one feels about a particular war, the nations must always be grateful to the veterans who fought there.

Col. Timothy Paul, of the New Mexico National Guard, told the audience that one of the best ways to honor veterans is to vote, exercising in the most responsible way the freedom that U.S. armed forces have fought to maintain.

"If you don't vote," he said. "You have no choice."

He aimed that message at young people of voting age.

"What our duty is as veterans is to tell young people to get out the vote," he said.

As faulty as American democracy can seem at times," he said. "We do it better than 99 percent of the rest of the world."

He said Tucumcari "is an important part the state and nation."

Paul advised his Tucumcari audience, "Make sure your voice is heard."

He also singled out Vietnam veterans and told the audience to "say thanks to every Vietnam veteran you see."

Porter reminded the audience that Delfinio Gonzalez, in whose honor the Tucumcari VFW post is named, was the first Quay County resident killed in action in World War I. Gonzalez was killed in 1918 during World War I in France, he said.

Paul said VFW members do much more than swap war stories at a bar. They are involved with assuring that veterans use the benefits they have earned in community activities.

"Besides, most of us don't tell war stories because we don't want to remember some things," he added.

New Mexico Rep. Dennis Roch, R-Logan, cited speeches of both former President Ronald Reagan and President Barak Obama that illustrated how welcoming home veterans is a non-partisan duty.

Veterans represent citizens from all ethnic and cultural groups and all walks of life, he said, adding that it's a shame that Vietnam veterans did not receive the welcome they deserved when they came home.

Roch quoted President Obama, who said of Vietnam vets, "You were denigrated when you should have been celebrated."

Ron Wilmot, field representative for U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., said the nation must ensure that veterans receive the benefits they have earned, in addition to honoring their service.

Paul Elam, a local singer, performed the songs "God Bless the USA" and "Some Gave All."

Olana Romero sang the national anthem to help open the ceremony.

Deacon Bobby Welch opened and closed the ceremony with prayers.

LUJAN OPPOSES ATTEMPT TO UNDERMINE ANTIQUITIES ACT AND PROTECTION OF TREASURED LANDS

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 339 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District spoke on the House floor today in opposition to H.R. 1459, legislation that undermines the Antiquities Act, one of the best tools for protecting treasured cultural, historic, and natural sites. Below are Lujan's remarks.

"Mr. Speaker, it is with great disappointment that I come to the floor today in opposition to this attempt by my Republican colleagues to undermine the Antiquities Act; a law that has resulted in the protection and preservation of some of our nation's most cherished lands. The Grand Canyon, Zion National Park, the Cesar Chavez National Monument, and many more have all been protected under the Antiquities Act by presidents of both parties.

"This issue hits close to home for me and my constituents. Last March, President Obama designated the Rio Grande del Norte in northern New Mexico as a national monument under the Antiquities Act.

"This was the result of years of work and the community coming together to find consensus on a path forward that respects our tradition and respects our culture. Protecting the Rio Grande del Norte had broad support and a strong coalition worked with the Administration and Secretary Salazar to show that protecting this land needed to be a top priority.

"Whether it's for recreation, farming, or sustaining a way of life, the Rio Grande del Norte impacts all those who visit and all those who live off the sustenance it provides. It is one of the crowning jewels of our state, and if it were not for the Antiquities Act this majestic land that represents our culture and drives the local economy would not have received the protections that will ensure its vitality for future generations.

"This attack on the Antiquities Act is an attack on the preservation of lands that are a part of who we are, our rich history as a diverse nation, and our ability to enjoy these lands in the future. I urge my colleagues to vote no on this bill."

LUJAN CALLS FOR A VOTE ON COMPREHENSIVE IMMIGRATION REFORM

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 301 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District and First Vice Chair of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus called for a vote in the House of Representatives on comprehensive immigration reform. House Democrats have introduced a discharge petition that would require an up or down vote on H.R. 15, a bipartisan immigration bill, once a majority of the House, 218 members, sign on to the petition. Lujan signed the petition this morning.

"Enough is enough - it is time to bring immigration reform to the House floor for a vote." Congressman Lujan said. "There is a growing coalition - from the high tech sector to law enforcement, from the agricultural sector to the faith community - that has been calling for action on comprehensive immigration reform. The Senate has passed a comprehensive bill and House Democrats have introduced legislation and stand willing to work toward a solution. House Republicans seem to be the only ones that are unwilling to address this critical issue and pass legislation that strengthens our economy, keeps our country safer, and reflects the contributions immigrants make to communities every day. The time for action is now. And with this petition, we are demanding a vote on comprehensive reform."

Lujan has been a strong voice on this issue with the Congressional Hispanic Caucus and is an original cosponsor of H.R. 15, which according to a recent study by the Congressional Budget Office, would reduce the deficit by $900 billion.

"The current system is broken and families are suffering," Lujan added. "We cannot afford to wait any longer, and House Republicans are out of excuses for delaying action on this urgent issue. Our communities deserve a vote on the House floor."

DOE's neglect of its tech-transfer mandate 'unacceptable'

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN Journal Washington Bureau

SECTION: EDITORIALS; Pg. B2

LENGTH: 805 words

With New Mexico's economy in the tank, it sure would be helpful if Los Alamos and Sandia National Laboratories could find more ways to spin their multi-billion-dollar, cutting-edge technology into the private sector to create new jobs.

Officials at the Department of Energy, which oversees the national labs in New Mexico and around the country, have long professed a commitment to this type of technology transfer. Unfortunately, their record doesn't back up their rhetoric.

DOE's tech transfer initiatives can take different forms, but here's how one arrangement is supposed to work.

The labs license technologies developed in-house - for example, Sandia's water contaminant removal or portable gas leak detection systems - to private companies for manufacture and sale on the commercial market. The labs then get a percentage of equity in the company, with the labs' share of any proceeds used to help further their science missions.

Yet an audit by DOE's inspector general's office released last month found only two of 11 national labs even bothered to keep records of their private equity holdings.

And the two that did - Argonne and the Y2 National Security Complex - reported only negligible numbers, the audit found.

Congress, under the leadership of former Sens. Pete Domenici and Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico, passed a law in 2005 to force DOE to try harder to move its cutting-edge research and technology to the marketplace. The law required DOE to appoint a new technology transfer coordinator at its Washington headquarters to crack the whip on the labs, which are naturally more attuned to science than creating business opportunities.

For several years, the labs simply added the tech transfer job to an existing director's already significant duties. Finally, in 2010, Steven Chu, then DOE's secretary, hired Karina Edmonds to do the tech transfer job full-time. Edmonds ran with the ball for a couple of years before returning to academia. The post has been vacant since early 2013.

The 2005 law also required DOE to set aside 0.9 percent of its applied research and development budget for a technology commercialization fund.

The inspector general's audit found that not only did DOE never plan to meet the spending requirements set out in the law, but also it didn't even bother to calculate how much money it needed to divert to the program.

In 2011, the DOE's general counsel sounded an alarm that the law was being ignored, but the department's inspector general found nearly three years later that DOE personnel were still "unable to provide documentation" and had no "forward-looking approach." DOE management concurred with all of the inspector general's findings and vowed to do better.

Meanwhile, some in Congress - including a couple of New Mexicans - are once again looking at legislation to jump start DOE's sluggish tech transfer efforts.

Sen. Tom Udall and Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, both Democrats, have separate bills on this front, while Sens. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., and Chris Coons, D-Del., have teamed up on bipartisan legislation.

Earlier this month in Washington, Rubio told me that part of the problem is that the federal government - not just DOE - tends to give the private sector the cold shoulder when it comes to tech transfer.

"Innovators and job creators feel like it's an adversarial process," Rubio said. "That attitude is pervasive throughout government."

Rubio and Coons, among other things, want to bring businesses into DOE at earlier stages of research and development to help ensure more technologies are adaptable to the commercial marketplace.

Udall's legislation would compel DOE to adapt an existing public-private partnership model used by the Small Business Administration for economic development and apply it to technology transfer. The Udall bill would also require DOE to assess technology transfer work as part of its reviews of lab performance, among other things.

Now, it is virtually impossible to measure the economic impact of tech transfer from the labs to the U.S. economy.

Meanwhile, Lujan's bill would authorize $20 million per year for five years to cover the government's share of DOE's Cooperative Research and Development Agreements with small innovative companies. That cost is now assumed entirely by the businesses, some of which are reluctant to assume that much risk.

Of course, not everyone is keen on using tax dollars to prop up private sector investment and that could be where Lujan's bill runs into opposition in the Republican-controlled House.

In any case, lawmakers from both parties seem to agree that DOE makes some mind-blowing technologies. They just wish the economy could benefit more from them.

"Technology transfer is important in New Mexico and to the nation," Udall said. "And the Department's failure to perform is unacceptable."

Neutron Center loses funding

SECTION: TODAY'S NEWS

LENGTH: 718 words

When President Barack Obama sent his FY2015 budget to Congress, it turned out to be bad news for the Manuel Lujan Jr. Neutron Center, which is part of the Los Alamos Neutron Science Center.

Through the past two decades, the Lujan Center has been operated through a partnership between the National Nuclear Security Administration and the Office of Basic Energy Sciences.

Obama's budget request cut $10 million in funding for the operational costs of the Lujan Center.

This is what the budget request said.

"The BES operations of the Lujan Neutron Scattering Center will cease and funding is requested for safe storage of facility components". For well over a decade, the Lujan Center at LANSCE has been an international center of excellence and innovation for basic and applied research in neutron scattering and fundamental nuclear physics," the budget statement said.

"The Lujan Center provides scientific users from almost every state in the nation unique capabilities for scientific research in material science, condensed matter science, biology, nuclear science and technology. The Lujan Center has a distinguished record of innovation and contribution to our nation's neutron scattering capability, a significant record of accomplishment in executing research of great importance to US national security, as well as a long history of training new users in the United States. We will keep our users informed on this developing situation and the path forward."

Dr. Tyrel M. McQueen, Chair of the LANSCE User Group Executive Committee, sent a letter to employees and those involved in the various user groups.

McQueen pointed out that the Basic Energy Sciences user program in neutron scattering will be utilized at Oak Ridge National Laboratory's Spallation Neutron Source (SNS) and its High Flux Isotope Reactor (HFIR).

"At this time, Los Alamos National Laboratory, the NNSA, and the other research sponsors are assessing the implications of this disappointing decision to the other neutron scattering activities at the Lujan Center," McQueen wrote.

"Numerous users have already expressed dismay and concern about the pending loss of access to unique instrumentation and the negative impact to their research programs. Some have observed that capacity is insufficient at other U.S. facilities to meet both the scientific and training needs of the community. Many have noted that the decision reduces the competitiveness of the U.S. neutron scattering community and the scientific programs that rely on the unique attributes of neutrons."

The Nuclear Materials Monitor reported that lab officials fear the decision to terminate the Lujan Center, which came without warning to the lab, represents diminishing support for LANSCE overall.

The Obama Administration previously attempted to block funding for a refurbishment of the facility only to have Congress intervene several times and provide funding for the upgrade.

Jennifer Talhelm, a spokeswoman for Sen. Tom Udall (D-N.M.), told the trade publication that the senator would fight to fund the facility this year.

"Senator Udall is a strong supporter of the Lujan Neutron Scattering Center, which is important for the stockpile stewardship program and which does critical science research both for the lab and for the nation, including the production of important medical isotopes," Talhelm said, adding: "He has previously fought successfully to prevent cuts to LANSCE, and he believes this program will remain important to the nation in the in the future."

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan (D-N.M) said in a statement, "Reductions to general science research are troubling. "Previous budgets have also called for cuts to the Lujan Center, and I've worked with the New Mexico delegation to restore funding and keep it operational. I will continue to advocate for the areas that help ensure our labs remain a key component in U.S. competitiveness, job creation, and national security."

According to the lab website, the 800-million-electron-volt (MeV) accelerator and its attendant facilities at Technical Area 53 have been a resource to a broad international community of scientific researchers since 1972. The Los Alamos Meson Physics Facility (LAMPF), as it was originally called, hosted about 1000 users per year to to perform medium energy physics experiments.

Bill introduced to protect Native American seeds

BYLINE: Bernie Dotson Staff writer city@gallupindependent.com

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 2

LENGTH: 246 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON - U.S. Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N. M., and Tom Udall, D-N. M., introduced the Native American Seeds Protection Act Friday, a proposal that would help protect and preserve Native American seeds used for cultural, religious, medicinal, ceremonial and agriculture purposes, according to a news release.

"Our tribal communities have always enhanced New Mexico's rich culture and traditions," Heinrich said. "This bill helps protect those traditions by ensuring these seeds are preserved and that future generations remain connected to their culture and heritage."

"The priceless cultural legacy of Native American communities is woven into the cultural fabric of our state," Udall said. "For generations, tribes have cultivated plants that have played an important role in cultural traditions and farming practices. This legislation would protect the purity of native seeds and help ensure they remain available to future generations not only as an agricultural resource, but as a tie to cultural practices."

The proposal would permit Indian tribes to work alongside public research institutions to encourage education and training programs aimed at protecting the purity of Native American seeds. The bill also helps secure funding for the construction of seed storage facilities.

The measure is a companion bill to a proposal sponsored by U.S. Reps. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N. M., and Ben Ray Luján D-N. M., that has been introduced in the U.S. House of Representatives.

Delegation pushes ABQ as federal manufacturing hub

BYLINE: Gary Gerew

LENGTH: 327 words

The five members of New Mexico's Congressional delegation have sent a joint letter to the federal Economic Development Administration urging that Albuquerque be picked as one of its 12 designated "manufacturing communities."

The selected communities are to be given extra consideration for up to $1.3 billion in federal spending as well as assistance with workforce and training, advanced research, infrastructure and site development, supply chain support, export promotion and capital access, according to the representatives.

In the letter, signed by Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and Reps. Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham, the delegation members said they were writing in support of an application by a collaboration of national laboratories, private industry, universities, community colleges, local governments and nonprofit organizations pursuing projects in optics and photonics technologies.

"Optics and photonics technology represents a field of science and engineering full of pathways for commercial, industrial and military applications," the representatives said. "Each of these applications provides an opportunity to improve our national security and competitive advantage in the global market through innovative manufacturing technologies."

The delegation added that optics and photonics are increasingly critical across a broad spectrum of commercial and national defense industries, and that strengthening New Mexico's capabilities, "would help ensure the United States continues to lead the world in optics and photonics development and manufacturing."

"Optics and photonics address and solve many of the challenges of the modern worlds, and we want those solutions to be researched, developed and manufactured in the United States," the delegation said.

LUJAN: REPUBLICANS ABANDON EFFORT TO FIND BIPARTISAN SOLUTION TO DOCTORS' PAYMENTS UNDER MEDICARE

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 512 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District voted today against a Republican bill to address the Medicare physician payment formula that impacts how much doctors are reimbursed for treating patients under Medicare. House Republicans amended a bipartisan bill that had wide support, adding in a provision to undermine the Affordable Care Act (ACA) by repealing the shared responsibility provision that allows the quality of insurance to significantly improve while minimizing premium increases.

"There is wide agreement that Congress needs to come together to pass legislation that ensures doctors will not receive deep cuts for treating seniors under Medicare. Unfortunately, House Republicans have chosen to put politics first rather than work together on a bipartisan solution," Congressman Lujan said. "Rather than build on bipartisan discussions that have been moving the process forward, House Republicans are again seeking to undermine the ACA. With the deadline to solve this problem quickly approaching, it is disappointing that House Republicans are putting politics ahead of the needs of America's seniors."

Under current law, Medicare physicians are scheduled to receive a 24 percent cut in reimbursements on April 1. A cut of this magnitude could impact seniors' ability to see their doctor. Prior to the move by House Republicans to bring legislation to the floor that also includes the Affordable Care Act, bipartisan efforts were in progress to replace the cuts with a 0.5 percent increase through 2018 and transition to a new reimbursement system.

This attempt to tie a fix for the Medicare physician payment formula to a provision undermining the ACA has led groups such as the American Medical Association and the AARP to express disappointment with the legislation.

"House Republicans were willing to shut down the government over their demands to undermine the Affordable Care Act. I hope they are not willing to jeopardize seniors' access to their doctors as well," Lujan added. "Time is running out to fix this problem. I hope House Republicans will drop their attempt to tie this important issue to the ACA."

The shared responsibility provision of the ACA plays a critical role in ensuring that millions of Americans don't lose their coverage when they get sick and that individuals with pre-existing conditions can get coverage. Repealing this aspect of the law would result in higher premiums for those who remain insured, fewer premium tax credits for middle-income families, and increased cost-shifting of uncompensated care to health care providers, workers, and businesses.

The shared responsibility provision was originally developed by the Heritage Foundation in 1989 to prevent the problem of "free riders" who don't get health insurance and face health care costs they cannot afford to pay. The costs of their uncompensated care are then passed along to all those who have health insurance in the form of higher premiums for consumers and businesses.

New Mexico Dems: New Mexico's Democratic Congressional Delegation Pushing for Advanced Photonics Manufacturing Consortium to be Designated as a 'Manufacturing Community'

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 506 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, Congressman Ben Ray Lujan and Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham are advocating for New Mexico Advanced Photonics Manufacturing Consortium in Albuquerque to be recognized by the federal government as a "Manufacturing Community," a designation that could make it eligible for up to $1.3 billion in future federal investment to further economic development strategies.

The delegation together wrote a letter in support of an application by the consortium, a collaboration of national laboratories, private industry, universities, community colleges, local governments and nonprofit organizations. The delegation and the members of the public-private partnership say New Mexico's extensive expertise make it a natural location for additional national investment in research and manufacturing of optics and photonics technologies, which are used in robotics, medical imaging, next-generation displays, defense, biometric security and many other fields.

"Optics and photonics technology represents a field of science and engineering full of pathways for commercial, industrial and military applications," the lawmakers wrote in their letter to the Economic Development Administration's Interagency Review Panel. "Each of these applications provides an opportunity to improve our national security and competitive advantage in the global market through innovative manufacturing technologies."

The administration's Investing in Manufacturing Communities Partnership will select up to 12 "Manufacturing Communities," giving them elevated consideration for up to $1.3 billion as well as assistance with workforce and training, advanced research, infrastructure and site development, supply chain support, export promotion and capital access.

The goal of the initiative is to encourage communities to devise comprehensive economic development strategies that strengthen their competitive edge in attracting global manufacturers and their supply chains.

Not only is New Mexico a leader in optics and photonics capabilities, the delegation and advocates say, optics and photonics are increasingly critical across a broad spectrum of commercial and national defense industries. Strengthening New Mexico's capabilities would help ensure the United States continues to lead the world in optics and photonics development and manufacturing.

"Optics and photonics address and solve many of the challenges of the modern worlds, and we want those solutions to be researched, developed and manufactured in the United States," the delegation wrote.

Bill introduced to protect native seeds

BYLINE: Gary Gerew

LENGTH: 260 words

The Senate is being asked to consider a bill sponsored by New Mexico's senators aimed at helping preserve Native American seeds used for cultural, religious, medicinal, ceremonial, and agriculture purposes.

"Our tribal communities have always enhanced New Mexico's rich culture and traditions," Sen. Martin Heinrich (D-NM) said in a statement. "This bill helps protect those traditions by ensuring these seeds are preserved and that future generations remain connected to their culture and heritage."

In a letter supporting the bill, Pueblo of Tesuque Gov. Robert A. Mora, Sr. wrote, "The bill supports longstanding efforts to sustain our traditional ways of life and cultural practices of sowing and harvesting of native seeds. These traditions and practices are often threatened by environmental and other factors that compromise the integrity of native seeds. Our goal is to pass on our traditional practices to future generation."

The proposal would permit Indian tribes to work alongside public research institutions to encourage education and training programs aimed at protecting the purity of Native American seeds, according to a news release issued by Heinrich and Sen. Tom Udall (D-NM). The bill also looks to secure funding for the construction of seed storage facilities.

Representatives Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-01) and Ben Ray Luján (D-03) have introduced a similar bill in the House.

Economic Development Administration

Office of Performance and National Programs

U.S. Department of Commerce

1401 Constitution Avenue NW, Suite 71030

Washington, DC 20230

Dear Interagency Review Panel:

We are writing in support of the New Mexico Advanced Photonics Manufacturing Consortium's application to be designated as a Manufacturing Community. In response to the President's call for a National Network for Manufacturing and Innovation (NNMI), a collaboration of National Laboratories, industry, universities, community colleges, local governments, and non-profit organizations have come together in New Mexico.

The consortium has developed a complete proposal for the U.S. Economic Development Administration's open solicitation for the Investing in Manufacturing Communities Partnership (IMCP) program. The consortium's unique public-private partnership is building on New Mexico's core capabilities and strengths in optics and photonics, and leveraging our region's innovative capacity to sustain and grow United States leadership in the application of light based technologies.

Optics and photonics address and solve many of the challenges of the modern world, and we want those solutions to be researched, developed and manufactured in the United States. Light-based technologies directly respond to the needs of humankind. The modern technology around you - your phone, computer, TV - and the communications technologies that enable these devices to function are all made possible largely by optics and photonics. Other technologies benefit from optics and photonics as well, including advanced manufacturing, robotics, medical imaging, next-generation displays, defense technologies, biometric security, image processing, communications, and many others.

In 2012, the National Academies National Research Council released a Report, "Optics and Photonics, Essential Technologies for Our Nation," which emphasized the importance of these technologies. The United Nations proclaimed 2015 as the International Year of Light and Light-based Technologies, showing the international significance of these technologies. Because photonics is a very broad field, the consortium has evaluated several strategic focus areas, to determine the scope of each opportunity.

Optics and photonics technology represents a field of science and engineering full of pathways for commercial, industrial and military applications. Each of these applications provides an opportunity to improve our national security and competitive advantage in the global market through innovative manufacturing technologies.

We are in strong support of this broad collaborative effort, and request that you give the New Mexico Advanced Photonics Manufacturing Consortium's submission full and fair consideration.

LUJAN CALLS FOR A VOTE TO EXTEND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 311 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District called for a vote in the House of Representatives to extend unemployment insurance through the end of the year for millions of out-of-work Americans. House Democrats have introduced a discharge petition that would require an up or down vote on legislation extending unemployment insurance once a majority of the House, 218 members, sign on to the petition. Lujan signed the petition this afternoon.

"Calls to extend unemployment insurance have fallen on deaf ears in the House of Representatives while two million Americans struggle to get by," Congressman Lujan said. "Republicans have failed to address this issue. There has not been one single vote to extend unemployment insurance while time and again House Republicans have scheduled votes to undermine the Affordable Care Act. With too many families still struggling to get by, it's long past time Congress acted and passed an emergency extension of unemployment benefits."

Lujan has been a strong voice on this issue, calling on House Republicans stop ignoring this important issue. Last week, he joined 160 other Democrats on a letter to Speaker Boehner highlighting the fact that approximately 200,000 veterans are among the 2 million Americans who have lost unemployment insurance. Currently, more than 9,700 New Mexicans have lost these benefits that help families make ends meet during difficult economic times while they actively look for work.

House Republicans have blocked multiple efforts by Democrats to bring up legislation to extend the program on the House floor. Last month, a measure to extend the program came one vote short of the 60 votes necessary to move legislation forward in the Senate.

Heinrich, Udall Introduce Bill To Protect And Preserve Native American Seeds;
Sen. Martin Heinrich (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. SENATE DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 366 words

WASHINGTON, D.C. (March 12, 2014) - Today, U.S. Senators Martin Heinrich (D-N.M.) and Tom Udall (D-N.M.) introduced the Native American Seeds Protection Act, a proposal that would help protect and preserve Native American seeds used for cultural, religious, medicinal, ceremonial, and agriculture purposes.

"Our tribal communities have always enhanced New Mexico's rich culture and traditions," said Sen. Heinrich. "This bill helps protect those traditions by ensuring these seeds are preserved and that future generations remain connected to their culture and heritage."

"The priceless cultural legacy of Native American communities is woven into the cultural fabric of our state," said. Sen. Udall. "For generations, tribes have cultivated plants that have played an important role in cultural traditions and farming practices. This legislation would protect the purity of native seeds and help ensure they remain available to future generations not only as an agricultural resource, but as a tie to cultural practices. I look forward to meeting with Tesuque Pueblo Governor Mora tomorrow to discuss this and other issues, and to working with Senator Heinrich to pass this important bill."

In a letter of support, Pueblo of Tesuque Governor Robert A. Mora, Sr. wrote, "The bill supports longstanding efforts to sustain our traditional ways of life and cultural practices of sowing and harvesting of native seeds. These traditions and practices are often threatened by environmental and other factors that compromise the integrity of native seeds. Our goal is to pass on our traditional practices to future generation."

The proposal would permit Indian tribes to work alongside public research institutions to encourage education and training programs aimed at protecting the purity of Native American seeds. The bill also helps secure funding for the construction of seed storage facilities.

The measure is a companion bill to U.S. Representatives Michelle Lujan Grisham (NM-01) and Ben Ray Lujan (NM-03) proposal that was introduced in the House.

Democrats seek vote on benefits

BYLINE: Staff

LENGTH: 256 words

More than 160 members of the House Democratic Caucus have signed a letter to asking House Speaker John Boehner to call for a vote to extend unemployment insurance.

The letter cited a new report that found that 200,000 veterans are among the more than 2 million people that have lost unemployment insurance benefits since they expired in December of last year.

Rep. Ben Ray Luján (D-3) was among those sending the letter.

"For more than two months, I have called on House Republicans to act on an extension of unemployment insurance. Every week that they have failed to address this issue, more New Mexicans have seen this vital safety net disappear," Luján said in a statement. "Now we see with this latest report, the impact this is having on our veteran community. During a difficult time, men and women who have served our nation are losing support that helps them make ends meet while they look for work. It's time for Congress to act and help our veterans and the 2 million Americans who are still struggling during this tough economic period."

Luján said that figures released last week showed the number of Americans who have lost unemployment insurance surpassed 2 million, including more than 9,700 New Mexicans. On average, every week, 72,000 more people will lose their unemployment insurance unless Congress acts to extend the emergency compensation program, he said.

Luján, Lara sweep congregational contests

BYLINE: Milan Simonich, The Santa Fe New Mexican

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 560 words

March 09--LAGUNA PUEBLO -- U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján showed his might Saturday, taking more than 98 percent of the vote at the Democratic pre-primary convention.

Luján, of Santa Fe, topped newcomer Robert Blanch in the battle for delegates in the 3rd Congressional District. Luján received 566 votes to nine for Blanch.

Blanch, an assistant district attorney in Bernalillo County, lives in a section of Albuquerque that was added to the northern congressional district after the 2010 census. He would have to petition onto the ballot if he wanted to continue his long-shot campaign against Luján for the Democratic nomination.

Republicans last week again nominated Jefferson Byrd as their candidate for Congress in Northern New Mexico. A rancher from Tucumcari, Byrd lost the general election to Luján two years ago.

In the Democratic pre-primary race in the 2nd Congressional District, Rocky Lara of Carlsbad was the runaway winner.

Lara took about 85 percent of the delegates. Her opponent, Leslie Endean-Singh of Alamogordo, did not reach the 20 percent threshold to make the ballot.

Endean-Singh, 69, said she was meeting with her team Saturday evening to decide whether she would continue her campaign through a petition drive. She is an attorney and previously served as a prosecutor and a magistrate judge.

Lara, 39, also is an attorney and a former Eddy County commissioner.

"I am honored to have the overwhelming support of Democrats in New Mexico's 2nd Congressional District," she said. "The momentum and energy our grass-roots campaign has built was evident in today's results."

Republican Steve Pearce of Hobbs is the incumbent congressman in the 2nd District. Pearce, 66, first won election to Congress in 2002.

He vacated the seat in 2008 to run for the U.S. Senate, a race he lost. Pearce recaptured the House seat in 2010.

Lara said her focus was on Pearce.

"Democrats in every corner of Southern New Mexico are united and motivated to take on Congressman Pearce and win in November," she said.

In a fiery speech to convention delegates, Lara spoke of her support for organized labor and her pride in being raised in a union household. Her father was a potash miner.

Momentum was on Lara's side well before the convention.

She was one of 16 new House candidates that the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee identified in its "Red to Blue Program." Democratic candidates in those districts could get financial help on a national scale if the party sees the potential of picking up the seat.

In addition, Luján and U.S. Sen. Martin Heinrich of Albuquerque endorsed Lara, something that typically does not happen in primary races.

Lara used part of her speech to reject the notion that she is running this time without great expectations, but to establish herself for a repeat campaign in two years.

"I am in this race to win," she said.

In the Albuquerque-based 1st Congressional District, U.S. Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham had no opposition from fellow Democrats. Two Republicans, Michael Frese and Richard Priem, will compete for the chance to run against her in November.

SERRANO, CROWLEY, AND LUJAN JOIN COLLEAGUES IN URGING THE IMPLEMENTATION OF A STEM GRANT PROGRAM FOR HISPANIC-SERVING INSTITUTIONS

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 794 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New York Rep. Jos E Serrano:

On March 4th, Congressman Serrano and 21 of his Democratic colleagues sent a letter to President Obama, urging him to demonstrate continued support for STEM (science, technology, engineering, and math) programs at Hispanic-Serving Institutions (HSIs). Serrano and his colleagues are specifically requesting the implementation of a dedicated grant program within the National Science Foundation (NSF). STEM fields are critical to the nation's global competitiveness, and it is essential that investments are made for underrepresented populations.

A STEM education grant program was authorized as part of the America COMPETES Act of 2007 (Public Law 110-69), but has yet to be implemented.

Full text of the letter below.

March 4, 2014

President Barack Obama

The White House

1600 Pennsylvania Avenue

Washington, DC 20500

Dear Mr. President,

We know that you share our commitment to encouraging more minorities, including Hispanic college students, to enter the science, technology, engineering, and mathematics (STEM) fields. Bringing this underrepresented population into these fields of tomorrow is critical for our country's competitiveness in a global economy, which is why we believe it is so important that your Administration move swiftly to implement the STEM Education grant program for Hispanic Serving Institutions (HSIs) at the National Science Foundation, as authorized by Congress in the America COMPETES Act of 2007 (P.L. 110-69).

The National Science Foundation, like other government agencies, has long recognized the value of targeted capacity-building programs at minority-serving institutions. While there may be other programs throughout federal agencies that have similar goals, the National Science Foundation programs have clearly filled an important niche in the training of minority students. There are currently in place programs for Historically Black Colleges and Universities and Tribal Colleges and Universities. The absence of a dedicated program for HSIs is notable - a situation we sought to correct in the America COMPETES Act.

In particular, we are concerned that the lack of a dedicated program for HSIs sends a negative message to the very students we need to reach. These students need to feel welcome in the science fields - particularly as the Hispanic population has been traditionally underrepresented, younger students may have difficulty seeing role models at the higher levels to inspire them. We appreciate the work the Administration has done to encourage and support educational achievement, such as through the White House Initiative for Educational Excellence for Hispanics. We believe a dedicated grant program at the National Science Foundation is the kind of concrete step needed to build upon these efforts and advance them further.

If we want to reach Hispanic students and entice them into a career in the science and technology fields, HSIs provide the infrastructure we need to build upon. Currently, well over half of all Hispanic students are enrolled at colleges and universities designated as HSIs. The majority of HSIs have Hispanic student populations well over the minimum threshold of 25 percent needed to receive this designation.

Furthermore, these institutions have the expertise in the needs of their student body, and as such are best equipped to build targeted STEM programs that will draw in Hispanic students. These reasons are what led Congress to recognize the role of HSIs in the America COMPETES Act by explicitly directing the National Science Foundation to establish a capacity building program for STEM education at HSIs.

Congress is due to soon act on the next reauthorization of the America COMPETES Act, and we intend to pursue the implementation of the Hispanic-Serving Institutions program as a priority. We hope that your Administration, including the National Science Foundation, will work with us and use this reauthorization to address any lingering concerns that are preventing this program from being established as Congress has made clear it expects to see done.

Together, we can help Hispanic students reach their rightful place in the STEM fields, and we firmly believe that the implementation of a dedicated grant program for HSIs at the National Science Foundation is a critical first step. We look forward to working with you to strengthen efforts to improve STEM education in our country.

Joseph Crowley

Two Curry County Commissioners Attend NACO 2014 Legislative Conference in Washington, D.C.

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 284 words

DATELINE: CLOVIS, N.M.

Curry County issued the following news release:

Commissioners Wendell Bostwick and Tim Ashley attended the National Association of Counties (NACO) 2014 Legislative Conference in Washington, D.C. March 1-5.

The conference brought over 2,000 elected and appointed county officials from across the country together to focus on the current legislative issues that face counties. This year, attendees were given the opportunity to hear from Mike Allen, Chief White House Correspondent for Politico, at the opening general session and later heard from various officials such as John Huntsman former governor of Utah and Anthony Foxx, Secretary of the U.S. Department of Transportation.

Bostwick attended various committee meetings such as the Public and Land Steering Committee and the Agricultural and Rural Affair Steering Committee. "All the workshops and sessions were very interesting with many of the topics being discussed germane to the issues in Curry County and New Mexico," said Bostwick.

Included in the conference agenda was a workshop on the overview of the Endangered Species Act. This act affects every State as listing certain species as endangered can cause detriment to local businesses and economies.

Aside from the conference, Bostwick and Ashley were able to meet with various State Senators and Representatives such as Representative Michelle Lujan Grisham, Representative Ben Ray Lujan, Senator Tom Udall and Senator Martin Heinrich to discuss topics such as Cannon Air Force Base, Ute water project and Lesser Prairie Chicken.

Questions may be addressed to the County Manager's Office at 575-763-6016.

LUJAN AND 160 MEMBERS OF CONGRESS CALL FOR A VOTE TO HELP JOBLESS VETERANS;
New Report Shows 200,000 Veterans Have Lost Unemployment Insurance;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District joined 160 other members of the House Democratic Caucus in sending a letter to House Speaker John Boehner calling for a vote to extend unemployment insurance. The letter highlights a new report by the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities that finds 200,000 veterans are among the more than 2 million people that have lost unemployment insurance benefits since they expired in December of last year.

"For more than two months, I have called on House Republicans to act on an extension of unemployment insurance. Every week that they have failed to address this issue, more New Mexicans have seen this vital safety net disappear," said Congressman Lujan. "Now we see with this latest report, the impact this is having on our veteran community. It's time for Congress to act and help our veterans and the 2 million Americans who are still struggling during this tough economic period."

"Unemployment insurance is critical for these Veterans to be able feed their families and put a roof over their head as they seek to transition from combat to career or try to get back on their feet with a new job," the letter reads. "For the sake of these Veterans who are heroes, we urge you to allow an up-or-down vote on a proposal to extend unemployment insurance as soon as possible."

Earlier this week, the number of Americans who have lost unemployment insurance surpassed two million, including more than 9,700 New Mexicans. On average, every week, 72,000 more people will lose their unemployment insurance unless Congress acts to extend the emergency compensation program.

New Mexico's congressional delegation condemns Russia's actions in Ukraine

BYLINE: Michael Coleman, JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU PUBLISHED: WEDNESDAY, MARCH 5, 2014 AT 9:07 AM

SECTION: INSIDE THE BELTWAY

.....

New Mexico's congressional delegation is joining other members of Congress and leaders throughout the Western Hemisphere to condemn Russia's invasion of the Crimean peninsula in Ukraine and call for possible sanctions and other maneuvers against Russia as retribution.

The statements came as the European Union was preparing a $15 billion aid package to Ukraine.

Sen. Tom Udall, a Democrat and members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee said the international community needs to send a "strong message."

"The United States, the European Union, and NATO need to send a strong message to Russia that violations of Ukrainian sovereignty are not acceptable," Udall said. "Diplomatic and economic options to isolate Russia for its aggressive actions in Crimea are certainly on the table. Our goal should be a negotiated settlement that preserves Ukrainian sovereignty and results in Russia ending its occupation of Ukrainian territory. I urge Ukraine to move ahead quickly with presidential elections and continue its transition to democratic stability. I support the proposed U.S. loan guarantee and hope that the U.S. State Department, the European Union, and the International Monetary Fund can work quickly to negotiate a broader economic package to help address Ukraine's underlying economic problems."

Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., said Russian President Vladimir Putin's behavior is disturbing.

"Russian aggression in the Crimean peninsula is consistent with a pattern of behavior from President Putin that is at odds with the international community," Heinrich said. "I am deeply concerned by President Putin's disregard for the sovereignty of Ukraine, and I fully support efforts to isolate Russia economically and diplomatically through sanctions, potential expulsion from the G8, and other measures. Russia must act responsibly if it wishes to continue participating in international forums and Russia's recent actions are neither responsible nor constructive. I will continue to support working with our European partners and our NATO allies to demonstrate our support of a Ukrainian future that is decided by Ukrainian citizens and not outside forces."

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., called the crisis in Ukraine "incredibly alarming."

"We must engage in aggressive diplomacy while keeping all available sanctions on the table," Lujan Grisham said. "I'm hopeful the continued American and European engagement will allow the political process, as outlined in the constitution of Ukraine to unfold. I'm also pleased that Secretary Kerry traveled to Kiev, and we are working closely with our European partners to peacefully resolve this situation."

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., said isolating Russia economically should be considered.

"I am gravely concerned by Russia's aggression in the Crimean peninsula that violates the sovereignty of Ukraine," he said. "The people of Ukraine should be allowed to chart their own path forward through free and fair elections without the threat of force from Russia. We need to work with our European allies to condemn Putin's actions and consider sanctions that will isolate Russia from the global community."

Rep. Steve Pearce encouraged decisive U.S. action.

"Russia's blatant aggression cannot go unchecked," he said. "The US and the EU should impose strict economic and diplomatic sanctions to hold Russia accountable."

LUJAN: HOUSE REPUBLICANS AGAIN VOTE TO UNDERMINE ACA WHILE IGNORING CRITICAL LEGISLATION;

50 Votes on ACA, Not One on Immigration Reform, Minimum Wage, or Unemployment Insurance; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 364 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District voted against yet another House Republican attempt to undermine the Affordable Care Act (ACA). The legislation on the floor today - the 50th vote on the ACA in the House - delays the individual responsibility provision and would result in an increase in premiums for millions of Americans.

"House Republicans have made their point over and over again. They want to repeal the ACA despite not having an alternative," Congressman Lujan said. "Their repeal only plan would put insurance companies back in charge and open the door for the worst abuses that the ACA has ended, such as discrimination based on pre-existing conditions. Their obsession with repealing the ACA stands in stark contrast to the important legislation they have failed to act on. Fifty votes on the ACA, yet not one vote on the House floor to reform our broken immigration system, extend unemployment insurance for those struggling to find work, and increase the minimum wage for hard-working Americans. House Republicans' priorities are clear - undermine the ACA while ignoring ways to strengthen our economy and the middle class."

The shared responsibility provision of the ACA plays a critical role in ensuring that millions of Americans don't lose their coverage when they get sick and that individuals with pre-existing conditions can get coverage. Repealing this aspect of the law would result in higher premiums for those who remain insured, fewer premium tax credits for middle-income families, and increased cost-shifting of uncompensated care to health care providers, workers, and businesses.

The individual responsibility provision was originally developed by the Heritage Foundation in 1989 to prevent the problem of "free riders" who don't get health insurance and face health care costs they cannot afford to pay. The costs of their uncompensated care are then passed along to all those who have health insurance in the form of higher premiums for consumers and businesses.

New Mexico Dems: Senator Udall, Congressman Lujan Announce Over $5.1 Million for Wireless Service for Navajo Nation and Picuris Pueblo

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 383 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

U.S. Senator Tom Udall and U.S. Representative Ben Ray Lujan announced that the Federal Communications Commission will award over $5.1 million to support mobile broadband service in areas of the Navajo Nation and Picuris Pueblo lacking wireless coverage. Through a reverse auction bidding process designed to maximize the expansion of wireless coverage, the FCC allocated a total of $5,149,628 to Smith Bagley, Inc. and Commnet Wireless, LLC for mobile broadband service at Picuris Pueblo in Taos County and on the Navajo Nation, which spans New Mexico, Arizona and Utah. Of the total award, more than $2 million will support wireless deployment over the next three years to 2,096 people living in New Mexico.

The FCC created the Tribal Mobility Fund as part of its reform of the Universal Service Fund. Through the initial phase of the fund, the FCC awarded a total of $49.8 million in one-time support to companies across five states that agreed to build 3G or 4G mobile broadband networks for currently underserved Tribal lands.

Both Udall and Lujan have strongly supported the expansion of broadband and wireless technology to Tribal and rural communities to help spur the growth of businesses and increase educational opportunities.

"Wireless coverage not only keeps us connected but can truly save lives during an emergency, " Udall said. "Wireless service in Tribal communities is vital for safety and security and to connect people and businesses around the world. This FCC action is a positive step forward, and as a member of the Appropriations Committee, I'll keep working until every New Mexican has access to high-speed Internet and wireless service."

"In this digital age, access to wireless service is becoming more and more important," Lujan said. "Wireless service not only connects families and friends and improves the safety and security of communities, it connects them to opportunities that would otherwise be closed off. This award by the FCC is a welcome step forward, and these funds for tribal communities are essential to promoting economic growth. We must continue our efforts to bring wireless service to every corner of New Mexico."

John Cornell: Bill good for energy projects and sportsmen

BYLINE: By John Cornell Guest column

SECTION: OPINION

LENGTH: 575 words

You've seen them as you drive down Highways 26 and 27 where wind and solar farms are visible in New Mexico. The rapid growth of wind and solar in our state is indicative of the rapid growth of renewable energy in this country, particularly here in the West. Utility-scale wind and solar energy production has increased by 23 percent in recent years. These homegrown energy sources will also help our country become more energy self reliant.

However, as we look to reduce our carbon footprint and expand renewable energy use, we need to remember something utility-scale wind and solar facilities require large expanses of real estate and will be on that landscape for decades to come. So where can developers get access to large undeveloped areas? Our federal public lands have increasingly been a popular place to site these industrial renewable energy developments and our federal land management agencies have worked hard to facilitate this development in recent years. Yet we receive nothing in exchange for the use of these lands by large-scale energy projects that will have a permanent impact on the landscapes and fish and wildlife.

This just doesn't seem right, which is why last week I traveled to Washington, DC to talk to Senators Martin Heinrich and Tom Udall and Representatives Michelle Lujan Grisham, Ben Ray Lujan and Stevan Pearce to thank them for their support of the Public Lands Renewable Energy Development Act (PLREDA, H.R. 596 and S. 279). This bill would create a leasing and royalty system for the development of renewable energy on federal public lands, similar to what is already in place for traditional mineral development.

A royalty-based leasing system for renewable energy development would be beneficial for industry, providing a more efficient permitting process that would reduce costs and risks to investors and focus limited agency resources. Through revenue sharing provisions, the PLREDA would benefit the local communities here in New Mexico where renewable development is occurring. Even more importantly, 35 percent of the royalties would be dedicated to conservation. That's right, for the first time private development on our federal lands would financially support efforts to restore habitats and fish and wildlife populations that are being impacted by that development.

Recent media coverage has begun to shine a light on some of the less positive impacts of wind and solar energy development. Wind turbines are killing eagles regularly in this region as well as bats and numerous other migratory bird species. Solar developments take up large swaths of land, affecting access for sportsmen and recreational users.

Renewable energy is certainly clean energy, but it is not without its own negative consequences. As part of a competitive leasing program, the bill will require that proposed sites be reviewed for potential impacts on fish, wildlife and other natural resources. This is something that sportsmen and women in New Mexico ardently support.

The Public Lands Renewable Energy Development Act would level the playing field and ensure that we are reinvesting in the conservation of our nonrenewable natural resources. I am glad that New Mexico's delegation recognizes the prudence of such an approach and I hope that Congress moves this bill forward this year so that we do not waste any more time as this industry grows so quickly.

New Mexico Dems: Udall, Heinrich, Lujan: New Mexicans Deserve Clear Information About Lamy Project

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 412 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, and Congressman Ben Ray Lujan announced yesterday that they have sent a letter on behalf of their constituents to Pacer Energy Marketing, which has announced plans to truck crude oil from the Four Corners to a property in Lamy owned by Santa Fe Southern Railway, where it would be transported by rail to refineries south of Albuquerque.

The lawmakers note in their letter that Pacer's plans have raised strong concerns among the residents of Lamy about the potential for spills and accidents, potential risks to water supplies and community wells, and the limited ability for emergency personnel to respond in case of an accident.

Udall, Heinrich and Lujan are working with state and local officials to determine what jurisdictions, permits and regulations apply. In the meantime, they are asking Pacer to provide information to help them - and the community - understand the implications of the project.

"We believe accurate and detailed information regarding the scope of your proposal should be shared with our constituents and local officials as soon as possible," the lawmakers wrote. "New Mexicans deserve to have clear information about a proposal that will have a significant impact on their community."

Specifically, they are requesting:

* An over view of the proposed project;

* An outline of what infrastructure changes or investments are planned as part of the project;

* A list and explanation of what federal, state, and local permits will be necessary to pursue the project;

* A list of what federal, state, and local permits or authorizations have been obtained or applied for at this time, and from what authorities;

* A list, including citations, for all applicable federal statutes and regulations that the project will need to comply with to protect and ensure the safety of the community's water, air, and residents;

* The proposed timeline for any construction and permitting activities for the project;

* A description of any community benefits that Pacer believes are relevant for the project, such as jobs created, estimated state and local tax revenue generated, or other community contributions.

The lawmakers are awaiting a response from Pacer.

House approves 'unlocking' bill

BYLINE: Gary Gerew

LENGTH: 277 words

The House of Representatives approved a bill Tuesday that would allow people to open their cell phones for service from companies other than the one from which they obtained the device.

The bill was passed with a 295-114 vote. The legislation is known as the "Unlocking Consumer Choice and Wireless Competition Act".

Rep. Ben Ray Luján (D-03) was among those voting against the bill. Luján, in a statement, said he made his decision because he believes the act was changed at the last minute in a way that weakens consumers' ownership rights.

"While this is a complex issue, what is at stake is straightforward," he said. "This is not just about the ability to unlock a phone and choose your mobile network, it is about the use of copyright laws to limit the freedom and choices of consumers. Instead of clarifying a questionable legal interpretation that prevents consumers from using their electronic devices for legal purposes, this bill legitimates that decision and allows anti-competitive practices to become legally enforceable. Many would agree that consumers should be able to unlock their phone or use electronic devices for legal purposes without running afoul of copyright law. Unfortunately this bill does not provide the straightforward solution that it did before the bill was changed."

Luján pointed out that consumer groups Public Knowledge and the Electronic Frontier Foundation had also withdrawn their support for the legislation.

Similar legislation is being considered by the Senate.

LUJAN CALLS FOR A VOTE IN THE HOUSE TO RAISE THE MINIMUM WAGE;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 372 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District joined a number of his Democratic colleagues today at a press conference highlighting their efforts to force a vote in the House of Representatives on an increase in the minimum wage.

"At today's minimum wage, many full-time workers and their families still live below the poverty line. As a nation, we can and we must do better if we are going to provide people with opportunities to pull themselves up and out of poverty with hard work and determination," Congressman Lujan said. "Raising the federal minimum wage to $10.10 for all workers would benefit 28 million workers and lift nearly 1 million people out of poverty. In New Mexico alone, approximately 147,000 workers would be impacted - almost 19 percent of the workforce. It will put more money in the pockets of workers who will spend that money in our communities and in our small businesses, helping them grow. That is why more than two-thirds of small business owners support an increase in the minimum wage."

Despite significant public support, House Speaker John Boehner has refused to allow a vote on a minimum wage increase. House Democrats have introduced a discharge petition that would require an up or down vote on legislation raising the federal minimum wage to $10.10 an hour when a majority of the House, 218 members, sign on to the petition. Lujan signed the petition this afternoon.

More than 600 economists, including seven Nobel Prize winners, recently signed a letter to the President and Congressional leaders expressing their support for raising the minimum wage. They highlighted recent research into the effects of a higher minimum wage, stating that "increases in the minimum wage have had little or no negative effect on the employment of minimum-wage workers, even during times of weakness in the labor market."

"It has been almost five years since Congress acted to increase the minimum wage, while inflation has pushed up the cost of everyday goods since that time. It's time for Congress to act and give America's workers a raise," added Lujan.

Udall, Heinrich, Lujan: New Mexicans Deserve Clear Information About Lamy Project

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 412 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The office of Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., issued the following news release:

Today, U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, and U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan announced that they have sent a letter on behalf of their constituents to Pacer Energy Marketing, which has announced plans to truck crude oil from the Four Corners to a property in Lamy owned by Santa Fe Southern Railway, where it would be transported by rail to refineries south of Albuquerque.

The lawmakers note in their letter that Pacer's plans have raised strong concerns among the residents of Lamy about the potential for spills and accidents, potential risks to water supplies and community wells, and the limited ability for emergency personnel to respond in case of an accident.

Udall, Heinrich and Lujan are working with state and local officials to determine what jurisdictions, permits and regulations apply. In the meantime, they are asking Pacer to provide information to help them - and the community - understand the implications of the project.

"We believe accurate and detailed information regarding the scope of your proposal should be shared with our constituents and local officials as soon as possible," the lawmakers wrote. "New Mexicans deserve to have clear information about a proposal that will have a significant impact on their community."

Specifically, they are requesting:

-An over view of the proposed project;

-An outline of what infrastructure changes or investments are planned as part of the project;

-A list and explanation of what federal, state, and local permits will be necessary to pursue the project;

-A list of what federal, state, and local permits or authorizations have been obtained or applied for at this time, and from what authorities;

-A list, including citations, for all applicable federal statutes and regulations that the project will need to comply with to protect and ensure the safety of the community's water, air, and residents;

-The proposed timeline for any construction and permitting activities for the project;

-A description of any community benefits that Pacer believes are relevant for the project, such as jobs created, estimated state and local tax revenue generated, or other community contributions.

The lawmakers are awaiting a response from Pacer.

Lujan Calls for a Vote in the House to Raise the Minimum Wage

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 379 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. (3rd CD), issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District joined a number of his Democratic colleagues today at a press conference highlighting their efforts to force a vote in the House of Representatives on an increase in the minimum wage.

"At today's minimum wage, many full-time workers and their families still live below the poverty line. As a nation, we can and we must do better if we are going to provide people with opportunities to pull themselves up and out of poverty with hard work and determination," Congressman Lujan said. "Raising the federal minimum wage to $10.10 for all workers would benefit 28 million workers and lift nearly 1 million people out of poverty. In New Mexico alone, approximately 147,000 workers would be impacted - almost 19 percent of the workforce. It will put more money in the pockets of workers who will spend that money in our communities and in our small businesses, helping them grow. That is why more than two-thirds of small business owners support an increase in the minimum wage."

Despite significant public support, House Speaker John Boehner has refused to allow a vote on a minimum wage increase. House Democrats have introduced a discharge petition that would require an up or down vote on legislation raising the federal minimum wage to $10.10 an hour when a majority of the House, 218 members, sign on to the petition. Lujan signed the petition this afternoon.

More than 600 economists, including seven Nobel Prize winners, recently signed a letter (http://www.epi.org/minimum-wage-statement/) to the President and Congressional leaders expressing their support for raising the minimum wage. They highlighted recent research into the effects of a higher minimum wage, stating that "increases in the minimum wage have had little or no negative effect on the employment of minimum-wage workers, even during times of weakness in the labor market."

"It has been almost five years since Congress acted to increase the minimum wage, while inflation has pushed up the cost of everyday goods since that time. It's time for Congress to act and give America's workers a raise," added Lujan.

Lujan Votes Against Bill That Limits Consumers' Ownership Rights

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 356 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. (3rd CD), issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District voted against legislation this evening that was originally aimed at allowing consumers to switch mobile networks without having to buy a new phone - or "unlock" their phone - but was changed at the last minute in a manner that weakens consumers' ownership rights.

"While this is a complex issue, what is at stake is straightforward. This is not just about the ability to unlock a phone and choose your mobile network, it is about the use of copyright laws to limit the freedom and choices of consumers," Congressman Lujan said. "Instead of clarifying a questionable legal interpretation that prevents consumers from using their electronic devices for legal purposes, this bill legitimates that decision and allows anti-competitive practices to become legally enforceable. Many would agree that consumers should be able to unlock their phone or use electronic devices for legal purposes without running afoul of copyright law. Unfortunately this bill does not provide the straightforward solution that it did before the bill was changed."

At issue is a ruling by the Librarian of Congress that decided removing locks on cell phones violates the Digital Millennium Copyright Act. H.R. 1123, originally was written to replace this ruling with an earlier decision that cellphone users could unlock their phones without violating copyright law.

H.R. 1123 passed out of the Judiciary Committee with bipartisan support, but was changed before coming to the House floor to make the unlocking of phones in bulk for the purpose of reselling them a violation of copyright law. Rather than overturning the ruling by the Librarian of Congress, the bill put on the floor tonight allows copyright law to limit the freedom of consumers to use their phones as they choose. As a result of this last minute change by the by House Republicans, consumer groups Public Knowledge and the Electronic Frontier Foundation withdrew their support for the legislation.

New Mexico Dems: Udall, Heinrich, Lujan Announce $1 Million Safer Grant for Bloomfield Fire Department

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 444 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

Yesterday, U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, and U.S. Representative Ben Ray Lujan, announced that the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) has awarded the Bloomfield Fire Department with a $1,023,494 grant under the Staffing for Adequate Fire and Emergency Response (SAFER) program. The grant funds will be used to increase the number of firefighters in Bloomfield, and help the Bloomfield Fire Department to enhance its deployment capabilities to ensure that the community has adequate protection from fires and fire-related hazards.

SAFER grants provide funds directly to fire departments to help them to improve and restore staffing to comply with minimum industry standards, and to maintain the 24-hour staffing needed to provide adequate protection from fire and fire-related hazards. Increased funding provided through SAFER grants allows fire departments to rehire laid-off firefighters, retain firefighters facing imminent layoffs, and hire new firefighters. The grants also assist with the recruitment and retention of volunteer firefighters. Full staffing enables fire departments to more effectively and safely respond to emergencies with decreased response times and greater numbers of trained personnel.

"This grant will provide important funding to the Bloomfield Fire Department, and help it to ensure it is fully staffed and appropriately equipped to respond to emergencies safely and effectively," Udall said. "New Mexicans understand the great risks that firefighters regularly face for our safety, and I'm proud to support this important investment in the safety of the both the firefighters of Bloomfield and the surrounding community, which they serve with dedication."

"Our brave firefighters serve on the frontlines every day to protect our communities, " Heinrich said. "This investment will help the Bloomfield Fire Department maintain the staffing it needs to keep the public safe. I will continue to support these essential grant programs to ensure our first responders can do their jobs effectively and safely."

"With New Mexico facing the threat of a longer fire season, these federal funds are a critical component to ensuring that the Bloomfield area has the personnel it needs to protect the community," Lujan said. "New Mexico's firefighters serve with distinction in harm's way and we must do all we can to see that they have the resources they need to do their jobs as safely and effectively as possible. This investment will contribute greatly to that effort."

Congressional Democrats back higher wage bill in NM

BYLINE: Gary Gerew

LENGTH: 196 words

The Democratic members of New Mexico's Congressional delegation have issued a joint statement supporting a proposal being debated by the state Legislature to raise the state's minimum wage.

The message was signed by Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham. They said they also support the idea of raising the federal minimum wage.

"Increasing the minimum wage ensures families have money to spend at local businesses, and it's one of the best things we can do to kickstart New Mexico's economy," Udall said. "At today's minimum wage, too many New Mexico families work two or three jobs just to put food on the table and fill up the gas tank, yet they still can't make enough to climb out of poverty. Our nation was founded on the promise that - no matter your background - anyone who works hard can get ahead. It's time to raise the minimum wage to make sure we're keeping that promise so that all New Mexico families have a real chance at the American dream."

New Mexico Dems: New Mexico's Democratic Congressional Delegation Supports NM Minimum Wage Increase

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 498 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, Congressman Ben Ray Lujan, and Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham have announced their enthusiastic support for increasing New Mexico's minimum wage.

The New Mexico state legislature is currently debating a measure to raise the minimum wage and provide for annual inflation increases to strengthen the economy and help lift more families into the middle class. Udall, Heinrich, Lujan and Lujan Grisham also support raising the federal minimum wage.

"Increasing the minimum wage ensures families have money to spend at local businesses, and it's one of the best things we can do to kickstart New Mexico's economy," Udall said. "At today's minimum wage, too many New Mexico families work two or three jobs just to put food on the table and fill up the gas tank, yet they still can't make enough to climb out of poverty. Our nation was founded on the promise that - no matter your background - anyone who works hard can get ahead. It's time to raise the minimum wage to make sure we're keeping that promise so that all New Mexico families have a real chance at the American dream."

"Working full time at the current minimum wage leaves too many New Mexico families struggling to make ends meet -- this is especially true for women, who make up a disproportionate share of minimum wage workers today," Heinrich said. "Our economy and our workforce are stronger when we reward an honest day's work with fair wages. We must be unwavering in our commitment to restore the basic bargain on which this country was built, that if you work hard and play the rules you can get ahead. It's time to raise the minimum wage."

"At today's minimum wage, many full-time workers and their families still live below the poverty line. As a state and a nation, we can and we must do better if we are going to provide people with opportunities to pull themselves up and out of poverty with hard work and determination," Lujan said. "An increase in the minimum wage is not only good for workers, it's good for businesses as it increases worker morale and contributes to a decrease in employee turnover. It also puts more money in the pockets of consumers, helping small businesses in our communities grow. It's time to give workers in New Mexico a raise."

"A strong, thriving middle class is the key to jumpstarting New Mexico's economy and ensuring our future success. But at today's minimum wage, New Mexico workers are denied the opportunity to enter the middle class - in fact, it's a daily struggle just to stay out of poverty and provide for their families," Lujan Grisham said. "Raising the minimum wage will give a much-needed shot in the arm to our recovery, help reduce our state's vast income inequality gap and expand economic opportunity for New Mexico families. Hardworking New Mexicans deserve a raise."

New Mexico Dems: Congressman Ben Ray Lujan Rejects Republican Bill that Undermines Medicare to Address Military Retiree Pensions

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 349 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District voted yesterday against a House Republican proposal that undermines Medicare and pits seniors against military retirees. The legislation addresses a provision in the budget agreement that was passed by Congress in December that reduced the cost-of-living adjustment (COLA) to pensions for military retirees - but it does so by extending sequester cuts to Medicare.

"I support action to restore the full cost of living adjustment for military retirees who have spent a career serving their country, but it's disappointing that House Republicans offered a bill that cut Medicare to pay for it," Congressman Lujan said. "We need a solution that does not pick winners and losers between military retirees and our nation's seniors."

Lujan voted for the budget agreement that rolled back last year's devastating sequester cuts that had resulted in Head Start centers shutting down, workers being furloughed, and cuts to the national labs that rippled through the New Mexico's economy. In January, Lujan supported the omnibus appropriations bill to fund the government that took steps to address the pension issue by repealing the COLA cut for disabled military retirees and survivors. The legislation also included important funding to address the backlog of veterans claims through the VA.

"During Congress' efforts to pass spending bills last month, we were able to address part of this problem in a bipartisan manner, ensuring that disabled military retirees would receive their full COLA," Lujan added. "It's disappointing that instead of once again working together to solve this problem that so many of us agree should be addressed, House Republicans choose legislation that weakens Medicare and our commitment to New Mexico's seniors."

Lujan is a cosponsor of the Military Retirement Restoration Act that repeals the cuts to COLAs and is fully paid for by closing tax loopholes for offshore corporations.

"We need a solution that does not pick winners and losers between military retirees and our nation's seniors."

Lujan voted for the budget agreement that rolled back last year's devastating sequester cuts that had resulted in Head Start centers shutting down, workers being furloughed, and cuts to the national labs that rippled through the New Mexico's economy. In January, Lujan supported the omnibus appropriations bill to fund the government that took steps to address the pension issue by repealing the COLA cut for disabled military retirees and survivors. The legislation also included important funding to address the backlog of veterans claims through the VA.

"During Congress' efforts to pass spending bills last month, we were able to address part of this problem in a bipartisan manner, ensuring that disabled military retirees would receive their full COLA," Lujan added. "It's disappointing that instead of once again working together to solve this problem that so many of us agree should be addressed, House Republicans choose legislation that weakens Medicare and our commitment to New Mexico's seniors."

Lujan is a cosponsor of the Military Retirement Restoration Act that repeals the cuts to COLAs and is fully paid for by closing tax loopholes for offshore corporations.

Lujan Rejects House Republican Bill That Undermines Medicare to Address Military Retiree Pensions

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. (3rd CD), issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District voted today against a House Republican proposal that undermines Medicare and pits seniors against military retirees. The legislation addresses a provision in the budget agreement that was passed by Congress in December that reduced the cost-of-living adjustment (COLA) to pensions for military retirees - but it does so by extending sequester cuts to Medicare.

"I support action to restore the full cost of living adjustment for military retirees who have spent a career serving their country, but it's disappointing that House Republicans offered a bill that cut Medicare to pay for it," Congressman Lujan said. "We need a solution that does not pick winners and losers between military retirees and our nation's seniors."

LUJAN: WITH PRESIDENT'S SIGNATURE TODAY, FARM BILL TO HELP NEW MEXICO COMMUNITIES; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 527 words

Santa Fe, NM - With President Barack Obama scheduled to sign the bipartisan Farm Bill into law this afternoon, Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District highlighted the important impact the legislation will have on communities in New Mexico.

"Farmers and ranchers in New Mexico have waited a long time for this day. With the President's signature on a new Farm Bill, those in the agricultural sector who contribute greatly to New Mexico's economy, while honoring our culture and history, will receive important assistance that will help in their efforts to produce the many crops - from chiles to pecans - that make New Mexico so special, "Congressman Lujan said. "In addition, the legislation includes an important provision that will help farmers and ranchers care for the acequias that are essential to their livelihood. By enabling Acequia and Community Ditch Associations to finally compete for federal grants, they will have an opportunity to receive funds that will help maintain the health of their acequias."

During debate on the House Farm Bill last year, Lujan offered an amendment to enable Acequia Community Ditch Associations to apply for federal funds within the Environmental Quality Incentive Program (EQIP). The amendment, which was adopted by a voice vote, would remove burdensome roadblocks to improve conservation practices and manage scare water resources, thereby strengthening the acequias that provide irrigation for local farmers. Lujan's efforts, along with the support of the New Mexico delegation, helped secure language in the bill that is similar to the amendment and will allow Acequia and Community Ditch Associations to form partnerships and apply for federal grants through EQIP as well as a number of other federal programs.

"We greatly appreciate the work of our congressional delegation to improve acequia eligibility for conservation programs," said Paula Garcia, Executive Director of the New Mexico Acequia Association. "Investment in agriculture will expand the availability of locally grown food and support the livelihood of farmers and ranchers in New Mexico's acequia communities. Particularly during this time of drought, conservation practices are vital for farmers and ranchers."

Among a number of provisions in the Farm Bill that will benefit New Mexico is one year of funding for the Payment in Lieu of Taxes (PILT) Program. Local governments that contain nontaxable federal lands and provide vital government services, such as public safety, housing, social services and transportation are eligible for the PILT program. PILT compensates these jurisdictions - which provide significant support for national parks, wildlife refuges and recreation areas - for their support and foregone tax revenue from these federal lands. Last year, New Mexico received more than $34 million through the program. In addition, the bill will help farmers' markets and specialty crop producers, providing important funds for chiles, pecans, and other fruits and vegetables.

New Mexico Dems: Congressman Ben Ray Lujan Signs on to Net Neutrality

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 328 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan has announced that he has signed on as a cosponsor to legislation to protect consumers and innovation online. Lujan joins Representatives Henry Waxman and Anna Eshoo, authors of legislation in the House, as well as a number of his colleagues on the Energy and Commerce Committee as a cosponsor of H.R. 3982, the Open Internet Preservation Act. A companion bill will be introduced in the Senate by Senator Ed Markey and includes the support of New Mexico Senator Tom Udall.

The legislation is a response to a decision by the D.C. Circuit Court last month to strike down the Federal Communications Commission's Open Internet Order that had prevented broadband providers from blocking or discriminating against content online. The bill restores these rules until the FCC takes new, final action in the Open Internet proceeding.

"A free and open Internet has spawned countless innovations that have impacted our lives for the better and spurred economic growth. It is essential that we keep the innovative spirit alive by ensuring that we have a system that does not block access to content on the web," Congressman Lujan said. "The decision by the D.C. Circuit Court threatens to undermine the freedom of the Internet by allowing restrictions that impede users' ability to harness the Internet's full potential. As the FCC works on replacement rules, this legislation will make it clear that the Internet will remain open for all users."

Time: 9:50 a.m. EST Date: Wednesday, February 6, 2014

REPRESENTATIVE CHRIS VAN HOLLEN (D-MD): Good morning, everybody. No, I'm not Henry Waxman.

And I want to say at the outset, we're all gathered here as part of the Safe Climate Caucus.

I think Henry Waxman is going to join us as soon as possible. But I speak on behalf of all of us and members of Congress in the House and the Senate, as well as all Americans, when we say that the country, and in fact the world and the planet, owe Henry Waxman a great debt of gratitude for the incredible work he's done in a whole range of areas in the United States Congress, but for the purposes of today, all his incredible work when it comes to addressing climate issues, clean energy issues.

So we salute him for his work and, because he's not able to join us right now but we didn't want to keep you waiting any longer, I'm going to read the statement that Henry Waxman had prepared. And then I'm going to introduce my colleagues.

So here's what Henry will say: Thank you for joining us today. (Laughter.) One year ago a group of members from Congress gathered to announce the beginning of a new caucus, the Safe Climate Caucus, that would focus on addressing the growing threat to our planet from climate change. Our members came from all over the country and represented diverse constituencies, yet we shared a common understanding: that climate change is real, that it poses a major threat to our planet and that Congress should be part of the solution.

We made a commitment to have our members speak on the House floor every single day that the House was in session and we kept at it day after day. Over the past year, we spoke on the floor for 117 consecutive days, delivering over 140 speeches about climate change. We talked about scientific issues showing the tremendous risks of climate change. We called for action after catastrophic, severe weather events. We lauded new clean energy in our districts as a way to promote economic growth while cutting pollution.

The House Republican leadership prevented action to address climate change, but they could not silence us. In his State of the Union address last week, President Obama declared 2014 a year of action. He reminded the nation that the debate is settled. Quote, "climate change is a fact." The president is right. This is a year of action, and that is why, in 2014, the members of the Safe Climate Caucus are redoubling our commitment to action. We will continue to speak out on the floor of the House, but we will also be writing weekly op-eds and posting videos on YouTube.

The Huffington Post has agreed to run an op-ed from one of our members every week the House is in session. Every week, one of our members is going to make a video for YouTube on the threat of climate change and solutions that can make America stronger.

And of course, we will continue to speak on the House floor every week. We'll be doing more this year, but our mission remains unchanged. We will continue to shine a light on an issue that may be the most important issue facing our children and grandchildren: the future of the planet.

Republicans many deny the science and ignore the threat, but we won't. We will be speaking out, writing op-eds and posting YouTubes, as I said, to raise awareness, build public support and encourage strong action by the administration.

We want to thank all the members in the Safe Climate Caucus. It's different from other Congressional caucuses because of the premium we place on action. Our members have made this effort a reality, and I want to give each of them an opportunity to discuss why this issue is so important.

And now, before I introduce one of our members, I just want to say a quick word.

Lloyd and I -- Lloyd, who I'm going to introduce in a minute -- were at a breakfast this morning with the head of the state of Connecticut's Green Bank. And there are now 11 states in the country -- Henry Waxman. All right! All right. How are you?

I was directed by your team to read your statement. But why don't I have Henry come forward and say a few words right now.

REPRESENTATIVE HENRY WAXMAN (D-CA): Thank you. Where are you in my statement? (Laughter.)

REP. VAN HOLLEN: Well, I had just finished your statement, I was saying a few words, and then I was going to introduce Lloyd. But why don't you step forward.

REP. WAXMAN: Well, thank you very much, Congressman Van Hollen. And I'm pleased to see so many of my colleagues here in the Safe Climate Caucus.

We've organized this caucus to speak out about the threat of climate change and the ignorance, intentional, of the Republicans, who don't want to know about the danger or acknowledge the science. And therefore, we've been stopped from any action in the House of Representatives to deal with this serious threat.

So each of us has taken a turn every day to speak on the House floor about climate change. We cannot set the agenda of the committees. We can't call the scientists before the Congress. The Republicans are doing nothing, but we will not be silenced.

We are going to move, however, to a new strategy in expressing how to draw attention to the climate change issue. What we're going to be doing is all of us in the Safe Climate Caucus will take our turns, not on the House floor, but doing an op-ed that will appear every day in the Huntington (sic\Huffington) Post. They've agreed to run an op-ed from one of our members every week the House is in session. And our members as well will make videos for YouTube on the threat of climate change and the solutions that can strengthen our nation.

We will be doing more of this this year than we have. Republicans may deny the science, ignore the threat, but we won't. So I want to thank my colleagues for being here, and particularly for Congressman Van Hollen, who should have told me that there's traffic when you come from -- (laughter) -- Bethesda to the Capitol and you shouldn't figure that everything is going to move smoothly to get here on time. But I apologize to everybody for my lateness, but I thank everybody for being here.

And I now want to turn the speaking over to --

REP. VAN HOLLEN: Well, let me introduce Lloyd. I was just going to --

REP. WAXMAN: Yeah, to Congressman Van Hollen, who is now our master's of ceremony. (Laughter.)

REP. VAN HOLLEN: No, no, I don't want to hang on that rope. But listen, I -- thank you. Thank you, Henry, again. And I swear at my congressmen every day about the traffic coming in as well. (Laughter.)

So let me -- let me just -- I was mentioning that this morning some of us were at a breakfast by the head of the Connecticut Green Bank. And I mention that because this group is organized for action. And as Congressman Waxman said, in the House the Republican leadership has refused to allow us to take any kind of legislative action. But what we can do is continue to push the discussion forward, not just at the national level but also at the state level. And the states are moving.

And the tragedy of this is that we could do so much more if the federal government would also move. The states and the people in this country are way ahead of this House Republican Congress. And the danger for the country is that if we continue to lag behind at the national level, folks around the world who recognize the potential for investing in green energy and green jobs will gain a competitive edge.

So this has always been a win-win. We can put more people back to work, we can gain a more competitive edge in the international economy and we can protect our climate. And one person who has been out there along with Henry Waxman, speaking out every day, pushing this issue forward is our good friend Lloyd Doggett from Texas. And he can talk to you a little bit about some of the activities that he's been engaged in and all of us are going to continue to work.

So, Lloyd, thank you for your leadership.

LLOYD DOGGETT: Thank you, Chris. And, Henry, thank you not only for leading our caucus but leading our country on so many critical issues.

In a sense Texas is the leader in greenhouse gas production and perhaps in climate change denying. I feel a special responsibility to speak out in this caucus on what I view as the most critical environmental issue that we face today, not only in Texas but in the entire world.

I look at my young granddaughters and think, in their lifetime Texas is on schedule to be consumed by more of the Sonoran Desert at the same time we have substantial receding of our coastlines, and by one estimate lose about a third of Galveston Island.

We, at the same time, are in store for more of the severe droughts that we've experienced recently -- erratic weather, more exposure to the spread of tropical diseases. The evidence of climate change is really all around us. I think that the choice is clear in how to address it.

At some point along this decline, America must have new green technology. We can develop that technology here or we can wait to buy it from some other place. It is a matter of running a new green energy, green job economy or getting run over by it.

I believe that this House majority is determined to prevent the Congress from recognizing the reality all around us and to remain inactive, and our caucus is determined to keep the issue on the forefront, as it must be.

I'm pleased to be a member because this caucus is about what is right for our health, for our economy and for our national security and to participate with people like Doris Matsui, who was there as we attempted to deal with this issue previously on the committee and remained such an important leader in the fight to get action on climate change. Doris?

REPRESENTATIVE DORIS MATSUI (D-CA): Thank you, Lloyd. And thank you, Lloyd, and thank you, Henry Waxman, for your continued leadership. Over 40 years, Henry has been the go-to person on many issues, whether it'd be health care, technology, energy environment. And in this particular effort, we are a band here of people who understand how important it is for us to really understand the effects of climate change.

I'm from California, and I think all of you know that we are experiencing a drought that we've never seen before, certainly not in our lifetimes. I'm from Sacramento, California, and we -- my district has two great rivers. I sit at the confluence of two great rivers. But even with that there is still not enough water. It hasn't rained. This has been a record year in the sense of a record that we don't like. We've had the lowest rainfall in Sacramento since the Gold Rush. That's a long time. It's a long time. And we're looking ahead trying to find some solutions here.

But if you also look at the fact that we have drought and we have fires, last year was also a dry year, with a record number of forest fires. We're on -- we're on now, on this -- on the -- (inaudible) -- even more this year. And that's not a record that we like.

I have grandchildren, and it's really amazing how much they know already. Anna (sp) is 10, Robbie (sp) is 7. They ask me all the time. They're studying the environment. They see what's happening. So here we are. Many of us have children and grandchildren. We are planning for the future, and we need to do that today. And our little band here will continue to work. We are getting more and more people involved.

And I would tell you it is happening from the ground up now, from the cities, neighborhoods, the states. They are all understanding because they know what is happening. So I am pleased to be involved in this safe climate caucus because we need to ensure that the future is there for our children and grandchildren.

And with that I would like to introduce to you Ben Ray Lujan, who is a wonderful member of the Energy and Commerce Committee and quite the shining light of the new members.

REPRESENTATIVE BEN RAY LUJAN (D-NM): Thank you, Doris. Thank you so very much.

Good morning, everyone. And first, let me say what a tremendous honor it's been to be able to work with Chairman Waxman. It's going to be fun working with Henry through the remainder of this Congress but also in making sure we continue to seek his advice and counsel with responsibilities that we all have. His distinguished record and service to our country on so many issues, especially when it comes to protecting our environment, is really an example to us all.

And as we expound the efforts of the safe climate caucus, I want to focus on one specific area. Doris talked about this quite a bit. Water. All across the West, severe droughts are impacting our communities. If you haven't been out there, we invite you to come out. When many of us think about drought, we think about food production generally with our farmers and our ranchers. But we're seeing tourism that's being impacted right now this winter with low snowfalls, where ski areas and communities that depend on this economic activity are feeling the pain.

This lack of snow is going to turn into a lack of snowmelt. It's funny our science works, isn't it? Many Western communities, it's essential for drinking water. And lower water flows are going to result in a concern with hydroelectric power generation meeting its obligations, especially for me in the Rocky Mountain West with our friends in Nevada and Arizona. We heard from Doris about the concerns in California. This is real. This is an economic impact that we have to pay attention to.

So our economy across the board is going to fill the impact of climate change as drought conditions continue to drip more and more and our country. No longer can our Republican colleagues look at this with their eyes shut. We know that the Earth is not flat, and we know that climate change is real. And I certainly hope that our Republican colleagues began to look at the literature and understand the importance that it's time to act.

So by being led by Ranking Member Waxman, we're going to turn up the volume on this. And you're going to be hearing from us, and we look forward to working with you in this area.

It's my honor now to introduce someone that I have looked up to, I have learned quite a bit from. He has been a leading progressive voice as well for the Congress, for the country and for working people across America, and that's our Progressive Caucus co-chairman, Representative Keith Ellison.

REPRESENTATIVE KEITH ELLISON (D-MN): Thanks, Ben Ray.

And then also let me add my voice to the many who thank Chairman Waxman. Chairman Waxman has been a hero to me, and thank you for pulling us all together today.

You know, climate change affects everybody on the planet and disrupts life systems all over the planet. But for some of our citizens, the bite is a little bit harder and disproportionate. And that's why I think we should use this 20th anniversary of the executive order on environmental justice that's coming up next week to really highlight how climate change affects vulnerable communities. This executive order called for a decrease in the disproportionate levels of pollution communities face and increase climate resiliency of low-income and minority communities.

Just a few stats to set the table, extreme weather events like Superstorm Sandy and Katrina destroy substandard housing and leave many communities with nowhere to turn; you see the catastrophic events and its effects on the newsreel. Sixty eight percent of African Americans live within 30 miles of a coal plant. African Americans, Hispanics, Asians are exposed to greater air toxin -- toxic concentrations than whites in many metropolitan areas of our -- around the United States. And heat waves increase the risk of heat island effects in our urban areas, disproportionately hitting low-income and even seniors in vulnerable populations.

Bottom line is, we've got to address this growing challenge of unsafe climate more than ever. The debate is over; the time for action is now, and that's why I'm proud to be a member of the Safe Climate Caucus and calling for action now.

Now, you know, I'm proud to introduce Scott Peters, who is a man of action himself, came to Congress to actually bring scientific understanding and knowledge to the way we live our lives and to the fight around a safe climate. I give you Scott Peters, California 53rd (sic: 52nd).

REPRESENTATIVE SCOTT PETERS (D-CA): Thank you, Keith. And again, thanks to Henry for all of your leadership over these many years, and I'm sure we'll all miss you, miss that. But we'll have -- at least do our part to fill the hole you're leaving us, so thank you.

Climate change is a top issue facing this generation. I practiced environmental law for about 15 years before I entered public service. And clearly, that's the -- that's the issue of the day in environmental law, as well. In San Diego, we face sea level rise, ocean acidification, more intense wildfires and obviously, drought, which is the big discussion point of this week.

I'm honored to have been selected to be the task force chair on climate for our sustainability caucus, honored to be a member of the Safe Climate Caucus, as well.

And I'm working on a few initiatives, one is to see if we can't reduce the effects of super pollutants, which are sort-lived climate pollutants, black carbon, methane and hydrochloric carbons, which have a very powerful short-term impact, but don't persist as long. If we can get those out of the mix, we can have a huge impact now. But I'm also not giving up on this Congress. I'm looking at ways where we can develop agreement even in a particularly partisan atmosphere.

Two examples, one is we've introduced a bill called the STRONG Act , which is going to help provide resiliency to communities on the ground for every dollar we spend on preparedness, we can save $4 on cleanup, and part of that's the FEMA budget.

And then also, we're looking for ways -- what Gabby Giffords used to work on in the Armed Services Committee, where I'm a member -- we're looking for ways to support the military's interest in investing in alternative energy, both the Navy and the Marines are interested in investing in biofuels as an alternative to jet fuel, and also with solar energy. I never met anyone who was a bigger fan of solar energy than the commandant of the Marines who makes great use of those technologies on the battlefield.

So we're looking forward to continuing those efforts. We'll -- you know, we'll fight where we need to; we'll try to agree where we can. But this is a critical issue and I want to thank Henry again for your leadership. Thanks for the group here, including me.

And now, I'm happy to introduce my freshman colleague from Ventura, California, who has led on this issue, not just here in Congress, but also in the history of serving in the California legislature, Julia Brownley.

REPRESENTATIVE JULIA BROWNLEY (D-CA): Good morning.

It is my privilege to be here this morning. I'm one of the newer members of the caucus and very excited about making a contribution to the caucus.

And I too, as all of my colleagues have done, want to really begin by thanking Congressman Waxman for his extraordinary leadership on climate change. His legacy of responsible environmental stewardship, including the Clean Air Act, will guide us certainly for many, many years to come. And Henry has been my congressman for a very, very long time, and I can speak for so many in California about their gratitude in his leadership.

Climate change is real, through, as already mentioned, wildfires, sea level rise, drought. Certainly in California, climate change impacts all of us, and it is certainly impacting my county, Ventura County. It threatens our economy, our food supply, our health and certainly our future, our children's future, our grandchildren's future.

Congress must -- must act to curb this growing threat to communities across our great country. And I look forward to working with my colleagues on the Safe Climate Caucus to protect our communities and preserve our land and waters for future generations.

And now it is my honor to introduce my colleague, my cohort from the freshman class from Wisconsin who has been an environmental crusader for much of his life way before he came to Congress. Wisconsin is grateful for his leadership, a great friend, Congressman Mark Pocan.

REPRESENTATIVE MARK POCAN (D-WI): Well, thank you very much, Julia.

And I want to add one final voice to the chorus to say thank you so much to Henry Waxman for your career. Hopefully what you see is a commitment of more people who want to pick up and try to take off and help on the voice that you've tried to have on climate for so long, and we're very committed to that.

I come from the state of Wisconsin. Senator Gaylord Nelson is from Wisconsin, who's the founder of Earth Day. It's not just for that tradition, but it's for our economy. And Wisconsin -- a big part of our economy is tourism, our wonderful green and open spaces that people come and visit. It is just absolutely crucial that we can make sure we're able to keep that economy going.

Climate change is very real, but so are climate change deniers. In fact, we work with a whole bunch of them. (Chuckles.) And scientists agree that our planet is warming, and it can cause serious harm across the globe. The effects of climate change are undeniable, and their consequences are unavoidable without action. And that requires action from Congress.

So I'm very proud to be a part of the Safe Climate Caucus, to make sure that I continue the work that we need to do to talk about the issue, to make sure that we're illustrating the problems of climate change, and eventually to make sure that we can actually pass laws that will improve not only the climate for this country but for the entire planet. And I'm just very proud to be a part of this caucus.

Thank you, Henry.

REP. WAXMAN: We're happy to entertain questions members of the press may have.

Yes.

Q: (Off mic) -- State Department -- (off mic) -- position that the administration has to reject that in order to properly address climate change and -- or is that almost kind of a distraction -- (off mic) --

REP. WAXMAN: I hope the president of the United States will say no to the Keystone pipeline agreement that the Canadians want us to go along with. They will triple the amount of tar sands oil, which will add enormously to our greenhouse gases and our climate change problem. It seems to me the argument that's being advanced is it's going to happen anyway because if we don't take that oil, it will still be developed and transported.

I don't believe that. And it's like the argument, we ought to sell somebody some very dangerous weapon because they're going to buy it anyway and therefore we ought to get the benefit from it.

We won't even get the benefit from the Keystone pipeline. It will allow the Canadian tar sands oil, the dirtiest possible oil, to be transported through the United States to the Gulf and then sent on to other places around the world, most likely China, for its commercial sale.

So I hope we will reject that pipeline, and it's up to Secretary Kerry and the president, who said that it's up to him, that he'll make the call.

Well, we're going to have to back him on a lot of calls that he's going to be making because, since Congress is not able to act on climate change at the moment, he is going to move forward with a whole agenda of actions through the EPA, the Department of Energy, Department of State, other governmental agencies to use existing law to reduce our greenhouse gases. And I think through that process, we could achieve the reductions the president committed to in the last international discussions.

But two things we need to do beyond that. One is not let the Keystone pipeline go forward because that's going to add to greenhouse gases. And secondly, the president is going to make decisions that will require approval by the Congress, but we are going to have to stand here in the Congress and back him up. And I think the American people will support his actions.

Yes.

Q: Congressman, following up on that, would you want this new initiative with the op-eds and YouTube videos and -- (off mic) -- to not mention Keystone, or will this group avoid the Keystone topic because some Democrats favor it?

REP. WAXMAN: This group is all about being able to speak up and talk truth to power. The power in the House right now is a Republican control that will not allow the Congress to do its usual mechanisms of hearings to get another point of view, which is the point of view of those of us who are concerned and the overwhelming scientific consensus concerned about what's happening with the climate change. So I wouldn't want this group to take the position that we're not going to let people during their presentations say anything one way or the other about another issue, especially one that is related to the climate change matter.

And this group that stands behind me -- (laughter) -- is going to be there to speak out.

Yes.

Q: (Off mic) -- climate change legislation -- (off mic) -- I was wondering what exactly you hope to achieve in the new strategy. And do you think you guys will -- (off mic)? And if not, you know, what -- how do you see -- (off mic)?

REP. WAXMAN: Yeah, I've been very careful in saying very precisely that Congress is not going to act at the present time. But the present time can be changed even with some of the present members, when the public pressure grows. The American people aren't going to buy this argument that if their Republican leaders say there's no such thing as climate change and if they're Republicans they should believe that position and deny science, which is not a political point of view but conclusions based on evidence. So I think the American people, as they see one climate disaster following another, with the nightly news dominated almost every single night by a climate issue disaster, that they're not going to wake up and say to their representatives, how can you deny this? How can you insist on ignoring what is going on? So I think the pressure on the -- on the Congress will grow as the -- as the public opinion starts demanding some action. And so I think the Congress will get to a point where we will start acting. But in the meantime, we have to rely on the president to do much of what we could do by law, in ways that I think would even be more conducive to educing the climate threats. But in the meantime, the president has authority to take a lot of actions on his own, and we need to support those actions.

Yes.

Q: (Off mic.)

REP. WAXMAN: I'm hopeful that there's going to be some movement on some things that we can do, and energy efficiency is one that looks like there's more of a consensus behind it. I don't think it's related to my announcement that I'm retiring. It's been moving along, and now in the Senate they're getting close and we've been talking in the House as well how to do at least the -- some improvement in energy efficiency.

But let me illustrate the problem we have with the fact that last week the Republican majority in the Energy and Commerce Committee reported out a bill to prevent EPA from being able to regulate climate pollutants, especially carbon emissions. They said that they're not going to allow, under the Clean Air Act, the actions by the EPA, because they're going to change the Clean Air Act itself. And what we said to the Republicans is, this bill denies climate change happening; it ignores its -- the problem by saying, there is no problem, or even those who might acknowledge a problem, they have absolutely no solution.

So we ask them: If you're going to keep EPA from regulating, and you're not going to be for a tax on carbon, you're not going to be for a cap-and-trade program, you're not going to be for any regulation, what is your answer? What do you have to offer to stop this threat?

And of course we have the deafening silence of the Republicans on this question.

So we -- we're not going to meet their silence by our silence and inaction. We'll do whatever we can to advance this issue.

And I can say one thing about my years in Congress. Time is on our side to change these policies, but we don't have a lot of time when it comes to the issue of climate change.

Last question, Mr. Potts (sp).

Q: Yeah. So one of nice things about a little bit more bipartisanship is there was a spending bill that was finally passed, but is there any sort of concern that with the revised appropriations process, that House Republicans might start taking whacks at EPA's spending that would decrease its ability to, you know, have oversight over these programs and regulations that it's trying to implement?

REP. WAXMAN: Well, the Republicans, especially the right- wingers, take the point of view that they don't want government, they want to shrink it, they want to eliminate it, and therefore they take the agencies that regulate to protect public health and safety and workers' protection, and they try to gut the laws, and if they can't gut the laws, they try to undercut the agencies' abilities to do things by defunding them or underfunding them, and then when something terrible happens, they say, see how government didn't respond to the problem?

That -- this is something we always have to watch out for and push back on. And we will -- we will certainly match them on that issue.

But the essential point is that I think more and more Republicans are going to look for ways to work with Democrats in order to get anything done. They haven't accomplished much of anything since they've been in power.

And we put out a report in the beginning of this Congress showing in our committee that the only proposals that became law were those proposals where we worked together on a bipartisan basis.

We're willing to work on a bipartisan basis on good policy, and we'll want to see movement for legislation that can be put into effect. But otherwise, we will fight back where they give ridiculous proposals like trying to stop regulation of coal-burning power plants, which is the leading source of greenhouse gases in our country.

Thank you all very much.

LUJAN STATEMENT ON SENATE REPUBLICANS ONCE AGAIN BLOCKING UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE EXTENSION

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 256 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after Senate Republicans once again voted to block action on a three-month extension of unemployment insurance. The Emergency Unemployment Compensation Extension Act, which is fully paid for and includes a provision to prohibit millionaires from receiving benefits, fell one vote short of the 60 votes needed to invoke cloture.

"For more than a month, long-term unemployed workers in New Mexico have been losing emergency unemployment insurance that has helped them make ends meet while they continue their search for work. More than 7,400 people across our state are worrying how they will get by if Congressional Republicans continue to stand in the way of an emergency extension.

"Time and again, Senate Republicans have blocked attempts to move forward with legislation that extends this important safety net, while Republicans in the House have refused to even act. Nearly 9,000 New Mexicans are still at risk of losing unemployment insurance over the next five months if Congressional Republicans continue to act as a roadblock to an extension.

"With nearly three job seekers for every job opening and our economy in New Mexico still struggling to recover, now is not the time to stand idly by. Extending unemployment insurance will help those hit hardest by the recession while generating economic activity that provides a boost to local businesses."

Luján cosponsors net neutrality bill

BYLINE: Gary Gerew

LENGTH: 188 words

Rep. Ben Ray Luján (D-03) is cosponsoring a House bill to prevent broadband providers from blocking or discriminating against content online.

The New Mexican Democrat is one of several representatives on the Energy and Commerce Committee backing H.R. 3982, the Open Internet Preservation Act. A companion bill is being drafted in the Senate and has the backing of Sen. Tom Udall.

"A free and open Internet has spawned countless innovations that have impacted our lives for the better and spurred economic growth," Luján said in a statement. "It is essential that we keep the innovative spirit alive by ensuring that we have a system that does not block access to content on the Web."

The legislation is a response to a decision by the D.C. Circuit Court last month to strike down the Federal Communications Commission's Open Internet Order. The bill restores these rules until the FCC takes new, final action in the Open Internet proceeding.

Candidates' primary bids official; Incumbents find out who they will be up against

BYLINE: James Monteleone Journal Staff Writer

SECTION: METRO & NEW MEXICO; Pg. C1

LENGTH: 526 words

SANTA FE - The field for New Mexico's 1st Congressional District race narrowed Tuesday as candidates for congressional and state offices filed paperwork to qualify for the June primary election ballot.

Former Albuquerque City Councilor Mike McEntee, a Republican who announced in October a bid for the central New Mexico U.S. House seat represented by Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., said he had withdrawn.

"The timing simply was not right, and I have no regrets," McEntee said.

McEntee's exit means the Republican nomination to challenge Lujan Grisham in the November general election will be decided between Corrales business owner Mike Frese and retired Army officer Richard Priem of Albuquerque.

Lujan Grisham, first elected in 2012, drew no Democratic primary opposition Tuesday.

Meanwhile, 3rd Congressional District Rep. Ben Ray Luján, seeking a fourth term, drew an unannounced primary election challenge from Bernalillo County Assistant District Attorney Robert Blanch of Albuquerque.

The winner of that race will go on to face Republican candidate Jefferson Byrd, a Tucumcari rancher who fell short in a 2012 bid for the seat against Luján.

In the race for governor, all five Democratic candidates who previously had announced plans to seek the party's nomination filed election paperwork to qualify for the primary elec- tion ballot.

The Democratic governor hopefuls are state Attorney General Gary King of Mori-arty, state Sen. Linda Lopez of Albuquerque, state Sen. Howie Morales of Silver City, longtime government administrator Lawrence Rael of Albuquerque and businessman Alan Webber of Santa Fe.

Republican Gov. Susana Martinez made her re-election bid official Tuesday. No Republican candidate filed to challenge her in the GOP primary.

However, Republicans are lining up for a primary fight for the U.S. Senate seat now held by Democratic Sen. Tom Udall. Albuquerque business owner Allen Weh and Las Cruces attorney David Clements filed for the GOP nomination to take on Udall. Udall did not draw a primary opponent.

In the southern New Mexico 2nd Congressional District, La Luz lawyer Leslie Endean-Singh and Carlsbad lawyer Roxanne "Rocky" Lara will seek the Democratic Party nomination to challenge Republican Rep. Steve Pearce, who filed to seek a sixth term.

Other candidates filing Tuesday included:

Attorney general: Democrat Hector Balderas of Albuquerque; Republicans James Baiamonte of Albuquerque and Susan Riedel of Las Cruces

Treasurer: Democrats Tim Eichenberg of Albuquerque, Patrick Padilla of Tijeras and John Wertheim of Albuquerque; Republican Rick Lopez of Santa Fe.

Secretary of state: Democrat Maggie Toulouse Oliver of Albuquerque; Republican incumbent Dianna Duran of Tularosa.

Auditor: Democrat Tim Keller of Albuquerque; Republican Robert Aragon of Albuquerque

Lt. governor: Democrats Debra Haaland of Albuquerque and Marie Julienne of Albuquerque; Republican incumbent John Sanchez of Albuquerque.

Land commissioner: Democratic incumbent Ray Powell of Los Ranchos de Albuquerque; Republican Aubrey Dunn of Capitan.

Appeals Court judge: Democrat Kerry Kiernan of Albuquerque; Republican incumbent Miles Hanisee of Albuquerque.

LUJAN ANNOUNCES FIRST ANNUAL CONGRESSIONAL APP COMPETITION FOR HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 342 words

Santa Fe, NM - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District announced details today for the first annual Congressional Science, Technology, Engineering, and Math (STEM) Academic Competition, "The House Student App Challenge." High school students from the Third District can compete by creating and exhibiting their software application, or "app," for mobile, tablet, or computer devices on a platform of their choice. The winning entry from each participating Congressional district will be displayed as part of an exhibit in the United States Capitol for one year.

"The House Student App Challenge gives students the opportunity to engage their creativity and spark an interest in the STEM education fields. Instead of just using the latest app or playing the latest video game, this contest challenges students to build it," Congressman Lujan said. "New Mexico has a rich history of innovation in technology and it is exciting to see the next generation of innovators build upon that legacy. I wish all of the contestants the best of luck and look forward to seeing their apps."

The "House Student App Challenge" is open to all high school students in New Mexico's Third Congressional District. Students entering the competition must submit their app's source code online during the Competition Submission Period, which is open until 11:59 PM Eastern Daylight Time on APRIL 30TH, 2014, as well as provide a YouTube or VIMEO video demo explaining their app and what they learned through this competition process.

Throughout the competition period, participating students will be provided opportunities to engage with various STEM educational partners located within the community to mentor and assist them with their app development. Additional details, including information on how students can register for the contest, is available at www.lujan.house.gov/blog/house-student-app-challenge.

LUJAN SIGNS ON TO NET NEUTRALITY LEGISLATION; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 324 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan announced today that he has signed on as a cosponsor to legislation to protect consumers and innovation online. Lujan joins Representatives Henry Waxman and Anna Eshoo, authors of legislation in the House, as well as a number of his colleagues on the Energy and Commerce Committee as a cosponsor of H.R. 3982, the Open Internet Preservation Act. A companion bill will be introduced in the Senate by Senator Ed Markey and includes the support of New Mexico Senator Tom Udall.

The legislation is a response to a decision by the D.C. Circuit Court last month to strike down the Federal Communications Commission's Open Internet Order that had prevented broadband providers from blocking or discriminating against content online. The bill restores these rules until the FCC takes new, final action in the Open Internet proceeding.

"A free and open Internet has spawned countless innovations that have impacted our lives for the better and spurred economic growth. It is essential that we keep the innovative spirit alive by ensuring that we have a system that does not block access to content on the web," Congressman Lujan said. "The decision by the D.C. Circuit Court threatens to undermine the freedom of the Internet by allowing restrictions that impede users' ability to harness the Internet's full potential. As the FCC works on replacement rules, this legislation will make it clear that the Internet will remain open for all users."

5 Democrats in race to unseat Martinez

SECTION: POLITICAL NEWS; STATE AND REGIONAL

LENGTH: 421 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

SANTA FE, N.M. (AP) - Five Democrats have officially entered the race to unseat Republican Gov. Susana Martinez.

New Mexico Attorney General Gary King, Santa Fe businessman Alan Weber, longtime government worker Lawrence Rael of Albuquerque and state Sens. Howie Morales of Silver City and Linda Lopez of Albuquerque Tuesday turned in the petitions and paperwork required to qualify for the Democratic Party's June primary ballot.

No one has filed to run against Martinez in the GOP primary.

But a lively Republican primary could be shaping up for U.S. Senate. Former New Mexico GOP Chairman Allen Weh and former Dona Ana County Republican Party Chairman David Clements are vying for the nomination to run against Democrat Tom Udall. It's Udall's first bid for re-election since winning the seat six years ago after the retirement of longtime Republican Sen. Pete Domenici.

State Auditor Hector Balderas was the only Democrat seeking to replace King as attorney general. Susan Riedel, a former deputy to Martinez when she was district attorney in Las Cruces, and Albuquerque lawyer James Baiamonte filed for the GOP ballot.

Two Albuquerque Democrats, Debra Haaland and Marie Julienne, are seeking the nomination to run against Lt. Gov. John Sanchez.

In Albuquerque's 1st Congressional District, two Republicans are vying to run against Democratic Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham -- Richard Priem and Michael Frese.

In southern New Mexico's 2nd Congressional District, Leslie Endean-Singh of La Luz and Carlsbad attorney Roxanne "Rocky" Lara filed for the Democratic nomination to run against incumbent Republican Rep. Steve Pearce.

One Democrat, Albuquerque Assistant District Attorney Robert Blanch, and a Republican rancher, Jefferson Byrd of Tucumcari, have set their sights on the 3rd Congressional District seat held by Democratic Rep. Ben Ray Lujan.

In other statewide offices, Capitan Republican attorney Aubrey Dunn filed to run against Democratic Land Commissioner Ray Powell; Albuquerque Democratic Sen. Tim Keller and Republican Robert Aragon are running for state auditor; and Bernalillo County Clerk Maggie Toulouse Oliver is running as a Democrat for secretary of state against Republican incumbent Dianna Duran.

Three Democrats have filed to run for state treasurer: Tim Eichenberg, Patrick Padilla and John Wertheim. Rick Lopez of Santa Fe was the only Republican candidate.

For the Court of Appeals, Miles Hanisee of Albuquerque was unopposed for the Republican nomination, and Kerry Kiernan of Albuquerque was the only Democrat.

NM delegation encouraged by GOP immigration reform proposal

BYLINE: Michael Coleman Journal Washington Bureau

SECTION: LEGISLATURE; Pg. A4

LENGTH: 545 words

WASHINGTON - Members of New Mexico's congressional delegation said they were encouraged by a proposal put forth by House Republican leaders this week to give illegal immigrants a chance to earn citizenship over the next decade.

The immigration reform "principles" unveiled Thursday at the House GOP's annual retreat on Maryland's Eastern Shore represent a significant breakthrough in the long-standing, failed congressional negotiations about how best to reform the nation's immigration laws. Democratic leaders in Washington, as well as rank-and-file Democratic delegates from New Mexico, voiced cautious optimism about the proposals.

"I'm hopeful that the House Republicans' (plan) means the door is open to a productive conversation, and that the House and Senate will be able to come together this year and pass an immigration bill that meets the real needs in our nation," said Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M.

Rep. Steve Pearce, the New Mexico delegation's only Republican, represents the state's sprawling border with Mexico. Pearce has long occupied a unique position on the immigration issue among members of the House GOP caucus. Like many Republicans, he opposes providing "amnesty" to people already in the country illegally. But Pearce advocates a greatly expanded guest worker program that would allow illegal immigrants a chance to become legitimate guests who could work in the U.S. as long as they pay taxes and return home occasionally.

"We are encouraged by the contents of these principles," Pearce spokesman Eric Layer said. "Immigration reform has long been a top priority and we are glad to see this moving forward. At the same time, Congressman Pearce's own views and positive proposals on how to best solve immigration issues - formed by years of communication with New Mexicans - are steady."

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., said she was glad the House Republican leadership "has finally outlined a set of immigration reform principles." She stressed that a so-called path to citizenship for the nation's estimated 11 million illegal immigrants is crucial to a bipartisan deal.

"As a nation of immigrants, citizenship has always been a key feature of who we are as Americans and it should be a key component of immigration reform," Lujan Grisham said. "It's time for House Republicans to side with a majority of the American people, in addition to countless business, faith and community leaders, and finally enact comprehensive immigration reform."

Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., called the proposals "an important first step."

"There are some important differences between Republicans' principles and the bipartisan bill in the House that reflects the Congressional Hispanic Caucus' priorities," Luján said. "But all parties need to work together and I look forward to working with my Republican colleagues to find a way forward."

Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., said he was "especially pleased" with the GOP's willingness to discuss citizenship for young people brought to the United States by illegal immigrant parents.

"New Mexicans are eager for a solution, DREAM Act students deserve a solution and our economy requires a solution," Heinrich said. "The Senate has taken action, and it's time for the House to do the same and pass accountable immigration reform."

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement tonight after President Obama delivered his State of the Union Address.

"Tonight, President Obama spoke of the great promise of America and the essential role that a vibrant middle class plays in enabling our nation to achieve its full potential. In declaring a time of action and signaling his determination to move our country forward, President Obama made it clear that the challenges facing our country and the American people can't wait.

"With New Mexico facing high levels of poverty, too many hungry children, and so many of our friends and neighbors looking for work, the delays and gridlock of the past must remain in the past. Last year was the least productive Congressional session of all time. We cannot afford to have a repeat of that this year. Rather than waste time trying to repeal the Affordable Care Act and hold the debt limit hostage, House Republicans need to work with President Obama so that we can find common ground and make progress on jobs and the economy - not govern from one manufactured crisis to the next.

"President Obama offered a number of important proposals that will build a stronger middle class and provide opportunities to hard-working Americans, from raising the minimum wage for federal contract workers to making college more affordable and accessible. These efforts are welcomed; however they are not a substitute for Congressional action. President Obama is taking action because Congress has failed to act. Congress must no longer turn a blind eye to the struggles of working people and the poor in America."

New Mexico Dems: Congressional Hispanic Caucus on the 5th Anniversary of the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 620 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

Yesterday, Congressional Hispanic Caucus (CHC) Chairman Ruben Hinojosa (TX-15) and CHC Members released the following statements on the fifth anniversary of the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act, a critical law championing the principle of equal pay for women.

"Women deserve to be paid fairly for the work they do. When we talk about women, these are our mothers, wives, sisters and daughters who are the backbone of our economy and who make up nearly half of our labor force. As a father, I want my daughters to earn more than the 77 cents women currently make. Women in our country deserve better and on this anniversary, let us stand up and help them succeed," said CHC Chairman Ruben Hinojosa (TX-15).

"Five years ago today, President Obama signed his first bill into law. With the stroke of a pen, he and the Democratic Congress that sent him the legislation sent a powerful message that we will fight for fairness in the workplace and an agenda that supports women and their families. We still have work to do to ensure equal pay for equal work, but we remain committed to this effort and will continue our call for fair and just treatment for all," said CHC First Vice Chair Ben Ray Lujan (NM-03).

"Five years ago today, President Obama signed into law the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act, critical legislation ensuring women can fight against pay discrimination in court. But with women making only 77 cents for every dollar men earn - and Hispanic women making even less - it's clear that we must do more to empower women in the workplace. That means passing the Paycheck Fairness Act. That means enhancing the Family and Medical Leave Act to include paid sick leave. And that means expanding access to child care for working families. At a time when women serve as the sole or co-breadwinner in two-thirds of American families, equal pay for equal work shouldn't be just a suggestion; it should be the law of the land," said CHC Whip Michelle Lujan Grisham (NM-01).

"There are turning points on the road to justice and equality in America. Passing the Lilly Ledbetter Act was a significant one. But passing legislation is only one part of the fight for equal pay and equal rights and we all have a responsibility to make sure the economic growth that enriches so many Americans is also lifting up the middle-class, the working-class, and our whole society, regardless of gender, orientation, or ethnicity," said CHC Immigration Task Force Chair Luis Gutierrez (IL-04).

"I was pleased to join Lilly Ledbetter, Leader Pelosi and colleagues at today's Steering and Policy Committee hearing on equal pay. As the President said in his State of the Union address, 'When women succeed, America succeeds.' The way to ensure women will succeed is by raising the minimum wage and guaranteeing equal pay for equal work. This is a particularly important issue for minority and immigrant women, who are paid even more disproportionately than white women," said CHC Health Task Force Chair Lucille Roybal-Allard (CA-40).

"The law that bears Lilly Ledbetter's name means my two daughters have the chance to compete in the workplace just like their brothers, receiving the same reward for the same job well done. We cannot be a nation which fails to pay the same wage, for the same quality of work, in the same job to a certain group of our citizens, based strictly on their gender. That is unacceptable for a nation based on equality, that prides itself on giving every American an equal opportunity," said CHC Financial Services, Manufacturing and Commerce Task Force Chair Tony Cardenas (CA-29).

NM delegates split on talk; Use of executive power an issue

BYLINE: Michael Coleman Journal Washington Bureau

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. A2

LENGTH: 510 words

WASHINGTON - New Mexico's congressional Democrats said they hoped Republicans would embrace some of President Obama's proposals to expand the middle class, while the delegation's lone Republican said he viewed the entire speech "with a jaded eye."

Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., said Tuesday night that Republicans and Democrats agree the middle class needs help. Deciding how to deliver it should not be so contentious, he said.

"What stood out to me was the emphasis on middle class families and what they need," he said of the State of the Union speech. "He really hit on some action areas we need to get done: Ensuring a fair minimum wage, helping workers train for and find jobs, making college affordable for all Americans and extending emergency unemployment insurance."

Udall a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said he backed Obama on opposing additional sanctions on Iran, at least until an interim six-month agreement is given time to work.

Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., said he was appalled by the president's insistence that he would use his executive powers to circumvent Republican opposition in Congress.

"My reaction is one of anger," Pearce said. "He's removing the voice of the people? No debate? He doesn't have the constitutional right to simply ignore the people in the House and the Senate. I found that extraordinarily offensive."

Asked if there was anything in the speech he could envision supporting, Pearce said he doubted Obama would operate in good faith on any issues.

"I looked at it with a jaded eye," he said. "I've heard it so many times."

Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., said he was encouraged by the president's vow to use an executive order to boost the minimum wage under new federal contracts to $10.10 an hour, from $7.25. "Those are the kinds of things that are well within his power as the president and will be embraced by the American people," Heinrich said.

Heinrich said he also backs the president's decision to step up use of executive decision-making.

"As long as it's within the context of what executive powers are, I think the American people expect him to not just sit around and wait for the Congress to send him bills," he said.

Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., said he was encouraged to hear Obama's call for more technology transfer, or moving government-funded research and development into the marketplace. Luján said New Mexico's nuclear laboratories and high-tech military installations are in prime positions to contribute.

"House Republicans need to work with President Obama so that we can find common ground and make progress on jobs and the economy, not govern from one crisis to the next," Luján said.

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., said she appreciated the president's comments about equality for women in the workplace. She noted two proposals that might attain rare bipartisan traction.

"He made a big push for immigration reform, and I really appreciate him mentioning infrastructure bills," she said. "I think we can get those things done and those are the kinds of things that spur economic growth."

LUJAN: FARM BILL INCLUDES IMPORTANT FUNDING FOR RURAL COMMUNITIES AND SUPPORT FOR ACEQUIAS; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 474 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District voted today in support of a new Farm Bill that makes reforms and extends programs for five years that support ranchers, farmers, and dairy producers. The Farm Bill conference report passed with bipartisan support by a vote of 251 to 166. The bill included provisions that Lujan has long supported and worked hard to see were included in the final version, including funding for an additional year of the Payment in Lieu of Taxes (PILT) program and language that enables Acequia and Community Ditch Associations to compete for federal funds.

"The Farm Bill has been years in the making, and finally passing this legislation is a big step forward that will help farmers, ranchers, and dairy producers in New Mexico - especially as many in our community face challenging drought conditions," Lujan said. "I am pleased this legislation includes a provision I worked on that will open up opportunities for Acequia and Community Ditch Associations to apply for federal funds. These funds can help farmers and ranchers tend to the health of the acequias that are essential to their livelihood and the culture of New Mexico."

During debate on the House Farm Bill last year, Lujan offered an amendment to enable Acequia Community Ditch Associations to apply for federal funds within the Environmental Quality Incentive Program (EQIP). The amendment, which was adopted by a voice vote, would remove burdensome roadblocks to improve conservation practices and manage scare water resources, thereby strengthening the acequias that provide irrigation for local farmers. Lujan's efforts, along with the support of the New Mexico delegation, helped secure language in the bill that is similar to the amendment and will allow Acequia and Community Ditch Associations to form partnerships and apply for federal grants through EQIP as well as a number of other federal programs.

Lujan did express strong disappointment with the level of funding for nutrition programs that was included in the bill. The legislation cuts $8 billion from the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP) by closing a loophole that impacts one-third of states, of which New Mexico is not one, but does not put the money back into the program.

"While these changes reform the food assistance program, I would have preferred that the savings were reinvested to support families that are struggling to put food on the table," Lujan added. "Even though the funding level in this bill far exceeds what House Republicans advocated for when they moved to slash $39 billion last year, we cannot abandon our efforts to combat hunger in our communities."

Diné Council Winter Session;
Naize focuses on energy accomplishments

BYLINE: Kathy Helms navajo1@gallupindependent.com, DINÉ BUREAU

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 1

LENGTH: 882 words

DATELINE: WINDOW ROCK

WINDOW ROCK - A five-minute break after Vice President Rex Lee Jim 's delivery of the State of the Nation address Monday resulted in the 22nd Navajo Nation Council losing quorum, heading off any potential discussion on the removal of Speaker Johnny Naize from his current position.

Naize was scheduled to deliver the "Speaker's Report," but submitted a written report instead, focusing on Council's accomplishments in the energy field, Fort Wingate land negotiations with the Zuni Tribe, health care and gaming, among other issues.

Naize's written speech did not mention the action to remove him as speaker, which is expected to come up Tuesday. Instead, he focused on Council's hard work in the face of challenges and reminded them of the tradition that binds them. His report concluded with him expressing his "sincere gratitude" for delegates' dedication and his suggestion that they get the rest they need and "take some time to enjoy life."

"Each one of us has made the choice to help our people with the resources available to us. ... My fellow colleagues, I am confident that with all that we have endured to this point, I can say we did it together and that moving forward, Diné people have a better future due to the actions of this Council."

Energy

Reflecting on 2013, Naize said energy continues to be a topic of great interest to the Navajo Nation government and people.

"The development of energy has had a tremendous impact to our economy, livelihood and basic governmental functions," he said. "The 22nd Navajo Nation Council has faced many challenges in its tenure thus far and no greater challenges than those concerning the continuation of our energy resources, which entails the tax revenue, royalties, and jobs associated with them.

"We can hold our heads high with the knowledge that we have increased our Nation's resources and secured employment for hundreds of Diné people with the many actions we have taken on their behalf," he stated.

NTEC

The Dec. 30 closing on Navajo Transitional Energy Co.'s purchase of BHP Billi-ton's Navajo Mine, the coal supply agreement with Arizona Public Service Co., and APS' decision to move forward with its purchase of Units 4 and 5 of the Four Corners Power Plant represented the culmination of years of hard work, late hours, long weekends and tedious negotiations, Naize said.

"The 22nd Navajo Nation Council and each of its standing committees have put forth a tremendous effort in responding to the difficult deadlines forced on us by this tedious negotiation process," he stated. "All the early morning meetings, work sessions, committee and Council meetings have paid off and we can finally say that the Navajo Nation owns and controls our largest natural resource."

Fort Wingate

Negotiations with the Zuni Tribe on dividing lands at the Fort Wingate Military Depot were near completion as of July, but a few months later, members of Iyanbito and Churchrock chapters expressed concern with the outcome of the negotiations, Naize said.

Delegate Edmund Yazzie wanted to ensure that his communities were heard as the negotiated land division is brought to conclusion, so a letter was sent to U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján Jr., D-N. M., requesting that he visit the impacted chapters to provide information. Naize said they remain hopeful that Lujan will meet with community members.

In the meantime, on Jan. 8, Luján and Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N. M., co-sponsored the bill H.R. 3822, the Fort Wingate Land Division Act of 2014, which seeks to divide the land according to what was negotiated July 8 in Washington. The bill has been assigned to the Committee on Natural Resources but has not been heard yet.

Health Care

Naize said he is continuing to monitor and help in whatever way he can to improve the overall health care system on the Navajo Nation. Recently, Delegate Dwight Witherspoon introduced a resolution to create a Navajo Department of Health. During a Jan. 3 work session in Flagstaff, Delegate Leonard Tsosie recommended they create a task force to address concerns within the proposed legislation.

In response, Naize said he initiated draft legislation to create the "Department of Health Creation Task Force" to review the bill and develop it to the best interest of Navajo. Naize said he asked Tsosie to sponsor the task force resolution to address the concerns with Witherspoon's resolution and expects the task force to remain in effect until Spring Session.

Other issues

Naize recapped the work that has been done on the Navajo Nation's proposed gaming compact with New Mexico, and also said he is in the process of creating a cooperative agreement for conducting the Cobell Land Buy-Back Program on Navajo.

Naize stated he is continuing to work on the creation of the Veterans Act and has offered his recommendations for improving the document through dialogue with the Navajo Department of Veteran Affairs.

Additionally, Naize said he is having his staff monitor and develop meetings with the Arizona Governor's Office concerning a compact to receive capital expense funding for Navajo Technical University.

Finally, the Human Rights Commission has been working with Council to advocate for the United States to acknowledge the rights of Indigenous peoples. Another trip to Switzerland is planned for March, Naize stated.

Luján: Problems for the unemployed worsening

BYLINE: Gary Gerew

LENGTH: 282 words

Rep. Ben Ray Luján (D-03) said that a new report shows nearly 72,000 people are losing unemployment insurance every week because Congress has failed to approve an extension for those benefits.

Luján said The analysis by House Ways and Means Committee Democrats found that more than 1.6 million Americans, including 7,492 New Mexicans have lost coverage since the end of December.

"It was disappointing that once again Republicans recessed the House without addressing expiring unemployment insurance that is leaving families in New Mexico out in the cold," Luján said in a statement. "I hope that a week at home talking to their constituents - hearing the stories of people who want to work and provide for their families but are struggling in an economy that has yet to fully recover - will move Republicans to action when the House returns."

Economists have found unemployment benefits to be one of the most effective job creation strategies available during a period of high joblessness, Luján said. The Congressional Budget Office has estimated that extending unemployment insurance for another year would save 200,000 jobs.

"Opposition to an extension of these benefits ignores the fact that in the current economic climate there are nearly three job seekers for every job opening," Luján added. "Last year, in what was the least productive session of all time, House Republicans failed to offer an agenda to create jobs, and now they want to deny vital assistance to our friends and neighbors who are struggling to find work."

LUJAN HIGHLIGHTS $3.7 MILLION AIMED AT TURNING AROUND LOWEST PERFORMING SCHOOLS IN NEW MEXICO; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 273 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District highlighted today that New Mexico has been selected to receive funding under the U.S. Department of Education's School Improvement Grant (SIG) Program. A grant of $3,754,213 will help in the effort to turn around persistently low achieving schools in the state.

"There is no better investment we can make in our young New Mexicans than providing them with a good education. We have the responsibility to ensure that our children have proper support and attend high quality schools," Congressman Lujan said. "Unfortunately, recent studies about the well-being of our children show that New Mexico ranks at the bottom or near the bottom in a number of categories. Turning around the lowest achieving schools in our communities represents an important step forward in the effort to provide our children with a brighter future. This grant will help these schools better support their students with the goal of giving every child the opportunity to succeed through education."

The SIG program awards grants to state educational agencies that award subgrants to school districts demonstrating the greatest need for the funds as well as the strongest commitment to providing adequate resources to substantially raise student achievement in their lowest-performing schools. New Mexico is one of seven states receiving these grants, along with Colorado, Indian, Kansas, Massachusetts, Utah, and Washington.

New Mexico Dems: Congressman Ben Ray Lujan: More than 1.6 Million Americans Have Lost Unemployment Insurance Including 7,400 in New Mexico

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 386 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District highlighted a new report on how many Americans have seen their unemployment insurance run out since December 28 of last year. The analysis by House Ways and Means Committee Democrats found that more than 1.6 million Americans, including 7,492 New Mexicans have lost these important benefits. Without Congressional action, on average, nearly 72,000 people are losing unemployment insurance every week.

"It was disappointing that once again Republicans recessed the House without addressing expiring unemployment insurance that is leaving families in New Mexico out in the cold," Congressman Lujan said. "I hope that a week at home talking to their constituents - hearing the stories of people who want to work and provide for their families but are struggling in an economy that has yet to fully recover - will move Republicans to action when the House returns next week."

House Republicans have blocked multiple efforts by House Democrats to bring legislation to the floor that would extend unemployment insurance that supports families during a time of need and supports small businesses that feel the impact when families have to cut back on basic necessities. In the Senate, Republicans have also voted to block action on an extension, including a proposal to scale back the program substantially and offset the costs.

With every dollar of unemployment compensation spent creating $1.52 in additional economic activity, economists have found unemployment benefits to be one of the most effective job creation strategies available during a period of high joblessness. The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office has estimated that extending unemployment insurance for another year would save 200,000 jobs.

"Opposition to an extension of these benefits ignores the fact that in the current economic climate there are nearly three job seekers for every job opening," Lujan added. "Last year, in what was the least productive session of all time, House Republicans failed to offer an agenda to create jobs, and now they want to deny vital assistance to our friends and neighbors who are struggling to find work."

LUJAN HONORS THE LIFE AND LEGACY OF DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 331 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today celebrating the life and legacy of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Lujan will honor Dr. King at a community event in Santa Fe today.

"Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr had purpose. Dr. King understood purpose. In sermons and speeches, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. spoke of a "Beloved Community' - a community that was founded on love, respect, and hope. A community that rejected darkness and discrimination, hate and racism, poverty and hunger.

"He reminded us that, "darkness cannot drive out darkness, only light can do that.' And he believed that we could achieve this great "Dream,' this attainable "Dream' - but only if we - brother and sister, friend and foe - would come together in common purpose to shine that bright light and cast out this evil darkness.

"Upon accepting the Nobel Peace Prize, Dr. King said, "I have the audacity to believe that peoples everywhere can have three meals a day for their bodies, education and culture of their minds, and dignity, equality, and freedom for their spirits.'

"Dr. King had the courage to stand up for his convictions, to shine the light of truth on the harsh injustices of his time, and to call upon our better angels to build a community and a country that allowed all its people - regardless of race, gender, or creed - to achieve their full potential.

"He told us, "our lives begin to end the day we become silent about things that matter.' Let us heed his call with the courage to stand up for our convictions. Let us not be silent any longer. We must join together - brother and sister, friend and foe - with a common purpose and shine a bright light on the injustices plaguing our society.

"Let Dr. King's example and enduring legacy inspire and drive us to action, and may we draw strength from his unwavering commitment to his dream of a beloved community."

AG Wins Injunction Against Valley Meat

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 299 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Attorney General issued the following news release:

State District Court Judge Matthew Wilson today granted Attorney General Gary King's motion for a preliminary injunction against Valley Meat Company, preventing the opening of a proposed horse slaughterhouse until the AG's lawsuit is resolved.

"The judge's decision allows our lawsuit to continue while preventing the immediate killing of horses for human consumption," says AG King. "I still strongly believe that Valley Meat's proposal for commercial horse slaughter posed a serious danger to consumers and to our environment."

With the close scrutiny of horse slaughter that the Attorney General's lawsuit has prompted, the U.S. Congress has approved, and the President has signed, an appropriations bill that restores the long-standing prohibition on funding for federal inspection of horse slaughterhouses - which effectively bans commercial horse slaughter nationwide.

Attorney General King is especially grateful to U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham, and Congressman Ben Ray Lujan, for their supportive efforts to de-fund the federal inspections.

Numerous other individuals and groups have helped accomplish this important result, particularly Front Range Equine Rescue, which first discovered Valley Meat's plans to get into the horse meat business and has worked tirelessly ever since to stop those operations, and Animal Protection of New Mexico, which has led the fight for equine protection in our state.

New Mexico Dem: Congressman Ben Ray Lujan Calls on Speaker Boehner to Keep the House in Session Until Unemployment is Extended

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 593 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District joined with 113 of his Democratic colleagues today on a letter calling on House Speaker John Boehner and Majority Leader Eric Cantor to keep the House in session until an extension of unemployment insurance is passed. At a time when more than 6,700 New Mexicans and 1.3 million Americans have seen their unemployment insurance run out, the House is scheduled to recess for a district work period next week.

"The American people expect their elected representatives to work until the job is done. Unfortunately, Republicans leaders of the House have no agenda to get people back to work or address the expiration of unemployment insurance for thousands of our friends and neighbors in New Mexico," Congressman Lujan said. "Rather than closing down the House next week, Republican leaders should stay in Washington and do the job the American people sent us here to do. As long as families are living with the stress of worrying what they are going to do when they are still unable to find a job and unemployment insurance is cut off, the House should remain in session and work on a solution that extends the safety net during this difficult economic time."

In addition to the 6,700 New Mexicans who have already lost unemployment insurance, 9,000 more individuals across the state will lose federal unemployment benefits over the next six months without Congressional action.

Below is the text of the letter:

Dear Speaker Boehner and Leader Cantor,

On December 28, 1.3 million Americans immediately lost all of their unemployment insurance when the Emergency Unemployment Compensation program expired. While this number grows higher with every week of Congressional inaction, the House of Representatives is scheduled to recess for district work period today for 10 days. This is unacceptable. Another 100,000 Americans will lose their benefits during this break while the families who lost their benefits right after Christmas will continue struggling to put food on the table, heat their homes, and pay their bills weeks after they lost this lifeline.

The Emergency Unemployment Compensation program is an investment with a proven economic return, and it is the right thing to do for American families. Every dollar spent on unemployment benefits generates $1.55 or more in economic activity. These benefits have also keep hundreds of thousands of American children out of poverty.

In the almost three weeks since the December 28 deadline, over 200,000 more Americans have exhausted their state benefits and are now unable to receive assistance under the expired federal program. The number grows higher every day. Approximately 72,000 Americans will lose their unemployment benefits every week - the equivalent of one person every 8 seconds.

There are legitimate policy discussions to be had about exactly how we should extend federal unemployment insurance, but we cannot find common ground when the House of Representatives is not in session and when this legislation is not even being considered in the House. The clock is ticking. This is why we urge you to cancel the pending district work period and keep the House of Representatives in session until both the House and Senate have sent legislation to the President to extend emergency federal unemployment benefits. Thank you for your consideration and we stand ready to work with you on this critical issue.

NM representatives not happy with budget bill

BYLINE: Gary Gerew

LENGTH: 396 words

The House members from New Mexico said they weren't pleased with provisions in the federal appropriations bill, but took different directions when it came to voting.

The bill was passed 359-67 by the House Thursday and is expected to receive a vote in the Senate this week.

Rep. Ben Ray Luján (D-3) voted for the bill, even though it didn't include some items he supported.

"This bill represents a compromise that on the whole will benefit New Mexico. While there are certainly aspects of it that I do not support, the funding bill addresses a number of priorities that are important to the people of New Mexico and our economy," Luján said in a statement. "I am, however disappointed, that funding for the Payment in Lieu of Taxes (PILT) program was not included, and as work on the Farm Bill continues, I encourage conference negotiators to include PILT funding in that bill."

Rep. Steve Pearce (R-2) voted against the bill and also cited the PILT funding as a reason for his decision.

"Today's vote was a difficult one," Pearce said in a statement. "While today's legislation includes increased funding for many key New Mexico projects and resolved some issues with last month's budget agreement, it also slashes vital funding that New Mexico counties rely on, and it keeps the nation on a dangerous path of debt and insolvency. We must not sacrifice the long-term health of the nation for temporary gains."

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-1) also voted for the bill, although she didn't like everything in it.

"Today, the House of Representatives took a monumental step forward by passing bipartisan legislation to fund the government through the end of the fiscal year. It ensures that we avoid another disastrous government shutdown, rolls back some of sequestration's harmful cuts and provides greater certainty for New Mexico families and businesses," Lujan Grisham said in a statement. "Still, this bill falls incredibly short, especially in terms of addressing the challenges facing middle class families and vulnerable populations. It is completely unacceptable that this legislation fails to extend emergency unemployment insurance for nearly 7,000 New Mexico jobseekers who are struggling to make ends meet."

VOTES FOR GOVERNMENT FUNDING PACKAGE THAT ROLLS BACK SEQUESTER CUTS

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 336 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District voted today for the omnibus appropriations bill that funds the government for fiscal year 2014. As a result of the budget deal that was passed in December, the appropriations bill rolls back the sequester cuts that have negatively impacted New Mexico.

"For too long Congress has had to legislate from one crisis to the next as House Republicans shutdown the government and used the appropriations process to make extreme demands," Congressman Lujan said. "With this legislation, we can move forward and address other critical issues facing our country. In addition, this measure takes significant steps to roll back the devastating sequester cuts that have harmed New Mexico and prevent a new round of even deeper cuts."

The Consolidated Appropriations Act is comprised of the 12 appropriations bills that fund all aspects of the federal government.

"This bill represents a compromise that on the whole will benefit New Mexico. While there are certainly aspects of it that I do not support, the funding bill addresses a number of priorities that are important to the people of New Mexico and our economy," Lujan added. "It provides vital funds for environmental cleanup at Los Alamos National Laboratory - going beyond the President's budget request. It also restores substantial funding for education that was cut through the sequester, including the full restoration of Head Start funding that will enable more children in New Mexico to access this important program. In addition, it repeals a cut to the cost-of-living adjustment for disabled military retirees and survivors and provides funding to address the backlog of veterans claims through the VA. I am, however disappointed, that funding for the Payment in Lieu of Taxes (PILT) program was not included, and as work on the Farm Bill continues, I encourage conference negotiators to include PILT funding in that bill."

LUJAN CALLS ON SPEAKER BOEHNER TO KEEP THE HOUSE IN SESSION UNTIL UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE IS EXTENDED

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 826 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District joined with 113 of his Democratic colleagues today on a letter calling on House Speaker John Boehner and Majority Leader Eric Cantor to keep the House in session until an extension of unemployment insurance is passed. At a time when more than 6,700 New Mexicans and 1.3 million Americans have seen their unemployment insurance run out, the House is scheduled to recess for a district work period next week.

"The American people expect their elected representatives to work until the job is done. Unfortunately, Republicans leaders of the House have no agenda to get people back to work or address the expiration of unemployment insurance for thousands of our friends and neighbors in New Mexico," Congressman Lujan said. "Rather than closing down the House next week, Republican leaders should stay in Washington and do the job the American people sent us here to do. As long as families are living with the stress of worrying what they are going to do when they are still unable to find a job and unemployment insurance is cut off, the House should remain in session and work on a solution that extends the safety net during this difficult economic time."

In addition to the 6,700 New Mexicans who have already lost unemployment insurance, 9,000 more individuals across the state will lose federal unemployment benefits over the next six months without Congressional action.

Below is the text of the letter:

January 16, 2014

Dear Speaker Boehner and Leader Cantor,

On December 28, 1.3 million Americans immediately lost all of their unemployment insurance when the Emergency Unemployment Compensation program expired. While this number grows higher with every week of Congressional inaction, the House of Representatives is scheduled to recess for district work period today for 10 days. This is unacceptable. Another 100,000 Americans will lose their benefits during this break while the families who lost their benefits right after Christmas will continue struggling to put food on the table, heat their homes, and pay their bills weeks after they lost this lifeline.

The Emergency Unemployment Compensation program is an investment with a proven economic return, and it is the right thing to do for American families. Every dollar spent on unemployment benefits generates $1.55 or more in economic activity. These benefits have also keep hundreds of thousands of American children out of poverty.

In the almost three weeks since the December 28 deadline, over 200,000 more Americans have exhausted their state benefits and are now unable to receive assistance under the expired federal program. The number grows higher every day. Approximately 72,000 Americans will lose their unemployment benefits every week - the equivalent of one person every 8 seconds.

There are legitimate policy discussions to be had about exactly how we should extend federal unemployment insurance, but we cannot find common ground when the House of Representatives is not in session and when this legislation is not even being considered in the House. The clock is ticking. This is why we urge you to cancel the pending district work period and keep the House of Representatives in session until both the House and Senate have sent legislation to the President to extend emergency federal unemployment benefits. Thank you for your consideration and we stand ready to work with you on this critical issue.

Sincerely,

Gary Peters

New Mexico Dems: New Mexico's Congressional Democrats Announce Federal Drought Assistance Available for Farmers and Ranchers

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 721 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

New Mexico's Democratic Congressional delegation, U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, Congressman Ben Ray Lujan, and Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham have announced that 27 counties in New Mexico will qualify for emergency loan assistance from the Farm Service Agency (FSA) due to losses caused by the ongoing drought. A full list of counties is included below.

The designation makes producers, farmers and ranchers in these counties eligible for Farm Service Agency (FSA) emergency loans, provided eligibility requirements are met. Funds are available for up to a maximum of $500,000 and may be used to restore or replace essential property; pay all or part of production costs associated with the disaster year; pay essential family living expenses; reorganize the farming operation; and refinance certain debts.

The counties were declared by the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) as "primary natural disaster areas" after suffering from droughts of severe, extreme and exceptional intensity during the growing season for eight or more consecutive weeks; or as "contiguous counties" because of they were nearby and considered to face similar circumstances.

"New Mexico farmers and ranchers continue to face great challenges due to the prolonged drought and I am glad the USDA continues to recognize the need for federal disaster assistance in our affected counties," Udall said. "We need to do all we can to support farm operators, especially in rural communities, who continue to be devastated by consecutive years of drought. Assistance like the FSA's emergency loan program is one important way we can do this. As a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, I'm proud to fight for the emergency assistance for farmers and ranchers, along with many other resources for our agricultural community."

"Farmers and ranchers help drive the economy and have shaped our state's history, as many growers in New Mexico come from families that have cultivated land for generations," Heinrich said. "These disaster declarations are a good first step to ensure they receive the necessary federal resources they need to recover from last year's natural disasters."

"Severe drought conditions across New Mexico are leaving farmers and ranchers throughout the state struggling, impacting their livelihoods as well as our economy," Lujan said. "The disaster declaration by the Secretary of Agriculture will make important resources available to help farmers make ends meet during this difficult time. It is also vital that Congress completes work on a new farm bill that takes steps to help farmers and ranchers better endure severe drought conditions."

"As years of severe drought continue to inflict harm on New Mexico's farmers and ranchers as well as our economy, it is important that we employ every tool possible to support those who are struggling due to factors completely outside of their control," Lujan Grisham said. "This federal disaster declaration will allow our state's farm operators to get the assistance they need. As a member of the House Agriculture Committee, I will continue working to pass a farm bill that includes crucial programs to support farmers and ranchers suffering from drought and natural disasters."

Through the FSA emergency loan program, farm operators can borrow up to 100 percent of actual production or physical losses. To qualify, they must have suffered at least a 30 percent loss in crop production or a physical loss to livestock, livestock products, real estate or chattel property.

Farm operators have eight months following the date of the disaster declaration to apply and are encouraged to do so through their local Farm Service Agency office. For a list of offices by county in New Mexico, click here or call 505-761-4900

"Agriculture is a vital part of New Mexico's economy, and this year's drought has imposed enormous hardships on our farmers and ranchers," Pearce said. "Today's announcement was the right decision, and will provide much-needed relief. I look forward to continuing to work closely with farmers and ranchers across southern New Mexico to make sure that they receive the support and resources they need."

TEXT:

WALDEN: I'll call to order the Subcommittee on Communications and Technology, and thank our witnesses for being here for this first of what will be many hearings as we look to update the Communications Act.

Few sectors of our economy are equal to the communications and technology sector when it comes to innovation, investment in the American economy, and job creation. In these tough economic times, we as policy-makers should be committed to fostering this critical sector of the economy.

Yet the laws that regulate the industry are outdated at best, and some are affirmatively damaging. This is why Chairman Upton and I, along with members of this Subcommittee, have decided to undertake the difficult task of updating the Communications Act of 1934.

In the eight decades since its passage, Congresses have come and gone. Some have even made substantial, though targeted, changes to the law. But none have undertaken to rethink the act for the environment of convergence and innovation in which we live today.

It's time for our laws to reflect our modern technological landscape, one grounded in the networks and services of our past, and driven by our IP and mobile future.

Just yesterday, the D.C. Circuit issued its decision in the net neutrality case, striking down the rules ordered by the Federal Communications Commission. I for one was pleased to see the court remove the government from the business of making management judgments and give providers the freedom to make decisions that are pro- competitive and pro-consumer.

While this decision benefits consumers and providers alike by keeping the Internet free from government interference, the rationale highlights the ongoing confusion regarding regulation of different services.

This is yet another example of why it's vital that we take a hard look at the laws in this space and reconcile them with the realities of technology. The answer is not to subject new technology to outdated regulations, but rather to craft laws appropriate to innovative services and platforms.

As we embark on this effort, it should come as no surprise that I'm focused on ensuring that we engage in a transparent and collaborative process, not only (ph) with our colleagues here in the Congress, but also with the many stakeholders outside of these halls.

What we want is a dialogue. Last week, the Committee released the first of what will be a series of white papers seeking input from the public. And I hope that interested parties will take the opportunity to make their voices heard to us.

Today's witnesses provide a unique and valuable perspective on the Communications Act.

As Chairman of the agency tasked with carrying out Congress's will and implementing the Act, the four witnesses today have had a front row seat to witness the Act in the real world, to see where it works and where it doesn't. These Chairmen have varied experiences and viewpoints that in many ways represent the evolution of modern communications.

When Chairman Wiley led the agency, telephone service was a government-regulated monopoly. Consumers got their news from broadcast television and print newspapers and the Internet was still years away.

Sixteen years later, when Reed Hundt took the reins, the Internet was coming into full force and mobility was beginning to take off. Chairman Powell's tenure saw the convergence of services towards the bundled offerings we see today, as well as the deployment of broadband to Americans.

And in the four years since Michael Copps served as Acting Chairman, there have been dramatic changes to the way we communicate and the technology that powers our lives. For example, the title of today's hearing contains a hashtag. Twitter, then with no vowels in its name, had yet to be discovered by -- at South by Southwest.

Neither we nor the august panel before us can predict the future and what technological changes it will bring. But by learning the lessons of the past, we can do our best to create a legal and regulatory environment that will foster innovation and competition, encourage consumer choice and optimum services.

So again, I want to thank you for -- to our witnesses for this impressive panel. We look forward to hearing your testimony and we appreciate your public service.

With that, I would yield to the Vice-Chair of the Subcommittee, Mr. Latta, for any opening comments he may have.

LATTA: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and thank you very much to our panel of distinguished witnesses for testifying before us today. I appreciate you all being here.

Since 1966, we have witnessed an unprecedented technological evolution in the communications industry. The rapid emergence of new and innovative technologies has fostered increased investment throughout the industry, and the development of a vibrant, competitive communications marketplace.

As we move into the future, it's important to examine the Communications Act to ensure that our public policy continues to encourage this kind of growth and innovation that is essential to fueling our economy.

Reforms to current law should reflect the technology we enjoy today and be able to adapt to the technology of tomorrow without further government intervention.

Our efforts should be dedicated to ensure that the laws governing the communications marketplace do not stifle current and future investment, innovation, economic growth, and consumer choice in this dynamic and converging digital age of communications.

I look forward to the testimony from our witnesses today. And again, Mr. Chairman, I thank you very much for holding this hearing.

WALDEN: Thank the gentleman for his comments.

Now I turn to the gentlelady from California, Ms. Eshoo, the Ranking Member of the Subcommittee, for her opening comments.

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and good morning to you, to all of the members, and the warmest welcome to each of the witnesses that are at the table.

Your combined public service is -- really stands as a hallmark of devoted service to our country, but also to move the country forward in one of its most important economic sectors. So welcome to you. It's wonderful to see all of you at the same time at the table.

With news of the court's net neutrality decision, today's hearing, I think, is a timely opportunity to hear from each one of you who have led the expert agency, the FCC, and combined, it represents over four decades of service. That is nothing short of extraordinary.

ESHOO: And each of you have had a hand in really I think changing our nation's communication and technology landscape. So not only kudos to you, thank you to you, but a recognition of what each one of you accomplished.

When Congress passed the Telecommunications Act of 1996, it was my second term in Congress, my first term on the committee, and there were just 11 references to the Internet -- the word "Internet" -- and only one mention of broadband across a 128-page bill.

Many proponents of updating the act have cited this as evidence that the act is outdated and unable to keep up with changes in technology.

But as Chairman Wheeler affirmed last week, the Communications Act continues to provide the FCC with ample authority to exercise its role in this new environment.

The court's decision yesterday I believe furthers this argument by upholding the FCC's existing authority to oversee broadband services. And I think that's very important for consumers across the country.

I make these points not to discourage the subcommittee's review of the act. I joined with the -- with the chairman to review this. I think that it's a worthy exercise.

But rather, we need to ensure that we know what problems we're trying to fix before undertaking a multi-year examination that include hearings, stakeholder meetings, white papers and the such.

Since the '96 act was enacted, hundreds of new entrants have emerged and more than $1.2 trillion has been invested by U.S. telecommunications companies.

I want this success story to be an unending one. And I think that is the goal of everyone on this wonderful subcommittee.

So, to that end, my goal throughout the subcommittee's review will be to see more competition, greater consumer choice and more innovation.

I am so proud, as the chairman was making his opening remarks, that so much of this has been born in my congressional district.

And so, innovation, innovation, innovation; and these goals were embedded in the '96 act and they remain just as important today.

At the same time, our process of examining the Communications Act should not derail, in my view, a more immediate update of our video laws -- a view shared by a majority of the witnesses at a September subcommittee hearing.

Recurring TV blackouts coupled with the rising cost of broadcast television programming with limited choice has left consumers frustrated and looking to Congress and the FCC for answers. I believe that working together at a bipartisan basis, we can make this happen in 2014.

So, Chairman Walden, thank you for holding today's hearing on the Communications Act. I welcome the review and I look forward to hearing the unique insights from the top experts from our country who have given so much in terms of their leadership in leading the expert agency.

And with that, 34 seconds to yield to Congressman Matsui.

MATSUI: Thank you, Ranking Member.

And I want to welcome all the former chairmen. We welcome you here for your ideas and experience that provide a basis for discussions moving forward.

As technology evolves, I believe it's important that we consider appropriate updates to the Communications Act that -- with goals that promote competition and innovation in the marketplace.

To that point, I am pleased that yesterday the D.C. Circuit affirmed the FCC's authority to oversee broadband services. In my opinion, that was the crux of the debate and the FCC's argument prevailed on the question of authority over broadband.

The FCC will need to exert its authority to ensure now that all Americans have access to a free and open Internet -- a competitive marketplace where checks and balances will fare (ph) well (ph) for all Americans.

I look forward to the hearing today and I yield back the balance of my time.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back the balance of her time.

The chair now recognizes the distinguished member from Michigan, the chairman of the full committee, Mr. Upton for opening comments.

UPTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Last month, you and I announced our plans for a comprehensive update to the Communications Act of 1934.

The changes in technology since the last update in '96 have been dramatic and existing laws have failed to keep pace with the vibrant and dynamic telecommunication industry.

Communications and technology sectors have consistently been areas of American leadership, innovative -- innovation and job creation, certainly. But the Communications Act is showing its age and our continued international leadership is, indeed, at stake.

Yesterday's net neutrality decision, while a victory for consumers in the economy, illustrates the uncertainty flowing from the current statutory and scheme and the need for this action.

It's time to revamp these laws to reflect the new competitive landscape in changing consumer expectations.

And as we begin the open process leading to a Comm Act update, we are looking for input -- yes, we are -- from all of the stakeholders in the communications and technology world. Where better to start than with our distinguished panel of former leaders of the FCC?

These leaders served during diverse times in the evolution of the communications sector and they've seen the market operate under the strong hand of the U.S. government and the challenges within divorcing the government from its heavy regulation of the communications sector from times before.

They've seen cable grow from its days as a struggling start-up. They've seen satellite services succeed in bringing competition to the video market and fail to find -- find success as a competitor to mobile phone service.

And they've seen the Internet grow from a DOD project to a tool for research universities and now as the commercial economic force that we know today.

Throughout the many nuanced iterations of the Communications Act, today's witnesses have firsthand seen the act at its finest and also when its inability to keep pace with technological innovation has impacted those vital economic issues.

So, I want to thank the witnesses for taking their time to share their experiences with us. We value, indeed, their expertise and welcome their thoughts on how we can ensure the Communications Act fosters our communications and technology sectors well into this century.

And I yield the balance of my time to Vice Chair...

BLACKBURN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And if I had my iPhone in my hand, I would hit "retweet" for everything that he has just said.

(LAUGHTER)

We do appreciate that you all are here. We do want to take advantage of the perspective that you have had.

Think about what has happened in the past 17 years since '96 and the changes that we have seen, not only in how we communicate but the rapidity of those communications and entertainment and how we access that -- how we take it with us, how we consume it.

So, we know that the pace of change means that we have to be very judicious and careful as we look at a rewrite.

We know that there are issues that are going to come on the plate that we're going to have to discuss also as we look at not only the Telecom rewrite but at the use of the virtual space -- privacy, data security; the way the virtual marketplace is used and the way our constituents want to have a toolbox to protect, as I call it, their virtual U (ph) online.

So, we appreciate your time -- your willingness to be with us this morning.

And I yield back to the chairman of the committee.

UPTON: Yield -- yield back. Or (ph)...

WALDEN: Did the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Barton, want to use some of that time?

BARTON: (OFF-MIKE) Yes (ph), if it's available.

WALDEN: It is.

BARTON: (OFF-MIKE) Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I've served on this committee since 1986. I've served with three of the four former chairmen -- Mr. Wylie preceded me.

We've had some agreements, we've had some disagreements. So, it's good to have all four of you gentlemen here today.

When I was chairman of the full committee, back in 1996, my committee introduced a bill we called the COPE Bill -- the -- the Communication Opportunity Promotion Enhancement Act of 2006.

It dealt with national franchising, net neutrality, public educational and governmental access, e-911 and what we now call VOIP. It passed this committee 42 to 12 and passed the House 321 to 101 but it didn't come up for a vote in the Senate.

I voted for the Telecommunications Act of '96 and the Cable Act of '92 and I hope this year to get to vote for another major bill that comes from the leadership of Mr. Upton, Mr. Walden, Mr. Waxman and Miss Eshoo.

This is a good thing to be doing and we're going to get some good information from you gentlemen and we appreciate you being here.

WALDEN: The gentleman's time's expired. I appreciate his comments.

We'll now go to the former chairman of the committee, Mr. Waxman, for opening comments.

WAXMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate your convening this morning's hearing and launching the subcommittee's examination of potential updates to the Communications Act.

And I want to thank our distinguished panel for being here to help us think through these ideas. And I think I've been in Congress during the time that all of you have been the heads of the FCC.

Technology has changed at a blistering pace since the enactment of the 1996 Telecommunications Act 18 years ago. The communications and technology industries are a thriving sector of our economy.

As broadband plays an increasingly central role in the daily life of our nation, having a strong Federal Communications Commission to oversee its successful growth is more critical than ever.

Yesterday, the D.C. Court affirmed what never should have been in question: the FCC is the expert agency, charged by Congress to oversee broadband networks. In doing so, the court reaffirmed that the FCC has broad, flexible authority to regulate in the broadband and digital age. However, while the court recognized the FCC's jurisdiction, it also overturned the specific rules the commission had adopted in the open Internet order.

I believe the FCC now has an opportunity, as well as a duty, to exercise the authority the court recognized yesterday, and reinstate the no-blocking and non-discrimination rules.

An open Internet is critical to the continuing growth of this economic sector. The Internet is a vibrant platform for commerce, innovation, and free speech. Having enforceable, open Internet rules of the road means that consumers are in control of their experience online.

I am pleased that Chairman Walden has stated his intention to expeditiously adopt a new set of rules following the court's guidance. And I look forward to working with the chairman and my colleagues in Congress to make sure these pro-consumer, pro-competition policies will continue to guide the expansion of broadband services.

This subcommittee is now embarking on a journey to update the Communications Act. And regardless of the advancements in network architecture or transmission protocol, the principles of competition and consumer protection remain as sound today as they were in 1934.

I know Chairman Walden recognizes the importance of these values and the action of the FCC that it (ph) plans to take later this month to initiate technology transitions reflects that.

I look forward to hearing from our witnesses about what Congress can do to help the FCC meet the challenges of the broadband and digital age.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I want to yield the balance of my time to Mr. Doyle.

DOYLE: Thank you, Mr. Waxman.

Mr. Chairman, thank you for holding this hearing. And thank you to this distinguished panel. It's good to see all of you here in front of the committee.

I just want to briefly concur with Mr. Waxman in light of yesterday's decision by the D.C. Circuit, that I want to encourage Chairman Walden to work quickly to ensure that the Internet remains an open platform for innovation, competition and economic growth, which the FCC now clearly has the authority to do.

I look forward to working with the commission and the stakeholders to put in place a robust framework that sustains an open Internet.

Mr. Waxman, I thank you for your courtesy, and I would yield back to you if someone else needs more time.

WAXMAN: Would (ph) -- would (ph) -- (inaudible) a minute.

If not, I yield back, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back the balance of his time.

We'll proceed now to our distinguished panel of witnesses, and begin with Chairman Richard Wiley, who was nominated by President Nixon, and served as chairman of the Federal Communications Commission from 1970 to 1977.

As chairman for most of the '70s, Chairman Wiley's tenure at the commission predates many of the major changes in the communications sector.

Chairman, we're glad to have you here today. Pull that microphone up close, and (inaudible) to go. Thank you for being here.

You need to push the button on the microphone there one time.

WILEY: Thank you very much, Chairman Walden, Ranking Member Eshoo, and other subcommittee members. Thank you for the invitation to testify today.

While I know it's not going to be self-evident, due to my youthful appearance, I've been involved for nearly 45 years in federal telecommunications policy. And from my own standpoint, what has occurred during that period is simply amazing.

When I was at the FCC in the 1970s, the average American enjoyed just three broadcast television stations, and one local and long- distance telephone provider. And the Department of Defense had just begun to explore a revolutionary computer project known as ARPANET.

But today, our citizens have access to hundreds of video channels delivered by countless providers and transmission technologies, dozens of voice and tech services, numerous wire line and wireless companies. And, of course, ARPANET have morphed into the Internet, which has become a universal medium of communications.

Interestingly, the bulk of this stunning technological metamorphosis has emerged since the 1996 Telecommunications Act was passed. That legislation significantly altered the rules governing virtually every aspect of communications. And the act's purpose was a simple in theory as it was complex in implementation. That is, to provide for a pro-competitive, deregulatory national policy framework designed to accelerate the deployment of advanced services and open all telecom markets to competition.

To this end, the statute sought to eliminate cross-platform barriers and to encourage competition among service suppliers previously treated as monopolies or oligopolies.

Now, to the credit of the drafters, the 1996 Act helped to bring about the vibrant competition that consumers enjoy today in a variety of communication sectors, be it voice, data, or video. Whether delivered by twisted pair, co-axial cable, optical fiber, or the electromagnetic spectrum, myriad providers today are offering their customers suites of advanced services in a marketplace that really could not have been imagined 18 years ago.

In my view, where (ph) the statute, and, indeed, FCC implementation has succeeded is when a lighter regulatory touch has been applied to markets, such as mobile and information services. The result has been that these sectors have thrived. For example, in the robustly competitive wireless marketplace, there are now more wireless subscriber connections than the population of the United States. Just think of that.

And mobile broadband has spawned an entirely new industry, mobile aps -- one that is estimated to employ more than 500,000 developers and related jobs, and contributes billions to the economy.

A similar success story is unfolding the delivery of digital content, where seemingly unlimited video-streaming web sites have developed to compete against traditional MVPDs, offering an eagerly waiting public new ways to consume video.

This marketplace, I would suggest, is emerging because of innovation and competition, and not because of government regulation.

Conversely, where the government has been less effective in maintaining -- is in maintaining highly restrictive regulations on traditional industries, like, for example, wireline telephony and broadcasting. The end result has been to disadvantage these sectors, even though they may be providing services that are often equivalent to those offered by their less regulated competitors.

In the developing I.P.-centric world, all types of providers should be able to market all kinds of services, employing the same computer-oriented language that defines digital communications.

And yet, the 1996 act continues to regulate commutations markets differently based on the conduit used to reach the customer, as well as the geographic location where traffic originates and terminates.

Now, the underlying problem is not a failure of congressional or FCC vision. Instead, the reality is that a government has great difficulty in writing laws or promulgating regulations that can keep pace with advancing technology. And especially so in a dynamic and ever-changing industry like communications.

Thus, I would suggest that the objective of a statutory rewrite should not be to legislate premised on the current state of the marketplace, or even on predictions of what it may look like in the future. Instead, Congress may want to consider a flexible and technologically neutral framework that will be capable of adapting to technical invention and innovation, whatever that may prove to be.

In this regard, let me close by setting forth a few principles that might guide the drafting of a new statute.

First, the industry silos embedded in (ph) the 1996 act should be abolished. And instead, functionally equivalent services should be treated in the same manner regardless of who provides them, or how they are delivered to consumers.

Second, the traditional dichotomy between interstate and intrastate services should be eliminated, because regulatory classifications based on geographical end points no longer make sense in an I.P. environment.

Third, legislation should be focused on maintaining consumer protection and public safety regulations. Conversely, economic regulations should be considered in the case of non-competitive markets or in the event of demonstrated market failure.

And fourth, new regulations should be instituted with a lighter touch, as I said, accompanied by sunset provisions so that the rationale for continued government intervention can be reviewed on a regular basis.

Thank you once again for the opportunity to testify.

WALDEN: Chairman Wiley, thank you very much for your learned comments, we appreciate your counsel. We'll go now to Chairman Reed Hundt, who was nominated by President Clinton and served as chairman of the FCC from 1993 to 1997. Chairman Hunt's tenure at the commission saw the passage of the ominous budget reconciliation of '93, which granted the commission the authority to auction spectrum licenses, and the Telecommunications Act of '96, so Chairman Hundt, thanks for joining us today, we're looking forward to your comments as well.

HUNDT: Thank you Chairman Walden, thank you for inviting me. A good, good morning to Ranking Member Eshoo and to all the other members of this distinguished committee. I'm very proud that many of you have become lifelong friends and it's a pleasure to be here with you.

I also want to thank the D.C. Circuit for giving me a flashback to law school so that I was late last night scrambling to read the key case right before this class.

I have a feeling I'm not the only person here who -- who did that but I also want to note I didn't have any staff for classmates, so I apologize if I haven't read it correctly, but I thought that I would throw away my remarks and for whatever it's worth, offer you my reading of -- of the case.

In my view the D.C. Circuit has written first a very, very well- reasoned and very important case. There's no question that this reflects that circuit's experience in these topic areas and that they brought that experience to bear in a bipartisan way to express a view about how the United States ought to grant the authority to create the legal culture that governs broadband.

What have they said, I believe the court has vindicated the wisdom of Congress in the 1996 act. Specifically, the court has said that when Congress, in that act, in Section 706, conveyed to its expert agency, the, quote, "authority to enact measures encouraging the deployment of broadband infrastructure" unquote.

In doing that, according to the D.C. Circuit, Congress said to the FCC, "You will be our instrument for creating a flexible and a -- a supple legal culture that will change over time as the market changes and as technology changes.

But they can always be used to protect competition, to protect consumers, and fundamentally, to make sure that absolutely everybody in America is participating in the common medium of the internet, and that absolutely everybody in America is able to use it to publish their views and review all the views of everyone else."

Not all those words are in this decision, but almost all those words are actually in this decision. Section 1706 of course is just one part of the 1996 act but I know I don't have to remind many of the members here -- maybe I don't have to remind any of the members here -- that was passed by a very large bipartisan vote in the Senate and in the House.

We all were -- those of us who were in public service then -- remember being in the Library of Congress when President Clinton, the Democratic President passed this law that was passed by a Senate controlled by the Republicans and a House controlled by the Republicans. And all came together and said, "We have a common vision".

And that is that there will be networks we did not know, technically speaking, what they would all look like, but there would be networks that would connect all of us to each other and to all of the resources of information that in fact would be utilized for entrepreneurship, for innovation, and for learning.

And I have to say, this is what's happened. Now, no one here thinks the government built these networks. No one thinks the FCC built these networks. But everyone should know that the legal culture that was created by Congress and its expert agency, through the terms of Republican and Democratic chairs, the legal culture is the legal culture that is regarded all around the world as the absolute best legal culture for governing the internet.

Any one of us knows 12 things that we think should be done differently, or maybe two dozen, but we ought to recognize just for a little while, that we as a country should pat our government on the back and say for the last 20 years, the legal culture that's been created that has governed the internet has really created the best possible environment for innovation, for entrepreneurship, for consumers.

That's what's actually happened, and this court has said, "And that law still exists". This court has said, "Already, Congress has enacted the law that gives the FCC the authority to protect competition and consumers".

And that authority, according to this court, lies in Section 1706, and the court also said that Congress can -- that the FCC can if it choose classify broadband as a common carrier. It could use either of these methods, it can use one of these methods, but it can accomplish the goals that are stated in the act and that have repeatedly been restated by this Congress.

The only thing the court said is, "If you're going to pass rules that look like common carrier rules and you're going to classify broadband as an information service, then you're going to be creating a contradiction that we won't permit".

You can't call it an information service and then pass rules that look like common carrier rules because if it quacks like a duck it's a duck.

So, that's why it was sent back. I read a lot of articles that said that this was a victory for Verizon. This is a victory for Congress. If it was a victory for Verizon, it was a Pyrrhic victory. It was the most perfect example of a Pyrrhic victory since Pyrrhus.

(LAUGHTER)

So I just wanna compliment this Congress on passing a supple law that has worked well, and that this court has just said still will permit you to achieve your goals through the expert agency.

Thank you.

WALDEN: Thank you Chairman Hundt. We appreciate your comments and your staying up all night to cram for our hearing.

(LAUGHTER)

Now turn to Chairman Michael Powell, who was nominated by George W. Bush and served as Chairman of the FCC from 2001 to 2005. During Mr. Powell's chairmanship, they saw a significant increase in the deployment of broadband to American homes as well as convergence of services toward the development of broadband -- toward the bundles of services that are common today, among many other things.

Chairman Powell, thank you for joining us today and please go ahead.

POWELL: Thank you Mr. Chairman, and as a former chairman, I'm happy to be sitting around with a bunch of these other chairmen offering as best we can our historic perspectives on how to prudently go about rewriting the act, should that be your intention.

And I'm pleased to be with Ranking Member Eshoo again and all the distinguished members of the committee.

I think it goes without saying, and all of us will say it in different ways, that the world has changed quite radically from 20 years ago in terms of markets and services, but don't ask us, ask your kids. Ask them to name three broadcast networks, if you will, ask them to do without the internet for a week, and for God's sakes, ask them to put their phone down at dinner and see what reaction you get. I think you will be convinced.

That transformation has taken place largely because of an enormous revolution in network architecture, in the form of the internet, which has unleashed a form of inter modal competition that heretofore wasn't really possible.

And it's really introduced an exciting world, and we should remember, gave birth to a host of companies and opportunities that never were envisioned before. The companies that are here, Google, Facebook, Amazon, Ebay, Twitter, Instagram -- you name it -- all able to be born and flourished because of this transformation.

I would say that any consideration of the act should start with not only cataloguing its ills, but cataloguing its successes, much as Reed was alluding to.

I think it's really important to note that over this period, we have seen the most stunning amount of investment in infrastructure and architecture, that we have ever seen.

We have reached 90 percent of Americans faster than any other technology in world history. Innovation and growth have continued at exponential rates, with broadband increasing over 19 times just in the last decade, doubling basically, increasing about 58 percent annually.

That's a stunning achievement and something we should make sure we keep going.

I -- so I think, you know, being guided by the old maxim of "Do no harm" is an important cautionary tale. As I thought about how you might think about architecting a new regime, I'm guided by the idea of the internet itself, which is the fundamental principle of simplicity as a design principle.

It has been a very, very powerful one in the internet and I think it -- it offers some guidance in this space as well. So I'd like to, toward that end, offer -- I'm gonna see Mr. Wiley's four principles and do him three better and offer you seven, as briefly as I can.

The first is, we've heard a lot about innovation. I do think the principal goal of the government should be to nurture that innovation. This is the kind of fomenting change we have never been able to harness as fully as we are today. Innovation has allowed us to bring completely new products and services and network changes to the market.

It's created a form of creative destruction that keeps the market energetic and keeps monopoly in check. And I think it's created new kinds of transparency for the American consumer through crowd sourcing and visibility. And we should study the conditions that go in to innovation and make sure we harness them. I think three are critical.

Innovations really do require freer markets. And a market that moves at Moore's law speed, the pace of adaptation transformation and change are incredibly fast. And there needs to be a constant and intense dialogue between producers and consumers. We should be careful to protect that.

Innovation requires risk taking. As we know, most new ventures fail. There has to be room in government policy for failure. There has to be room in government policy for encouraging taking those risks. And innovation requires investing more than a trillion as Congressman Eshoo was talking about earlier since 1996, is stunning. But it requires a stable regulatory environment to provide that uncertainty because if investment slows innovation will slow with it.

The second rule of simplicity, I think, is once you've created a lighter regulatory environment, by trying to pursue the maxim of less is more, organize it better.

We certainly have heard about the challenges of silos and buckets. Clearly that had its place in another time when these technologies, applications and typed of companies were deeply intertwined, were not able to provide alternative services and other spaces. That day has moved on and we certainly crave a more unified, integrated kind of legal regime that doesn't make those sorts of distinctions.

In fact, as I heard mentioned today I think yesterday's court decision and the multiyear debate on net neutrality that illustrates the almost tortuous challenges sometimes of addressing a modern circumstance in using provisions of last century's rules. I think they're certainly widespread agreement on core principles around an open internet.

Yet the somewhat kludgy path we've had to follow in an effort to implement them has made the matter, I believe, infinitely more complex and controversial than necessary and the threat of radically upending the long-standing light regulatory foundation of broadband on which massive investment and growth have been built with good effect to implement one set of rules seems distressing. Any shift of that magnitude I do think would require Congress' -- the people's representatives to weigh in on.

A third principle give regulators the ability and obligation to address changing markets. As we've said the markets move drastically and the FCC often has limited ability to make those migrations. Yes, in places they have. There are other instances in which they've not been able to even when they concede that the fundamental circumstances are changed.

Fourth, the law should ensure competitive parity and technical neutrality. There is a hodgepodge of applications of statutes I could point out in which certain rules apply to one sector of a service and not to other sectors. This has really just been an outgrowth of the passage of years and the changing nature of companies. But there are many rules that apply to cable for example that don't apply to dbs for no discernible reason.

One very valuable thing the committee can do is prune through the statute to harmonize those differentiated treatments as best as possible.

Fifth, the FCC should police markets not create them. I think this is generally well understood but there is a role for a cop on the beat. What I don't think there should be is a master chef who believes it's the commission's objective to make markets or create the conditions and circumstances for them.

And finally, the last two, timeliness. If you're working in Moore's law you need timely and prompt decisions from the government.

Lastly and most importantly, the law still needs to preserve important societal values, and protect consumers from harm. And the FCC and the government will always have a sacred responsibility in that regard. Thank you for your time.

WALDEN: Chairman, thank you. Speaking of cops on the beat, we'll now go to Michael Copps, served as acting chairman of the federal communications commission from January to June 2009, and served as commissioner from 2001 to 2011.

Prior to joining the commission, Commissioner Copps worked right here on Capitol Hill, and the U.S. Department of Commerce. Commissioner Copps, Chairman Copps, thank you for being with us. And we look forward to your comments to round out our panel.

COPPS: Thank you Chairman Walden, Chairman Upton, Miss Eshoo and Mr. Waxman, Vice Chairman, Former Chairman, all the members of the committee, I'm delighted to be here.

We're here today to review whether the Communications Act needs to be updated or otherwise reformed. I've heard some say that simply because the act is old it must be obsolete. That no matter how well it has served us an act written 18 years ago cannot have relevance in today's altered world.

As someone only a little younger than the original act of 1934, I would raise a caution flag or two. The Declaration of Independence and the Constitution were written long ago, too, yet we still find them critically relevant in our lives. While it is praiseworthy to ponder changes to the law, I would suggest firstly that the framework of the current statute remains in many ways strong.

And secondly, that the current act's provisions can still do much to improve our communications landscape. To enlarge economic and social opportunity for all of us, and to nourish the kind of civic dialogue upon which successful self-government inevitably rests.

In an ideal world most of us would welcome an up-to-the minute rewrite of the law to reflect how we believe it could be improved.

The last such revision in 1996 was born of a unique political moment that aligned a sufficient and sundry number of stake holders across sectors and constituencies who were able to negotiate a compromise statute that while far from perfect at least envisioned delivering to every American no matter who they are, where they live, or their particular circumstances of their individual lives, the most advanced communications technologies and services feasible at reasonable and comparable prices, replete with consumer protections, rights of privacy, assurances of public safety and utilizing competition to help achieve these goals.

Putting the statute to work to deliver these benefits was my mission at the FCC, working with some of the most amazing public servants anywhere.

Nowadays, I carry out my public interest mission in the nonprofit sector at Common Cause. In the immediate wake of the new law's passage, the commission indeed made important strides to carry out these congressional mandates.

But alas things changed.

Some of the very interests who helped negotiate the new Communications Act spent more time undermining the statute than implementing it. Such efforts continue to this day as we saw in yesterday's court decision that left unaddressed would seriously jeopardize the future of the open internet.

I appeared in front of this panel many times over the years to voice my dissent on commission decisions involving the reclassification of communications services, industry consolidation across both our telecom and media sectors, the elimination of policies that had long safeguarded the public interest, and the heavy toll thereby exacted on consumer choices, consumer prices and slowing the deployment of competitive low-cost, high-speed broadband, this century's most important infrastructure.

We can, I know, debate for hours but a record of these hearings needs to show that many people do not share the easy optimism that others express about the state of America's communications readiness.

As you consider legislation in the coming months, some will tell you that America is a veritable broadband wonderland, a triumph of free market entrepreneurship that puts us at the front of high tech nations. But there are stubborn facts we must never avoid. The United States originator of so much of the technology behind the internet has fallen from leader to lagger in broadband penetration.

According to OCED, our country is 16th in wired broadband connections per 100 residents. Worse, comparative research shows Americans are paying more an getting less than wired broadband consumers in competitor countries. The Department of Justice has noted the local wireless marketplace offers consumers little in the way of choice, even as mobile data plans are saddled with data caps that harm consumption and innovation alike and once again for the third time the FCC found itself unable to certify that we enjoy a competitive wireless marketplace.

Surely the time is now for pro-active and pro-consumer measures to make quality broadband universally affordable once and for all.

While we are not gathered here this morning to rehash those decisions, I do think it is important to understand that many of the faults attributed to the current statute are more the result of powerful industry efforts to undermine it and of commission decisions that too often aid and abet the effort.

So while we open discussions on revising communications law, let us recognize that our present statute has been interpreted and implemented in ways not originally intended, and that many of us constituent parts are still relevant, workable and consumer friendly. There is a statute to enforce and putting that job on hold while we consider changing it is not a good option.

Additionally, I think most of us here this morning understand that finding a new correlation of interests that can come together to forge the Communications Act of 2015 or 2020 will be even more challenging than the jockeying that gave birth to the current law.

As the world races ahead, we have a duty to make the best possible use of the laws we have in order to achieve the ongoing goals that Congress laid out. These remain powerful interests, a statute that invokes the public interest over 100 times, that highlights the universality of service, competition and consumer protection and that underlines the necessity for media and informs communities and engages citizens cannot be all bad.

Would I have some preferences for a reworked statute?

Of course, although a good part of it would be making sure the commission and the industry follow through on what is already on the books to foster competition and consumer protection, to deliver on public safety, to preserve privacy in this age of massive intrusion, to avoid never-ending industry consolidation, to put the brakes on gatekeeping in our media, both traditional and new, and to provide the FCC with the resources it needs to discharge its responsibilities.

My greatest disappointment at the commission is that we didn't do enough to encourage media that truly reflects the diversity of our people.

Can you believe that today there is no African-American owned full power commercial television station anywhere in the land?

America is diversity. And if our media fails to represent diversity, diversity of providers and content and viewpoint and ownership, it fails us.

The sad plight of communications across our native lands needs to be addressed with renewed urgency and additional resources.

Imagine that there are still areas where the majority of First Americans cannot access even plain old telephone service, let alone the kind of high-speed broadband that is the most powerful tool they could have to create opportunity where there is so little opportunity now.

I would hope we could find ways to stimulate basic communications research by private-public partnerships. I'm not talking about the next glitzy app but the basic fundamental research that will determine who wins and loses in the global sweepstakes.

I'm for making the commission more efficient, like doing away with the closed meeting rule that prevents more than two commissioners from even talking to one another.

And I hope that reform needs to go forward, whether or not it is accompanied by more far-reaching revisions.

And I believe that when three commissioners have something they want to do at the FCC, that item should go on the agenda.

My list could go on and I welcome the opportunity to discuss such things today. But I always come back to democracy because that's what concerns me most.

Our country is in trouble, reminiscent in many ways of the severity of the economic, global and social crises it faced in the 1930s, and there are no guaranteed happy outcomes.

I just do not see how citizens can be expected to navigate through all these issues and come out with smart decisions for our nation's future when the telecommunications tools we need are not available to all and in the media environment where community outlets have been short-circuited, investigative journalism hangs by a thread and wherein we expect some invisible hand to produce those things that the market itself no longer produces and which, in fact, the market alone has never produced.

Communications are vital to our economy, but they are the lifeblood, the lifeblood of our democracy. They must be available to all, open to all, never the exclusive province of the affluent or the few, always alive to the common good.

We shouldn't see our communications world as part telecom, part media or part traditional media, part new media. We have one communications ecosystem and our job is to make it work for everyone.

And I know of no greater challenge that confronts the Congress, the commission or the country.

Thank you for holding this hearing today and for inviting me to be a part of it. And I look forward to our discussion.

WALDEN: Chairman Copps, thank you for your thoughtful presentation. We appreciate it. And as you know, our subcommittee has moved forward on some of these initiatives and we welcome encouragement over on the other side of the building on the Sunshine Act and a few other things.

So would like to open up the questioning process now with a question of Chairman Powell.

Since you presided over the federal communications proceedings that classified cable and telco delivered broadband services as information services, do you think we would have seen the same level of broadband investment during the past decade had the FCC classified these services as common carrier communications services?

POWELL: I think in short my judgment is no. I think the Internet, if, at the time that that classification decision was made, was more unknown than known. I think it was a period of rampant experimentation.

I think the capital required to drive and produce the broadband networks that were not in place, needed conditions that allowed them the flexibility to make those choices without the risk that they would be put back into kind of the monopoly era regulatory models.

So I think it was an important component to spurring that investment.

WALDEN: Chairman Wiley, does the Federal Communications Commission need to continue to have broad discretion over mergers and acquisitions, or should the Department of Justice anti-trust review be enough?

WILEY: I think there has been duplication from time to time although I would point out that the Justice Department is looking at anti-trust aspects and the FCC has got a broader public interest standpoint.

I think the two agencies need to work together and I think they have worked together through the years.

So I think the process is appropriately developing. But I do worry sometimes that we see great delays in the handling of these consolidations and mergers, which I think is contrary to the best interest of the coverage involved and also contrary, I think, to the public interest and consumers.

WALDEN: And to both Chairman Powell and Chairman Wiley, can the FCC ever really future-proof regulations, given how rapidly technology is changing, and are there elements that the Communications Act holding the commission back from flexibly addressing new technologies?

POWELL: No, I don't think any agency can future-proof the regulatory involvement no more than Congress could write a statute that wouldn't, over time, fray in its relevancy in a market that's driven by technological change.

I do believe, though, that there are tools to give greater flexibility and not more prescriptive constraints that we have seen in some regulatory vehicles. So, no, they can't future predict.

And then I thought -- I think the other guidance is, I think asking the commission to engage in anything that requires predictive judgment about future outcomes should be avoided where possible.

WILEY: Yes. And that's why I suggested in my prepared testimony that we ought to have an opportunity to have a light touch here and have the government have a -- in your statute have a very flexible, technology neutral type of approach to this, because it's very hard to predict.

And the 1996 drafters did not really foresee the development of the Internet to become a universal medium and I don't think they predicted broadband to be what it is today. So I think you have to step back a little bit and I think allow the technology to develop and to allow innovation and invention to occur without stifling it.

WALDEN: OK. I'm going to start with Chairman Powell and then each of you can take this one in the minute and a half I have left.

Should the Internet be regulated as a common carrier under Title II?

POWELL: Well, for me that's easy. No.

I think one of the things I'd like to say about that, though, is that people should fully understand what that means.

Even if that were able to give you a better basis for recovering these two components of the rules, it would be the instant application of thousands of pages of decades-old regulations instantly to the Internet, where they heretofore have not been, both through -- on a bipartisan basis, we've had a much more light (ph) regulatory environments.

To shatter the investment-backed expectations that would result, I think, would be exceedingly damaging and more than most people realize.

WALDEN: Chairman Hundt, do you care to comment on that?

HUNDT: Just two points: the 1996 act was shorter than the rules for Little League Baseball, meaning Congress does not necessarily have to write thousands of pages and, in its wisdom, it did not do so in 1996. And that act now has given the FCC the ability to achieve the fundamental goals.

As I mentioned earlier, it can choose to use the specific methods that are dictated by the common carrier treatment. But it absolutely does not have to use very many of these methods to accomplish its goals.

In fact, the court, on page 61, outlined its view of what the FCC should do and said you could treat it as common carrier and have about 30 words that establish the principles. I'm not saying they should do that. I'm saying they can do that.

WALDEN: Do you think they should?

HUNDT: I think what they should do -- and I hesitate to say to the current chairman what he ought to do, but since you asked -- I think they ought to take a fresh look at all the facts in law as exists right now. And they also ought to be down here, listening to you all in having a robust discussion. But the key point is, they have authority.

WALDEN: Got it.

Real quickly, the two remaining, because I've gone over my time. Wiley (INAUDIBLE) --

(CROSSTALK)

WILEY: I think -- OK.

WALDEN: No, go ahead.

WILEY: All right.

I think it would be a big mistake to turn away from -- in the information service pathway that we've started and go back to common carrier regulations, however that might be defined.

I think we want to provide an environment where there is, I think, opportunities for investment and encouraging innovation, allowing businessmen to try to experiment and try to find ways to serve the customer.

And I think to go back to a 1934 style common carrier regulation, which was really based on regulating the railroads, I think, doesn't make any sense.

WALDEN: All right.

Mr. Copps, real quick?

COPPS: My answer is yes, I do. The course says we have the authority to do that. Whatever we do, we need to do it quickly, promptly and provide some certainty in the marketplace. I have always stressed the importance of that reclassification.

People talk about Section 706. I've always said that there is authority there to do a lot of things.

But what -- we don't need now to get into months of third ways and fourth ways and fifth ways to thread this needle. We need some clarity. Business needs clarity. Consumers need clarity and the commission needs clarity, too.

And we have to make sure whatever we do that things like interconnection and those things, consumer protections are provided.

WALDEN: Appreciate that. I thank the indulgence of the committee and turn now to the ranking member, Ms. Eshoo for five minutes.

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And to each one of our distinguished witnesses, what a rich, rich hearing with your testimony. Thank you very, very much.

To Chairman Hundt, thank you for your eloquent summation without any staff or other counsel to assist you late last night.

In your testimony you discussed the importance of the decision that this country made to allow Internet service providers a full use of the existing telephone network without paying the owners anything. It's a very, very -- I mean, one of these essential platforms in the success of the Internet.

So, essentially, we said the incumbents could not be gatekeepers that charge a toll for getting online.

In your view, does yesterday's Circuit decision reverse that longstanding policy?

HUNDT: No, it doesn't. And I think, Congresswoman, that you put your finger on the central issue.

If I may say, yes, Internet service providers are gatekeepers and they also are two-sided networks or two-sided gatekeepers.

Like any gatekeepers, there is somebody on one side and somebody on the other side.

And so the situation then is very similar to the credit card industry. So we all own credit cards and then there's the credit card company and then on the other side of that there is the restaurant.

And it's very useful for restaurants that we all have credit cards and it's useful for us that all the restaurants will take them, but it's not so useful if the gatekeeper says, now some of these restaurants, we're not going to allow them to participate in the system.

Translating that to the present, if the Internet service provider were to say, you know, not all the people that are putting the content on their -- on their computers, we don't want all of them to be able to have access to all of the users; that's a problem if the gatekeeper behaves that way.

ESHOO: Thank you. Very --

HUNDT: That's the central issue.

ESHOO: Yes. Thank you very much.

To Chairman Powell, it's wonderful to see you again. As you know, under current law, cable subscribers are required to buy the so- called broadcast basic tier as a condition of getting access to any other cable programming.

As re: transmission consent fees continue to rise and are inevitably being passed on to consumers in the form of below-the-line fees, I mean, I don't think it's a sustainable business model, most frankly. I just don't think that it can continue to work this way.

Do you think that the so-called must buy requirement makes any sense? Shouldn't consumers have the ability to lower their bills by electing to receive broadcast channels over the air?

POWELL: I don't. I think -- I think it's -- it should be an extraordinary circumstance in which the government tells the consumer you have to buy a television package as a prerequisite of buying more of what you want, which is essentially what the rule does.

The other grounds on which I think it's fatally flawed is only cable subscribers have that obligation. Dish and direct satellite subscribers do not have that obligation. And they're the second and third largest MVPDs in the United States.

Yet a consumer who subscribes to DirecTV does not have to, under the must-buy rule, purchase those programming, but if they switch to Comcast or TimeWarner Cable, they do. That's the parity point that I was making and I think is a perfect place for harmonization.

ESHOO: Thank you very much.

Chairman Copps, thank you for being here today, the man with real wisdom, the man that we always count on to put -- place democracy front and center of everything.

You know so well that, since Citizens United, the last two election cycles that have set records for money spent, including hundreds of millions of dollars from undisclosed sources, the bulk of this so-called dark money spending by outside groups that hide their donors go toward negative TV ads. We all know that.

Would you recommend changes to the Communications Act to ensure that voters are informed about who exactly is behind these anonymous TV ads?

And is there anything in your view that the FCC can do on its own without congressional intervention?

COPPS: I would recommend them enforcing the statute that we already have. And if you take a close look at Section 317, which has to do with sponsorship identification and which goes back even before the Telecommunications Act of 1934 was written, goes back to 1927, ensuring that listeners and viewers, more recently, know by whom they are trying to be persuaded, whether it's a commercial product or a political product.

Those rules were last revisited in a meaningful way by the FCC in the 1960s, which repeated that people have a right to know by whom they are being persuaded.

Since then we have all these new avenues of dark money and super PACs and all of the rest. But we also have the authority, recently reemphasized by the Government Accountability Office, the recommendation that the commission update those rules and get on with the job.

So we can have this kind of information available to consumers so that when you see that negative ad and it says brought to you by Citizens for Purple Majesties and Amber Waves of Grain and it's really a chemical company dumping sludge into the Chesapeake Bay, potential voters, citizens have a right to know that and will know that.

That's basic information that you need to have, if you're going to have a viable civic dialogue. So this is something that the FCC can do. It doesn't await a president making a proposal to do this. It doesn't involve Congress having to pass a law.

It involves the Federal Communications Commission doing its job. And it could do this within 90 to 120 days and update the rules to take mind of the new dark money avenues that I was talking about earlier.

So this would be a real way to shine a little bit of sunlight on the dark world of TV political advertising.

ESHOO: Thank you very much.

And Mr. Wiley, thank you for your wonderful, distinguished public service. I'll submit my questions to you in writing.

WILEY: All right. Thank you.

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: Thank you. We'll now turn to the vice chair of the full committee, the gentlelady from Tennessee, Ms. Blackburn for five minutes.

BLACKBURN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you all for the time this morning.

I want to pick up where the subcommittee chairman left off, talking about the responsibility of the FCC and what it would look like going forward.

I think that it's fair to say -- and Mr. Powell, I will address this to you because I have heard you say, you know, AOL was on top at one point when you were -- on top of the game and where are they now, I think, was the comment.

But anyway, looking at where the FCC would be and as we look at the Telecom Act, should we begin to think in terms of the FCC being more as enforcement rather than regulatory in its scope or in its -- really in its scope?

Mr. Powell and then Mr. Wiley, I would like to hear from you.

POWELL: I think some aspects of that deserves a fresh examination. You know, the FCC, which I am a huge supporter of, served there with great people and I think it does an enormously great public service in that we functions that are critical to in respect to management and many other things.

But it is one of the last of the New Deal era agencies that actually has affirmative economic regulatory power; that is, the ability to set the prices, terms and conditions of market activity as opposed to having a more significant enforcement, policing or consumer protection role.

Not to say that some of that may or may not still be warranted, but I do think that that is a kind of holdover from judgments of different administrative eras. And I would recommend if you're going to look at -- you should look at the--

BLACKBURN: Look at the balance?

POWELL: ... the dichotomy and the balance of that role. I do think that leaders -- and many of them sitting at this table -- have -- have migrated more toward that more defensible rule, but many of those provisions still remain, and I think they're worthy of second consideration.

BLACKBURN: OK.

Mr. Wiley?

WILEY: Yes, I would agree with -- largely with what Chairman Powell has suggested. I think the commission does have strong enforcement efforts today. And some would say, almost too strong in some instances. But I think -- I think, frankly, that a lighter touch is -- is the way to go in this area.

BLACKBURN: OK. Let me ask you this. Privacy data security -- it's front-page news right now. It's going to be. Do you think that now is the time for the FCC to focus on its core competencies? Or should it move over and look at privacy data security, or leave that to the FCC? Mr. Wiley?

Mr. Wiley?

WILEY: I -- I didn't hear that. I -- I didn't hear it. I'm sorry.

BLACKBURN: Oh. Privacy data security -- leave it to the FCC and the FCC focus on its core mission? Or what is your thought on that?

WILEY: I think so.

BLACKBURN: You think so?

WILEY: I would agree with that.

BLACKBURN: OK.

Mr. Powell, coming back to you, 706 -- we're hearing a lot about that today. And you may have others who think that, you know, the FCC -- that this is an invitation -- 706 is an invitation to come in and regulate Internet services. So, as you look at 706, do you agree that the provision was intended to give the FCC the ability to forebear from regulations that would stifle broadband investment and innovation?

POWELL: I -- I agree that the decision certainly gives them the power to forebear. And for many years, many people interpreted 706 as deregulatory. It speaks of removing barriers and removing obstacles, less about introducing them.

I certainly was serving at a time where the commissions had held that that was not a separate basis of authority. And in fairness to the fact, every commission had so held until recently. So, that was the position of the law when I -- when I was there, at least.

I will say, though, that I think if the commission is going to have a role in broadband, I -- I highly would prefer that be under the construct of the light regulatory information services definitions that reside around 706, than to make a radical transformation to Title 2 as a regulatory framework for those questions.

BLACKBURN: OK.

Thank you very much.

Mr. Chairman, I will yield back the balance of my time.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back. And the chair now recognizes the gentleman from California, the ranking member of the -- of the committee on the Democrats' side, Mr. Waxman.

WAXMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

My colleague, Ms. Blackburn, suggested the FCC needs to act more like the Federal Trade Commission. The FTC doesn't -- does important consumer protection work. But I believe we need an agency like the FCC, that can write forward-looking rules of the road for industry and consumers.

Chairman Hundt and Copps, do you agree with that?

HUNDT: Absolutely, Mr. Waxman. Forward-looking is -- here's the best example of useful forward-looking law. It's in the incentive auction legislation that you passed, where this Congress said, "We want the FCC to establish before the auction a generally-applicable rule about how much spectrum anybody can buy."

That has to be forward-looking. You don't want to go into the auction with your money, and not know whether or not you're going to be permitted to win in the -- keep the license that you -- that you thought you were the high bidder on. That has to be forward-looking. So, that's a great example of you all asking for a forward-looking rule, and really deserving a forward-looking rule.

WAXMAN: Mm-hmm. Mr. Copps?

COPPS: Absolutely, I concur. We all talk about how rapidly the telecommunications technology and services are changing. The commission has to be aware of that -- have the flexibility to react to that, and certainly to fulfill its responsibilities to look into the future, and try to determine how best to fulfill its -- it's mission, which includes consumer protection, includes privacy, and includes ubiquity of services.

WAXMAN: Mr. Powell, in light of yesterday's decision, the D.C. Court -- Circuit recognized the authority granted by Congress to the FCC in the 1996 act. Do you believe that the agency can properly oversee the growth of broadband infrastructure services?

POWELL: I do. For a matter of record, as chairman of the FCC, and the commission that classified broadband the way that it is today, we -- we quite poignantly recognized that -- the importance of that continuing role to a degree. And we believe that the authority existed within that Title 1 framework to take care of those circumstances.

Whether you agree or disagree, the court certainly validated yesterday, from a judicial standpoint, that Title 1 and 706 do provide that flexible authority.

WAXMAN: Mm-hmm.

And, Mr. Wiley...

WILEY: Yes?

WAXMAN: If you agree the FCC has the authority, do you think it ought to use it?

WILEY: Well, the court said that the commission could have authority in this area. I would strongly advise, in my own view, the commission to let the marketplace to develop. And if problems do exist, then to step in. There are avenues. If we find blocking, if we find discrimination, there are avenues that can be taken.

I think the problem is, sometimes, we're -- we're in search of a problem here that may not exist. I think if you look at all the suggestions of the carriers that have come out of the decision from yesterday, they all want to keep the marketplace open, all want to give consumers access to various kinds of content. And I -- I take them at their word. I think that's going to develop.

WAXMAN: Mr. Hundt, if we want to keep the marketplace open, isn't it reasonable to anticipate that some of the players will not want it to be so open if it's to their financial advantage? And shouldn't the FCC play a role to make sure, prospectively, that we have an open competitive market with the consumers being in charge?

HUNDT: I completely agree. And if I might, I think it's important -- well, let me say this. I have the view that the case and the statute have the following meaning.

Section 1706 gives the FCC the authority to accomplish the goals you just stated without also requiring the FCC to make a classification decision. That is to say, it can make a classification decision and act with the authority that would come from that, but it doesn't need to do that in order to pass rules that are authorized under Section 1706. Meaning, 1706 and the common carrier provision are two independent bases for FCC action. That's why the FCC can choose both or either in order to have a (inaudible) rulemaking that would accomplish the goals you described.

WAXMAN: Didn't the court say that the FCC made the wrong choice? And they have two titles they can rely on? You're saying they don't need either title? They can just go ahead and...

HUNDT: I...

WAXMAN: ... think (ph) about regulation?

HUNDT: Yeah, I think what the court said is, if you do choose the information services classification, then you're bound by the restrictions in that. But you don't need to make that choice in order to accomplish the goals that are desiring -- which the court has said that it approves of the goals.

WAXMAN: Mm-hmm. And you don't need to be a -- regulators or (ph) common carrier, either?

HUNDT: I beg your pardon?

WAXMAN: You don't have to regulate it as a common carrier?

HUNDT: The court has said you could choose that, or you could choose 706 or you could choose both. The only thing you can't do is choose information services classification and pass common carrier- like rules.

WAXMAN: I see. Thank you. That's very helpful.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I yield back my time.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back, and the chair now recognizes five minutes, the former chairman of the full committee, the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Barton.

BARTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I've -- I've listened to our testimony and our questions so far. I'm going to make brief statement before I ask a question.

I was here in 1996. And that act was a philosophical change from where the committee had been, and to some extent, where the country had been, in terms of telecommunications policy.

BARTON: You had a Republican Congress -- House and Senate -- for the first time in over 50 years, maybe 60 years. You had a Democratic president, Mr. Clinton, who came from a kind of a conservative pro- business background down in Arkansas. And the -- the former chairman of the committee, Mr. Dingell and Mr. Waxman and Mr. Markey and some of those folks, had a very regulatory approach, although not totally so.

And in the Telco Act of '96, Mr. Braley and Mr. Fields, we went -- we decided to go with a market approach. And Mr. Copps, as he's pointed out, markets don't always work, but generically, if they're open and transparent, unless there is a natural monopoly, they do give a lot more choice to people.

And that's what the Telco Act of '96 did. It rejected the philosophy that the government knows best that the regulator knows best, that people can't if -- if they have -- if they have access to appropriate information, can't make choices that -- are good choices.

And we see reflected today in some of the questions that Mr. Waxman, especially, just asked, you know, that some of my friends on the Democrat side just don't know like a market approach. You know, how dare it be possible that under -- under Title I, informational services, you can have an open, transparent Internet and you don't need the FCC to -- to tell you what to do. My God. That's scary. We better get that FCC back on the job.

They just -- maybe, you know if they can't do it under Title II as a -- as a common carrier, well, they just gonna have to figure out how to -- how to regulate under Title I. Well, you know, if you look at the explosion in what's happened -- I mean, I have -- I had somebody, a young person, a very young person, about nine years old, come into my office, down in Texas, and apparently, did not know there was such a thing as a hard-line telephone. Did not know what that was on my desk.

This young lady thought a phone was just something you carried around with you. And -- and her parents were very young, and they didn't have hard-line phones in their home, and they -- you know -- her dad worked out of his truck, doing stuff, and -- and contracting and stuff. She didn't know what it was.

So, you know, this thing that Mr. Upton and Mr. Walden are starting to take a real comprehensive review and working with Mr. Waxman and Ms. Eshoo, it's a good thing. But philosophically, I don't want to go back to where I have to depend on the intelligence of Mr. Copps or Mr. Powell or Mr. Hundt or Mr. Wiley and the three or four other wise people at the FCC, to know what's best for me in telecommunications policy.

You know, I think if we set the ground rules, and I -- I agree that you have to have a traffic cop, but I don't agree that you gotta be so prescriptive that -- that the market just flat gets -- gets strangled before it even has a chance to get underway.

So my -- my question, and I'll throw it open to the panel, is there still a need for a Title I, I mean, for a Title II, for -- for common carrier? In the telecommunication marketplace today, could we deregulate the telephone companies, in totality, because, you know, there really is no such thing as a natural monopoly anymore?

COPPS: If we can find a way to assure that some of the qualities that people fought for long and hard in terms of privacy and public safety and consumer protection, do not accompany the new tools of broadband and Internet as they accompanied telephone, then I think we're in trouble.

I like the market approach too, and it was decided long ago that the telecommunications industry (inaudible) industries would operate in a capitalistic system and you don't blame business for trying to seize market control or capture the market or even to have gate keeping but we've always, since very early in the last century, had protections against untrammeled building toward monopoly and duopoly.

I read the '96 act, and I wasn't as intimately involved with it as you were, but followed it with some degree of interest as being somewhat more proactive. I read that act as instructing the Federal Communications Commission to do what it needs to do to encourage bringing the most advanced telecommunications feasible to all of our citizens no matter where they live, at reasonably comparable prices, reasonably comparable services, allowing them to access media that serves communities and provides information that are necessary to exercise a citizen's responsibilities in a democratic society, so I think yes, a light touch where possible.

But, you know, we sit here and talk about, well we have to do away with these -- these stove pipes and all, and I agreed to that with some extent, but we have -- we have enshrined that. I mean, if we're gonna say we're gonna treat a telephone call you make on the Internet entirely different than we make a telephone call somewhere else, that's not functionally equivalent. That's not treating technologies alike.

So, I think...

(CROSSTALK)

BARTON: (inaudible) I mean, I know my time is way over, but it -- it is something...

(LAUGHTER)

... it's something to think about, because we've got a real chance in the rest of this Congress and the next Congress to build on what we started in '96.

WILEY: I would just like to say that I agree with much of what you say. I think in -- in a competitive marketplace that we see today, with the kind of I.P.-centric world, I think economic regulation has to be considered with some skepticism, because the markets are competitive.

If you don't have market failure, then the question is, why should the government be stepping in? Consumer protection, E911, you know, those kinds of things, that's a different story.

But we're talking about economic regulation here, and I think it's more questionable, and I certainly wouldn't be thinking about going back to common carrier world in an information services environment. I don't think that makes sense.

WALDEN: Well thank you, the gentleman's time has expired.

And the chair recognizes, for five minutes, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Doyle.

DOYLE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and once again, thank you to our witnesses for your testimony today.

We've talked a lot about net neutrality in the court decision, so I'd like to maybe go to a couple different topics and ask Chairman Hundt and Chairman Copps about special access.

How -- how can the FCC enhance competition, in the special access marketplace, and is new statutory authority necessary or do you think the commission has the sufficient authority to ensure that the markets are competitive.

COPPS: On special access I think what needs to happen -- yes, I think the commission has the authorities for the FCC to make up its mind. I was before this committee and I think you were here too. And perhaps it was Mr. Markey, or somebody who asked us all back in 2007 to sign a letter saying we would have this problem resolved by September.

And we all said "Whoopee, let's -- let's do that".

And it hasn't been done yet. All these seven years have gone by. Enormous amounts of money are at stake here. The ability of competitors to enter the business and to compete is at stake here.

I am pleased at some signs now, that the FCC is beginning to move. And I want to especially commend you because I know you were a big proponent of getting this data collection process going, and that's the prerequisite of -- of doing some -- something final on this.

The commission also has to look at allegations of anti- competitive practices and special access, such things as loyalty mandates and excessive early termination and shortfall penalties. But getting this right is important.

And each year that goes on, there's billions of dollars going to maybe where they should go or maybe where they shouldn't be going.

DOYLE: Thank you.

Commissioner Hundt.

HUNDT: I echo Commissioner Copps' remarks and would just add, this is another example of another useful, forward-looking rule. We could all use a forward-looking rule on this topic.

DOYLE: Thank you, yes. And Commissioner Copps, we have been waiting years and years and years, and I hope before my tenure in Congress is over that we'll see the FCC do something on special access. And I intend to be for a little bit longer.

(LAUGHTER)

Commissioner Copps, the FCC recently closed a very successful -- a low-power FM application process and is currently considering thousands of LPFM applications, and I want to personally thank you for your efforts in that regards and ask you what other opportunities you see for the FCC to further empower communities in innovative ways.

COPPS: Well, first of all, I want to thank you because, without you and the leadership of your colleagues here, this would not have happened and we wouldn't have had that window, first one open since 2000.

And it's a window of enormous potential. So, number one, we want that to move forward with all dispatch and maybe go from 800 low power stations to maybe thousands of them.

Going beyond that, though, we just have to look at whatever kind of options we can think of to encourage community radio to revivify the pig (ph) channels and make sure that they're not just cast aside, as some of the big companies seem to want to do.

Look at new models for noncommercial media, nonprofit media. And that applies not just to media companies, but to telecom companies, newspapers and so many other things. And there's a lot of potential here in a market that doesn't seem to be able to provide all the tools that we need for media and for news, for nonprofit media to step in.

But the IRS is dragging its feet on making a lot of these determinations that it should be making. So, low power, yes. Looking at channels 5 and 6, there are all sorts of options out there.

Put some special emphasis on using community radio, and diversifying communities and native lands. It's just a field that's rife with potential, if we can just step up to the plate and realize our responsibility to do it.

DOYLE: Thank you.

Gentlemen, thank you for your insight today. We appreciate it here on the committee.

And I'll yield back, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: Thank you very much. The gentleman yield backs the balance of his time.

And the chair now recognizes himself for five minutes.

And, Mr. Powell, thanks for -- again for you being here today. And if I could just start with some questions to you.

POWELL: Yes, sir.

WALDEN: It's kind of interesting because in reviewing your testimony and also Mr. Wiley, you both used very similar language in spots.

And in your opening statement you said that this market requires a greater degree of business flexibility, fewer prescriptive rules and an assurance that any government involvement is applied on a technology-neutral basis and creates a better investment climate.

And I also saw that Mr. Wiley also had said in his testimony about -- the government can't keep up and there's a need for flexibility and technology-neutral framework in his testimony. So, very, very similar language.

But your testimony, when you're -- when you go through it, I find it interesting because you're going through your seven points and for simplicity.

And one of the things that you bring out, because you also were talking about that flexibility and also having better business climate, you state in your testimony that since 1996 we've seen $1 trillion invested in Internet infrastructure.

And then you also laid out that, you know, the simplicity that has to be there.

But also in that simplicity, you said that, you know, practicing simplicity can be scary. And it takes courage to discard old ideas and rules that are no longer needed.

Could you give a couple of examples of those?

POWELL: Yes. It's a great, challenging question. I think I might actually go back to some of what Mr. Barton was talking about.

If you think about one of the wisest things that was done in the 1996 act, it has nothing to do with the individual rules. It was the fundamental judgment that the government rejected the natural monopoly thesis and believed instead that competition was the more fruitful approach.

But common carriage law inherently is about a government- sanctioned monopoly. It's essentially the queen of the realm who grants an exclusive license to a ferryboat captain to go across the river and in exchange for all the privileges of that monopoly, they agree to be bound to serve all the citizens in a nondiscriminatory way and other things that the sovereign wishes to have as part of that exclusive benefit. Mutual in some regards the monopolist gets the exclusive profits and the -- and the realm gets the benefits of serving all the citizens.

In some ways in 1996, the government sued for divorce from companies through the notion of an exclusive monopoly and instead said go compete. Raise your own capital. No guaranteed return on investment. No guaranteed success.

But yet the lingering notions of common carriage, which are still in the statute and, by the way, are still being raised in the context of the net neutrality debate, still hover around our regulatory questions.

To me, whether the country comes to some committed conclusion that, even with its challenges and the need for oversight that were really about competition and were ready to truly let go of common carriage, is a great example, a fundamental one of how to make that decision.

LATTA: Thank you.

And let me follow up with another question.

And when you're looking at the (inaudible) assessing the competition and the communications industry, do you think an updated communications action modify how the FCC currently conducts its competitive analysis?

POWELL: I think so, only because I think there is some ambiguity there that, when managed in responsible hands, works fine. At times, it doesn't.

I am worried about the FCC merger review process in part because it professes to do a competitive analysis following essentially anti- trust guidelines administered by other departments.

But under the public interest standard, which I do think is valuable, it turns into a competition of conditions. And as an anti- trust lawyer, I used to believe the FCC, if they're doing something bad, shoot them. If they're not, don't let them cure harm by how many good jelly beans you can put on the scale and to make the thing go away.

And then by doing it in a way that it extracts these concessions as a voluntary proffer, you make sure that the case can't be appealed to the courts because you no longer have standing.

I think insulating their review process from judicial review through the conditioning mechanism and allowing the commissioning mechanism to be a vehicle by which the commission can legislate beyond its authority, can get companies to do things in the context of that proceeding it can't pass laws about, borders on kind of administrative improbability.

So does that happen every time? No.

Do I think it happens sometimes? Yes.

And I think Congress should at least examine the review process and see if whether better controls could be in place.

LATTA: Thank you very much.

And I see my time has expired and the chair now recognizes for five minutes the gentlelady from California, Ms. Matsui.

MATSUI: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I want to thank all of the former chairmen for being here. This has been really an interesting and informative discussion.

Under Section 254, carriers have certain obligations to provide universal access. In the D.C. Circuit's decision yesterday, the court made clear the FCC has a similar charge under 706 to ensure that all Americans have access to broadband and that the FCC has authority over broadband providers to meet that mandate from Congress.

I have two questions for all the chairmen relating to the court's decision yesterday.

The first, do you agree the FCC should and must promote universal access to broadband for all Americans?

Mr. Wiley?

WILEY: Yes, I would agree with that.

(UNKNOWN): Yes.

MATSUI: Mr. Powell?

POWELL: Absolutely. There's no way you can be a functioning member of society without access to this technology.

MATSUI: OK.

Then does the court's decision yesterday affirm the FCC's authority to transition the universal service fund to broadband?

Chairman Wiley?

WILEY: Yes, I think the FCC has done a good job in looking at that.

I am concerned somewhat with the size and the growth of the universal service fund. And I think the commission has got to look at the compensate -- the pay in that -- covering that. Some issues has got to be looked at, I think.

MATSUI: But it's generally yes?

WILEY: Yes.

MATSUI: (inaudible)?

POWELL: Yes, I think commend Chairman Genachowski from my grading, the fund toward broadband and he did it on a theory of 706. So in that extent, I think the ruling yesterday only strengthens the commission moving in that direction.

MATSUI: Good.

COPPS: Yes.

Chairman Copps?

That's great. I appreciate your views because I believe that it's one of potentially biggest unintended consequences avoided by the court's decision because transitioning USF to broadband is a -- really a critical step toward achieving universal access and adoption in this country.

Chairman Hundt, you said that yesterday's circuit decision is a victory for Congress and the smart, flexible approach of the 1996 Telecom Act.

How can we continue that success?

Are there any unintended consequences we should watch out for as this committee starts the process of updating the Communications Act?

HUNDT: Well, I think as a number of you have mentioned, of course the FCC on remand needs to commence a new proceeding, which I believe Chairman Wheeler has already said that he intends to do.

And naturally that should be and will be an open proceeding. I'm sure this committee will have an ample opportunity to express its views.

I don't, myself, have the ability to forecast where that will come out or should come out, because I think it's really, really important to examine all the new facts about emerging network architectures and about competition problems on both sides of the two- sided network.

HUNDT: I would just say that's why it's so useful that the court has said that the FCC's authority is broad and powerful, because the technologies in the network architectures and the competition problems are constantly changing. And the FCC and rulemaking has the ability to adapt to those changes, sometimes eliminating rules, sometimes writing new rules. So this is a very, very workable process that we have here.

And, as I said before, congratulations to this committee for the 1996 act, which did create this legal culture.

MATSUI: Chairman Powell, would you like to comment?

POWELL: I'm sorry. Can you refresh the question?

MATSUI: Well, I'm really...

POWELL: Sorry.

MATSUI: You know, we -- as Chairman Hundt commenting that the court decision, he felt, was a victory for Congress and for this smart, fixable approach of the '96 act, are there any unintended consequences that we should watch out for as we re-examine and update the Communications Act moving forward?

POWELL: I more or less would agree with Chairman Hundt. I mean, I think to the degree that, you know, in some ways I saw a quote the other day that I thought summed it up great. It's not a victory for any side but it might have been a victory for the debate. And that is that the commission continues to have a meaningful role in the oversight protection of broadband without crossing the line into the more dangerous concerns around common carriage.

And if that's ultimately the outcome, maybe that's workable.

Unintended consequences, I do think even the court struggled with them itself, which is 706 is an extraordinarily broad, unconstrained provision. How it's interpreted and how responsibly it's interpreted and applied, I think, is important.

Because I think Congress hasn't spoken with much specificity about broadband regulation and to take a position as open-ended and vague as 706 and see that as the foundation for everything broadband going forward has potential risks and dangers, but I think that will be worked out over time through its application, through dialogue with Congress.

MATSUI: Thank you very much. Chairman Copps?

COPPS: While I'm pleased that the court recognized the authority of the commission, I don't know that I'm ready to declare victory yet. If it is a victory for the debate, that's not necessarily a good thing because we've had so many years of debate while the evolution of the Internet continues and gatekeeping shows the rise of its ugly head.

So it's a victory if the commission reacts and reacts promptly and provides some certainty and some guarantees. But we've lost a couple of years, looking for third ways and other ways and I don't want to lose a couple of more years going down that road.

MATSUI: Well, I think there's an opportunity here. Yes?

WILEY: I was just going to say. I think if it's a victory, I think it's a victory for technical innovation, a victory for investment and ultimately a victory for the consumer. And I think thus we ought to see how the marketplace develops in this area and see whether problems, as I said earlier, really come about, as some people predict.

MATSUI: I think this is an interesting moment in time. And we have to provide a thoughtful way as we move forward. And I appreciate all your comments. Thank you very much. I yield back.

WALDEN: Gentle lady yields back. The chairman now recognizes the gentleman from Illinois.

SHIMKUS: Thank you, chairman. Welcome, you all. It's good to have you. The -- and I think it would be safe to say that no one envisioned this world in which we live in technologically. No one envisioned it in '96. So the really the basic -- the basic first question is in a rewrite for public policy elected officials or even folks in the commission to envision what would world would be like ten years after a rewrite, that's -- that's going to be almost -- that's impossible to do.

Is that -- most people view that as correct? No one knew in '96 what would come. So that talks about what these basic premises that I enjoy: democracy, freedom, marketplace, capitalism.

One thing that hasn't really been addressed is consumer choice. And how that really does drive innovation and drive -- and it's that marketplace. And I remember going to the consumer electronics show and the MP3 was being unveiled and I just was amazed at how much capital flowed for just music in this space, in the technology space. That's the same thing now with Internet, broadband, downloads, Pandora, you name it. It's all migrated to that.

So we don't ever want to lose the aspect of the power of the individual consumer in this debate versus what some people would say would be the power of a government or regulatory arena or agency. And Mr. Copps, I think that's true for these segments of society that feel they don't have access.

I think that you can pull together based upon technology the ability to get the word out through broad band, information, newsletters and the like. I mean the technology has allowed us to really -- there's really no excuse for people not to have access to information flow today even if they go through universal service fund or go to the library to get on broadband through what we've been able to do through the e-rates and all that other stuff which we talked about a lot in your day, Mr. Hundt.

So here -- here's the basic question I have. Because I -- a couple of you in your opening statements, talk about silos. You are all members of the commission and you all were chairmen, which is a different position than being a standard commissioner. Because you have the responsibility for the whole body of workers within the FCC. So, we've got consumers -- we've got the bureaus and the other things other than the bureaus. I only talk about the bureaus but you go on the website you see all these other little offices and stuff: consumer and government affairs, enforcement, international media, public safety, wireless, wire line.

So in a rewrite of the '96 act, should there not be some discussion in how we reform the commission itself based upon what current technology is today? And I think, Mr. Wiley, you kind of talked about this a little bit. And just a guess of where am I heading in the future?

I mean, there is a future look, right, Mr. Copps? There is a future. But how do we reform the FCC itself and start tearing down some of these silos, which some of you have addressed are a problem? And if we can go from left to right, Mr. Wiley, if you want to go first and that will be the end of my questions.

WILEY: Yes, I think what's changed in the Internet world is that you find different parties doing the same kinds of services, providing the same kind of activities that you wouldn't have thought of before. You wouldn't have thought of broadcasters being in the technology end or cable being in the wire -- in the wire line field. But this is happening now.

And I think, therefore, the commission probably does have to change its internal structure. If you have -- in a digital world if you have functionally equivalent services being provided by different parties, I think they should be regulated in a functionally equivalent way. And that's not the way the commission has done it through the years. It's not the way they're organized. It's going to take some change.

SHIMKUS: Thank you. Mr. Hundt?

HUNDT: You know the French say "well, that works in practice, but maybe doesn't really work in theory." And I think it's really, really important to focus on practice. The current structure allows the FCC chair in what I will definitely describe as an open process to reorganize the FCC to meet the objectives that are set by any particular Congress in any particular situation. And that's a good thing.

So, when this Congress had the wisdom to ask the FCC to auction the spectrum in 1993, I was allowed, thanks to you -- but not because of a statutory mandate, but because of flexibility, I was allowed to create a wireless bureau, which previously did not exist.

At any given moment it's hard to say exactly what the administrative structure ought to be. And I think the current system, which tells the chair, figure it out, tell us what it is, you're held accountable, that's a good system.

POWELL: I do think form follows function. And I think -- certainly when I was chairman, we merged a few bureaus. Cable was a separate bureau from broadcasting. Today it's the media bureau -- changes we made to try to reflect.

A common principle is organize around the way it's seen through the eyes and ears of consumers. And, you know, to me at the time, television was television to most Americans and making sure you had cross-pollinization of the bureaucrats, professional who -- the bureaucracy and professionals who managed that I thought was important so they saw their functions through the same eyes of our constituents. And I think that's one principle you can follow.

POWELL: I do -- I do agree with Reed. I think the chairman is also CEO. The statute assigns them that responsibility. I don't think we talk enough about the CEO role and the management of that operation, but I think there's plenty of flexibility to respond to that if it's clear what it is what we're trying to execute.

COPPS: I don't think there's any magic formula. Certainly there have been times when the stove pipe approach has been too much in presence. I think Michael tried to work against that and go towards a little more holistic type of view. So did the Chairman Jennakowsi (ph).

That being said though, you need experts in these specific bureaus. There is a specific telecom expertise and wire line and wireless and all the details of that and special access and everything else we're talking about. So I think you still have to have those bureaus but if you can have -- I think chairman Jennakowsi (ph) established a consumer task force whose job it was to go across those agencies and look at whatever or those bureaus and whatever those bureaus were doing to assess the impact on consumer well-being.

So I think that's a good approach. But it's a management thing and something that I think is a product of good leadership at the commission and good oversight by the committee.

(UNKNOWN): We need to move onto Mr. Dingell for the next five minutes. Mr. Chairman.

DINGELL: I want to commend you for this hearing. I think this has been an important hearing and events of this week tell us that it's time that the committee is going to have to start looking at what we're going to do about bringing the '96 Act up to date.

I have enjoyed the comments by my dear friend, Mr. Barton, in announcing my position as being strongly regulator. Sometimes I have a hard time recognizing my position when it's set forth by other members.

In any event, that is not important. But I would just like to remind everybody that this business of the '96 Act started when we began to try to get judge Greene out of the business of regulating the telecommunications industry.

It also started when we started trying to get the amount of spectrum that was held out of use by industry and business and government and get that available to people. And to see to it that we had a fair program for dealing with our legislation and a fair program for dealing with these matters.

I would like to welcome our friends, the chairman here, for their appearance and for their assistance to us and for what it is that they have done with us over the years.

If there's an attempt made to update the communications action, I will offer my support. Yesterday's court decisions vacating the anti- discrimination and anti-blocking rules of the federal communications commission open internet order is proof that the Congress needs to bring our communication laws into the 21st century.

Only clear direction from Congress will strengthen consumer protections, promote competitions and give industry the regulatory certainty it needs to innovate in the future. As we go about this important work, I caution that we do so with great care. On the benefit of a carefully collected and substantial body of evidence.

This is going to require rigorous oversight by the committee and considerable work to get the information that we have need of so that we can legislate properly. And I hope that the undertaking will be bipartisan in order so that any final product that we complete here moves through the Senate and to the president's desk for signature.

We have to resolve a number of very important high line (ph) and hard questions to inform our work as we move forward. I respectfully suggest that these questions included -- or rather include but are not limited to the following.

First, how do we improve and protect Americans access to content while also preserving the ability of private companies to monetize their investments for future growth?

Likewise, how do we best foster the ongoing development of future technologies that will ensure American leadership in the field of technology and communications. And then we have to decide how we are to promote the more efficient and fair use of value and increasingly scarce commodities like spectrum, which we've not administered too well of late and have administered on the amounts we could get for in money rather than how it would serve the nation to allocate this spectrum.

Lastly, we're going to have to decide how we will ensure that the Federal Communications Commission, the National Telecommunications and Information Administration and other related bodies function smoothly to protect consumers and promote growth, rather than hindering it.

Regardless of these answers and the answers to these questions and others, I submit that our work should proceed from the conviction that the public interest is still and is always going to remain the central concern that we have with regard to the Communications Act.

I have had the good fortune to be one of the authors of almost every major piece of telecommunications legislation passed by the Congress in the past three decades, and the public interest is in the heart of each, going back to the '33 and '34 act. I see no reason why that should be any different this time around.

The only issue here worth exploring is what that standard has meant in years past and whether there's any reason to give the commission different guidance for the future in interpreting it as we address the other questions I've just outlined.

Mr. Chairman, I wish you godspeed in this endeavor, and I offer you my support. And I'm delighted that the chairmen of the commission have been here this morning to assist us in beginning this process, which I hope will go forward with reasonable speed, with great care, and again, with great attention to the public interest.

I thank you all for listening to me.

WALDEN: Chairman Dingell, thank you for your kind comments and your always generous words and willingness to work to improve our communication and other laws. We look forward to working with you. My only disappointment is you did not have a list of yes or no questions for this panel.

(LAUGHTER)

Now, with that, we'll turn to Mr. Terry from Nebraska, and we look forward to your comments and questions, sir.

TERRY: Yes, you do (ph). Thank you.

And I just -- for our esteemed guests here today, I want to follow up on what my friend from California, Ms. Matsui, began, and that's with the high-cost areas. I want to take it from a little bit different angle and get your input.

As kind of mentioned here, we've seen a convergence of technologies and services that are all kind of being wrapped into one anymore (ph). And the same as -- we talked about it in my early days on this committee in voice, and Barton brought that up. Well, now it's in video.

And so when we talk about a rural telecom and the Internet as a basis of delivering video today, it's kind of making -- well, it's altering the way that rural telecoms used to work. And so we have a current legal structure with this QRA and a mindset of -- on treating rural telecoms like old copper wires, which a lot of them are still using.

So I just want to ask your opinions about and reform for or within the FCC, should rural and high-cost areas -- so Mr. Copps, it even comes back to inner city, where you have low take but high cost.

How do we think about this differently in making sure that if you live in rural America or you're setting up a wind farm, where you want to continuously oversee but remotely, thereby requiring broad broadband for all of that data? Do we need to think about things differently than high-cost rural, high-cost inner city?

Mr. Wiley, why don't we start with you.

WILEY: Well, I'm not an expert in the rural telephone area, but I still think there is a concern that's different than in the big cities. And I think therefore, high-cost funds still are something that have to be part of the whole equation, in my opinion, and you know that better than anybody in Nebraska. So I don't have any huge input to you today as far as how to change the system.

TERRY: Yes. And later (ph), I guess to clarify, since video and Internet are becoming the same and your telecom is your really maybe your sole provider of that, it's all meshed together. Does that change anything? Mr. Hundt?

HUNDT: I think that people have said we really want broadband to be the network for everyone in the country. In rural areas, as I'm sure you know, Congressman, there are many places where the cable broadband penetration is as low as 15 percent and 20 percent, not anything nearly as high as it is in Washington, D.C., or in the suburbs.

Now, that's a problem that the FCC really does need to think about in conjunction with the industry that Michael represents so ably. And in particular, not to touch too many other buttons, the recent increases in the prices of the content have a disproportionate impact in rural America because when those content price increases as passed on by the cable industry, they are taking a lot of money out of the wallets of the people in those areas, and those are the same areas where broadband is expensive. And so as people are paying more for the broadcast content and the cable channel content, they have less available to purchase broadband.

This is a problem that is real and existing right now. And this also gives me a chance to pass the solution over to the -- to Chairman Powell.

(LAUGHTER)

POWELL: Congressman, I think you make a couple of important points that we should just put top of mind, which is the challenge of reaching that last 5 to 7 percent is because under traditional market fundamentals, they're uneconomic. And if they're uneconomic, the only way to cure something is you have to change the economic equation.

This is why I've always had no problem understanding and respecting that government has a meaningful and significant role in terms of our ubiquity objectives in universal service, of universality and affordability, to play a role through either the universal service program or any other properly constructed program to try to change the economic equation that attracts the infrastructure that those communities deserve.

I think it's a more optimistic scenario in the modern world than it was before because in the old world, we had single technology. We tried to string twisted copper wire between two farms 300 miles apart, and that was enormously and hideously expensive. One of the things I think really opens up an opportunity today is, because of a common IP platform, we can essentially deliver almost any kind of service over almost any kind of network.

So that means that wireless, and probably its companion of satellite-available services, have real hope and promise for rural America. That is, they have very dynamically different costs characteristics. A satellite at 28,000 feet sees rural Nebraska no differently than it sees Manhattan. Wireless has a much lower cost infrastructure for some of those areas.

So I think that isn't a complete answer, but putting a lot of energy and investment into how those services will solve those problems is useful. And I think, as the chairman of the FCC is moving toward an IP network common regulatory proceeding, that conversion that you're talking about also can get harmonized and the universal service program get harmonized along with it.

TERRY: Thank you. Agree.

COPPS: I have a little different answer. Reasonably comparable services at reasonably comparable prices is the injunction on the charge of the Telecommunications Act. Reforming USF, which the commission is in the process of doing -- with lots of wrinkles and problems to work out, no question about that -- is certainly an important part of the equation.

But anybody who thinks that the universal service fund alone is going to bring this country the kind of high-speed, low-cost broadband that we need to have to be competitive in the world arena in the 21st century I think is -- is not looking at the situation as it is.

This has to be an infrastructure mission. Our country has had infrastructure missions before, when we came together to build highways and railroads and rural electricity, and so on and so forth. And that's what we need now.

We are not going to be competitive, we're not going to get out of the holes that we're in unless every citizen in this country has that access. And yes, it's reaching that last 5 percent to 7 percent. That's extremely important. Way more than half of our homes don't have the kind of high-speed, low-cost broadband, fiber broadband, that we're going to really need to be competitive.

So we need to look at that not just as an FCC problem but as a problem confronting our government and our society and act upon it and figure out whether we are really serious of being competitive in the global sweepstakes.

TERRY: Thank you.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back. Look to the gentleman from New Mexico, Mr. Lujan, for five.

LUJAN: Mr. Chairman, thank you very much. And I must say I was concerned with some of the approach that was being taken in the line of questioning leading up to those last responses to my colleague, where for the first time I heard the importance of rural America.

Coming from a Western state, from a congressional district that represents 17 of New Mexico's 22 tribes, and the sprawling nature associated with what the West brings us, many parts of rural America, where our food is grown, where energy is generated, critically important to be able to get coverage to these areas.

And as I joked with Chairman Wheeler when we had him in front of us a couple weeks ago, I explained to him that, you know, these last flights home, it's been great to see the TSA debating whether we can make phone calls at 30,000 feet. I know that I have streaming video content at 30,000 feet. I can communicate with my office and anyone else that I so choose to.

So if I can communicate with constituents and get the video content that I want at 30,000 feet, why can't I do it on the ground in rural America? The technology is here, and there's no reason that we can't push it out.

To three responses, I just can't say thanks enough for that. Chairman Copps, with the response associated with a very aggressive push to infrastructure investment in America -- it's absolutely needed. And we shouldn't forget, especially as we talk about different ideals and philosophies that we have on this committee, and even in this Congress, and across the country, that it was in many conservative and rural parts of America that benefited from government investment with rural electrification, with major water projects that provide us power now that could be in question because of water flows -- whole other topic of conversation, but nonetheless, that we need to make sure that we're addressing.

So Chairman Powell, you talked about twisted pairs and what that brought us, decisions that were made as a result of the '96 act. And looking at section 7068, I'm not sure what we're arguing about with concerns in that particular area. It's encouraging deployment of reasonable and timely basis on advanced telecom, especially for educational purposes.

There may be some concerns with some of my colleagues on price cap regulation, but regulatory for bands, measures that promote competition in local markets -- this could be written by any member on this committee, encouraging ideals that I think that we all share.

But one thing that hasn't been talked about very much, and even given the fact that there was a huge data breach with Target, 70 million customers that were impacted, is the security of this network. I would hope that -- and I'd like to get your opinion, if 706a provides us the necessary standards to be able to bring safeguards, or if you think that that's something that needs to be addressed.

And I'd like to invite comment from each of you. Mr. Hundt?

HUNDT: As Chairman Powell said, section 1706 is very broad, and I think that it is an opportunity and a duty for the FCC to dig into it and to create an appropriate framework, with the help of this committee and its counterpart in the Senate.

If I might continue your point -- your theme of rural America, there are a number of other provisions, as well, in the '96 act that the FCC can use to try to achieve the goal of completely widespread broadband, even in rural and high-cost areas.

And one that I would identify is the current proceeding to reimagine the E-rate. The E-rate -- if we went -- I just recently met with the chief librarian in Puma County, Arizona, which isn't very far away from you, and you know the geography is not dissimilar.

They have a fantastic system of broadband for not just the central library in Tucson but all the branch libraries all over this very, very sparsely populated geography. The library is the number one public Internet access point in southern Arizona. Therefore, it's the proper focus of extra E-rate support and the proper focus of the combination of network architectures that might well resemble what Chairman Powell was talking about. I -- that's -- we shouldn't decide that part. But we should decide that's a very flexible tool also that can be used to deliver the right participation in the American community to rural America.

LUJAN: Chairman Powell?

POWELL: Congressman, I'd really like to put a punctuation on what you raised because I think it goes to the committee's desire, I hope, to try to harmonize and see communication landscape as a single ecosystem. All the wonderful benefits we're bragging and celebrating are continuously and daily at risk. I think cyberthreat, data retention, breach are all issues that are the Achilles heel of all of the promise of the network that we're celebrating, but they require very complex solutions that look through an entire ecosystem.

706 is no more -- is not particularly up to that job. Why? Even for no other reason that you can't have a discussion without software involved. The cybersecurity question on a global economic -- ecosystem basis means a conversation with every element of that massive connective chain, and that is the Web companies, the infrastructure companies, wireless companies, content companies. There's just no way, in my opinion, even with its breadth, that one could look hopefully to that as the single point of authority to make the most meaningful impact on this issue, mostly because 50 percent of that ecosystem aren't even implicated by that provision.

LUJAN: Chairman...

COPPS: I hope 706 is up to the job. I think it does confer a lot of authority. But I don't want this to become just the solution du jour, and we talk about 706 for the next two years, and then another court somewhere strikes that down, or whatever.

I do want to highlight one thing that you mentioned in terms of getting broadband out. And I commend you for your interest and your work with native Hawaiians (ph) and native Americans. And one area where I think maybe a rewrite would help would be to more formally institutionalize, put some flesh on the bones of the trust relationship and the consultative mechanisms that we have between the commission and native Americans.

It's not -- it's working better than it has. I think there has been more emphasis in recent years. Obviously, back in Chairman Kennard's time, who's not here today, there was an interest in moving us forward and getting us into a new trust relationship. But that's 13 or 14 years ago.

And the situation, as you point out, is so dire, when one member of a tribe can't call somebody else, but you can make the call from 30,000 feet, that's something wrong there. But that might be a concrete area where the commission can actually -- where the Congress can actually lend a hand.

WALDEN: Appreciate that. Gentleman's time is expired. We'll now go to the gentleman from New Jersey for five minutes.

LANCE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And to the distinguished panel, this is among the most interesting hearings in which I have ever participated. It's my honor to be able to meet all of you.

I gather there is a consensus from the distinguished panel that the 1996 legislation needs, to some extent, statutory update and revision. Is that accurate -- from the panel?

(UNKNOWN): I would agree.

(UNKNOWN): I don't agree.

LANCE: And Chairman Hundt, if you would indicate why you do not agree there needs to be statutory update?

HUNDT: I think that the D.C. circuit has made it very clear that the '96 act has given the authority to the FCC to address all the economic and social problems that this committee in recent years and in past years has asked the FCC to address.

LANCE: Other distinguished members...

COPPS: I basically concur and agree with what Chairman Hundt has said. Sure, it's always nice to have some additional clarity, but time is of the essence here. We have a statute that I think can deliver on a lot of the things that need to be delivered, and we should be about that job.

I just -- it's so difficult to see the correlation of forces coming together to give birth to an act, after what we went through in 1996, and I don't think it's going to be any easier in 2014 to do that than it was 18 years ago.

LANCE: Chairman Powell?

POWELL: I think, by any measure, a deliberative process in the legislature would take a meaningful number of years, as the chairman -- as Chairman Walden himself has recognized in setting out a multi- year process. I do think there are sufficient conditions to justify the institution of that kind of examination over that period of time because I think the market is radically different, and the relevancy of law as applied to reality should be a core principle of governance.

LANCE: I thank you.

WILEY: I think the very fact that you didn't have the Internet really developed, you didn't have broadband, you didn't have all the technological changes that have occurred since 1996 really gives, I think, substance to taking another look. And I think that gives Congress an opportunity, I think, to perhaps make some suggestions to the regulatory body that I think would be very helpful.

LANCE: Thank you, Chairman Wiley.

Am I accurate -- I've not read the decision. I have reviewed its consequences, but I've not read it, and I certainly will read yesterday's decision. Am I accurate that the FCC decided in 2004 that Internet access services would not be classified as telecommunications services? Is that true, Chairman Powell?

POWELL: Yes, sir, that's correct.

LANCE: And if that decision were to be revisited, that could be revisited by the administrative agency? Is that accurate as to how it could proceed?

POWELL: It is accurate. It could.

LANCE: And if there were to be a revisiting of the 2004 decision that this is not classified as telecommunications services, then there would have to be an extensive period of review and there would have to be some sort of high-level determination as to why a different decision were to be made? Is that the way it would work?

POWELL (?): Yes. Under administrative law, even with deference, the agency has to provide a reasoned explanation for its change in policy. It would require a notice and comment proceeding which is open.

LANCE: Yes.

POWELL: I wouldn't -- you know, the suggestion's been made that, somehow, that would lead to instant clarity. It would lead to another three to four-year period of conflict and litigation.

LANCE: And litigation. Chairman Copps?

COPPS: But I would just say I don't think it would take forever to compile that record. I, and a lot of other people I know, would be happy to contribute to the rationale for that sort of action. So it's not really starting under tabula rasa. I think a lot of the information is out there. It was just a route not taken, and now we need to go back and look at it.

LANCE: And the FCC's reclassification would be considered arbitrary and capricious unless there were a period of comment and refreshing the record and some sort of heightened standard, is that accurate legally?

(UNKNOWN): Yes, sir. They have to follow the Administrative Procedure Act obligations.

(UNKNOWN): And I'm certain they would.

LANCE: I would presume that would be the case. And finally, the decision yesterday possibly could be appealed to the Supreme Court, but it's not clear whether or not either side is likely to do that?

(UNKNOWN): That's correct.

LANCE: Thank you very much.

My time has expired, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: Thank the gentleman.

Now turn to Mr. Long from Missouri, I think our last member to ask questions. Please go ahead.

LONG: Thank you, Chairman.

And Chairman Hundt, last night, you said that you spent quite a bit of time trying to go through the court ruling of yesterday. And most of the congressmen were home trying to read through a 1,562-page bill that we're going to be voting on this afternoon. So I've ordered my staff to bring a copy of that to you. And if you could peruse that over...

(LAUGHTER)

If you can peruse that over your lunch hour and kind of decipher it for me, I would appreciate it.

Earlier in your testimony, Chairman Hundt, you said that -- and I didn't get to understand your point, I don't think, concerning the auction. You said, if I remember right, that we need a cap so people know what they're buying. Can you kind of tell me what you were -- in full disclosure, I come from a 30-year career as an auctioneer before I came to Congress a few years ago, so I've got a lot of interest in how an auction operates and try and make it operate the best it can for the public and the taxpayers.

HUNDT: I remember very well that in our first auction, we had Senator Burns, who had a...

LONG: Conrad Burns, you bet.

HUNDT: ... come and conduct the very first auction...

LONG: He is from Missouri. Now, he served from Montana, but he's originally from Missouri. That's two of us.

HUNDT: He did claim that particular heritage, and he did great job. I would recommend to Chairman Wheeler that he should come and ask you to conduct this next auction.

(LAUGHTER)

LONG: I'm not worried about conducting as much as I am how to -- you know, how it's put together, and that's what I've been trying to...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: But what was your comment? I didn't understand. You said that we need a cap so people know what they're buying. What exactly did you mean?

HUNDT: So in any auction, when folks come in, you want the high bidder to be able to walk away with whatever was auctioned. And the way to do that, I believe, is to make sure that everybody bidding in that auction knows the following. What are the rules about how much you can buy?

It doesn't have to be a cap. It could be -- some people think it should be an aggregation level. There's many different ways to define it. But people ought to know as they're about to take the money out of the wallet, as they're about to raise the hand and say that they're putting in the high bid, they ought to know that they can walk away with whatever they can buy, instead of having to have another proceeding where they ask the FCC or the Department of Justice later, Am I permitted to walk away with this, because I don't know whether or not I've violated any of your aggregation rules.

So this Congress in the incentive auction rule did say that the FCC should create a generally applicable aggregation rule, and I think that was a very wise thing to do. That way, everybody going into the auction can estimate in advance whether or not what they buy is -- what they bid on and win on is what they can walk away with.

LONG: OK. I -- talking to the interested parties that are interested in buying this spectrum, they have told me -- and this is probably a topic for another day, but they said if they can buy A, B and C spectrum, then maybe they want to buy L, M, N, O, P later in the auction. If they can't buy A, B and C, L, M, N, O, P doesn't -- if they can't buy that, too, then the first three things that they bought -- so it's a very confusing situation.

So any of you have any staff or anybody you want to get with my staff that we can talk about and kind of sort that out, I'd appreciate it.

I want to move to Chairman Wiley for a minute. If you turn on the TV at night, the only reason it's not 100 percent phone company ads and cellular companies and things is because it's interspersed with the auto insurance ads. So there would be more -- so it's seems like there's quite a bit of competition out there now.

And as far as the auction that I was talking about with Chairman Hundt, the wireless market, I think, appears to be extremely competitive. And you do have larger companies, AT&T, Verizon, T- Mobile, Sprint. And given that, doesn't it make sense that the FCC -- why will they -- should they not -- they shouldn't handicap bidders, should they, to get the most money for the taxpayers and have the best auction they can where either -- some people are wanting to limit who can buy what. Can you kind of walk me through that?

WILEY: Well, my view is that the auction ought to be available, open to all. I think if Congress really wants to see the maximum amount of revenue derived in order to support the public safety network, we're going to have to pay the broadcasters. It's a very complex process. And I do -- I am concerned about the fact that we start to begin to limit people in this, that you're going to find you're going to have less revenue than might be otherwise anticipated. I think a free auction ought to be open to all.

LONG: When people would attend my auction, I was always interested in having the most people there and have them spend the most money that they could. And if they didn't want to bid, I would bid for them. I'd tell them just to hold their hand up in the air, and when they paid enough, I'd tell them to take it down, so...

(LAUGHTER)

-- with that, Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

(UNKNOWN): Quite an auction.

(LAUGHTER)

WALDEN: I want to thank our distinguished panel of witnesses, both for your prior government service and your continuing involvement and interest in public policy to assist us in our mission and goals in updating the communications act.

I draw attention to those who are observing our hearing. They can go to our hashtag and -- at #commsactupdate (ph). I think it's in front here. And give us your information. A lot of people have been doing that during the hearing. We appreciate that, another reflection of how technology is changing the world, and we need to keep up with it.

So thank you for your participation. Our subcommittee stands adjourned.

[*] WALDEN: I'll call to order the Subcommittee on Communications and Technology, and thank our witnesses for being here for this first of what will be many hearings as we look to update the Communications Act.

Few sectors of our economy are equal to the communications and technology sector when it comes to innovation, investment in the American economy, and job creation. In these tough economic times, we as policy-makers should be committed to fostering this critical sector of the economy.

Yet the laws that regulate the industry are outdated at best, and some are affirmatively damaging. This is why Chairman Upton and I, along with members of this Subcommittee, have decided to undertake the difficult task of updating the Communications Act of 1934.

In the eight decades since its passage, Congresses have come and gone. Some have even made substantial, though targeted, changes to the law. But none have undertaken to rethink the act for the environment of convergence and innovation in which we live today.

It's time for our laws to reflect our modern technological landscape, one grounded in the networks and services of our past, and driven by our IP and mobile future.

Just yesterday, the D.C. Circuit issued its decision in the net neutrality case, striking down the rules ordered by the Federal Communications Commission. I for one was pleased to see the court remove the government from the business of making management judgments and give providers the freedom to make decisions that are pro- competitive and pro-consumer.

While this decision benefits consumers and providers alike by keeping the Internet free from government interference, the rationale highlights the ongoing confusion regarding regulation of different services.

This is yet another example of why it's vital that we take a hard look at the laws in this space and reconcile them with the realities of technology. The answer is not to subject new technology to outdated regulations, but rather to craft laws appropriate to innovative services and platforms.

As we embark on this effort, it should come as no surprise that I'm focused on ensuring that we engage in a transparent and collaborative process, not only (ph) with our colleagues here in the Congress, but also with the many stakeholders outside of these halls.

What we want is a dialogue. Last week, the Committee released the first of what will be a series of white papers seeking input from the public. And I hope that interested parties will take the opportunity to make their voices heard to us.

Today's witnesses provide a unique and valuable perspective on the Communications Act.

As Chairman of the agency tasked with carrying out Congress's will and implementing the Act, the four witnesses today have had a front row seat to witness the Act in the real world, to see where it works and where it doesn't. These Chairmen have varied experiences and viewpoints that in many ways represent the evolution of modern communications.

When Chairman Wiley led the agency, telephone service was a government-regulated monopoly. Consumers got their news from broadcast television and print newspapers and the Internet was still years away.

Sixteen years later, when Reed Hundt took the reins, the Internet was coming into full force and mobility was beginning to take off. Chairman Powell's tenure saw the convergence of services towards the bundled offerings we see today, as well as the deployment of broadband to Americans.

And in the four years since Michael Copps served as Acting Chairman, there have been dramatic changes to the way we communicate and the technology that powers our lives. For example, the title of today's hearing contains a hashtag. Twitter, then with no vowels in its name, had yet to be discovered by -- at South by Southwest.

Neither we nor the august panel before us can predict the future and what technological changes it will bring. But by learning the lessons of the past, we can do our best to create a legal and regulatory environment that will foster innovation and competition, encourage consumer choice and optimum services.

So again, I want to thank you for -- to our witnesses for this impressive panel. We look forward to hearing your testimony and we appreciate your public service.

With that, I would yield to the Vice-Chair of the Subcommittee, Mr. Latta, for any opening comments he may have.

LATTA: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and thank you very much to our panel of distinguished witnesses for testifying before us today. I appreciate you all being here.

Since 1966, we have witnessed an unprecedented technological evolution in the communications industry. The rapid emergence of new and innovative technologies has fostered increased investment throughout the industry, and the development of a vibrant, competitive communications marketplace.

As we move into the future, it's important to examine the Communications Act to ensure that our public policy continues to encourage this kind of growth and innovation that is essential to fueling our economy.

Reforms to current law should reflect the technology we enjoy today and be able to adapt to the technology of tomorrow without further government intervention.

Our efforts should be dedicated to ensure that the laws governing the communications marketplace do not stifle current and future investment, innovation, economic growth, and consumer choice in this dynamic and converging digital age of communications.

I look forward to the testimony from our witnesses today. And again, Mr. Chairman, I thank you very much for holding this hearing.

WALDEN: Thank the gentleman for his comments.

Now I turn to the gentlelady from California, Ms. Eshoo, the Ranking Member of the Subcommittee, for her opening comments.

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and good morning to you, to all of the members, and the warmest welcome to each of the witnesses that are at the table.

Your combined public service is -- really stands as a hallmark of devoted service to our country, but also to move the country forward in one of its most important economic sectors. So welcome to you. It's wonderful to see all of you at the same time at the table.

With news of the court's net neutrality decision, today's hearing, I think, is a timely opportunity to hear from each one of you who have led the expert agency, the FCC, and combined, it represents over four decades of service. That is nothing short of extraordinary.

ESHOO: And each of you have had a hand in really I think changing our nation's communication and technology landscape. So not only kudos to you, thank you to you, but a recognition of what each one of you accomplished.

When Congress passed the Telecommunications Act of 1996, it was my second term in Congress, my first term on the committee, and there were just 11 references to the Internet -- the word "Internet" -- and only one mention of broadband across a 128-page bill.

Many proponents of updating the act have cited this as evidence that the act is outdated and unable to keep up with changes in technology.

But as Chairman Wheeler affirmed last week, the Communications Act continues to provide the FCC with ample authority to exercise its role in this new environment.

The court's decision yesterday I believe furthers this argument by upholding the FCC's existing authority to oversee broadband services. And I think that's very important for consumers across the country.

I make these points not to discourage the subcommittee's review of the act. I joined with the -- with the chairman to review this. I think that it's a worthy exercise.

But rather, we need to ensure that we know what problems we're trying to fix before undertaking a multi-year examination that include hearings, stakeholder meetings, white papers and the such.

Since the '96 act was enacted, hundreds of new entrants have emerged and more than $1.2 trillion has been invested by U.S. telecommunications companies.

I want this success story to be an unending one. And I think that is the goal of everyone on this wonderful subcommittee.

So, to that end, my goal throughout the subcommittee's review will be to see more competition, greater consumer choice and more innovation.

I am so proud, as the chairman was making his opening remarks, that so much of this has been born in my congressional district.

And so, innovation, innovation, innovation; and these goals were embedded in the '96 act and they remain just as important today.

At the same time, our process of examining the Communications Act should not derail, in my view, a more immediate update of our video laws -- a view shared by a majority of the witnesses at a September subcommittee hearing.

Recurring TV blackouts coupled with the rising cost of broadcast television programming with limited choice has left consumers frustrated and looking to Congress and the FCC for answers. I believe that working together at a bipartisan basis, we can make this happen in 2014.

So, Chairman Walden, thank you for holding today's hearing on the Communications Act. I welcome the review and I look forward to hearing the unique insights from the top experts from our country who have given so much in terms of their leadership in leading the expert agency.

And with that, 34 seconds to yield to Congressman Matsui.

MATSUI: Thank you, Ranking Member.

And I want to welcome all the former chairmen. We welcome you here for your ideas and experience that provide a basis for discussions moving forward.

As technology evolves, I believe it's important that we consider appropriate updates to the Communications Act that -- with goals that promote competition and innovation in the marketplace.

To that point, I am pleased that yesterday the D.C. Circuit affirmed the FCC's authority to oversee broadband services. In my opinion, that was the crux of the debate and the FCC's argument prevailed on the question of authority over broadband.

The FCC will need to exert its authority to ensure now that all Americans have access to a free and open Internet -- a competitive marketplace where checks and balances will fare (ph) well (ph) for all Americans.

I look forward to the hearing today and I yield back the balance of my time.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back the balance of her time.

The chair now recognizes the distinguished member from Michigan, the chairman of the full committee, Mr. Upton for opening comments.

UPTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Last month, you and I announced our plans for a comprehensive update to the Communications Act of 1934.

The changes in technology since the last update in '96 have been dramatic and existing laws have failed to keep pace with the vibrant and dynamic telecommunication industry. Communications and technology sectors have consistently been areas of American leadership, innovative -- innovation and job creation, certainly. But the Communications Act is showing its age and our continued international leadership is, indeed, at stake.

Yesterday's net neutrality decision, while a victory for consumers in the economy, illustrates the uncertainty flowing from the current statutory and scheme and the need for this action.

It's time to revamp these laws to reflect the new competitive landscape in changing consumer expectations.

And as we begin the open process leading to a Comm Act update, we are looking for input -- yes, we are -- from all of the stakeholders in the communications and technology world. Where better to start than with our distinguished panel of former leaders of the FCC?

These leaders served during diverse times in the evolution of the communications sector and they've seen the market operate under the strong hand of the U.S. government and the challenges within divorcing the government from its heavy regulation of the communications sector from times before.

They've seen cable grow from its days as a struggling start-up. They've seen satellite services succeed in bringing competition to the video market and fail to find -- find success as a competitor to mobile phone service.

And they've seen the Internet grow from a DOD project to a tool for research universities and now as the commercial economic force that we know today.

Throughout the many nuanced iterations of the Communications Act, today's witnesses have firsthand seen the act at its finest and also when its inability to keep pace with technological innovation has impacted those vital economic issues.

So, I want to thank the witnesses for taking their time to share their experiences with us. We value, indeed, their expertise and welcome their thoughts on how we can ensure the Communications Act fosters our communications and technology sectors well into this century.

And I yield the balance of my time to Vice Chair...

BLACKBURN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And if I had my iPhone in my hand, I would hit "retweet" for everything that he has just said.

(LAUGHTER)

We do appreciate that you all are here. We do want to take advantage of the perspective that you have had.

Think about what has happened in the past 17 years since '96 and the changes that we have seen, not only in how we communicate but the rapidity of those communications and entertainment and how we access that -- how we take it with us, how we consume it.

So, we know that the pace of change means that we have to be very judicious and careful as we look at a rewrite.

We know that there are issues that are going to come on the plate that we're going to have to discuss also as we look at not only the Telecom rewrite but at the use of the virtual space -- privacy, data security; the way the virtual marketplace is used and the way our constituents want to have a toolbox to protect, as I call it, their virtual U (ph) online.

So, we appreciate your time -- your willingness to be with us this morning.

And I yield back to the chairman of the committee.

UPTON: Yield -- yield back. Or (ph)...

WALDEN: Did the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Barton, want to use some of that time?

BARTON: (OFF-MIKE) Yes (ph), if it's available.

WALDEN: It is.

BARTON: (OFF-MIKE) Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I've served on this committee since 1986. I've served with three of the four former chairmen -- Mr. Wylie preceded me.

We've had some agreements, we've had some disagreements. So, it's good to have all four of you gentlemen here today.

When I was chairman of the full committee, back in 1996, my committee introduced a bill we called the COPE Bill -- the -- the Communication Opportunity Promotion Enhancement Act of 2006.

It dealt with national franchising, net neutrality, public educational and governmental access, e-911 and what we now call VOIP. It passed this committee 42 to 12 and passed the House 321 to 101 but it didn't come up for a vote in the Senate.

I voted for the Telecommunications Act of '96 and the Cable Act of '92 and I hope this year to get to vote for another major bill that comes from the leadership of Mr. Upton, Mr. Walden, Mr. Waxman and Miss Eshoo.

This is a good thing to be doing and we're going to get some good information from you gentlemen and we appreciate you being here.

WALDEN: The gentleman's time's expired. I appreciate his comments. We'll now go to the former chairman of the committee, Mr. Waxman, for opening comments.

WAXMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate your convening this morning's hearing and launching the subcommittee's examination of potential updates to the Communications Act.

And I want to thank our distinguished panel for being here to help us think through these ideas. And I think I've been in Congress during the time that all of you have been the heads of the FCC.

Technology has changed at a blistering pace since the enactment of the 1996 Telecommunications Act 18 years ago. The communications and technology industries are a thriving sector of our economy.

As broadband plays an increasingly central role in the daily life of our nation, having a strong Federal Communications Commission to oversee its successful growth is more critical than ever.

Yesterday, the D.C. Court affirmed what never should have been in question: the FCC is the expert agency, charged by Congress to oversee broadband networks. In doing so, the court reaffirmed that the FCC has broad, flexible authority to regulate in the broadband and digital age. However, while the court recognized the FCC's jurisdiction, it also overturned the specific rules the commission had adopted in the open Internet order.

I believe the FCC now has an opportunity, as well as a duty, to exercise the authority the court recognized yesterday, and reinstate the no-blocking and non-discrimination rules.

An open Internet is critical to the continuing growth of this economic sector. The Internet is a vibrant platform for commerce, innovation, and free speech. Having enforceable, open Internet rules of the road means that consumers are in control of their experience online.

I am pleased that Chairman Walden has stated his intention to expeditiously adopt a new set of rules following the court's guidance. And I look forward to working with the chairman and my colleagues in Congress to make sure these pro-consumer, pro-competition policies will continue to guide the expansion of broadband services.

This subcommittee is now embarking on a journey to update the Communications Act. And regardless of the advancements in network architecture or transmission protocol, the principles of competition and consumer protection remain as sound today as they were in 1934.

I know Chairman Walden recognizes the importance of these values and the action of the FCC that it (ph) plans to take later this month to initiate technology transitions reflects that.

I look forward to hearing from our witnesses about what Congress can do to help the FCC meet the challenges of the broadband and digital age.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I want to yield the balance of my time to Mr. Doyle.

DOYLE: Thank you, Mr. Waxman.

Mr. Chairman, thank you for holding this hearing. And thank you to this distinguished panel. It's good to see all of you here in front of the committee.

I just want to briefly concur with Mr. Waxman in light of yesterday's decision by the D.C. Circuit, that I want to encourage Chairman Walden to work quickly to ensure that the Internet remains an open platform for innovation, competition and economic growth, which the FCC now clearly has the authority to do.

I look forward to working with the commission and the stakeholders to put in place a robust framework that sustains an open Internet.

Mr. Waxman, I thank you for your courtesy, and I would yield back to you if someone else needs more time.

WAXMAN: Would (ph) -- would (ph) -- (inaudible) a minute.

If not, I yield back, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back the balance of his time.

We'll proceed now to our distinguished panel of witnesses, and begin with Chairman Richard Wiley, who was nominated by President Nixon, and served as chairman of the Federal Communications Commission from 1970 to 1977.

As chairman for most of the '70s, Chairman Wiley's tenure at the commission predates many of the major changes in the communications sector.

Chairman, we're glad to have you here today. Pull that microphone up close, and (inaudible) to go. Thank you for being here.

You need to push the button on the microphone there one time.

WILEY: Thank you very much, Chairman Walden, Ranking Member Eshoo, and other subcommittee members. Thank you for the invitation to testify today.

While I know it's not going to be self-evident, due to my youthful appearance, I've been involved for nearly 45 years in federal telecommunications policy. And from my own standpoint, what has occurred during that period is simply amazing. When I was at the FCC in the 1970s, the average American enjoyed just three broadcast television stations, and one local and long- distance telephone provider. And the Department of Defense had just begun to explore a revolutionary computer project known as ARPANET.

But today, our citizens have access to hundreds of video channels delivered by countless providers and transmission technologies, dozens of voice and tech services, numerous wire line and wireless companies. And, of course, ARPANET have morphed into the Internet, which has become a universal medium of communications.

Interestingly, the bulk of this stunning technological metamorphosis has emerged since the 1996 Telecommunications Act was passed. That legislation significantly altered the rules governing virtually every aspect of communications. And the act's purpose was a simple in theory as it was complex in implementation. That is, to provide for a pro-competitive, deregulatory national policy framework designed to accelerate the deployment of advanced services and open all telecom markets to competition.

To this end, the statute sought to eliminate cross-platform barriers and to encourage competition among service suppliers previously treated as monopolies or oligopolies.

Now, to the credit of the drafters, the 1996 Act helped to bring about the vibrant competition that consumers enjoy today in a variety of communication sectors, be it voice, data, or video. Whether delivered by twisted pair, co-axial cable, optical fiber, or the electromagnetic spectrum, myriad providers today are offering their customers suites of advanced services in a marketplace that really could not have been imagined 18 years ago.

In my view, where (ph) the statute, and, indeed, FCC implementation has succeeded is when a lighter regulatory touch has been applied to markets, such as mobile and information services. The result has been that these sectors have thrived. For example, in the robustly competitive wireless marketplace, there are now more wireless subscriber connections than the population of the United States. Just think of that.

And mobile broadband has spawned an entirely new industry, mobile aps -- one that is estimated to employ more than 500,000 developers and related jobs, and contributes billions to the economy.

A similar success story is unfolding the delivery of digital content, where seemingly unlimited video-streaming web sites have developed to compete against traditional MVPDs, offering an eagerly waiting public new ways to consume video.

This marketplace, I would suggest, is emerging because of innovation and competition, and not because of government regulation.

Conversely, where the government has been less effective in maintaining -- is in maintaining highly restrictive regulations on traditional industries, like, for example, wireline telephony and broadcasting. The end result has been to disadvantage these sectors, even though they may be providing services that are often equivalent to those offered by their less regulated competitors.

In the developing I.P.-centric world, all types of providers should be able to market all kinds of services, employing the same computer-oriented language that defines digital communications.

And yet, the 1996 act continues to regulate commutations markets differently based on the conduit used to reach the customer, as well as the geographic location where traffic originates and terminates.

Now, the underlying problem is not a failure of congressional or FCC vision. Instead, the reality is that a government has great difficulty in writing laws or promulgating regulations that can keep pace with advancing technology. And especially so in a dynamic and ever-changing industry like communications.

Thus, I would suggest that the objective of a statutory rewrite should not be to legislate premised on the current state of the marketplace, or even on predictions of what it may look like in the future. Instead, Congress may want to consider a flexible and technologically neutral framework that will be capable of adapting to technical invention and innovation, whatever that may prove to be.

In this regard, let me close by setting forth a few principles that might guide the drafting of a new statute.

First, the industry silos embedded in (ph) the 1996 act should be abolished. And instead, functionally equivalent services should be treated in the same manner regardless of who provides them, or how they are delivered to consumers.

Second, the traditional dichotomy between interstate and intrastate services should be eliminated, because regulatory classifications based on geographical end points no longer make sense in an I.P. environment.

Third, legislation should be focused on maintaining consumer protection and public safety regulations. Conversely, economic regulations should be considered in the case of non-competitive markets or in the event of demonstrated market failure.

And fourth, new regulations should be instituted with a lighter touch, as I said, accompanied by sunset provisions so that the rationale for continued government intervention can be reviewed on a regular basis.

Thank you once again for the opportunity to testify.

WALDEN: Chairman Wiley, thank you very much for your learned comments, we appreciate your counsel. We'll go now to Chairman Reed Hundt, who was nominated by President Clinton and served as chairman of the FCC from 1993 to 1997. Chairman Hunt's tenure at the commission saw the passage of the ominous budget reconciliation of '93, which granted the commission the authority to auction spectrum licenses, and the Telecommunications Act of '96, so Chairman Hundt, thanks for joining us today, we're looking forward to your comments as well. HUNDT: Thank you Chairman Walden, thank you for inviting me. A good, good morning to Ranking Member Eshoo and to all the other members of this distinguished committee. I'm very proud that many of you have become lifelong friends and it's a pleasure to be here with you.

I also want to thank the D.C. Circuit for giving me a flashback to law school so that I was late last night scrambling to read the key case right before this class.

I have a feeling I'm not the only person here who -- who did that but I also want to note I didn't have any staff for classmates, so I apologize if I haven't read it correctly, but I thought that I would throw away my remarks and for whatever it's worth, offer you my reading of -- of the case.

In my view the D.C. Circuit has written first a very, very well- reasoned and very important case. There's no question that this reflects that circuit's experience in these topic areas and that they brought that experience to bear in a bipartisan way to express a view about how the United States ought to grant the authority to create the legal culture that governs broadband.

What have they said, I believe the court has vindicated the wisdom of Congress in the 1996 act. Specifically, the court has said that when Congress, in that act, in Section 706, conveyed to its expert agency, the, quote, "authority to enact measures encouraging the deployment of broadband infrastructure" unquote.

In doing that, according to the D.C. Circuit, Congress said to the FCC, "You will be our instrument for creating a flexible and a -- a supple legal culture that will change over time as the market changes and as technology changes.

But they can always be used to protect competition, to protect consumers, and fundamentally, to make sure that absolutely everybody in America is participating in the common medium of the internet, and that absolutely everybody in America is able to use it to publish their views and review all the views of everyone else."

Not all those words are in this decision, but almost all those words are actually in this decision. Section 1706 of course is just one part of the 1996 act but I know I don't have to remind many of the members here -- maybe I don't have to remind any of the members here -- that was passed by a very large bipartisan vote in the Senate and in the House.

We all were -- those of us who were in public service then -- remember being in the Library of Congress when President Clinton, the Democratic President passed this law that was passed by a Senate controlled by the Republicans and a House controlled by the Republicans. And all came together and said, "We have a common vision".

And that is that there will be networks we did not know, technically speaking, what they would all look like, but there would be networks that would connect all of us to each other and to all of the resources of information that in fact would be utilized for entrepreneurship, for innovation, and for learning.

And I have to say, this is what's happened. Now, no one here thinks the government built these networks. No one thinks the FCC built these networks. But everyone should know that the legal culture that was created by Congress and its expert agency, through the terms of Republican and Democratic chairs, the legal culture is the legal culture that is regarded all around the world as the absolute best legal culture for governing the internet.

Any one of us knows 12 things that we think should be done differently, or maybe two dozen, but we ought to recognize just for a little while, that we as a country should pat our government on the back and say for the last 20 years, the legal culture that's been created that has governed the internet has really created the best possible environment for innovation, for entrepreneurship, for consumers.

That's what's actually happened, and this court has said, "And that law still exists". This court has said, "Already, Congress has enacted the law that gives the FCC the authority to protect competition and consumers".

And that authority, according to this court, lies in Section 1706, and the court also said that Congress can -- that the FCC can if it choose classify broadband as a common carrier. It could use either of these methods, it can use one of these methods, but it can accomplish the goals that are stated in the act and that have repeatedly been restated by this Congress.

The only thing the court said is, "If you're going to pass rules that look like common carrier rules and you're going to classify broadband as an information service, then you're going to be creating a contradiction that we won't permit".

You can't call it an information service and then pass rules that look like common carrier rules because if it quacks like a duck it's a duck.

So, that's why it was sent back. I read a lot of articles that said that this was a victory for Verizon. This is a victory for Congress. If it was a victory for Verizon, it was a Pyrrhic victory. It was the most perfect example of a Pyrrhic victory since Pyrrhus.

(LAUGHTER)

So I just wanna compliment this Congress on passing a supple law that has worked well, and that this court has just said still will permit you to achieve your goals through the expert agency.

Thank you.

WALDEN: Thank you Chairman Hundt. We appreciate your comments and your staying up all night to cram for our hearing.

(LAUGHTER)

Now turn to Chairman Michael Powell, who was nominated by George W. Bush and served as Chairman of the FCC from 2001 to 2005. During Mr. Powell's chairmanship, they saw a significant increase in the deployment of broadband to American homes as well as convergence of services toward the development of broadband -- toward the bundles of services that are common today, among many other things.

Chairman Powell, thank you for joining us today and please go ahead.

POWELL: Thank you Mr. Chairman, and as a former chairman, I'm happy to be sitting around with a bunch of these other chairmen offering as best we can our historic perspectives on how to prudently go about rewriting the act, should that be your intention.

And I'm pleased to be with Ranking Member Eshoo again and all the distinguished members of the committee.

I think it goes without saying, and all of us will say it in different ways, that the world has changed quite radically from 20 years ago in terms of markets and services, but don't ask us, ask your kids. Ask them to name three broadcast networks, if you will, ask them to do without the internet for a week, and for God's sakes, ask them to put their phone down at dinner and see what reaction you get. I think you will be convinced.

That transformation has taken place largely because of an enormous revolution in network architecture, in the form of the internet, which has unleashed a form of inter modal competition that heretofore wasn't really possible.

And it's really introduced an exciting world, and we should remember, gave birth to a host of companies and opportunities that never were envisioned before. The companies that are here, Google, Facebook, Amazon, Ebay, Twitter, Instagram -- you name it -- all able to be born and flourished because of this transformation.

I would say that any consideration of the act should start with not only cataloguing its ills, but cataloguing its successes, much as Reed was alluding to.

I think it's really important to note that over this period, we have seen the most stunning amount of investment in infrastructure and architecture, that we have ever seen.

We have reached 90 percent of Americans faster than any other technology in world history. Innovation and growth have continued at exponential rates, with broadband increasing over 19 times just in the last decade, doubling basically, increasing about 58 percent annually.

That's a stunning achievement and something we should make sure we keep going.

I -- so I think, you know, being guided by the old maxim of "Do no harm" is an important cautionary tale. As I thought about how you might think about architecting a new regime, I'm guided by the idea of the internet itself, which is the fundamental principle of simplicity as a design principle.

It has been a very, very powerful one in the internet and I think it -- it offers some guidance in this space as well. So I'd like to, toward that end, offer -- I'm gonna see Mr. Wiley's four principles and do him three better and offer you seven, as briefly as I can.

The first is, we've heard a lot about innovation. I do think the principal goal of the government should be to nurture that innovation. This is the kind of fomenting change we have never been able to harness as fully as we are today. Innovation has allowed us to bring completely new products and services and network changes to the market.

It's created a form of creative destruction that keeps the market energetic and keeps monopoly in check. And I think it's created new kinds of transparency for the American consumer through crowd sourcing and visibility. And we should study the conditions that go in to innovation and make sure we harness them. I think three are critical.

Innovations really do require freer markets. And a market that moves at Moore's law speed, the pace of adaptation transformation and change are incredibly fast. And there needs to be a constant and intense dialogue between producers and consumers. We should be careful to protect that.

Innovation requires risk taking. As we know, most new ventures fail. There has to be room in government policy for failure. There has to be room in government policy for encouraging taking those risks. And innovation requires investing more than a trillion as Congressman Eshoo was talking about earlier since 1996, is stunning. But it requires a stable regulatory environment to provide that uncertainty because if investment slows innovation will slow with it.

The second rule of simplicity, I think, is once you've created a lighter regulatory environment, by trying to pursue the maxim of less is more, organize it better.

We certainly have heard about the challenges of silos and buckets. Clearly that had its place in another time when these technologies, applications and typed of companies were deeply intertwined, were not able to provide alternative services and other spaces. That day has moved on and we certainly crave a more unified, integrated kind of legal regime that doesn't make those sorts of distinctions.

In fact, as I heard mentioned today I think yesterday's court decision and the multiyear debate on net neutrality that illustrates the almost tortuous challenges sometimes of addressing a modern circumstance in using provisions of last century's rules. I think they're certainly widespread agreement on core principles around an open internet.

Yet the somewhat kludgy path we've had to follow in an effort to implement them has made the matter, I believe, infinitely more complex and controversial than necessary and the threat of radically upending the long-standing light regulatory foundation of broadband on which massive investment and growth have been built with good effect to implement one set of rules seems distressing. Any shift of that magnitude I do think would require Congress' -- the people's representatives to weigh in on.

A third principle give regulators the ability and obligation to address changing markets. As we've said the markets move drastically and the FCC often has limited ability to make those migrations. Yes, in places they have. There are other instances in which they've not been able to even when they concede that the fundamental circumstances are changed.

Fourth, the law should ensure competitive parity and technical neutrality. There is a hodgepodge of applications of statutes I could point out in which certain rules apply to one sector of a service and not to other sectors. This has really just been an outgrowth of the passage of years and the changing nature of companies. But there are many rules that apply to cable for example that don't apply to dbs for no discernible reason.

One very valuable thing the committee can do is prune through the statute to harmonize those differentiated treatments as best as possible.

Fifth, the FCC should police markets not create them. I think this is generally well understood but there is a role for a cop on the beat. What I don't think there should be is a master chef who believes it's the commission's objective to make markets or create the conditions and circumstances for them.

And finally, the last two, timeliness. If you're working in Moore's law you need timely and prompt decisions from the government.

Lastly and most importantly, the law still needs to preserve important societal values, and protect consumers from harm. And the FCC and the government will always have a sacred responsibility in that regard. Thank you for your time.

WALDEN: Chairman, thank you. Speaking of cops on the beat, we'll now go to Michael Copps, served as acting chairman of the federal communications commission from January to June 2009, and served as commissioner from 2001 to 2011.

Prior to joining the commission, Commissioner Copps worked right here on Capitol Hill, and the U.S. Department of Commerce. Commissioner Copps, Chairman Copps, thank you for being with us. And we look forward to your comments to round out our panel.

COPPS: Thank you Chairman Walden, Chairman Upton, Miss Eshoo and Mr. Waxman, Vice Chairman, Former Chairman, all the members of the committee, I'm delighted to be here.

We're here today to review whether the Communications Act needs to be updated or otherwise reformed. I've heard some say that simply because the act is old it must be obsolete. That no matter how well it has served us an act written 18 years ago cannot have relevance in today's altered world.

As someone only a little younger than the original act of 1934, I would raise a caution flag or two. The Declaration of Independence and the Constitution were written long ago, too, yet we still find them critically relevant in our lives. While it is praiseworthy to ponder changes to the law, I would suggest firstly that the framework of the current statute remains in many ways strong.

And secondly, that the current act's provisions can still do much to improve our communications landscape. To enlarge economic and social opportunity for all of us, and to nourish the kind of civic dialogue upon which successful self-government inevitably rests.

In an ideal world most of us would welcome an up-to-the minute rewrite of the law to reflect how we believe it could be improved.

The last such revision in 1996 was born of a unique political moment that aligned a sufficient and sundry number of stake holders across sectors and constituencies who were able to negotiate a compromise statute that while far from perfect at least envisioned delivering to every American no matter who they are, where they live, or their particular circumstances of their individual lives, the most advanced communications technologies and services feasible at reasonable and comparable prices, replete with consumer protections, rights of privacy, assurances of public safety and utilizing competition to help achieve these goals.

Putting the statute to work to deliver these benefits was my mission at the FCC, working with some of the most amazing public servants anywhere.

Nowadays, I carry out my public interest mission in the nonprofit sector at Common Cause. In the immediate wake of the new law's passage, the commission indeed made important strides to carry out these congressional mandates.

But alas things changed.

Some of the very interests who helped negotiate the new Communications Act spent more time undermining the statute than implementing it. Such efforts continue to this day as we saw in yesterday's court decision that left unaddressed would seriously jeopardize the future of the open internet.

I appeared in front of this panel many times over the years to voice my dissent on commission decisions involving the reclassification of communications services, industry consolidation across both our telecom and media sectors, the elimination of policies that had long safeguarded the public interest, and the heavy toll thereby exacted on consumer choices, consumer prices and slowing the deployment of competitive low-cost, high-speed broadband, this century's most important infrastructure.

We can, I know, debate for hours but a record of these hearings needs to show that many people do not share the easy optimism that others express about the state of America's communications readiness. As you consider legislation in the coming months, some will tell you that America is a veritable broadband wonderland, a triumph of free market entrepreneurship that puts us at the front of high tech nations. But there are stubborn facts we must never avoid. The United States originator of so much of the technology behind the internet has fallen from leader to lagger in broadband penetration.

According to OCED, our country is 16th in wired broadband connections per 100 residents. Worse, comparative research shows Americans are paying more an getting less than wired broadband consumers in competitor countries. The Department of Justice has noted the local wireless marketplace offers consumers little in the way of choice, even as mobile data plans are saddled with data caps that harm consumption and innovation alike and once again for the third time the FCC found itself unable to certify that we enjoy a competitive wireless marketplace.

Surely the time is now for pro-active and pro-consumer measures to make quality broadband universally affordable once and for all.

While we are not gathered here this morning to rehash those decisions, I do think it is important to understand that many of the faults attributed to the current statute are more the result of powerful industry efforts to undermine it and of commission decisions that too often aid and abet the effort.

So while we open discussions on revising communications law, let us recognize that our present statute has been interpreted and implemented in ways not originally intended, and that many of us constituent parts are still relevant, workable and consumer friendly. There is a statute to enforce and putting that job on hold while we consider changing it is not a good option.

Additionally, I think most of us here this morning understand that finding a new correlation of interests that can come together to forge the Communications Act of 2015 or 2020 will be even more challenging than the jockeying that gave birth to the current law.

As the world races ahead, we have a duty to make the best possible use of the laws we have in order to achieve the ongoing goals that Congress laid out. These remain powerful interests, a statute that invokes the public interest over 100 times, that highlights the universality of service, competition and consumer protection and that underlines the necessity for media and informs communities and engages citizens cannot be all bad.

Would I have some preferences for a reworked statute?

Of course, although a good part of it would be making sure the commission and the industry follow through on what is already on the books to foster competition and consumer protection, to deliver on public safety, to preserve privacy in this age of massive intrusion, to avoid never-ending industry consolidation, to put the brakes on gatekeeping in our media, both traditional and new, and to provide the FCC with the resources it needs to discharge its responsibilities. My greatest disappointment at the commission is that we didn't do enough to encourage media that truly reflects the diversity of our people.

Can you believe that today there is no African-American owned full power commercial television station anywhere in the land?

America is diversity. And if our media fails to represent diversity, diversity of providers and content and viewpoint and ownership, it fails us.

The sad plight of communications across our native lands needs to be addressed with renewed urgency and additional resources.

Imagine that there are still areas where the majority of First Americans cannot access even plain old telephone service, let alone the kind of high-speed broadband that is the most powerful tool they could have to create opportunity where there is so little opportunity now.

I would hope we could find ways to stimulate basic communications research by private-public partnerships. I'm not talking about the next glitzy app but the basic fundamental research that will determine who wins and loses in the global sweepstakes.

I'm for making the commission more efficient, like doing away with the closed meeting rule that prevents more than two commissioners from even talking to one another.

And I hope that reform needs to go forward, whether or not it is accompanied by more far-reaching revisions.

And I believe that when three commissioners have something they want to do at the FCC, that item should go on the agenda.

My list could go on and I welcome the opportunity to discuss such things today. But I always come back to democracy because that's what concerns me most.

Our country is in trouble, reminiscent in many ways of the severity of the economic, global and social crises it faced in the 1930s, and there are no guaranteed happy outcomes.

I just do not see how citizens can be expected to navigate through all these issues and come out with smart decisions for our nation's future when the telecommunications tools we need are not available to all and in the media environment where community outlets have been short-circuited, investigative journalism hangs by a thread and wherein we expect some invisible hand to produce those things that the market itself no longer produces and which, in fact, the market alone has never produced.

Communications are vital to our economy, but they are the lifeblood, the lifeblood of our democracy. They must be available to all, open to all, never the exclusive province of the affluent or the few, always alive to the common good. We shouldn't see our communications world as part telecom, part media or part traditional media, part new media. We have one communications ecosystem and our job is to make it work for everyone.

And I know of no greater challenge that confronts the Congress, the commission or the country.

Thank you for holding this hearing today and for inviting me to be a part of it. And I look forward to our discussion.

WALDEN: Chairman Copps, thank you for your thoughtful presentation. We appreciate it. And as you know, our subcommittee has moved forward on some of these initiatives and we welcome encouragement over on the other side of the building on the Sunshine Act and a few other things.

So would like to open up the questioning process now with a question of Chairman Powell.

Since you presided over the federal communications proceedings that classified cable and telco delivered broadband services as information services, do you think we would have seen the same level of broadband investment during the past decade had the FCC classified these services as common carrier communications services?

POWELL: I think in short my judgment is no. I think the Internet, if, at the time that that classification decision was made, was more unknown than known. I think it was a period of rampant experimentation.

I think the capital required to drive and produce the broadband networks that were not in place, needed conditions that allowed them the flexibility to make those choices without the risk that they would be put back into kind of the monopoly era regulatory models.

So I think it was an important component to spurring that investment.

WALDEN: Chairman Wiley, does the Federal Communications Commission need to continue to have broad discretion over mergers and acquisitions, or should the Department of Justice anti-trust review be enough?

WILEY: I think there has been duplication from time to time although I would point out that the Justice Department is looking at anti-trust aspects and the FCC has got a broader public interest standpoint.

I think the two agencies need to work together and I think they have worked together through the years.

So I think the process is appropriately developing. But I do worry sometimes that we see great delays in the handling of these consolidations and mergers, which I think is contrary to the best interest of the coverage involved and also contrary, I think, to the public interest and consumers. WALDEN: And to both Chairman Powell and Chairman Wiley, can the FCC ever really future-proof regulations, given how rapidly technology is changing, and are there elements that the Communications Act holding the commission back from flexibly addressing new technologies?

POWELL: No, I don't think any agency can future-proof the regulatory involvement no more than Congress could write a statute that wouldn't, over time, fray in its relevancy in a market that's driven by technological change.

I do believe, though, that there are tools to give greater flexibility and not more prescriptive constraints that we have seen in some regulatory vehicles. So, no, they can't future predict.

And then I thought -- I think the other guidance is, I think asking the commission to engage in anything that requires predictive judgment about future outcomes should be avoided where possible.

WILEY: Yes. And that's why I suggested in my prepared testimony that we ought to have an opportunity to have a light touch here and have the government have a -- in your statute have a very flexible, technology neutral type of approach to this, because it's very hard to predict.

And the 1996 drafters did not really foresee the development of the Internet to become a universal medium and I don't think they predicted broadband to be what it is today. So I think you have to step back a little bit and I think allow the technology to develop and to allow innovation and invention to occur without stifling it.

WALDEN: OK. I'm going to start with Chairman Powell and then each of you can take this one in the minute and a half I have left.

Should the Internet be regulated as a common carrier under Title II?

POWELL: Well, for me that's easy. No.

I think one of the things I'd like to say about that, though, is that people should fully understand what that means.

Even if that were able to give you a better basis for recovering these two components of the rules, it would be the instant application of thousands of pages of decades-old regulations instantly to the Internet, where they heretofore have not been, both through -- on a bipartisan basis, we've had a much more light (ph) regulatory environments.

To shatter the investment-backed expectations that would result, I think, would be exceedingly damaging and more than most people realize.

WALDEN: Chairman Hundt, do you care to comment on that?

HUNDT: Just two points: the 1996 act was shorter than the rules for Little League Baseball, meaning Congress does not necessarily have to write thousands of pages and, in its wisdom, it did not do so in 1996. And that act now has given the FCC the ability to achieve the fundamental goals.

As I mentioned earlier, it can choose to use the specific methods that are dictated by the common carrier treatment. But it absolutely does not have to use very many of these methods to accomplish its goals.

In fact, the court, on page 61, outlined its view of what the FCC should do and said you could treat it as common carrier and have about 30 words that establish the principles. I'm not saying they should do that. I'm saying they can do that.

WALDEN: Do you think they should?

HUNDT: I think what they should do -- and I hesitate to say to the current chairman what he ought to do, but since you asked -- I think they ought to take a fresh look at all the facts in law as exists right now. And they also ought to be down here, listening to you all in having a robust discussion. But the key point is, they have authority.

WALDEN: Got it.

Real quickly, the two remaining, because I've gone over my time. Wiley (INAUDIBLE) --

(CROSSTALK)

WILEY: I think -- OK.

WALDEN: No, go ahead.

WILEY: All right.

I think it would be a big mistake to turn away from -- in the information service pathway that we've started and go back to common carrier regulations, however that might be defined.

I think we want to provide an environment where there is, I think, opportunities for investment and encouraging innovation, allowing businessmen to try to experiment and try to find ways to serve the customer.

And I think to go back to a 1934 style common carrier regulation, which was really based on regulating the railroads, I think, doesn't make any sense.

WALDEN: All right.

Mr. Copps, real quick?

COPPS: My answer is yes, I do. The course says we have the authority to do that. Whatever we do, we need to do it quickly, promptly and provide some certainty in the marketplace. I have always stressed the importance of that reclassification. People talk about Section 706. I've always said that there is authority there to do a lot of things.

But what -- we don't need now to get into months of third ways and fourth ways and fifth ways to thread this needle. We need some clarity. Business needs clarity. Consumers need clarity and the commission needs clarity, too.

And we have to make sure whatever we do that things like interconnection and those things, consumer protections are provided.

WALDEN: Appreciate that. I thank the indulgence of the committee and turn now to the ranking member, Ms. Eshoo for five minutes.

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And to each one of our distinguished witnesses, what a rich, rich hearing with your testimony. Thank you very, very much.

To Chairman Hundt, thank you for your eloquent summation without any staff or other counsel to assist you late last night.

In your testimony you discussed the importance of the decision that this country made to allow Internet service providers a full use of the existing telephone network without paying the owners anything. It's a very, very -- I mean, one of these essential platforms in the success of the Internet.

So, essentially, we said the incumbents could not be gatekeepers that charge a toll for getting online.

In your view, does yesterday's Circuit decision reverse that longstanding policy?

HUNDT: No, it doesn't. And I think, Congresswoman, that you put your finger on the central issue.

If I may say, yes, Internet service providers are gatekeepers and they also are two-sided networks or two-sided gatekeepers.

Like any gatekeepers, there is somebody on one side and somebody on the other side.

And so the situation then is very similar to the credit card industry. So we all own credit cards and then there's the credit card company and then on the other side of that there is the restaurant.

And it's very useful for restaurants that we all have credit cards and it's useful for us that all the restaurants will take them, but it's not so useful if the gatekeeper says, now some of these restaurants, we're not going to allow them to participate in the system.

Translating that to the present, if the Internet service provider were to say, you know, not all the people that are putting the content on their -- on their computers, we don't want all of them to be able to have access to all of the users; that's a problem if the gatekeeper behaves that way.

ESHOO: Thank you. Very --

HUNDT: That's the central issue.

ESHOO: Yes. Thank you very much.

To Chairman Powell, it's wonderful to see you again. As you know, under current law, cable subscribers are required to buy the so- called broadcast basic tier as a condition of getting access to any other cable programming.

As re: transmission consent fees continue to rise and are inevitably being passed on to consumers in the form of below-the-line fees, I mean, I don't think it's a sustainable business model, most frankly. I just don't think that it can continue to work this way.

Do you think that the so-called must buy requirement makes any sense? Shouldn't consumers have the ability to lower their bills by electing to receive broadcast channels over the air?

POWELL: I don't. I think -- I think it's -- it should be an extraordinary circumstance in which the government tells the consumer you have to buy a television package as a prerequisite of buying more of what you want, which is essentially what the rule does.

The other grounds on which I think it's fatally flawed is only cable subscribers have that obligation. Dish and direct satellite subscribers do not have that obligation. And they're the second and third largest MVPDs in the United States.

Yet a consumer who subscribes to DirecTV does not have to, under the must-buy rule, purchase those programming, but if they switch to Comcast or TimeWarner Cable, they do. That's the parity point that I was making and I think is a perfect place for harmonization.

ESHOO: Thank you very much.

Chairman Copps, thank you for being here today, the man with real wisdom, the man that we always count on to put -- place democracy front and center of everything.

You know so well that, since Citizens United, the last two election cycles that have set records for money spent, including hundreds of millions of dollars from undisclosed sources, the bulk of this so-called dark money spending by outside groups that hide their donors go toward negative TV ads. We all know that.

Would you recommend changes to the Communications Act to ensure that voters are informed about who exactly is behind these anonymous TV ads?

And is there anything in your view that the FCC can do on its own without congressional intervention? COPPS: I would recommend them enforcing the statute that we already have. And if you take a close look at Section 317, which has to do with sponsorship identification and which goes back even before the Telecommunications Act of 1934 was written, goes back to 1927, ensuring that listeners and viewers, more recently, know by whom they are trying to be persuaded, whether it's a commercial product or a political product.

Those rules were last revisited in a meaningful way by the FCC in the 1960s, which repeated that people have a right to know by whom they are being persuaded.

Since then we have all these new avenues of dark money and super PACs and all of the rest. But we also have the authority, recently reemphasized by the Government Accountability Office, the recommendation that the commission update those rules and get on with the job.

So we can have this kind of information available to consumers so that when you see that negative ad and it says brought to you by Citizens for Purple Majesties and Amber Waves of Grain and it's really a chemical company dumping sludge into the Chesapeake Bay, potential voters, citizens have a right to know that and will know that.

That's basic information that you need to have, if you're going to have a viable civic dialogue. So this is something that the FCC can do. It doesn't await a president making a proposal to do this. It doesn't involve Congress having to pass a law.

It involves the Federal Communications Commission doing its job. And it could do this within 90 to 120 days and update the rules to take mind of the new dark money avenues that I was talking about earlier.

So this would be a real way to shine a little bit of sunlight on the dark world of TV political advertising.

ESHOO: Thank you very much.

And Mr. Wiley, thank you for your wonderful, distinguished public service. I'll submit my questions to you in writing.

WILEY: All right. Thank you.

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: Thank you. We'll now turn to the vice chair of the full committee, the gentlelady from Tennessee, Ms. Blackburn for five minutes.

BLACKBURN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you all for the time this morning.

I want to pick up where the subcommittee chairman left off, talking about the responsibility of the FCC and what it would look like going forward.

I think that it's fair to say -- and Mr. Powell, I will address this to you because I have heard you say, you know, AOL was on top at one point when you were -- on top of the game and where are they now, I think, was the comment.

But anyway, looking at where the FCC would be and as we look at the Telecom Act, should we begin to think in terms of the FCC being more as enforcement rather than regulatory in its scope or in its -- really in its scope?

Mr. Powell and then Mr. Wiley, I would like to hear from you.

POWELL: I think some aspects of that deserves a fresh examination. You know, the FCC, which I am a huge supporter of, served there with great people and I think it does an enormously great public service in that we functions that are critical to in respect to management and many other things.

But it is one of the last of the New Deal era agencies that actually has affirmative economic regulatory power; that is, the ability to set the prices, terms and conditions of market activity as opposed to having a more significant enforcement, policing or consumer protection role.

Not to say that some of that may or may not still be warranted, but I do think that that is a kind of holdover from judgments of different administrative eras. And I would recommend if you're going to look at -- you should look at the--

BLACKBURN: Look at the balance?

POWELL: ... the dichotomy and the balance of that role. I do think that leaders -- and many of them sitting at this table -- have -- have migrated more toward that more defensible rule, but many of those provisions still remain, and I think they're worthy of second consideration.

BLACKBURN: OK.

Mr. Wiley?

WILEY: Yes, I would agree with -- largely with what Chairman Powell has suggested. I think the commission does have strong enforcement efforts today. And some would say, almost too strong in some instances. But I think -- I think, frankly, that a lighter touch is -- is the way to go in this area.

BLACKBURN: OK. Let me ask you this. Privacy data security -- it's front-page news right now. It's going to be. Do you think that now is the time for the FCC to focus on its core competencies? Or should it move over and look at privacy data security, or leave that to the FCC? Mr. Wiley?

Mr. Wiley?

WILEY: I -- I didn't hear that. I -- I didn't hear it. I'm sorry.

BLACKBURN: Oh. Privacy data security -- leave it to the FCC and the FCC focus on its core mission? Or what is your thought on that?

WILEY: I think so.

BLACKBURN: You think so?

WILEY: I would agree with that.

BLACKBURN: OK.

Mr. Powell, coming back to you, 706 -- we're hearing a lot about that today. And you may have others who think that, you know, the FCC -- that this is an invitation -- 706 is an invitation to come in and regulate Internet services. So, as you look at 706, do you agree that the provision was intended to give the FCC the ability to forebear from regulations that would stifle broadband investment and innovation?

POWELL: I -- I agree that the decision certainly gives them the power to forebear. And for many years, many people interpreted 706 as deregulatory. It speaks of removing barriers and removing obstacles, less about introducing them.

I certainly was serving at a time where the commissions had held that that was not a separate basis of authority. And in fairness to the fact, every commission had so held until recently. So, that was the position of the law when I -- when I was there, at least.

I will say, though, that I think if the commission is going to have a role in broadband, I -- I highly would prefer that be under the construct of the light regulatory information services definitions that reside around 706, than to make a radical transformation to Title 2 as a regulatory framework for those questions.

BLACKBURN: OK.

Thank you very much.

Mr. Chairman, I will yield back the balance of my time.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back. And the chair now recognizes the gentleman from California, the ranking member of the -- of the committee on the Democrats' side, Mr. Waxman.

WAXMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

My colleague, Ms. Blackburn, suggested the FCC needs to act more like the Federal Trade Commission. The FTC doesn't -- does important consumer protection work. But I believe we need an agency like the FCC, that can write forward-looking rules of the road for industry and consumers.

Chairman Hundt and Copps, do you agree with that?

HUNDT: Absolutely, Mr. Waxman. Forward-looking is -- here's the best example of useful forward-looking law. It's in the incentive auction legislation that you passed, where this Congress said, "We want the FCC to establish before the auction a generally-applicable rule about how much spectrum anybody can buy."

That has to be forward-looking. You don't want to go into the auction with your money, and not know whether or not you're going to be permitted to win in the -- keep the license that you -- that you thought you were the high bidder on. That has to be forward-looking. So, that's a great example of you all asking for a forward-looking rule, and really deserving a forward-looking rule.

WAXMAN: Mm-hmm. Mr. Copps?

COPPS: Absolutely, I concur. We all talk about how rapidly the telecommunications technology and services are changing. The commission has to be aware of that -- have the flexibility to react to that, and certainly to fulfill its responsibilities to look into the future, and try to determine how best to fulfill its -- it's mission, which includes consumer protection, includes privacy, and includes ubiquity of services.

WAXMAN: Mr. Powell, in light of yesterday's decision, the D.C. Court -- Circuit recognized the authority granted by Congress to the FCC in the 1996 act. Do you believe that the agency can properly oversee the growth of broadband infrastructure services?

POWELL: I do. For a matter of record, as chairman of the FCC, and the commission that classified broadband the way that it is today, we -- we quite poignantly recognized that -- the importance of that continuing role to a degree. And we believe that the authority existed within that Title 1 framework to take care of those circumstances.

Whether you agree or disagree, the court certainly validated yesterday, from a judicial standpoint, that Title 1 and 706 do provide that flexible authority.

WAXMAN: Mm-hmm.

And, Mr. Wiley...

WILEY: Yes?

WAXMAN: If you agree the FCC has the authority, do you think it ought to use it?

WILEY: Well, the court said that the commission could have authority in this area. I would strongly advise, in my own view, the commission to let the marketplace to develop. And if problems do exist, then to step in. There are avenues. If we find blocking, if we find discrimination, there are avenues that can be taken.

I think the problem is, sometimes, we're -- we're in search of a problem here that may not exist. I think if you look at all the suggestions of the carriers that have come out of the decision from yesterday, they all want to keep the marketplace open, all want to give consumers access to various kinds of content. And I -- I take them at their word. I think that's going to develop.

WAXMAN: Mr. Hundt, if we want to keep the marketplace open, isn't it reasonable to anticipate that some of the players will not want it to be so open if it's to their financial advantage? And shouldn't the FCC play a role to make sure, prospectively, that we have an open competitive market with the consumers being in charge?

HUNDT: I completely agree. And if I might, I think it's important -- well, let me say this. I have the view that the case and the statute have the following meaning.

Section 1706 gives the FCC the authority to accomplish the goals you just stated without also requiring the FCC to make a classification decision. That is to say, it can make a classification decision and act with the authority that would come from that, but it doesn't need to do that in order to pass rules that are authorized under Section 1706. Meaning, 1706 and the common carrier provision are two independent bases for FCC action. That's why the FCC can choose both or either in order to have a (inaudible) rulemaking that would accomplish the goals you described.

WAXMAN: Didn't the court say that the FCC made the wrong choice? And they have two titles they can rely on? You're saying they don't need either title? They can just go ahead and...

HUNDT: I...

WAXMAN: ... think (ph) about regulation?

HUNDT: Yeah, I think what the court said is, if you do choose the information services classification, then you're bound by the restrictions in that. But you don't need to make that choice in order to accomplish the goals that are desiring -- which the court has said that it approves of the goals.

WAXMAN: Mm-hmm. And you don't need to be a -- regulators or (ph) common carrier, either?

HUNDT: I beg your pardon?

WAXMAN: You don't have to regulate it as a common carrier?

HUNDT: The court has said you could choose that, or you could choose 706 or you could choose both. The only thing you can't do is choose information services classification and pass common carrier-like rules.

WAXMAN: I see. Thank you. That's very helpful.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I yield back my time.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back, and the chair now recognizes five minutes, the former chairman of the full committee, the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Barton.

BARTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I've -- I've listened to our testimony and our questions so far. I'm going to make brief statement before I ask a question.

I was here in 1996. And that act was a philosophical change from where the committee had been, and to some extent, where the country had been, in terms of telecommunications policy.

BARTON: You had a Republican Congress -- House and Senate -- for the first time in over 50 years, maybe 60 years. You had a Democratic president, Mr. Clinton, who came from a kind of a conservative pro- business background down in Arkansas. And the -- the former chairman of the committee, Mr. Dingell and Mr. Waxman and Mr. Markey and some of those folks, had a very regulatory approach, although not totally so.

And in the Telco Act of '96, Mr. Braley and Mr. Fields, we went -- we decided to go with a market approach. And Mr. Copps, as he's pointed out, markets don't always work, but generically, if they're open and transparent, unless there is a natural monopoly, they do give a lot more choice to people.

And that's what the Telco Act of '96 did. It rejected the philosophy that the government knows best that the regulator knows best, that people can't if -- if they have -- if they have access to appropriate information, can't make choices that -- are good choices.

And we see reflected today in some of the questions that Mr. Waxman, especially, just asked, you know, that some of my friends on the Democrat side just don't know like a market approach. You know, how dare it be possible that under -- under Title I, informational services, you can have an open, transparent Internet and you don't need the FCC to -- to tell you what to do. My God. That's scary. We better get that FCC back on the job.

They just -- maybe, you know if they can't do it under Title II as a -- as a common carrier, well, they just gonna have to figure out how to -- how to regulate under Title I. Well, you know, if you look at the explosion in what's happened -- I mean, I have -- I had somebody, a young person, a very young person, about nine years old, come into my office, down in Texas, and apparently, did not know there was such a thing as a hard-line telephone. Did not know what that was on my desk.

This young lady thought a phone was just something you carried around with you. And -- and her parents were very young, and they didn't have hard-line phones in their home, and they -- you know -- her dad worked out of his truck, doing stuff, and -- and contracting and stuff. She didn't know what it was.

So, you know, this thing that Mr. Upton and Mr. Walden are starting to take a real comprehensive review and working with Mr. Waxman and Ms. Eshoo, it's a good thing. But philosophically, I don't want to go back to where I have to depend on the intelligence of Mr. Copps or Mr. Powell or Mr. Hundt or Mr. Wiley and the three or four other wise people at the FCC, to know what's best for me in telecommunications policy.

You know, I think if we set the ground rules, and I -- I agree that you have to have a traffic cop, but I don't agree that you gotta be so prescriptive that -- that the market just flat gets -- gets strangled before it even has a chance to get underway.

So my -- my question, and I'll throw it open to the panel, is there still a need for a Title I, I mean, for a Title II, for -- for common carrier? In the telecommunication marketplace today, could we deregulate the telephone companies, in totality, because, you know, there really is no such thing as a natural monopoly anymore?

COPPS: If we can find a way to assure that some of the qualities that people fought for long and hard in terms of privacy and public safety and consumer protection, do not accompany the new tools of broadband and Internet as they accompanied telephone, then I think we're in trouble.

I like the market approach too, and it was decided long ago that the telecommunications industry (inaudible) industries would operate in a capitalistic system and you don't blame business for trying to seize market control or capture the market or even to have gate keeping but we've always, since very early in the last century, had protections against untrammeled building toward monopoly and duopoly.

I read the '96 act, and I wasn't as intimately involved with it as you were, but followed it with some degree of interest as being somewhat more proactive. I read that act as instructing the Federal Communications Commission to do what it needs to do to encourage bringing the most advanced telecommunications feasible to all of our citizens no matter where they live, at reasonably comparable prices, reasonably comparable services, allowing them to access media that serves communities and provides information that are necessary to exercise a citizen's responsibilities in a democratic society, so I think yes, a light touch where possible.

But, you know, we sit here and talk about, well we have to do away with these -- these stove pipes and all, and I agreed to that with some extent, but we have -- we have enshrined that. I mean, if we're gonna say we're gonna treat a telephone call you make on the Internet entirely different than we make a telephone call somewhere else, that's not functionally equivalent. That's not treating technologies alike.

So, I think...

(CROSSTALK)

BARTON: (inaudible) I mean, I know my time is way over, but it -- it is something...

(LAUGHTER)

... it's something to think about, because we've got a real chance in the rest of this Congress and the next Congress to build on what we started in '96.

WILEY: I would just like to say that I agree with much of what you say. I think in -- in a competitive marketplace that we see today, with the kind of I.P.-centric world, I think economic regulation has to be considered with some skepticism, because the markets are competitive.

If you don't have market failure, then the question is, why should the government be stepping in? Consumer protection, E911, you know, those kinds of things, that's a different story.

But we're talking about economic regulation here, and I think it's more questionable, and I certainly wouldn't be thinking about going back to common carrier world in an information services environment. I don't think that makes sense.

WALDEN: Well thank you, the gentleman's time has expired.

And the chair recognizes, for five minutes, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Doyle.

DOYLE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and once again, thank you to our witnesses for your testimony today.

We've talked a lot about net neutrality in the court decision, so I'd like to maybe go to a couple different topics and ask Chairman Hundt and Chairman Copps about special access.

How -- how can the FCC enhance competition, in the special access marketplace, and is new statutory authority necessary or do you think the commission has the sufficient authority to ensure that the markets are competitive.

COPPS: On special access I think what needs to happen -- yes, I think the commission has the authorities for the FCC to make up its mind. I was before this committee and I think you were here too. And perhaps it was Mr. Markey, or somebody who asked us all back in 2007 to sign a letter saying we would have this problem resolved by September.

And we all said "Whoopee, let's -- let's do that".

And it hasn't been done yet. All these seven years have gone by. Enormous amounts of money are at stake here. The ability of competitors to enter the business and to compete is at stake here.

I am pleased at some signs now, that the FCC is beginning to move. And I want to especially commend you because I know you were a big proponent of getting this data collection process going, and that's the prerequisite of -- of doing some -- something final on this.

The commission also has to look at allegations of anti- competitive practices and special access, such things as loyalty mandates and excessive early termination and shortfall penalties. But getting this right is important. And each year that goes on, there's billions of dollars going to maybe where they should go or maybe where they shouldn't be going.

DOYLE: Thank you.

Commissioner Hundt.

HUNDT: I echo Commissioner Copps' remarks and would just add, this is another example of another useful, forward-looking rule. We could all use a forward-looking rule on this topic.

DOYLE: Thank you, yes. And Commissioner Copps, we have been waiting years and years and years, and I hope before my tenure in Congress is over that we'll see the FCC do something on special access. And I intend to be for a little bit longer.

(LAUGHTER)

Commissioner Copps, the FCC recently closed a very successful -- a low-power FM application process and is currently considering thousands of LPFM applications, and I want to personally thank you for your efforts in that regards and ask you what other opportunities you see for the FCC to further empower communities in innovative ways.

COPPS: Well, first of all, I want to thank you because, without you and the leadership of your colleagues here, this would not have happened and we wouldn't have had that window, first one open since 2000.

And it's a window of enormous potential. So, number one, we want that to move forward with all dispatch and maybe go from 800 low power stations to maybe thousands of them.

Going beyond that, though, we just have to look at whatever kind of options we can think of to encourage community radio to revivify the pig (ph) channels and make sure that they're not just cast aside, as some of the big companies seem to want to do.

Look at new models for noncommercial media, nonprofit media. And that applies not just to media companies, but to telecom companies, newspapers and so many other things. And there's a lot of potential here in a market that doesn't seem to be able to provide all the tools that we need for media and for news, for nonprofit media to step in.

But the IRS is dragging its feet on making a lot of these determinations that it should be making. So, low power, yes. Looking at channels 5 and 6, there are all sorts of options out there.

Put some special emphasis on using community radio, and diversifying communities and native lands. It's just a field that's rife with potential, if we can just step up to the plate and realize our responsibility to do it.

DOYLE: Thank you.

Gentlemen, thank you for your insight today. We appreciate it here on the committee.

And I'll yield back, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: Thank you very much. The gentleman yield backs the balance of his time.

And the chair now recognizes himself for five minutes.

And, Mr. Powell, thanks for -- again for you being here today. And if I could just start with some questions to you.

POWELL: Yes, sir. WALDEN: It's kind of interesting because in reviewing your testimony and also Mr. Wiley, you both used very similar language in spots.

And in your opening statement you said that this market requires a greater degree of business flexibility, fewer prescriptive rules and an assurance that any government involvement is applied on a technology-neutral basis and creates a better investment climate.

And I also saw that Mr. Wiley also had said in his testimony about -- the government can't keep up and there's a need for flexibility and technology-neutral framework in his testimony. So, very, very similar language.

But your testimony, when you're -- when you go through it, I find it interesting because you're going through your seven points and for simplicity.

And one of the things that you bring out, because you also were talking about that flexibility and also having better business climate, you state in your testimony that since 1996 we've seen $1 trillion invested in Internet infrastructure.

And then you also laid out that, you know, the simplicity that has to be there.

But also in that simplicity, you said that, you know, practicing simplicity can be scary. And it takes courage to discard old ideas and rules that are no longer needed.

Could you give a couple of examples of those?

POWELL: Yes. It's a great, challenging question. I think I might actually go back to some of what Mr. Barton was talking about.

If you think about one of the wisest things that was done in the 1996 act, it has nothing to do with the individual rules. It was the fundamental judgment that the government rejected the natural monopoly thesis and believed instead that competition was the more fruitful approach.

But common carriage law inherently is about a government- sanctioned monopoly. It's essentially the queen of the realm who grants an exclusive license to a ferryboat captain to go across the river and in exchange for all the privileges of that monopoly, they agree to be bound to serve all the citizens in a nondiscriminatory way and other things that the sovereign wishes to have as part of that exclusive benefit. Mutual in some regards the monopolist gets the exclusive profits and the -- and the realm gets the benefits of serving all the citizens.

In some ways in 1996, the government sued for divorce from companies through the notion of an exclusive monopoly and instead said go compete. Raise your own capital. No guaranteed return on investment. No guaranteed success. But yet the lingering notions of common carriage, which are still in the statute and, by the way, are still being raised in the context of the net neutrality debate, still hover around our regulatory questions.

To me, whether the country comes to some committed conclusion that, even with its challenges and the need for oversight that were really about competition and were ready to truly let go of common carriage, is a great example, a fundamental one of how to make that decision.

LATTA: Thank you.

And let me follow up with another question.

And when you're looking at the (inaudible) assessing the competition and the communications industry, do you think an updated communications action modify how the FCC currently conducts its competitive analysis?

POWELL: I think so, only because I think there is some ambiguity there that, when managed in responsible hands, works fine. At times, it doesn't.

I am worried about the FCC merger review process in part because it professes to do a competitive analysis following essentially anti- trust guidelines administered by other departments.

But under the public interest standard, which I do think is valuable, it turns into a competition of conditions. And as an anti- trust lawyer, I used to believe the FCC, if they're doing something bad, shoot them. If they're not, don't let them cure harm by how many good jelly beans you can put on the scale and to make the thing go away.

And then by doing it in a way that it extracts these concessions as a voluntary proffer, you make sure that the case can't be appealed to the courts because you no longer have standing.

I think insulating their review process from judicial review through the conditioning mechanism and allowing the commissioning mechanism to be a vehicle by which the commission can legislate beyond its authority, can get companies to do things in the context of that proceeding it can't pass laws about, borders on kind of administrative improbability.

So does that happen every time? No.

Do I think it happens sometimes? Yes.

And I think Congress should at least examine the review process and see if whether better controls could be in place.

LATTA: Thank you very much.

And I see my time has expired and the chair now recognizes for five minutes the gentlelady from California, Ms. Matsui.

MATSUI: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I want to thank all of the former chairmen for being here. This has been really an interesting and informative discussion.

Under Section 254, carriers have certain obligations to provide universal access. In the D.C. Circuit's decision yesterday, the court made clear the FCC has a similar charge under 706 to ensure that all Americans have access to broadband and that the FCC has authority over broadband providers to meet that mandate from Congress.

I have two questions for all the chairmen relating to the court's decision yesterday.

The first, do you agree the FCC should and must promote universal access to broadband for all Americans?

Mr. Wiley?

WILEY: Yes, I would agree with that.

(UNKNOWN): Yes.

MATSUI: Mr. Powell?

POWELL: Absolutely. There's no way you can be a functioning member of society without access to this technology.

MATSUI: OK.

Then does the court's decision yesterday affirm the FCC's authority to transition the universal service fund to broadband?

Chairman Wiley?

WILEY: Yes, I think the FCC has done a good job in looking at that.

I am concerned somewhat with the size and the growth of the universal service fund. And I think the commission has got to look at the compensate -- the pay in that -- covering that. Some issues has got to be looked at, I think.

MATSUI: But it's generally yes?

WILEY: Yes.

MATSUI: (inaudible)?

POWELL: Yes, I think commend Chairman Genachowski from my grading, the fund toward broadband and he did it on a theory of 706. So in that extent, I think the ruling yesterday only strengthens the commission moving in that direction.

MATSUI: Good. COPPS: Yes.

Chairman Copps?

That's great. I appreciate your views because I believe that it's one of potentially biggest unintended consequences avoided by the court's decision because transitioning USF to broadband is a -- really a critical step toward achieving universal access and adoption in this country.

Chairman Hundt, you said that yesterday's circuit decision is a victory for Congress and the smart, flexible approach of the 1996 Telecom Act.

How can we continue that success?

Are there any unintended consequences we should watch out for as this committee starts the process of updating the Communications Act?

HUNDT: Well, I think as a number of you have mentioned, of course the FCC on remand needs to commence a new proceeding, which I believe Chairman Wheeler has already said that he intends to do.

And naturally that should be and will be an open proceeding. I'm sure this committee will have an ample opportunity to express its views.

I don't, myself, have the ability to forecast where that will come out or should come out, because I think it's really, really important to examine all the new facts about emerging network architectures and about competition problems on both sides of the two- sided network.

HUNDT: I would just say that's why it's so useful that the court has said that the FCC's authority is broad and powerful, because the technologies in the network architectures and the competition problems are constantly changing. And the FCC and rulemaking has the ability to adapt to those changes, sometimes eliminating rules, sometimes writing new rules. So this is a very, very workable process that we have here.

And, as I said before, congratulations to this committee for the 1996 act, which did create this legal culture.

MATSUI: Chairman Powell, would you like to comment?

POWELL: I'm sorry. Can you refresh the question?

MATSUI: Well, I'm really...

POWELL: Sorry.

MATSUI: You know, we -- as Chairman Hundt commenting that the court decision, he felt, was a victory for Congress and for this smart, fixable approach of the '96 act, are there any unintended consequences that we should watch out for as we re-examine and update the Communications Act moving forward?

POWELL: I more or less would agree with Chairman Hundt. I mean, I think to the degree that, you know, in some ways I saw a quote the other day that I thought summed it up great. It's not a victory for any side but it might have been a victory for the debate. And that is that the commission continues to have a meaningful role in the oversight protection of broadband without crossing the line into the more dangerous concerns around common carriage.

And if that's ultimately the outcome, maybe that's workable.

Unintended consequences, I do think even the court struggled with them itself, which is 706 is an extraordinarily broad, unconstrained provision. How it's interpreted and how responsibly it's interpreted and applied, I think, is important.

Because I think Congress hasn't spoken with much specificity about broadband regulation and to take a position as open-ended and vague as 706 and see that as the foundation for everything broadband going forward has potential risks and dangers, but I think that will be worked out over time through its application, through dialogue with Congress. MATSUI: Thank you very much. Chairman Copps?

COPPS: While I'm pleased that the court recognized the authority of the commission, I don't know that I'm ready to declare victory yet. If it is a victory for the debate, that's not necessarily a good thing because we've had so many years of debate while the evolution of the Internet continues and gatekeeping shows the rise of its ugly head.

So it's a victory if the commission reacts and reacts promptly and provides some certainty and some guarantees. But we've lost a couple of years, looking for third ways and other ways and I don't want to lose a couple of more years going down that road.

MATSUI: Well, I think there's an opportunity here. Yes?

WILEY: I was just going to say. I think if it's a victory, I think it's a victory for technical innovation, a victory for investment and ultimately a victory for the consumer. And I think thus we ought to see how the marketplace develops in this area and see whether problems, as I said earlier, really come about, as some people predict.

MATSUI: I think this is an interesting moment in time. And we have to provide a thoughtful way as we move forward. And I appreciate all your comments. Thank you very much. I yield back.

WALDEN: Gentle lady yields back. The chairman now recognizes the gentleman from Illinois.

SHIMKUS: Thank you, chairman. Welcome, you all. It's good to have you. The -- and I think it would be safe to say that no one envisioned this world in which we live in technologically. No one envisioned it in '96. So the really the basic -- the basic first question is in a rewrite for public policy elected officials or even folks in the commission to envision what would world would be like ten years after a rewrite, that's -- that's going to be almost -- that's impossible to do.

Is that -- most people view that as correct? No one knew in '96 what would come. So that talks about what these basic premises that I enjoy: democracy, freedom, marketplace, capitalism.

One thing that hasn't really been addressed is consumer choice. And how that really does drive innovation and drive -- and it's that marketplace. And I remember going to the consumer electronics show and the MP3 was being unveiled and I just was amazed at how much capital flowed for just music in this space, in the technology space. That's the same thing now with Internet, broadband, downloads, Pandora, you name it. It's all migrated to that.

So we don't ever want to lose the aspect of the power of the individual consumer in this debate versus what some people would say would be the power of a government or regulatory arena or agency. And Mr. Copps, I think that's true for these segments of society that feel they don't have access. I think that you can pull together based upon technology the ability to get the word out through broad band, information, newsletters and the like. I mean the technology has allowed us to really -- there's really no excuse for people not to have access to information flow today even if they go through universal service fund or go to the library to get on broadband through what we've been able to do through the e-rates and all that other stuff which we talked about a lot in your day, Mr. Hundt.

So here -- here's the basic question I have. Because I -- a couple of you in your opening statements, talk about silos. You are all members of the commission and you all were chairmen, which is a different position than being a standard commissioner. Because you have the responsibility for the whole body of workers within the FCC. So, we've got consumers -- we've got the bureaus and the other things other than the bureaus. I only talk about the bureaus but you go on the website you see all these other little offices and stuff: consumer and government affairs, enforcement, international media, public safety, wireless, wire line.

So in a rewrite of the '96 act, should there not be some discussion in how we reform the commission itself based upon what current technology is today? And I think, Mr. Wiley, you kind of talked about this a little bit. And just a guess of where am I heading in the future?

I mean, there is a future look, right, Mr. Copps? There is a future. But how do we reform the FCC itself and start tearing down some of these silos, which some of you have addressed are a problem? And if we can go from left to right, Mr. Wiley, if you want to go first and that will be the end of my questions.

WILEY: Yes, I think what's changed in the Internet world is that you find different parties doing the same kinds of services, providing the same kind of activities that you wouldn't have thought of before. You wouldn't have thought of broadcasters being in the technology end or cable being in the wire -- in the wire line field. But this is happening now.

And I think, therefore, the commission probably does have to change its internal structure. If you have -- in a digital world if you have functionally equivalent services being provided by different parties, I think they should be regulated in a functionally equivalent way. And that's not the way the commission has done it through the years. It's not the way they're organized. It's going to take some change.

SHIMKUS: Thank you. Mr. Hundt?

HUNDT: You know the French say "well, that works in practice, but maybe doesn't really work in theory." And I think it's really, really important to focus on practice. The current structure allows the FCC chair in what I will definitely describe as an open process to reorganize the FCC to meet the objectives that are set by any particular Congress in any particular situation. And that's a good thing. So, when this Congress had the wisdom to ask the FCC to auction the spectrum in 1993, I was allowed, thanks to you -- but not because of a statutory mandate, but because of flexibility, I was allowed to create a wireless bureau, which previously did not exist.

At any given moment it's hard to say exactly what the administrative structure ought to be. And I think the current system, which tells the chair, figure it out, tell us what it is, you're held accountable, that's a good system.

POWELL: I do think form follows function. And I think -- certainly when I was chairman, we merged a few bureaus. Cable was a separate bureau from broadcasting. Today it's the media bureau -- changes we made to try to reflect.

A common principle is organize around the way it's seen through the eyes and ears of consumers. And, you know, to me at the time, television was television to most Americans and making sure you had cross-pollinization of the bureaucrats, professional who -- the bureaucracy and professionals who managed that I thought was important so they saw their functions through the same eyes of our constituents. And I think that's one principle you can follow.

POWELL: I do -- I do agree with Reed. I think the chairman is also CEO. The statute assigns them that responsibility. I don't think we talk enough about the CEO role and the management of that operation, but I think there's plenty of flexibility to respond to that if it's clear what it is what we're trying to execute.

COPPS: I don't think there's any magic formula. Certainly there have been times when the stove pipe approach has been too much in presence. I think Michael tried to work against that and go towards a little more holistic type of view. So did the Chairman Jennakowsi (ph).

That being said though, you need experts in these specific bureaus. There is a specific telecom expertise and wire line and wireless and all the details of that and special access and everything else we're talking about. So I think you still have to have those bureaus but if you can have -- I think chairman Jennakowsi (ph) established a consumer task force whose job it was to go across those agencies and look at whatever or those bureaus and whatever those bureaus were doing to assess the impact on consumer well-being.

So I think that's a good approach. But it's a management thing and something that I think is a product of good leadership at the commission and good oversight by the committee.

(UNKNOWN): We need to move onto Mr. Dingell for the next five minutes. Mr. Chairman.

DINGELL: I want to commend you for this hearing. I think this has been an important hearing and events of this week tell us that it's time that the committee is going to have to start looking at what we're going to do about bringing the '96 Act up to date.

I have enjoyed the comments by my dear friend, Mr. Barton, in announcing my position as being strongly regulator. Sometimes I have a hard time recognizing my position when it's set forth by other members.

In any event, that is not important. But I would just like to remind everybody that this business of the '96 Act started when we began to try to get judge Greene out of the business of regulating the telecommunications industry.

It also started when we started trying to get the amount of spectrum that was held out of use by industry and business and government and get that available to people. And to see to it that we had a fair program for dealing with our legislation and a fair program for dealing with these matters.

I would like to welcome our friends, the chairman here, for their appearance and for their assistance to us and for what it is that they have done with us over the years.

If there's an attempt made to update the communications action, I will offer my support. Yesterday's court decisions vacating the anti- discrimination and anti-blocking rules of the federal communications commission open internet order is proof that the Congress needs to bring our communication laws into the 21st century.

Only clear direction from Congress will strengthen consumer protections, promote competitions and give industry the regulatory certainty it needs to innovate in the future. As we go about this important work, I caution that we do so with great care. On the benefit of a carefully collected and substantial body of evidence.

This is going to require rigorous oversight by the committee and considerable work to get the information that we have need of so that we can legislate properly. And I hope that the undertaking will be bipartisan in order so that any final product that we complete here moves through the Senate and to the president's desk for signature.

We have to resolve a number of very important high line (ph) and hard questions to inform our work as we move forward. I respectfully suggest that these questions included -- or rather include but are not limited to the following.

First, how do we improve and protect Americans access to content while also preserving the ability of private companies to monetize their investments for future growth?

Likewise, how do we best foster the ongoing development of future technologies that will ensure American leadership in the field of technology and communications. And then we have to decide how we are to promote the more efficient and fair use of value and increasingly scarce commodities like spectrum, which we've not administered too well of late and have administered on the amounts we could get for in money rather than how it would serve the nation to allocate this spectrum.

Lastly, we're going to have to decide how we will ensure that the Federal Communications Commission, the National Telecommunications and Information Administration and other related bodies function smoothly to protect consumers and promote growth, rather than hindering it.

Regardless of these answers and the answers to these questions and others, I submit that our work should proceed from the conviction that the public interest is still and is always going to remain the central concern that we have with regard to the Communications Act.

I have had the good fortune to be one of the authors of almost every major piece of telecommunications legislation passed by the Congress in the past three decades, and the public interest is in the heart of each, going back to the '33 and '34 act. I see no reason why that should be any different this time around. The only issue here worth exploring is what that standard has meant in years past and whether there's any reason to give the commission different guidance for the future in interpreting it as we address the other questions I've just outlined.

Mr. Chairman, I wish you godspeed in this endeavor, and I offer you my support. And I'm delighted that the chairmen of the commission have been here this morning to assist us in beginning this process, which I hope will go forward with reasonable speed, with great care, and again, with great attention to the public interest.

I thank you all for listening to me.

WALDEN: Chairman Dingell, thank you for your kind comments and your always generous words and willingness to work to improve our communication and other laws. We look forward to working with you. My only disappointment is you did not have a list of yes or no questions for this panel.

(LAUGHTER)

Now, with that, we'll turn to Mr. Terry from Nebraska, and we look forward to your comments and questions, sir.

TERRY: Yes, you do (ph). Thank you.

And I just -- for our esteemed guests here today, I want to follow up on what my friend from California, Ms. Matsui, began, and that's with the high-cost areas. I want to take it from a little bit different angle and get your input.

As kind of mentioned here, we've seen a convergence of technologies and services that are all kind of being wrapped into one anymore (ph). And the same as -- we talked about it in my early days on this committee in voice, and Barton brought that up. Well, now it's in video.

And so when we talk about a rural telecom and the Internet as a basis of delivering video today, it's kind of making -- well, it's altering the way that rural telecoms used to work. And so we have a current legal structure with this QRA and a mindset of -- on treating rural telecoms like old copper wires, which a lot of them are still using.

So I just want to ask your opinions about and reform for or within the FCC, should rural and high-cost areas -- so Mr. Copps, it even comes back to inner city, where you have low take but high cost.

How do we think about this differently in making sure that if you live in rural America or you're setting up a wind farm, where you want to continuously oversee but remotely, thereby requiring broad broadband for all of that data? Do we need to think about things differently than high-cost rural, high-cost inner city?

Mr. Wiley, why don't we start with you. WILEY: Well, I'm not an expert in the rural telephone area, but I still think there is a concern that's different than in the big cities. And I think therefore, high-cost funds still are something that have to be part of the whole equation, in my opinion, and you know that better than anybody in Nebraska. So I don't have any huge input to you today as far as how to change the system.

TERRY: Yes. And later (ph), I guess to clarify, since video and Internet are becoming the same and your telecom is your really maybe your sole provider of that, it's all meshed together. Does that change anything? Mr. Hundt?

HUNDT: I think that people have said we really want broadband to be the network for everyone in the country. In rural areas, as I'm sure you know, Congressman, there are many places where the cable broadband penetration is as low as 15 percent and 20 percent, not anything nearly as high as it is in Washington, D.C., or in the suburbs.

Now, that's a problem that the FCC really does need to think about in conjunction with the industry that Michael represents so ably. And in particular, not to touch too many other buttons, the recent increases in the prices of the content have a disproportionate impact in rural America because when those content price increases as passed on by the cable industry, they are taking a lot of money out of the wallets of the people in those areas, and those are the same areas where broadband is expensive. And so as people are paying more for the broadcast content and the cable channel content, they have less available to purchase broadband.

This is a problem that is real and existing right now. And this also gives me a chance to pass the solution over to the -- to Chairman Powell.

(LAUGHTER)

POWELL: Congressman, I think you make a couple of important points that we should just put top of mind, which is the challenge of reaching that last 5 to 7 percent is because under traditional market fundamentals, they're uneconomic. And if they're uneconomic, the only way to cure something is you have to change the economic equation.

This is why I've always had no problem understanding and respecting that government has a meaningful and significant role in terms of our ubiquity objectives in universal service, of universality and affordability, to play a role through either the universal service program or any other properly constructed program to try to change the economic equation that attracts the infrastructure that those communities deserve.

I think it's a more optimistic scenario in the modern world than it was before because in the old world, we had single technology. We tried to string twisted copper wire between two farms 300 miles apart, and that was enormously and hideously expensive. One of the things I think really opens up an opportunity today is, because of a common IP platform, we can essentially deliver almost any kind of service over almost any kind of network.

So that means that wireless, and probably its companion of satellite-available services, have real hope and promise for rural America. That is, they have very dynamically different costs characteristics. A satellite at 28,000 feet sees rural Nebraska no differently than it sees Manhattan. Wireless has a much lower cost infrastructure for some of those areas.

So I think that isn't a complete answer, but putting a lot of energy and investment into how those services will solve those problems is useful. And I think, as the chairman of the FCC is moving toward an IP network common regulatory proceeding, that conversion that you're talking about also can get harmonized and the universal service program get harmonized along with it.

TERRY: Thank you. Agree.

COPPS: I have a little different answer. Reasonably comparable services at reasonably comparable prices is the injunction on the charge of the Telecommunications Act. Reforming USF, which the commission is in the process of doing -- with lots of wrinkles and problems to work out, no question about that -- is certainly an important part of the equation.

But anybody who thinks that the universal service fund alone is going to bring this country the kind of high-speed, low-cost broadband that we need to have to be competitive in the world arena in the 21st century I think is -- is not looking at the situation as it is.

This has to be an infrastructure mission. Our country has had infrastructure missions before, when we came together to build highways and railroads and rural electricity, and so on and so forth. And that's what we need now.

We are not going to be competitive, we're not going to get out of the holes that we're in unless every citizen in this country has that access. And yes, it's reaching that last 5 percent to 7 percent. That's extremely important. Way more than half of our homes don't have the kind of high-speed, low-cost broadband, fiber broadband, that we're going to really need to be competitive.

So we need to look at that not just as an FCC problem but as a problem confronting our government and our society and act upon it and figure out whether we are really serious of being competitive in the global sweepstakes.

TERRY: Thank you.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back. Look to the gentleman from New Mexico, Mr. Lujan, for five.

LUJAN: Mr. Chairman, thank you very much. And I must say I was concerned with some of the approach that was being taken in the line of questioning leading up to those last responses to my colleague, where for the first time I heard the importance of rural America. Coming from a Western state, from a congressional district that represents 17 of New Mexico's 22 tribes, and the sprawling nature associated with what the West brings us, many parts of rural America, where our food is grown, where energy is generated, critically important to be able to get coverage to these areas.

And as I joked with Chairman Wheeler when we had him in front of us a couple weeks ago, I explained to him that, you know, these last flights home, it's been great to see the TSA debating whether we can make phone calls at 30,000 feet. I know that I have streaming video content at 30,000 feet. I can communicate with my office and anyone else that I so choose to.

So if I can communicate with constituents and get the video content that I want at 30,000 feet, why can't I do it on the ground in rural America? The technology is here, and there's no reason that we can't push it out.

To three responses, I just can't say thanks enough for that. Chairman Copps, with the response associated with a very aggressive push to infrastructure investment in America -- it's absolutely needed. And we shouldn't forget, especially as we talk about different ideals and philosophies that we have on this committee, and even in this Congress, and across the country, that it was in many conservative and rural parts of America that benefited from government investment with rural electrification, with major water projects that provide us power now that could be in question because of water flows -- whole other topic of conversation, but nonetheless, that we need to make sure that we're addressing.

So Chairman Powell, you talked about twisted pairs and what that brought us, decisions that were made as a result of the '96 act. And looking at section 7068, I'm not sure what we're arguing about with concerns in that particular area. It's encouraging deployment of reasonable and timely basis on advanced telecom, especially for educational purposes.

There may be some concerns with some of my colleagues on price cap regulation, but regulatory for bands, measures that promote competition in local markets -- this could be written by any member on this committee, encouraging ideals that I think that we all share.

But one thing that hasn't been talked about very much, and even given the fact that there was a huge data breach with Target, 70 million customers that were impacted, is the security of this network. I would hope that -- and I'd like to get your opinion, if 706a provides us the necessary standards to be able to bring safeguards, or if you think that that's something that needs to be addressed.

And I'd like to invite comment from each of you. Mr. Hundt?

HUNDT: As Chairman Powell said, section 1706 is very broad, and I think that it is an opportunity and a duty for the FCC to dig into it and to create an appropriate framework, with the help of this committee and its counterpart in the Senate. If I might continue your point -- your theme of rural America, there are a number of other provisions, as well, in the '96 act that the FCC can use to try to achieve the goal of completely widespread broadband, even in rural and high-cost areas.

And one that I would identify is the current proceeding to reimagine the E-rate. The E-rate -- if we went -- I just recently met with the chief librarian in Puma County, Arizona, which isn't very far away from you, and you know the geography is not dissimilar.

They have a fantastic system of broadband for not just the central library in Tucson but all the branch libraries all over this very, very sparsely populated geography. The library is the number one public Internet access point in southern Arizona. Therefore, it's the proper focus of extra E-rate support and the proper focus of the combination of network architectures that might well resemble what Chairman Powell was talking about. I -- that's -- we shouldn't decide that part. But we should decide that's a very flexible tool also that can be used to deliver the right participation in the American community to rural America.

LUJAN: Chairman Powell?

POWELL: Congressman, I'd really like to put a punctuation on what you raised because I think it goes to the committee's desire, I hope, to try to harmonize and see communication landscape as a single ecosystem. All the wonderful benefits we're bragging and celebrating are continuously and daily at risk. I think cyberthreat, data retention, breach are all issues that are the Achilles heel of all of the promise of the network that we're celebrating, but they require very complex solutions that look through an entire ecosystem.

706 is no more -- is not particularly up to that job. Why? Even for no other reason that you can't have a discussion without software involved. The cybersecurity question on a global economic -- ecosystem basis means a conversation with every element of that massive connective chain, and that is the Web companies, the infrastructure companies, wireless companies, content companies. There's just no way, in my opinion, even with its breadth, that one could look hopefully to that as the single point of authority to make the most meaningful impact on this issue, mostly because 50 percent of that ecosystem aren't even implicated by that provision.

LUJAN: Chairman...

COPPS: I hope 706 is up to the job. I think it does confer a lot of authority. But I don't want this to become just the solution du jour, and we talk about 706 for the next two years, and then another court somewhere strikes that down, or whatever.

I do want to highlight one thing that you mentioned in terms of getting broadband out. And I commend you for your interest and your work with native Hawaiians (ph) and native Americans. And one area where I think maybe a rewrite would help would be to more formally institutionalize, put some flesh on the bones of the trust relationship and the consultative mechanisms that we have between the commission and native Americans.

It's not -- it's working better than it has. I think there has been more emphasis in recent years. Obviously, back in Chairman Kennard's time, who's not here today, there was an interest in moving us forward and getting us into a new trust relationship. But that's 13 or 14 years ago.

And the situation, as you point out, is so dire, when one member of a tribe can't call somebody else, but you can make the call from 30,000 feet, that's something wrong there. But that might be a concrete area where the commission can actually -- where the Congress can actually lend a hand.

WALDEN: Appreciate that. Gentleman's time is expired. We'll now go to the gentleman from New Jersey for five minutes.

LANCE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And to the distinguished panel, this is among the most interesting hearings in which I have ever participated. It's my honor to be able to meet all of you.

I gather there is a consensus from the distinguished panel that the 1996 legislation needs, to some extent, statutory update and revision. Is that accurate -- from the panel?

(UNKNOWN): I would agree.

(UNKNOWN): I don't agree.

LANCE: And Chairman Hundt, if you would indicate why you do not agree there needs to be statutory update?

HUNDT: I think that the D.C. circuit has made it very clear that the '96 act has given the authority to the FCC to address all the economic and social problems that this committee in recent years and in past years has asked the FCC to address.

LANCE: Other distinguished members...

COPPS: I basically concur and agree with what Chairman Hundt has said. Sure, it's always nice to have some additional clarity, but time is of the essence here. We have a statute that I think can deliver on a lot of the things that need to be delivered, and we should be about that job.

I just -- it's so difficult to see the correlation of forces coming together to give birth to an act, after what we went through in 1996, and I don't think it's going to be any easier in 2014 to do that than it was 18 years ago.

LANCE: Chairman Powell?

POWELL: I think, by any measure, a deliberative process in the legislature would take a meaningful number of years, as the chairman -- as Chairman Walden himself has recognized in setting out a multi- year process. I do think there are sufficient conditions to justify the institution of that kind of examination over that period of time because I think the market is radically different, and the relevancy of law as applied to reality should be a core principle of governance.

LANCE: I thank you.

WILEY: I think the very fact that you didn't have the Internet really developed, you didn't have broadband, you didn't have all the technological changes that have occurred since 1996 really gives, I think, substance to taking another look. And I think that gives Congress an opportunity, I think, to perhaps make some suggestions to the regulatory body that I think would be very helpful.

LANCE: Thank you, Chairman Wiley.

Am I accurate -- I've not read the decision. I have reviewed its consequences, but I've not read it, and I certainly will read yesterday's decision. Am I accurate that the FCC decided in 2004 that Internet access services would not be classified as telecommunications services? Is that true, Chairman Powell?

POWELL: Yes, sir, that's correct.

LANCE: And if that decision were to be revisited, that could be revisited by the administrative agency? Is that accurate as to how it could proceed?

POWELL: It is accurate. It could.

LANCE: And if there were to be a revisiting of the 2004 decision that this is not classified as telecommunications services, then there would have to be an extensive period of review and there would have to be some sort of high-level determination as to why a different decision were to be made? Is that the way it would work?

POWELL (?): Yes. Under administrative law, even with deference, the agency has to provide a reasoned explanation for its change in policy. It would require a notice and comment proceeding which is open.

LANCE: Yes.

POWELL: I wouldn't -- you know, the suggestion's been made that, somehow, that would lead to instant clarity. It would lead to another three to four-year period of conflict and litigation.

LANCE: And litigation. Chairman Copps?

COPPS: But I would just say I don't think it would take forever to compile that record. I, and a lot of other people I know, would be happy to contribute to the rationale for that sort of action. So it's not really starting under tabula rasa. I think a lot of the information is out there. It was just a route not taken, and now we need to go back and look at it.

LANCE: And the FCC's reclassification would be considered arbitrary and capricious unless there were a period of comment and refreshing the record and some sort of heightened standard, is that accurate legally?

(UNKNOWN): Yes, sir. They have to follow the Administrative Procedure Act obligations.

(UNKNOWN): And I'm certain they would.

LANCE: I would presume that would be the case. And finally, the decision yesterday possibly could be appealed to the Supreme Court, but it's not clear whether or not either side is likely to do that?

(UNKNOWN): That's correct.

LANCE: Thank you very much.

My time has expired, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: Thank the gentleman.

Now turn to Mr. Long from Missouri, I think our last member to ask questions. Please go ahead.

LONG: Thank you, Chairman.

And Chairman Hundt, last night, you said that you spent quite a bit of time trying to go through the court ruling of yesterday. And most of the congressmen were home trying to read through a 1,562-page bill that we're going to be voting on this afternoon. So I've ordered my staff to bring a copy of that to you. And if you could peruse that over...

(LAUGHTER)

If you can peruse that over your lunch hour and kind of decipher it for me, I would appreciate it.

Earlier in your testimony, Chairman Hundt, you said that -- and I didn't get to understand your point, I don't think, concerning the auction. You said, if I remember right, that we need a cap so people know what they're buying. Can you kind of tell me what you were -- in full disclosure, I come from a 30-year career as an auctioneer before I came to Congress a few years ago, so I've got a lot of interest in how an auction operates and try and make it operate the best it can for the public and the taxpayers.

HUNDT: I remember very well that in our first auction, we had Senator Burns, who had a...

LONG: Conrad Burns, you bet.

HUNDT: ... come and conduct the very first auction...

LONG: He is from Missouri. Now, he served from Montana, but he's originally from Missouri. That's two of us. HUNDT: He did claim that particular heritage, and he did great job. I would recommend to Chairman Wheeler that he should come and ask you to conduct this next auction.

(LAUGHTER)

LONG: I'm not worried about conducting as much as I am how to -- you know, how it's put together, and that's what I've been trying to...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: But what was your comment? I didn't understand. You said that we need a cap so people know what they're buying. What exactly did you mean?

HUNDT: So in any auction, when folks come in, you want the high bidder to be able to walk away with whatever was auctioned. And the way to do that, I believe, is to make sure that everybody bidding in that auction knows the following. What are the rules about how much you can buy?

It doesn't have to be a cap. It could be -- some people think it should be an aggregation level. There's many different ways to define it. But people ought to know as they're about to take the money out of the wallet, as they're about to raise the hand and say that they're putting in the high bid, they ought to know that they can walk away with whatever they can buy, instead of having to have another proceeding where they ask the FCC or the Department of Justice later, Am I permitted to walk away with this, because I don't know whether or not I've violated any of your aggregation rules.

So this Congress in the incentive auction rule did say that the FCC should create a generally applicable aggregation rule, and I think that was a very wise thing to do. That way, everybody going into the auction can estimate in advance whether or not what they buy is -- what they bid on and win on is what they can walk away with.

LONG: OK. I -- talking to the interested parties that are interested in buying this spectrum, they have told me -- and this is probably a topic for another day, but they said if they can buy A, B and C spectrum, then maybe they want to buy L, M, N, O, P later in the auction. If they can't buy A, B and C, L, M, N, O, P doesn't -- if they can't buy that, too, then the first three things that they bought -- so it's a very confusing situation.

So any of you have any staff or anybody you want to get with my staff that we can talk about and kind of sort that out, I'd appreciate it.

I want to move to Chairman Wiley for a minute. If you turn on the TV at night, the only reason it's not 100 percent phone company ads and cellular companies and things is because it's interspersed with the auto insurance ads. So there would be more -- so it's seems like there's quite a bit of competition out there now. And as far as the auction that I was talking about with Chairman Hundt, the wireless market, I think, appears to be extremely competitive. And you do have larger companies, AT&T, Verizon, T- Mobile, Sprint. And given that, doesn't it make sense that the FCC -- why will they -- should they not -- they shouldn't handicap bidders, should they, to get the most money for the taxpayers and have the best auction they can where either -- some people are wanting to limit who can buy what. Can you kind of walk me through that?

WILEY: Well, my view is that the auction ought to be available, open to all. I think if Congress really wants to see the maximum amount of revenue derived in order to support the public safety network, we're going to have to pay the broadcasters. It's a very complex process. And I do -- I am concerned about the fact that we start to begin to limit people in this, that you're going to find you're going to have less revenue than might be otherwise anticipated. I think a free auction ought to be open to all.

LONG: When people would attend my auction, I was always interested in having the most people there and have them spend the most money that they could. And if they didn't want to bid, I would bid for them. I'd tell them just to hold their hand up in the air, and when they paid enough, I'd tell them to take it down, so...

(LAUGHTER)

-- with that, Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

(UNKNOWN): Quite an auction.

(LAUGHTER)

WALDEN: I want to thank our distinguished panel of witnesses, both for your prior government service and your continuing involvement and interest in public policy to assist us in our mission and goals in updating the communications act.

I draw attention to those who are observing our hearing. They can go to our hashtag and -- at #commsactupdate (ph). I think it's in front here. And give us your information. A lot of people have been doing that during the hearing. We appreciate that, another reflection of how technology is changing the world, and we need to keep up with it.

So thank you for your participation. Our subcommittee stands adjourned.

N.M. Delegation Announces Federal Drought Assistance Available for NM Farmers and Ranchers

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 819 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The office of Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., issued the following news release:

Today, U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Lujan, and Michelle Lujan Grisham announced that 27 counties in New Mexico will qualify for emergency loan assistance from the Farm Service Agency (FSA) due to losses caused by the ongoing drought. A full list of counties is included below.

The designation makes producers, farmers and ranchers in these counties eligible for Farm Service Agency (FSA) emergency loans, provided eligibility requirements are met. Funds are available for up to a maximum of $500,000 and may be used to restore or replace essential property; pay all or part of production costs associated with the disaster year; pay essential family living expenses; reorganize the farming operation; and refinance certain debts.

The counties were declared by the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) as "primary natural disaster areas" after suffering from droughts of severe, extreme and exceptional intensity during the growing season for eight or more consecutive weeks; or as "contiguous counties" because of they were nearby and considered to face similar circumstances.

"New Mexico farmers and ranchers continue to face great challenges due to the prolonged drought and I am glad the USDA continues to recognize the need for federal disaster assistance in our affected counties," Udall said. "We need to do all we can to support farm operators, especially in rural communities, who continue to be devastated by consecutive years of drought.

Assistance like the FSA's emergency loan program is one important way we can do this. As a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, I'm proud to fight for the emergency assistance for farmers and ranchers, along with many other resources for our agricultural community."

"Farmers and ranchers help drive the economy and have shaped our state's history, as many growers in New Mexico come from families that have cultivated land for generations," Heinrich said. "These disaster declarations are a good first step to ensure they receive the necessary federal resources they need to recover from last year's natural disasters."

"Agriculture is a vital part of New Mexico's economy, and this year's drought has imposed enormous hardships on our farmers and ranchers," Pearce said. "Today's announcement was the right decision, and will provide much-needed relief. I look forward to continuing to work closely with farmers and ranchers across southern New Mexico to make sure that they receive the support and resources they need."

"Severe drought conditions across New Mexico are leaving farmers and ranchers throughout the state struggling, impacting their livelihoods as well as our economy," Lujan said. "The disaster declaration by the Secretary of Agriculture will make important resources available to help farmers make ends meet during this difficult time. It is also vital that Congress completes work on a new farm bill that takes steps to help farmers and ranchers better endure severe drought conditions."

"As years of severe drought continue to inflict harm on New Mexico's farmers and ranchers as well as our economy, it is important that we employ every tool possible to support those who are struggling due to factors completely outside of their control," Lujan Grisham said. "This federal disaster declaration will allow our state's farm operators to get the assistance they need. As a member of the House Agriculture Committee, I will continue working to pass a farm bill that includes crucial programs to support farmers and ranchers suffering from drought and natural disasters."

Through the FSA emergency loan program, farm operators can borrow up to 100 percent of actual production or physical losses. To qualify, they must have suffered at least a 30 percent loss in crop production or a physical loss to livestock, livestock products, real estate or chattel property.

Farm operators have eight months following the date of the disaster declaration to apply and are encouraged to do so through their local Farm Service Agency office. NM delegation's Dems want fixes to Obamacare

BYLINE: Copyright © 2014 Albuquerque Journal By Michael Coleman Journal Washington Bureau

LENGTH: 769 words

WASHINGTON - Democrats in New Mexico's congressional delegation who cheered when President Barack Obama signed the Affordable Care Act into law three years ago are less enthusiastic following the flawed rollout of its health care exchanges in recent weeks, but none supports its repeal.

Meanwhile, Rep. Steve Pearce - the delegation's lone Republican - was a harsh critic of the law before its passage and remains convinced it should be scrapped. The Journal interviewed all five members of the delegation about the law last week.

Most delegation Democrats concede certain elements of the Affordable Care Act, also known as Obamacare, could use some fine-tuning, but they also contend the underlying law is sound.

"We start with the idea that this is an attempt to get everybody quality affordable health care," said Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., who voted for the law. "I think most of our citizens agree that would be a good thing, especially in a state like New Mexico, with such a high rate of uninsured."

However, Udall said the bill had a "disastrous rollout," with technical glitches plaguing the enrollment website.

"I'm outraged about what happened because it hurt some people's ability to sign up and discouraged some people," Udall said. "But down the line, what we want to be doing is fix the problems as we see them. This is the law of the land. Let's get the problems fixed."

Udall late last year teamed up with Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., to help Americans whose existing health plans had been canceled because of the onset of Obamacare. The president had long told Americans if they liked their existing plans, they could keep them but, in spite of the president's promise, thousands of plans were canceled. The Udall-Landrieu legislation would allow individuals to keep their current health plans if they chose to do so, as long as they stay current with their payments. The bill has languished in the Senate.

Pearce said that fix and others are simply political cover for Democrats, such as Udall and Landrieu, who are up for re-election in 2014.

"People who are up for re-election are absolutely scrambling because the voters are extremely angry about this stuff, so they start looking for fixes," Pearce said.

House Republicans have passed dozens of bills to repeal the health law in its entirety, but the legislation is a nonstarter in the Democratic-controlled Senate.

"Some of the wrinkles are getting smoothed out from an administrative standpoint," said Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., who also voted for the law. "Any large piece of legislation is going to have its challenges and there may well be things we have to change legislatively. What I don't think you'll see are the fundamental pillars (repealed)." Heinrich said he supports fine-tuning the bill but didn't have any specific suggestions. He said he wants to give the law more time to reveal where fixes are needed.

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, a Democrat who was not in Congress when the Affordable Care Act was passed, said that, despite a botched rollout, many Americans support the law. A Gallup poll released Friday showed that the law has fallen to its lowest approval rating in more than a year, with 54 percent disapproving and just 38 percent approving.

"People don't want to repeal the Affordable Care Act, but they do want to fix it," said Lujan Grisham, a former New Mexico health secretary. "Even the people who love it see value in getting it fixed."

She said the law could be tweaked to ensure that "high-risk" pools of beneficiaries don't flood the exchanges, driving up prices for everyone in the system.

"We want coverage and insurance that's affordable for the vast majority, not just a few," she said.

Lujan Grisham predicted the Republican push to repeal the law will wane in the second session of the 113th Congress.

"I think finally - not entirely - but in large part, that debate has diminished," Lujan Grisham said. "There may be some fixes that look like repeal to me and I'm not interested in that."

Rep. Ben Ray Luján, a Democrat, said he spent a lot of time in hospitals before the December 2012 death of his father, former New Mexico House Speaker Ben Lujan, who lost a battle with lung cancer. The health care horror stories the congressman heard from fellow patients and their families convinced him that Obamacare is a step in the right direction from the previous insurance system.

"The environment was a very unfair one when it came to people getting the treatment they need," he said. "But if improvements need to be made to make it work better, we need to do that." Off target

Congress delegation expects production; Economic issues lead NM agenda

BYLINE: Copyright © 2014 Albuquerque Journal By Michael Coleman Journal Washington Bureau

SECTION: NEW MEXICO; Pg. B1

LENGTH: 958 words

WASHINGTON - As lawmakers get back to work this month after their holiday recess, New Mexico's congressional delegation is optimistic that the second session of the 113th Congress will be more productive than the first.

After all, things couldn't get much worse. Last year's congressional session was marred by a protracted fiscal fight that culminated in a 16-day government shutdown, leaving many Americans fuming. Meanwhile, a Pew Foundation study found that Congress passed just 55 "substantive" bills last year, a record low for a first session.

In Journal interviews last week, members of New Mexico's congressional delegation said the bruising budget battles appear to be over - at least for now - which should result in more productivity.

"I think there is a real opportunity to pass legislation, which we didn't have last year," said Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, who was elected president of the freshman class for the second session of the 113th Congress. "There is a clear message from our constituents that they have had enough."

She and other Democratic New Mexico lawmakers cited immigration reform, an unemployment benefit extension, a minimum wage hike, protecting New Mexico's nuclear weapons labs and helping to create private-sector jobs from federal research and development spending as top priorities, among other initiatives.

Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, both Democrats, told the Journal they plan to focus on ways to bolster New Mexico's economy. Among their most immediate priorities is helping to pass a bill extending unemployment benefits that expired on Dec. 28. The measure stalled in the Senate last week.

"We need to help these families pay for basic necessities," Udall said.

Udall, a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, said he is relieved that Congress passed a two-year budget resolution in December, which should help return both chambers to their "regular order" of business. Anoth- er potential fight over the debt ceiling looms in early February, but most congressional observers expect some kind of deal to avert a government shutdown.

Udall said the House and Senate appropriations committees can now determine actual spending levels, which is critical for federally dependent states such as New Mexico.

"It's important we do our No. 1 job, which is set priorities for the federal government through funding bills," he said. "It makes a big difference for New Mexico."

Udall said he plans an aggressive push for construction projects on New Mexico's military bases to help keep them viable and off of any federal Base Realignment and Closure Commission lists. He vowed to continue working to protect spending at Los Alamos and Sandia national laboratories, especially for the budget beleaguered B-61 bomber.

Udall also said he hopes the U.S. House will follow the Senate's lead and pass an immigration reform bill. House Speaker John Boehner, R-Ohio, said last week that he planned to introduce a list of conservative "principles" on the issue soon to spur action in the House. But the speaker's list is not expected to contain a path to citizenship for the estimated 12 millions illegal immigrants already in the U.S.

Rep. Steve Pearce, the New Mexico delegation's lone Republican, predicted the citizenship issue will remain a sticking point between the GOP-controlled House and the Democratic-controlled Senate. Pearce has long supported a greatly expanded guest worker program but opposes outright legalization.

"The ultimate question that comes down is, are we going to pass amnesty or not?" Pearce said. "With 7 percent unemployment, we ought to be really careful about opening these immigration doors to too many people."

Pearce said he plans to continue his fight against what he views as unnecessary federal spending, as well as the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service's attempts to list species as endangered that he deems harmful to New Mexico's economy. Pearce has opposed the listing of the lesser prairie chicken and sagebrush lizard in New Mexico, arguing that the restrictions would harm job creation and productive land use.

"We'll be taking proactive stances when Fish and Wildlife is trying to list this species and that species," Pearce said. "We're going to try to come up with innovative ways to protect species and keep the jobs there."

Heinrich said economic issues will most likely dominate his agenda.

"I think you'll see a lot of effort into raising the minimum wage and trying to extend unemployment for the long-term unemployed," Heinrich said. "We'll also be looking very closely at student loans and student debt."

Heinrich, a member of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, also said he will push for wilderness protections in New Mexico, including a bill he has co-sponsored with Udall that would set aside almost a half-million acres in southern New Mexico as a national monument.

Several members of the New Mexico delegation cited technology transfer as a key agenda item. Tech transfer is a fancy phrase for spinning government-funded research and technology, such as the billions spent at Sandia and Los Alamos, into private-sector jobs.

Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., is co-chairman of the House Technology Transfer Caucus.
He, Lujan Grisham and Heinrich each told the Journal they will push to maintain the labs' Lab Directed Research and Development budgets in a way that helps spur innovation. Those funds are under attack from some in Congress as unnecessary in a time of tight budgets.

Udall, who expects to introduce a new tech transfer bill in the coming weeks, said Ernest Moniz, the new secretary of energy, is attuned to the importance of the issue.

"I feel better about getting something done," Udall said. "I think the new secretary has an interest here."

New Mexico Dems: New Mexico's Democratic Congressional Delegation Announces $1.6 Million Grant for Highway and Road Repairs

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 249 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, Congressman Ben Ray Lujan, and Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham have announced that the New Mexico Department of Transportation will receive a $1.6 million grant for repair and reconstruction of roads around the state damaged in last year's floods. The grant funds will be used to restore major highways and roads on federal lands that were damaged by the severe flooding in September. The record-breaking rain and storms caused damage in about two-thirds of the state.

In October, at the urging of the congressional delegation, President Obama declared a major disaster for the state of New Mexico and Santa Clara Pueblo for the severe storms and flooding that occurred from Sept. 9-22. This funding is being made available as a result of the delegation's request for emergency relief. It will help restore essential traffic, minimize the extent of damage, protect remaining facilities, and complete other permanent repairs necessary to restore roads and highways to their pre-flooding conditions. The U.S. Department of Transportation, Federal Highway Administration authorized the funds through an Emergency Relief program, which may award funds to a state after the president or governor issues a formal emergency declaration and if the state requests emergency relief for repairs to its eligible highways.

New Mexico Dems: Congressman Ben Ray Lujan: Senate Action on Unemployment Insurance a Good First Step

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 364 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District applauded Senate action today that will allow for the consideration of bipartisan legislation to extend federal unemployment benefits that expired at the end of last month. On December 28, 1.3 million Americans, including 6,000 New Mexicans, saw their unemployment benefits run out at a time when the economy in New Mexico continues to struggle in the wake of the deepest recession in a generation.

"The Senate vote to move forward on legislation to extend unemployment insurance is a positive first step toward helping our friends and neighbors who want to work and support their families, but are not finding opportunities to get ahead during these difficult economic times," Congressman Lujan said. "Instead of providing a lifeline for the long-term unemployed in New Mexico, House Republican leaders have sat idly by as unemployment benefits for thousands of New Mexicans expired, and as more individuals stand to lose benefits every week."

Without Congressional action, an additional 9,000 New Mexicans will lose federal unemployment benefits over the next six months. Last month, Lujan wrote to House Speaker John Boehner (http://www.lujan.house.gov/press-releases/luj%C3%A1n-signs-letter-to-boehner-calling-for-extension-of-federal-unemployment-insurance/) urging him to schedule a House vote on this important issue before recessing for the year. Republican leaders failed to act, allowing benefits to lapse. Lujan is once again calling for action in the House.

"As the House returns to Washington this week, extending unemployment benefits should be a top priority. At a time when there are three job seekers for every one job opening, an extension to this important safety net can help families continue to weather these tough times," Lujan added. "Not only does unemployment insurance support those who have been hit hardest by the recession, but it also assists our local businesses that feel the impact when families no longer can afford the basics of food, clothing, or rent."

LUJAN STATEMENT ON 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE WAR ON POVERTY

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 373 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on the 50th anniversary of President Lyndon B. Johnson's "War on Poverty."

"Fifty years ago, in a State of the Union Address, President Johnson declared "War on Poverty' and brought to the conscience of a nation the plight of millions of Americans who were suffering from hunger, unemployment, and a lack of economic opportunity. He focused attention on those for whom the American Dream had fallen out of reach.

"Since that time, our nation has made strides, implementing polices that have given more Americans an opportunity to succeed and climb the ladder out of poverty. Social Security and Medicare have been instrumental in helping millions of Americans avoid the clutches of poverty and secure dignity in their older years. Head Start, Pell Grants, and nutrition assistance have all helped lift millions of families out of destitution.

"Despite these efforts over the past 50 years, much work still remains. In New Mexico, too many of our friends and neighbors are living in poverty. Too many of our children go to bed hungry every night. Too many Americans still "live on the outskirts of hope' just as President Johnson saw five decades ago. Our fight against poverty must not fade. As long as 20 percent of New Mexicans continue to live in poverty, we must continue to work toward solutions that provide a fair shot at the American Dream.

"Slashing nutrition assistance for families that are struggling to put food on the table and allowing unemployment insurance to expire for those who are working so hard to find a job in the face of a tough economy is no way to achieve this goal. Providing a safety net that supports families during difficult times along with implementing economic policies that invest in education, innovation, and infrastructure are critical components of an agenda that will create jobs and provide opportunities for all Americans.

"As we recognize this anniversary of President Johnson's call to action, let us recommit to work on behalf of the men, women, and children who live in poverty and address this challenge head on."

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. (3rd CD), issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on the 50th anniversary of President Lyndon B. Johnson's "War on Poverty."

"Fifty years ago, in a State of the Union Address, President Johnson declared 'War on Poverty' and brought to the conscience of a nation the plight of millions of Americans who were suffering from hunger, unemployment, and a lack of economic opportunity. He focused attention on those for whom the American Dream had fallen out of reach.

"Since that time, our nation has made strides, implementing polices that have given more Americans an opportunity to succeed and climb the ladder out of poverty. Social Security and Medicare have been instrumental in helping millions of Americans avoid the clutches of poverty and secure dignity in their older years. Head Start, Pell Grants, and nutrition assistance have all helped lift millions of families out of destitution.

"Despite these efforts over the past 50 years, much work still remains. In New Mexico, too many of our friends and neighbors are living in poverty. Too many of our children go to bed hungry every night. Too many Americans still 'live on the outskirts of hope' just as President Johnson saw five decades ago. Our fight against poverty must not fade. As long as 20 percent of New Mexicans continue to live in poverty, we must continue to work toward solutions that provide a fair shot at the American Dream.

"Slashing nutrition assistance for families that are struggling to put food on the table and allowing unemployment insurance to expire for those who are working so hard to find a job in the face of a tough economy is no way to achieve this goal. Providing a safety net that supports families during difficult times along with implementing economic policies that invest in education, innovation, and infrastructure are critical components of an agenda that will create jobs and provide opportunities for all Americans.

"As we recognize this anniversary of President Johnson's call to action, let us recommit to work on behalf of the men, women, and children who live in poverty and address this challenge head on."

LUJAN: SENATE ACTION ON UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE A POSITIVE FIRST STEP;
With 6,000 New Mexicans Having Lost Benefits, House Needs to Act;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 345 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District applauded Senate action today that will allow for the consideration of bipartisan legislation to extend federal unemployment benefits that expired at the end of last month. On December 28, 1.3 million Americans, including 6,000 New Mexicans, saw their unemployment benefits run out at a time when the economy in New Mexico continues to struggle in the wake of the deepest recession in a generation.

"The Senate vote to move forward on legislation to extend unemployment insurance is a positive first step toward helping our friends and neighbors who want to work and support their families, but are not finding opportunities to get ahead during these difficult economic times," Congressman Lujan said. "Instead of providing a lifeline for the long-term unemployed in New Mexico, House Republican leaders have sat idly by as unemployment benefits for thousands of New Mexicans expired, and as more individuals stand to lose benefits every week."

Without Congressional action, an additional 9,000 New Mexicans will lose federal unemployment benefits over the next six months. Last month, Lujan wrote to House Speaker John Boehner urging him to schedule a House vote on this important issue before recessing for the year. Republican leaders failed to act, allowing benefits to lapse. Lujan is once again calling for action in the House.

"As the House returns to Washington this week, extending unemployment benefits should be a top priority. At a time when there are three job seekers for every one job opening, an extension to this important safety net can help families continue to weather these tough times," Lujan added. "Not only does unemployment insurance support those who have been hit hardest by the recession, but it also assists our local businesses that feel the impact when families no longer can afford the basics of food, clothing, or rent."

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL

LENGTH: 140 words

DATELINE: ALBUQUERQUE, N.M.

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) - Two members of New Mexico's congressional delegation are pushing for the preservation of Native American seeds.

Legislation introduced by U.S. Reps. Michelle Lujan Grisham and Ben Ray Lujan would focus on those seeds that are used for cultural, religious, medicinal, ceremonial and agricultural purposes.

Under the measure, tribes could get grants from the U.S. Department of Agriculture for research, education and training programs aimed at protecting the purity of Native American seeds.

The legislation would also allow for the construction of seed storage facilities.

At Tesuque Pueblo in northern New Mexico, Tribal Gov. Mark Mitchell says environmental contaminants and other factors are threatening the integrity of the community's native seeds.

The legislation has been referred to the House Agriculture Committee.

Bill introduced to protect NM seeds

LENGTH: 322 words

Reps. Michelle Lujan Grisham (NM-1) and Ben Ray Luján (NM-3) have introduced legislation to help preserve Native American seeds used for cultural, religious, medicinal, ceremonial and agricultural purposes.

The Native American Seeds Protection Act of 2013 would allow tribes to obtain grants from the U.S. Department of Agriculture to conduct research, education and training programs aimed at protecting the purity of Native American seeds.

The legislation would also allow the construction of seed storage facilities.

"New Mexico's rich Native American history has made countless contributions to our state's culture and traditions," said Lujan Grisham in a statement. "Protecting native seeds keeps tribal communities connected to their ancestors and preserves access to a critical cultural resource. Tribes are becoming increasingly concerned that current conditions threaten the purity of these native seeds. That's why I'm proud to introduce the Native American Seeds Protection Act, legislation that will expand the capacity of tribes to test, monitor and preserve their native seeds for future generations."

"Protecting native seeds is about more than protecting a critical source of food and medicines - it is about preserving the heritage and culture of Native American communities," said Rep. Luján, a vice chair of the Congressional Native American Caucus. "These seeds represent not only food and sustenance; they represent a way of life and cultural practices that have been passed down for generations. Native seeds also exemplify the strong connection that many New Mexico communities have to the land. This legislation will provide federal grants that will assist in the effort to protect and preserve Native American seeds and the rich culture they embody."

Reaction varies in N.M. Supreme Court ruling

BYLINE: Arin McKenna

SECTION: TODAY'S NEWS

LENGTH: 764 words

The New Mexico Supreme Court ruling legalizing same-gender marriage prompted reactions across the United States.

U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham issued a joint statement applauding the ruling.

"Today's court ruling is a resounding victory for New Mexicans in all four corners who love one another and deserve to be treated equally under the law-just as our Constitution intended," said Udall. "Our country has come a long way in advancing marriage equality for all, and I am proud New Mexico is joining in that forward progress. I'm also glad the court has finally provided the legal clarity for the countless New Mexicans who have been in limbo for too long, and I congratulate all our families in New Mexico who will finally be treated with the respect and dignity they deserve."

"Today is a proud day for New Mexico and a significant step forward to creating a fairer, more just society. I am thrilled that the New Mexico Supreme Court found that our constitution requires marriage equality for all our citizens," said Heinrich. "This ruling stands to strengthen New Mexico families and affirms that loving same sex couples who accept the responsibility of marriage are respected and recognized in our state. We must continue our march toward full equality for all Americans."

"Today's decision by the New Mexico Supreme Court ensures that every couple can make the personal choice of marriage," said Luján. "Marriage equality is a matter of civil rights and treating all people who are in loving and committed relationships fairly. Gay and lesbian couples make the same contributions and sacrifices that we all do, including paying taxes, owning business and caring for their families. Now everyone will be treated equally under the law."

"This is an incredible victory for New Mexico, where we believe that all families matter and that everyone deserves the same basic rights and responsibilities that only marriage provides," said Lujan Grisham.

"This ruling confirms what we already know and believe - that in New Mexico, freedom means freedom for everyone. I'm thrilled that all New Mexicans now have the opportunity to marry the person they love, and I'm proud that our state is on the right side of history."

"Despite countless efforts made by County Clerks throughout New Mexico, I am proud that New Mexico will join the other 16 states who have legalized same-sex marriage and would like to commend the New Mexico Supreme Court for upholding the State's anti-discrimination provisions in the constitution and outlawing any further discrimination of same-sex couples," wrote State Representative Stephanie Garcia Richard (D-District 43).

"I have been touched by the stories of loving couples, here in District 43, that stood up against out-dated laws and for their equal rights as taxpaying citizens, to obtain marriage licenses in the towns they call home. This is a historic day and I am thrilled to continue to fight for all residents, regardless of race, gender, sexuality and mobility, during the upcoming legislative session."

New Mexico Attorney General and gubernatorial candidate Gary King, who argued for marriage equality in the case before the N.M. Supreme Court, wrote, "This ruling brings the fight for equal rights another step forward - and allows thousands of couples the right to marry the people they love, free from government interference, and protected from undue discrimination. It will allow them to visit their sick spouses in the hospital, to receive health and other benefits due to married couples, and to be counted as spouses in countless other aspects, from loan applications to tax filings."

Not all reactions were positive. Voices for Family Values wrote, "Today the New Mexico Supreme Court released their ruling which redefines marriage to mean something it was never meant to be. The unfortunate effects this will have on society are sweeping. The court chose to issue a mandate and tear down an important pillar of our society-- the traditional family. This opens new opportunities for the traditional family to be undermined and our societies threads to be ravaged."

The organization is collecting signatures from those opposed to same-sex marriage to present to the 2014 legislature.

State Sen. William Sharer (R-Farmington) expressed disappointment in the ruling and vowed to continue his push for a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage.

"If they are saying (prohibiting gay marriage) is unconstitutional," Sharer said, "we need to make it constitutional."

New Mexico becomes 17th state to allow gay marriage

BYLINE: Steve Terrell, The Santa Fe New Mexican

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 1312 words

Dec. 20--The state Supreme Court ruled unanimously Thursday that it's unconstitutional to deny marriage licenses to same-sex couples in New Mexico.

News of the ruling, which came after eight county clerks in the state had started issuing marriage licenses to same-sex couples earlier this year, spread quickly on social media and touched off celebrations among marriage-equality advocates.

New Mexico joins 16 other states in allowing gay marriage through legislation, court rules or voter referendums.

Justice Edward Chávez wrote in the court's opinion that although New Mexico's marriage statutes do not specifically prohibit same-gender marriages, existing state laws have had the effect of preventing same-gender couples from marrying and enjoying the rights and protections of civil marriage.

Read the New Mexico Supreme Court's opinion

Such couples have been "subjected to a history of discrimination and violence," he wrote, and barring them from getting married violates the constitution's equal protection clause. New Mexico cannot deny them the right to marry, he said, "unless the proponents of the legislation -- the opponents of same-gender marriage -- prove that the discrimination caused by the legislation is substantially related to an important government interest."

The court rejected the argument that "responsible procreation and child-rearing" is an "overriding governmental interest," in part because procreation has never been a condition of marriage under New Mexico law, and state law recognizes the right of same-gender couples to raise children.

The court declined to strike down the state's marriage laws, however, because that would be inconsistent with the Legislature's commitment to "fostering stable families." However, Chávez wrote, all the rights, protections and responsibilities of marriage shall "apply equally to both same-gender and opposite-gender married couples."

Politicians supporting gay marriage immediately began to weigh in, expressing jubilation.

City Councilor Patti Bushee and former state Democratic Party chairman Javier Gonzales, two of the three candidates running in the Santa Fe mayor's race, praised the decision, as did two Democratic gubernatorial candidates, Alan Webber and Gary King, as well as Santa Fe Mayor David Coss and current state Democratic Party Chairman Sam Bregman.

Former New Mexico Gov. Gary Johnson, a longtime Republican who ran as a Libertarian in the 2012 presidential election, sent an email, saying, "This ruling is in line with our basic values as a state. In New Mexico, we don't turn our back on any member of our families."

Democrats in New Mexico's congressional delegation -- U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham -- issued a joint news release applauding the decision.

As the news spread across the country, actor George Takei, who played Hikaru Sulu in the original Star Trek, tweeted, "Oh happy day! New Mexico makes 17!"

Gov. Susana Martinez, not a supporter of marriage equality, issued a statement calling for both sides of the issue to show each other respect.

"My personal views on this issue are well-known, and I'm confident that most New Mexicans believe, like I do, that it should have been settled by a vote of the people," Martinez said. "Instead, the Supreme Court stepped in and rendered their decision."

The governor said that while she's sure there will be "intense debate about this decision," she encouraged New Mexicans "to continue to respect one another in their discourse, as this is an important issue for many New Mexicans on both sides. As we move forward, I am hopeful that we will not be divided, as we must come together to tackle very pressing issues, like reforming education and growing our economy, in the weeks and months ahead."

Asked for comment about the decision, a spokesman for the New Mexico Conference of Catholic Bishops, which is opposed to same-sex marriage, pointed to a brief statement on the website of the Archdiocese of Santa Fe.

"The bishops of New Mexico recognize the New Mexico Supreme Court as the interpreter of the State Constitution. The Catholic Church respects and loves the gay and lesbian members of our community. We will continue to promote Catholic teaching of the Biblical definition of marriage to be that of one man and one woman."

State Sen. Bill Sharer, R-Farmington, a leading legislative opponent of same-sex marriage, said in a statement that he's disappointed by the court ruling. But, he added, "If they are saying [prohibiting gay marriage] is unconstitutional, we need to make it constitutional."

Sharer said he plans to introduce a constitutional amendment to reverse the court's ruling. He had planned to prefile a proposed amendment Thursday, but when the court's decision came down, he decided to redraft it to make sure it conformed with points made by the high court.

On the national level, Brian Brown, president of National Organization for Marriage, issued a statement saying,"Once again, activists judges have thrown out the historic legal understanding of marriage in New Mexico. This is a continuation of a very dangerous rush towards silencing people of faith who simply believe marriage to be the union of one man and one woman."

After oral arguments in the Supreme Court last October, Sharer had predicted the court would rule in favor of same-sex marriage but said he would seek legislation to specifically outlaw it.

Legislative opponents of gay marriage have tried for more than a decade to pass laws or constitutional amendments to prohibit homosexuals from marrying each other. Normally, such bills get stuck in the legislative committee process. With Democrats controlling the Legislature, there's not much to suggest that the result would be any different in the upcoming session.

Meanwhile, county clerks who haven't already been issuing marriage licenses to same-sex couples began preparing to do so.

Sandoval County Clerk Eileen Garbagni said Thursday that her office will begin issuing marriage licenses to gay couples at 9 a.m. Friday, Dec. 20. "We've got the paperwork ready," she said. Katrina Salazar, who works at the Rio Arriba County Clerk's Office in Tierra Amarilla, said because of the ruling, her office will now begin issuing marriage licenses to same-sex couples. "That's the law," she said.

The decision could have significant benefits for married gay people who are eligible for Social Security benefits or will be eligible soon.

"As the rules are currently written, state recognition of a marriage is key to the issue of Social Security retirement benefits and survivor benefits," said Brad Wright, a spokesman for the Washington, D.C.-based National Committee to Preserve Social Security and Medicare. "The difference can be literally life-changing for some, with hundreds of dollars more per month."

The website for the Social Security Administration says the agency is developing and implementing its policies in that area.

"If you are in, or are a surviving spouse of, a same-sex marriage or other legal same-sex relationship, even if you live in a state that prohibits same-sex marriage, we encourage you to apply right away," the website says.

The issue came to a head in New Mexico this year, when same-sex couples in Las Cruces, Bernalillo and Santa Fe counties asked county clerks to issue marriage licenses. At first the clerks declined, but then judicial filings cleared the way for same-sex licenses in some counties but not others.

The case was accepted by the five-member court when all 33 county clerks across the state asked for clarity on the laws.

New Mexico Dems: New Mexico's Democratic Lawmakers Applaud New Mexico Supreme Court Decision on Marriage Equality

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, Congressman Ben Ray Lujan and Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham joined together yesterday in applauding the decision by the New Mexico Supreme Court that affirms marriage equality in the State of New Mexico.

"We hold that the State of New Mexico is constitutionally required to allow same-gender couples to marry and must extend to them the rights, protections, and responsibilities that derive from civil marriage under New Mexico law," wrote Justice Edward Chavez in a unanimous 5 to 0 decision. The Court found that prohibiting individuals from marrying solely because of sexual orientation is a violation of the Equal Protection Clause in the New Mexico Constitution.

"[The] court ruling is a resounding victory for New Mexicans in all four corners who love one another and deserve to be treated equally under the law - just as our Constitution intended," said Udall issued yesterday afternoon. EDITORIAL: An essential step -- Scale back spying

SECTION: COMMENTARY

LENGTH: 787 words

Dec. 19--The decision by a federal judge earlier this week granting a preliminary injunction to block the government's collection of domestic phone records is welcome to all who believe that U.S. citizens have the right to privacy absent probable cause of wrongdoing. U.S. District Court Judge Richard J. Leon, in making his ruling, is saying that the goverment's widespread, secret spying program is likely unconstitutional.

Naturally, the ruling by Leon will not stand unchallenged. Expect more debate and more discussion about just how far the government needs to go to protect the security of citizens. But it is time to stop the debating and start restraining the nation's security agencies. People deserve, as the Fourth Amendment so clearly states, to be secure in their person -- without unwarranted government intrusion and spying. That is true whether we are talking about police breaking into a home without probable cause or government spies from the National Security Agency capturing the records of a private citizens' cellphone calls.

For New Mexicans, some of the strongest fighters against an overreaching government are our two U.S. senators, Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich. (The state's House delegation, Democratic U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Luján, Michelle Lujan Grisham and Republican Steve Pearce, also are calling for less NSA spying and more accountability. All three voted last summer to defund the NSA mass surveillance program, through an amendment to the Defense Department's annual appropriation bill that failed narrowly.)

Udall, New Mexico's senior senator, has long been a champion of civil liberties and the rights of citizens to be left alone. He voted against the USA Patriot Act, passed in the post 9/11 fervor to fight terrorism no matter the cost to liberty. He correctly predicted that the Patriot Act would undermine the rights of citizens. He continues to push for scaling back mass spying and for investigations of these programs. As he said: "We can protect our national security without sacrificing our constitutional rights."

Heinrich, in a statement applauding the decision, put it well: "We have allowed the intelligence community to stray from what the Framers had in mind when they wrote the Fourth Amendment and were dealing directly with government overreach. It's increasingly clear that some of the NSA's current efforts are unnecessary, and possibly unlawful." In a closed Senate Select Committee on Intelligence hearing in October, Heinrich offered an amendment that would have stopped the NSA from collecting Americans' cellphone location information in bulk while still allowing the government to obtain individual warrants. The amendment failed by a 7-8 vote.

More broadly, Heinrich and Udall back the USA Freedom Act, legislation that would end the metadata collection of Americans' phone and other communications records currently allowed under Section 215 of the USA Patriot Act. This legislation should pass -- and it is an issue that can unite liberals and conservatives. People from all political persuasions agree that it is wrong to invade privacy so routinely.

This preliminary ruling -- made by an appointee of President George W. Bush -- is limited to the cases before the court. With numerous other lawsuits in the pipeline, though, this decision should be the beginning of the people reclaiming their right to privacy. Leon delayed his order barring the government collecting the information pending an appeal, but it is clear he expects the plaintiffs to prevail.

Citizens know about this unprecedented mining of information because one man, Edward Snowden, leaked the existence of the program to journalists -- at considerable risk to his safety and security. Snowden, who had been a National Security Agency contractor, believed the government's spying program had to be exposed. He thought Americans deserved to know what their government was doing to their privacy, and that if made public, the programs would not survive a constitutional challenge. Today, Snowden is living in Russia and trying to find asylum from a government that still wants to arrest him and put him on trial for espionage.

His actions gave citizens important knowledge about their government's actions. A federal judge is warning that security agencies are going too far. It is up to citizens to follow through now and demand action from their elected representatives. Unless people are willing to fight for their privacy, they will sacrifice it to a security state whose appetite for information can never be satisfied.

JESSICA ROSENWORCEL, COMMISSIONER, FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

AJIT VARADARAJ PAI, COMMISSIONER, FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

MICHAEL P. O'RIELLY, COMMISSIONER, FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

[*] WALDEN: I'll call to order the Subcommittee on Communication and Technology. And it's a delight to welcome all five members of the Federal Communications Commission, fully installed and bright and shiny faces and welcome to go today. We welcome you. And Chairman Wheeler and Commissioner O'Rielly, we especially welcome you and look forward to working with you to set the communications agenda for the United States.

Federal Communications Commission is the arm of our government, tasked with fostering some of the most important parts of our national economy. And among them, the telecommunications industry, the video distribution industries and the Internet.

Give the economic significance of these industries, the changes from Congress -- the charge from Congress to encourage competition, license our national spectrum assets and facilitate technological advances is one that must be discharged with transparency, accountability and a long view of the technological landscape.

It is with this in mind, that the subcommittee has worked over the last three years on efforts to improve the commission's processes. As the subcommittee with jurisdiction over the Federal Communications Commission, take this task very seriously and with great care to ensure the commission not only remains a vital institution, but one that can serve as an example for other federal agencies of accountability and efficiency.

A bipartisan majority of this subcommittee is deeply committed to this cause, and it's proud to have reported out a bipartisan FCC Process Reform Bill to the full House of Representatives, yesterday.

Chairman Wheeler, it's clear you want to improve the agency. I've appreciated our conversations and your comments. And I'd like to commend for turning your attention to this task as one of your first roles as chairman by asking one of your top advisers to review the FCC process and submit recommendations for improvement by early 2014.

While there are a number of large proceedings currently pending at the commission, many of which we will talk about today, I'm particularly concerned with returning the commission to addressing some of its long overdue responsibilities.

For example, despite multiple unsuccessful trips to the Third Circuit Court of Appeals, the commission's responsibility to address the media ownership proceeding, remains unfulfilled.

Additionally, licensing, one of the original -- licensing, one of the original reasons for the creation of the commission, has fallen woefully behind.

Of particular note is the tragic pace of processing of applications in the commission's media bureau.

Now the AM radio industry has been clamoring for the ability to use FM translators to give new life to that classic medium. And I certainly appreciate what Commissioner Pai has done, taking on this issue and it's very good work.

And as a former licensee, I actually know firsthand, the commission has been in no rush to address translator applications. In fact, my own application sat unresolved at the commission for 10 years.

To put this in context, while the commission considered my application, my wife and I actually sold our radio stations, our son went off an graduated from college and every full power television station in the country converted from analog to digital broadcasting.

Look, the commission can do better than that. The commission should do better than that. And I'm hopeful that our shared commitment will lead to improvement in that bureau.

As the only one on the panel with the unique experience of having been a licensee of commercial broadcast and still under your jurisdiction with my amateur radio license, which I'm set to renew for March, hopefully I will get approved within 10 years, I'd like to offer two pieces of advice for you as you move forward with your change.

First, where Congress has spoken, I urge you to heed the words in statute and reject calls to act in ways contrary to congressional intent. For example, in the incentive auction proceeding, some are calling on the commission to exclude bidders from participating in the auction. Others, still are calling for excessive guard bands in the attempt to end-run requirements to license, reclaim TV band spectrum.

I'm just saying both are bad ideas.

Second, I urge you to bear in mine that even seemingly small changes in your rules can have significant impact on the market. The commission's recent decision to apply yet incomplete rules to its UHF discount has effectively frozen many plans for broadcast mergers and acquisition.

The problem here isn't that the commission wants to update or needs to update the UHF discount rule, the problem is that absent a decision how and importantly, when the commission will move forward, it has pressed paused for an indefinite period of time.

We all know that markets do not react favorable to this kind of open-ended uncertainty.

On the other hand, I applaud the recent announcement on the schedule for the spectrum incentive auctions. Both the broadcast and wireless industries are waiting with bated breath to see how the FCC addresses this first-of-a-kind auction.

To say nothing of the public safety agencies that are counting on the auction fund to fund FirstNet. The certainty of a timetable is good for both stakeholders and for the commission.

Finally, turning to those large proceedings the commission has on its plate. We're looking forward to working with you to tackle the tough issues like the I.P. transition, universal service reform and media ownership.

Chairman Upton and I recently launched a large proceeding of our own, an initiative to update the Communications Act. Each of you brings the unique perspective to your work on the commission, industry lobbyist, newspaper publisher, a couple of lawyers, even some former legislative Hill staffers. That experience, combined with your expertise on the Federal Communications Commission staff and your own work on the commission, will be valuable in our efforts as we work together to update and modernize the Communications Act.

So Congress -- or Chairman Wheeler...

(LAUGHTER)

We wouldn't want to demote you to level of congressman.

Chairman Wheeler -- yeah, our numbers aren't that great -- Commissioner O'Rielly, we especially welcome you aboard the FCC and Commissioners Clyburn, Rosenworcel and Pai, welcome back, not only the commission, but before our committee. We thank you all for joining us today, we look forward to working together in this very critical sector of America's economy to spur further innovation technology growth and jobs.

And with that, I will now yield to the ranking member of the subcommittee, my friend Ms. Eshoo from California.

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman for holding this hearing, it's wonderful to see a full Federal Communications Commission before us. Welcome to each one of you, special welcome to the new chairman.

I think that you started out with 100 percent goodwill with everyone that is on this committee, I think our full committee -- in fact I think the Congress.

We have -- there have been many months where we didn't have a full commission. I want to once again thank Commissioner Clyburn for her exceptional leadership during that period of time.

Welcome to each one of the commissioners, and of course, to the newest commissioner, Mike O'Rielly, who served on the other side of that table.

When I first came to the committee, he was here when we began -- began the Telecom Act. And now, guess what, you get to trudge through that all over again, according to the chairman.

So I guess there are some things that we just never finish with.

As Chairman Wheeler announced last week, the commission has made the upcoming incentive auction of broadcast television spectrum the top priority of the commission. And I agree.

This is a rare opportunity to auction beach-front spectrum under 1 gigahertz. And the FCC has to structure rules to promote a competitive wireless landscape and ensure carriers, of all sizes, both regional and national, have an opportunity to bid competitively for license spectrum.

And it has to be done right. It's the first in the history of the world that an auction has been structured this way. And I appreciate, Mr. Chairman, and all the commissioners, your understanding, the delicacy of this needing to be done right, well and successfully.

Similarly, recognizing the enormous economic and societal benefits of unlicensed spectrum which is tucked away in one corner of my telecom heart. The FCC has an opportunity to structure a band plan that ensures the nationwide block of spectrum under 1 gigahertz, dedicated for unlicensed innovation.

With unlicensed spectrum being a critical tool to bring broadband to unserved areas, including rural America, this opportunity really must be seized.

In addition to the important role the FCC has in freeing up more spectrum for mobile broadband, I'd like to highlight four issues that the commission should make a top priority in 2014. And I think you're going to.

First during the three months since I released a draft legislation, the message from individuals, communications companies and consumer groups has been abundantly clear. Our video laws are in need of reform, they're broken.

Independent of such legislation, the commission does have an important responsibility to promote competition, consumer choice and localism across the video marketplace.

Second, I hope the commission will continue its focus on modernizing the E-Rate program to support a 21st Century digital needs of our schools and libraries.

In June, together with Commissioner Rosenworcel, we called for such an update. And I'm pleased that the White House and the FCC agree with us and have made this issue a key priority. We have to stay on it. We have to move and we have to make it much better. It's gotta be a 21st century plan.

Third, the commission should uphold, I think, the goals (ph) of Section 629 and ensure a vibrant, competitive retail set-top box market. A successor to the current CableCARD regime, whether by FCC rule, or more preferably, a voluntary industry agreement, will usher in a new generation of technologies that will give consumers giver choice and ensure that innovation flourishes.

Finally, I'm pleased that the commission has made the transition to Next Generation 911, as well as improving the indoor location accuracy of 911 calls the key priority.

In fact, later today, it's my understanding that the commission will vote on an order to improve the reliability of 911. And I look forward to continued updates as the commission proceeds with the implementation of Next Gen 911.

Mr. Chairman, thank you for holding this morning's hearing. I look forward to the important testimony of Chairman Wheeler and each of the commissioners, most importantly, I pledge to work with each of you to make American's communications sector the most effective and the most admired in the world.

And with that, I yield back.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back.

Chair now recognizes the chairman of the full committee, Mr. Upton from Michigan, I believe.

UPTON: Great, (inaudible) Michigan.

WALDEN: (inaudible) Ohio.

UPTON: Thank you-- thank you, Mr. Chairman.

You know, today we welcome a fully constituted FCC back to the Energy and Commerce Committee. The -- the last time that we heard from the full commission was in July of 2012.

So the FCC has regulatory authority over a sector of our economy that is critical to innovation, jobs and our nation's global leadership in technology.

Communication sector is also an integral part of our daily lives, connecting us to loved ones, alerting us to natural disasters and entertaining and educating us every single day.

As the regulatory agency of these industries, the FCC has the immensely important task of promoting growth and competition. Our hearing today will examine actions that the FCC has taken since the commission last appeared and set expectations for the agency's future.

As the oversight authority for the commission, our committee works hard to ensure that the FCC functions to the benefit of America consumers as well as companies.

We also wanna make sure that this agency functions efficiently and transparently as all government agencies should.

I'm glad to say that this is not a partisan concern. Bipartisan majority on a voice vote of the full committee reported an FCC process reform bill yesterday that will help the FCC operate more openly and defectively. And we expect it to be on the House floor in the not too distant future.

And the bill is needed. There are several stalled proceedings and ambiguous projects at the commission that cause concern to me and other members of the committee. We've sent a number of letters in the past months regarding media ownership.

Subcommittee Vice Chair Latta has gone to the extent of drafting a bill to end the cable set-top box integration ban, a bill that seems to make a lot of sense, and which perhaps the FCC should have considered doing a while ago. My concern and hope is that we can start a productive dialogue today with our esteemed witnesses on these and the many other important issues pending at the commission.

Commission O'Rielly, I'd like to welcome you back to the Energy and Commerce Committee, a committee you know well, having once served here as the staff.

And Chairman Wheeler, though you're from Ohio, this is often known as the big house, now the Dingell room. Hope you appreciate the -- the green and white decor.

(LAUGHTER)

And yes, we were first party.

(LAUGHTER)

Welcome back.

And I yield to other members, Republican members.

WALDEN: The chairman now recognizes the vice chair of the Subcommittee on Communications, Mr. Latta from Ohio.

(LAUGHTER)

Home of the speaker of the House.

(LAUGHTER)

LATTA: (inaudible) number two.

But thank you very much for yielding, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you very much to our commissioner for being with us today.

And welcome to our newest members for the commission. I really appreciate you -- having you here with us today.

The communications and technology industry has been a consistent bright spot in the U.S. economy. It's created millions of American jobs, spurred significant investment and innovation and, most importantly, empowered consumers, who are the driving force behind robust competition in the communications marketplace.

As U.S.-based businesses lead the world in technological advances, we have a responsibility to ensure the FCC fosters continued growth and development in the communications sector.

This can be achieved by the FCC incorporating more transparency and accountability in its processes, operating within the bounds of its statutory authority and acting upon legislation according to congressional intent. I look forward to continuing working with Chairman Upton and the members of this committee and also Congressman Green on my H.R. 3196, which is the legislation to eliminate the integration ban on the set- top boxes and allow the marketplace to get to the next-generation innovation without the regulatory barriers being put in front of it.

I look forward to the hearing and hearing the testimony today.

And, Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

Thank you.

WALDEN: The chair recognizes the gentlelady from Tennessee, the vice chair of the full committee, for the remaining 40 seconds, if she wants it.

BLACKBURN: And I thank the chairman.

I want to welcome all of our commissioners and publicly commend Commissioner Clyburn for the wonderful work that she did when she served as the acting chair. We appreciate that leadership.

And, Chairman Wheeler, we look forward to having you continue and to work in a collaborative manner to find results for the private sector.

We would hope that the commission will be proactive, not get beyond its mission, but to stay focused on your core mission. Pay attention to economic analysis. Look at cost to benefit analysis. And make certain that you don't suffer mission creep, which is casting a shadow over the private sector.

With that, I yield back.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back.

The chair recognizes the ranking member of the full committee, Mr. Waxman.

WAXMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I want to welcome the members of the commission, Chairman Wheeler and all the commissioners.

And I also want to join in commending Commissioner Clyburn for the incredible job she did as acting chairwoman, from the industry agreement on interoperability to long overdue reforms on prison phone rates, your brief chairmanship will be remembered for the remarkable amount you accomplished.

Let me welcome Chairman Wheeler and Commissioner O'Rielly. I congratulate you on your appointment and confirmation, and we're pleased to have you here.

You join the FCC at a time when our country is undergoing dramatic and perhaps fundamental transformations in communications networks and technologies, and the decisions you make at the commission will no doubt have lasting impact on our nation's communications landscape.

At the top of the FCC agenda is the spectrum auctions authorized by the Public Safety and Spectrum Auction Act last year. And I'm pleased to see that the FCC is moving ahead to conduct the H Block auction in January.

In addition to allocating new wireless spectrum to address our nation's spectrum shortage, this auction will provide significant down payment for the nation-wide interoperable public safety network.

I also support, Chairman Wheeler, your recently announced timetable for the incentive auction. This auction has many layers of complexity, and I applaud your commitment to getting the technical issues right.

Congress gave the FCC the tools to unleash the economic opportunities for both licensed and unlicensed spectrum, revolutionize public safety communications, ensure a vibrant and competitive wireless market, all the while protecting consumer access to free over-the-air television.

And I think FCC must remain faithful to these goals as you implement the law.

You also must bear in mind the principles undergirding the Communications Act, as we consider the next evolution in our nation's wireless networks. Our values do not change with each successive generation of technology. Whether the infrastructure is copper or fiber optics, the commission's charge is to protect and promote the longstanding goals of competition, universal access and consumer protection.

Chairman Upton and Walden recently called for a multiyear examination of possible updates to the Communications Act, and I welcome the opportunity for a bipartisan consideration of these issues, and I hope the commission will be a partner in this endeavor.

In 2010, the commission and this committee spent many hours working to preserve the principle of an open Internet. That process led to a sensible set of rules governing the broadband market that was supported by a diverse groups of stakeholders and provided the foundation for the FCC's Open Internet Order.

I believe the Open Internet Order will be upheld in the court. But whatever the outcome, I'll be looking to you to assure that the Internet remains an open platform for innovation and economic growth.

I want to at this point yield the balance of my time to my fellow Californian and good friend, Congresswoman Matsui.

MATSUI: Thank you very much, Ranking Member Waxman for yielding me time.

It's wonderful to see the full complement of the commission here today.

I want to join in welcoming Chairman Wheeler, and who brings a wealth of knowledge and experience to the FCC.

And I'd also like to congratulate and welcome Commissioner O'Rielly.

And I also would like to commend Commissioner Clyburn for her leadership during the interim period. Thank you very much.

Mr. Chairman, the subcommittee is working diligently to find bipartisan solutions for smart and sound spectrum policy for our nation. We've worked want to create a path for DOD to reallocate the 1755 to 1780 megahertz band.

DOD and the broadcasters should be applauded for their leadership on a landmark sharing agreement.

Moreover, I've joined with Representative Guthrie to introduce H.R. 3674, the Federal Spectrum Incentive Act, which passed this committee yesterday in a bipartisan manner.

The bill is the first of its kind that offers a fresh approach that would create a federal spectrum incentive auction. I look forward to working closely with my colleagues and the administration in moving this bill to the floor.

There are tough decisions ahead, and I want to encourage also the FCC to move forward with the USF reform efforts. Modernizing the USF for broadband, particularly the lifeline program will provide a path toward universal broadband adoption in this country.

And, with that, I yield back the balance of my time.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back the balance of her time; all time's been consumed. We'll now go to our witnesses.

And, again, we thank you very much for being here today and the public service work you're all undertaking.

And, Mr. Wheeler, as chairman of the FCC, we're gonna lead off with you. So pull that microphone close, turn on the button, and you're good to go, sir.

WHEELER: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, Ms. Eshoo, other members of the committee. It's a privilege to be before you today, and a privilege to be joining my colleagues here, the full component of the commission. I think we will make a great team, and I know that all of us are honored to be able to work with the quality men and women that make up the FCC.

Today is my 39th day on the job. And I have enjoyed the informal discussions that I've been able to have with many of you in the interim and look forward to today having a even more complete discussions and to working with you afterwards.

As I think everybody in their statements has indicated, we are in a very exciting time, in the midst of a great network revolution.

The lesson of history is that revolutions like that come chock full of challenges. And we're gonna have to work together on how we address those challenges.

We've tended to look at those challenges through three prisms, if you will, and to say, OK, how do we make sure, first of all, that what policies we adopt promote economic growth and maintain national leadership?

And clearly at the root of those are issues such as competition and maintaining the necessary assets, such as spectrum.

The second prism is what we've begun to call the network compact. There has, for a century, developed a set of values that represent the relationship between those who operate networks and those who use networks. Those values must be preserved regardless of the type -- of the technology used in the network.

And, thirdly, is the -- is the goal that networks work for everyone, that it's -- it's not what broadband -- it's not just the delivery of broadband, but it's what broadband enables that is what is important.

If we don't have 21st century education capabilities, if we don't make sure that Americans with disabilities have access to the capabilities of the new network, if we don't make sure that tribal Americans have opportunities to use the new networks, then we have failed in our goal.

So, those three things, economic growth, the network compact and -- and what networks enable are the three pillars of policy. But at the heart of them is competition.

It has become a joke, at least in my office, that everybody keeps -- that I keep saying, "Competition. Competition. Competition."

But that is very much what -- what we believe.

Let me do a quick look at the three areas where the commission is keeping pace with innovation, that innovative economy.

First is process reform. The committee's bipartisan effort yesterday is significant and is noted and appreciated.

On my second day, Mr. Chairman, as you noted, I began a process that will produce a report in 60 days. We're gonna look at how to enhance accountability through deadlines and tracking systems, how to expedite the licensing process, like you referenced. How to shorten the processing time of applications for review and Commissioner Pai has an interesting idea in that regard.

How to streamline consumer complaint, collection and a searchable database, which Commissioner Rosenworcel has been a champion of. And how to attack the backlog as Commissioner Clyburn did when she was chairwoman. We also wanna weed out outdated regulations, incorporate performance -- and incorporate performance measures.

Second focus is gonna be, as you have all appropriately said, the spectrum auctions, especially the incentive auction.

This committee, working with MTIA and DOD, has provided great leadership on the 1755 to 1780 band that we look forward to moving forward on that and moving that to auction.

The Guthrie-Matsui bill, which you all moved yesterday, which has been referenced, it takes the incentive auction idea and applies it to federal agencies, and that's a great step forward.

And then speaking of incentives, we have the incentive auction coming up. We're gonna have -- we have established a schedule now, we're gonna have policy recommendations in January. And we're gonna have consideration and discussion of that until spring, when we'll be making a decision. And we'll have an auction in the -- in mid-2015.

But while we're discussing spectrum and regulatory process, I would be remiss if I didn't bring up an item we will be considering today. A proposal to ask for comments on a rule to reflect the realities of new onboard aircraft technology.

And there have been lots of misconceptions about that. And let me just see if I can address these right upfront.

One, we are going to continue -- we are proposing to consider to continue the ban on mobile devices that can interfere with terrestrial networks. But where there is new onboard technology that eliminates that potential for interference, then there is no need for an interference rule.

This is the responsible thing to do, where the rationale for a rule doesn't exist, the rule shouldn't exist. We are the expert technical agency. And new technology removes the technical justification of this rule.

In that regard, I should mention that I have spoken with Transportation Secretary Foxx this morning. And he has told me that, yes, the FCC is the technical agency and that the Department of Transportation is the aviation agency and that they will be moving on a rule to address voice calls on airplanes.

I'm the last person in the world who wants to listen to somebody talking to me, while they fly across the country. But we are the technical agency and we will make the technical rules that reflect the -- the way the new technology works.

Finally, item three, you've all talked about the -- the I.P. transition -- transitions, I should say. Because it's not just one transition, it's a multi-faceted process. And at today's meeting, we're gonna hear a report from the technology transitions policy task force, which will lay out a schedule, including a plan for a January order that will invite experiments in the field, real life experiments, recommend data collection and create a framework for policy decisions.

So we have a full agenda, as you have all said. It is a privilege to be here, to be able to work with all of you and I look forward to doing that in the time coming (ph).

WALDEN: Chairman Wheeler, thank you for your public service and thank you for recognizing our concerns on the subcommittee and full committee.

And now we'll switch to -- I guess, once a chairman, always a chairman, right, highest title. Former Chairwoman Clyburn, we're delighted to have you back before the committee. Thanks for your work publicly and please go ahead with your opening statement.

CLYBURN: Thank you, Chairman Walden, Ranking Member Eshoo, and members of the committee.

Thank you, again, for allowing me to appear before you today. Since our last visit, I have had an incredible opportunity to serve as acting chair and I'm glad to note that with the support of my colleagues and the assistance of a skilled and dedicated staff, we were able to move a number of important items, which clearly advanced the public interest.

This hearing comes at a critical stage in our communications policy continuum. We are experiencing tremendous technological change that affects every aspect of our lives.

And as we look ahead to the challenges of tomorrow, I believe it is important to understand the terrain over which we have travelled. We reached a voluntary interoperability industry solution in the lower 700 megahertz band to address an issue, that for years, have been impeding the deployment of valuable spectrum.

We launched a proceeding to modernize the FCC's schools and libraries program, known as E-Rate, to ensure that our children have the resources and connectivity they need to support digital learning and become the leaders of tomorrow.

We adopted an order to address rule call completion because it is unacceptable in today's world that calls to non-urban areas are not being completed.

We adopted an order to reform inmate calling services to finally provide relief to millions of families who have been paying unreasonably high rate to stay connected with loved ones.

We enabled the H Block spectrum auction and the AWS-3 proposal to take major steps forward on government and commercial spectrum sharing. And we made ongoing reforms to lifeline and proposed significant forfeitures to companies not following the FCC's rules.

With Chairman Wheeler and my fellow commissioners, I look forward to building on the progress we have made.

As Chairman Wheeler has made clear, the voluntary incentive auction proceeding continues to be a top commission priority for those broadcast television licensees who want to continue to use their spectrum, the act mandates that the commission makes all reasonable efforts to preserve the coverage areas and population served.

The act also has clear directives for the proceeds from the forward auction, which includes much earned contributions to the Public Safety Trust Fund and the national deficit.

Congress also gave the commission authority to propose a band plan with an appropriate balance of unlicensed and licensed spectrum.

Unlicensed spectrum plays a critical role in advancing more efficient use of spectrum and commercial wireless carriers are increasingly using unlicensed Wi-Fi services to off load their smartphone traffic.

In addition to spectrum, Chairman Wheeler has also announced that the commission will consider an order next month to launch trials regarding the ongoing technology transitions.

I do believe that trials, if structured properly, can produce helpful insights into how best to approach reform. And I will be keeping a keen eye on how the trials and future reforms affect all consumers.

Process reform is where we have an opportunity to develop an even more efficient agency.

Yesterday, the committee passed the Federal Communications Commission Process Reform Act of 2013. I am pleased that the proposed modifications to the Sunshine Act would facilitate federal commissioners participation on the Federal-State Joint Board and the Joint Conference.

I would also encourage you to review the Paperwork Reduction Act and how it can be improved. For example, the FCC is using its website to better inform consumers in the industry.

Yet, to obtain voluntary feedback on our website, the PRA requires OMB approval. As a result, the commission cannot be as responsive to users without engaging in a lengthy OMB approval process.

So as you can see, Mr. Chairman, and distinguished members of the committee, we have both challenges and opportunities ahead.

I look forward to working with each of you to address our evolving communications landscape.

I appreciate your attention this morning and will be glad to answer any questions you may have.

WALDEN: Thank you for your work, your testimony, your recommendations, and we'll now go to Commissioner Rosenworcel. Thank you for being here this morning, we're delighted to have you back and please go ahead. ROSENWORCEL: It's good to be back.

Good morning, Chairman Walden, Ranking Member Eshoo and members of the subcommittee, it is an honor to appear before you today in the company of my colleagues, new and old, at the FCC.

By some measures, communications technologies account for as much as one-sixth of our economy, no wonder. These are the networks that carry all aspects of our modern commercial and civic life.

They are changing at a breathtaking pace. Keeping up requires taking a fresh look at our policies, informed by the policies of the past, we have to think boldly about the future.

Now in the weeks ahead, we will do this, as we wrestle with the upcoming transition to Internet protocol and think about spectrum auctions, including incentive auctions.

But I think we make a mistake if we focus only on networks themselves. After all, there is great beauty and power in what we can do with them.

Our new networks can change the ways we connect, create and conduct commerce. They can change the ways we learn and seek security.

So in my brief time before you today, this is what I wanna talk about. How the broadband beneath us and the air waves all around us can improve education and improve public safety.

First, I wanna talk about the E-Rate program. E-Rate helps connects schools and libraries across the country to the Internet. It is a byproduct of the Telecommunications Act of 1996.

Remember in 1996, probably everyone in this room called the Internet the information superhighway. It was a long time ago. In 1996, only 14 percent of public schools were connected to the Internet.

Today, thanks to the E-Rate, that number is north of 95 percent, which sounds good. It sounds like the job is done, but nothing could be further from the truth, because the challenge today is not connection, it is capacity.

Too many of our E-Rate schools access the Internet at speeds as low as 3 megabits, that is too slow for high definition video, it is not fast enough for the most innovative teaching tools, and it is definitely not fast enough to prepare the next generation with the stem skills that are so essential to compete.

Contrast this with efforts under way in some of our world neighbors.

In South Korea, 100 percent of schools are connected to high speed broadband and all schools are converting to digital textbooks by 2016. Ireland will have all schools connected to 100 megabits next year.

Finland will have all schools connected to 100 megabits the year after that.

Meanwhile, in both Turkey and Thailand, the government is seeking a vendor to supply tablet computers to millions of students for a new era of broadband enabled digital learning.

Now we can wait and see where the status quo takes us and let other nations lead the way, or we can chose a future where all American students have the access to the broadband that they need to compete, no matter who they are, where they live or where they go to school.

I think it's time to compete. I think it's time for E-Rate 2.0. The FCC has a rule-making proceeding under way to reboot and recharge the E-Rate program. I think we need to make it a high priority.

I think we need to find ways to bring 100 megabits to all schools in the near term, and one gigabit to all schools in the long term. While we're at it, we must find ways to reduce the bureaucracy of this program and make it easier for small and rural schools to participate.

Second, I want to talk about a number all of us know by heart, but none of us ever hopes to use. I want to talk about 9-1-1. In my time at the FCC, I have visited 9-1-1 call centers all across the country. I am always struck by the steely calm of those who answer the phones and help ensure that help is on the way.

I am also struck by how many emergency calls now come in from wireless phones. In fact, nationwide more than 70 percent of calls made to 9-1-1 are made from wireless phones. That is more than 400,000 calls per day. Now, if you use your wireless phone to call 9- 1-1 from outdoors, your location is reported, sometimes to within 50 meters under FCC location accuracy standards. But if you use your wireless phone to call 9-1-1 from indoors, you better cross your fingers because no FCC location accuracy standards apply.

I think this is an unacceptable gap in public safety communications. It deserves your attention and ours. Because no matter where you are when you call 9-1-1, you want first responders to find you. Moreover, as our networks evolve and the ways we use them change, we must make sure our public safety policies keep pace. In fact, our approaches to networks both wired and wireless need to evolve as markets evolve.

But in our efforts, we must not lose sight of why networks matter, because they can do more than connect us. They can strengthen education and enhance our security, and of course, grow our economy in new and exciting ways.

Thank you. I look forward to answering any questions you might have.

WALDEN: Commissioner Rosenworcel, thank you for your work and your testimony and your suggestions.

We go now to Commissioner Pai. Thank you for being here and thank you for all the work you've been doing. And please go ahead with your opening statement.

PAI: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Walden, Ranking Member Eshoo, members of the subcommittee, thank you for holding this hearing.

It has been exactly one year since I last appeared before you and much has happened in the time since. Most notably, we have lost two colleagues and we have gained two new ones. Chairman Wheeler and Commissioner O'Rielly have gotten off to strong starts and I am pleased that we are finally back at full strength.

Over the past year, we have made progress in a number of different areas, but there is much more to be done. This morning, I will touch on two of the issues that I find most pressing: the incentive auction and E-Rate reform. A fuller list of FCC priorities from cable forbearance to AM radio is detailed in my written testimony.

First, the incentive auction. Perhaps the most daunting challenge the commission faces is the looming spectrum crunch. To meet this challenges, we are focused on implementing the responsibilities that Congress gave us in the Spectrum Act, especially with respect to the broadcast incentive auction.

The incentive auction is the commission's best chance to push a large amount of spectrum, well suited for mobile broadband, into the commercial marketplace. I support Chairman Wheeler's recent announcement setting the middle of 2015 as our new target. It is more important to get the incentive auction done right than it is to get it done right now.

If, for example, any part of our software were to fail during the incentive auction, like another government website that shall not be named, the commission by law would not get a second bite at the apple. My greatest worry about the incentive auction, however, is not with the technology. It is about participation. In order for the incentive auction to be successful, we will need robust participation by both broadcasters and wireless carriers. So the commission must avoid choices that will deter participation in both the reverse auction and the forward auction.

For the reverse auction, prices paid to broadcasters should be determined by the market, not set by administrative fiat. Any attempt to restrict payments to broadcasters, including a complicated scoring scheme, will deter broadcaster participation and risk causing the incentive auction to fail.

For the forward auction, the commission should not limit carriers' ability to participate, such as by setting a spectrum cap or narrowing the spectrum screen. This would result in less spectrum for mobile broadband and less revenue to fund national priorities that this committee has identified, and a greater chance of a failed auction.

Another issue that will impact participation in the forward auction is the size of the geographic licenses to be offered. Our NPRM proposed using economic areas, but some argue that this would make it too difficult for smaller carrier to participate in the auction. Our goal should be to allow as many carriers as possible to bid, whether they be nationwide, regional or rural.

So I am pleased to see alternative proposals for license sizes, such as the newly coined partial economic areas. If technically feasible, these proposals deserve serious consideration.

Aside from the incentive auction, there are many other opportunities when it comes to spectrum, from the H block auction next month to the possible clearing of AWS-3, to the greater unlicensed use in the 5 gigahertz band. Consistent with my all-of-the-above approach, I hope we seize all of these opportunities in the near term.

The second issue I will discuss is the Universal Service Fund's schools and libraries program, better known as E-Rate. In many ways, E-Rate has been a success, as my colleague has pointed out. But it also has had difficulties. The funding process can stretch for years. Many schools and libraries feel compelled to hire outside consultants to handle all the complexities. Others don't bother applying at all.

Services like paging are prioritized over services like connecting classrooms. And there's no meaningful transparency into either the amount or the impact of E-Rate spending.

To solve these problems, I've proposed a student-centered E-Rate program. This means an up front allocation of funding and a matching requirement, so that applicants know how much money they can spend and have greater incentives to spend that money wisely. This means simplifying the application process. This means targeting funding at next-generation technologies, while still letting local schools set their own priorities. And this means making all funding and spending decisions accessible on a central website that everyone can see.

In its first year, a student-centered approach would provide an extra $1 billion for next-generation services, all without collecting an extra dime from the American people. Accordingly, I believe it would be premature to increase the program's budget. And under no circumstances should we do so without finding corresponding savings in other parts of the Universal Service Fund.

We cannot ask Americans to pay even more in their monthly phone bills, especially when median household income in this country is now lower than it was in 2007.

Thank you once again to Chairman Walden and Ranking Member Eshoo for holding this hearing. I look forward to answering your questions and continuing to work with you and my colleagues in months to come.

WALDEN: Thank you, Commissioner Pai. We appreciate your thoughtful testimony and your recommendations. We'll now go to Commissioner O'Rielly. Welcome aboard the Federal Communications Commission. Welcome back before this committee. And you know how the rules work, so please go ahead and again thank you for being here today.

O'RIELLY: Thank you to the chairman and ranking member and members of the subcommittee.

In respect of the time of the subcommittee members, I'd like to make five points and then move on to answer your questions.

Point one, I'm truly honored to be before the subcommittee. I had the pleasure of working on the full committee staff for eight years and it was one of the greatest jobs I'll ever have. The breadth of knowledge and command of the diverse policy issues by the members of this committee are of the highest quality.

Point two, the FCC is an independent agency, not part of the executive branch. It was created by Congress and served to implement the statutes enacted by Congress. I firmly believe that our role is to follow the statute as written and not substitute our thoughts for your work. The commission has no right or authority to ignore the statute or statutory deadlines. Thankfully, I've worked on most communications policy statutes over the last 20 years and have first- hand knowledge of the intent behind many key provisions.

Point three, the commission has difficult, but exciting work ahead. If done correctly, it can have a significant positive impact on U.S. domestic product and on national productivity. Our communications companies are extremely important to the U.S. economy and we must allow them to flourish in the world marketplace. The commission's overall focus, however, must remain on the consumer.

Point four, in terms of specific items, my particular focus and attention will be on the immediate work before the commission. In the big picture, the FCC must finish rules for the incentive auctions, continue USF reform, proceed with the I.P. transition trials, and complete our media ownership proceedings.

Point five, part of the role of a FCC commissioner is to conduct outreach and provide information to the public. I take this function seriously and it's why I'm choosing to spend sometime on the issue of distracted driving caused by wireless device users. Drivers need to put away their wireless phones and focus their eyes on the drive.

Let me be clear. My view is the wireless industry is doing yeoman's work to get out the message. They're aware of the problem. They are dedicated considerable resources to finding solutions and education, and they're working hard to prevent the horrible tragedies by texting, viewing, e-mailing, tweeting, mapping, posting, among others, while driving.

It does not appear that more government regulation would be helpful in this space. Instead, I'm talking to my other colleagues to find ways to use our voice in non-regulatory, non-costly ways to educate the public and prevent senseless accidents. Thank you.

WALDEN: You win the prize -- two minutes and 37 seconds, return.

O'RIELLY: I'm familiar with this committee very well.

(LAUGHTER)

WALDEN: Yes, indeed. Some will learn along the way.

(LAUGHTER)

We appreciate all your testimony and your recommendations. And it's just good to have all five commissioners in place, or four commissioners and chair in place. As Commissioner Pai said, it has been a year to the day, I think, since we had the commissioners here. So welcome aboard.

I know we all have a lot of questions. I'm going to -- I learned at the heels of the former chairman, Mr. Dingell, about trying to get answers at a relatively rapid rate. So I'm going to try and pose some of these, not as skillfully as he does in a yes or no format, but to the extent to which you can address them rapidly, that would be good.

And I want to start, Mr. Wheeler, with you as chairman. I know you all are voting on this NPRM today. I do want to stress it would be helpful if the public got to see that. As far as I know, you and your staffs are the only ones who see it in advance. That's one of the process issues I hope you'll break through and this maybe will be the last NPRM that's not public first.

But the commission's -- I want to follow up and figure out how you're going to permit, as your testimony indicates, airlines to choose whether to allow voice calls. And here's why I ask it. Is the commission planning to waive either the common carrier obligation to complete calls, or the net neutrality rules on blocking (inaudible) packets. Both would seem to be necessary in order to prevent voice calling from aircraft.

WHEELER: So, thank you, Mr. Chairman. So, first, to your point that -- that the MPRM that we are considering today will be complete in listing the rule -- the words of the rule...

WALDEN: Right.

WHEELER: ... that we are considering. That in -- in light with the philosophy that...

WALDEN: Thank you.

WHEELER: ... you and I share, which is, let's get it out there...

WALDEN: Right.

WHEELER: ... so that people can see it. The purpose of this is to do just that, to put the language out so people can see it and give us their comments on it.

Now, to your specific question -- the -- the open Internet order specifically provides what's called the premises exemption. And that means that coffee shops, book stores and airlines mentioned by name are exempt from the order in that, under the definition of reasonable network management, which is one of the tools that are allowed, for premises owners -- which include airlines -- there is the ability to pick and choose exactly what comes over.

WALDEN: All right. We'll follow up more on the other piece that you might have to deal with, as well.

I want to ask you about Title 2. You've had a -- you haven't, but there's been a preceding open at the Commission for a long time that would -- the reclassification docket. Are you planning to keep that open, or are you planning to close it?

WHEELER: So, I think we're in a situation right now where we're waiting for a court opinion on exactly what our authorities are on a broad sense. And that there is no rush between now and then to make a decision on Title 2.

I will note, however, that, as you mentioned, this docket has been open for a long time. And it has not had the threatened chilling effect that some have worried about on investment in wireless and broadband infrastructure. This is an -- this is an issue that clearly is going to have to be dealt with, and we'll start with the court decision.

WALDEN: I've got about three more questions I want to try and get in here.

We understand the FCC's launched a study -- a multimarket study of critical information needs. Apparently, this study includes a qualitative media analysis, which would require interviewing reporters and editors to figure out how the media decides what news stories to run. Are these the kinds of questions that government entities should be asking of the news media? And with somebody with a journalism degree, I do get a little chill up my spine thinking about the government asking how these decisions are made.

Doesn't it have an effect on the -- doesn't it have an effect on the media that the regulatory body is even asking these questions? And how does it help you fulfill your Section 257 mandate, on which it's predicated?

WHEELER: So, I think this goes back to the root of the discussion you and I were having a moment about -- about making sure that the public understand what's going on.

The 257 requirement mandates lowering barriers to access to media for minorities, women, small business and other identified groups.

In order to make that kind of a judgment, you have to have facts. In order to have facts, you do studies. And what we did was, there is a study that has been proposed by a consulting firm that we were working with. And we put that out for public notice to exactly get the kind of input...

WALDEN: All right.

WHEELER: ... that you're suggesting.

WALDEN: All right, I...

WHEELER: And -- but it's not -- and this is -- I -- this is not an effort to influence the media. It...

WALDEN: I'm going to interrupt you just a second, because when you're spending somewhere between $209,918 -- and some of the questions of the media personnel include, "What's the news philosophy of the station?," "Who decides what stories are covered?," "What are the demographics of news management staff?," "Have you ever suggested coverage of what you consider to be a story with critical information of what consumers used?," "What was the reason given for the decision?"

These seem like really internal journalistic issues. Now, I -- I need to move on to one other, 'cause I'm actually over, but it's a very important question.

The quant -- quantile regression analysis -- QRA -- approach to providing universal support for rural companies -- that was part of the commission's U.S. (ph) reform efforts -- has had a negative impact -- negative impact on investment and the deployment of broadband services in rural America.

Commissioner Pai, you've been an advocate for the need to address this problem to ensure that rural Americans are not left behind. What do you recommend, Commissioner Pai, needs to be done with regard to the application of the QRA?

PAI: I thank you for the question, Mr. Chairman.

I've seen the problems on paper. The Obama administration's Department of Agriculture, for example, reported to us earlier this year that some 37 percent of funds from RUS are sitting on the table because there is so much uncertainty among rural carriers. And I've seen it in person from my home state of Kansas to carriers in rural Alaska, Because they are uncertain about what the future portends because of the QRA, they are not making additional investments in terms of broadband. And that creates a digital slide that we won't be able to bridge.

WALDEN: So, Chairman Wheeler, if I might, given the -- negative impact of the QRA -- that it's having on broadband development, especially in rural America, do you intend to reconsider its application?

WHEELER: Yes. As a matter of fact, I have asked the bureau to draft, and let me see, what an order that I could share with my colleagues would be to eliminate the QRA, and to return to the high- cost loop support model.

WALDEN: I appreciate that.

I've got other issues, obviously, with the F.M. translators for A.M., and delay in the rulemaking, dealing with cable operators and the groups utilized by them. And so, maybe we can follow up afterwards, but the committee's been kind to let me over-extend my questioning. But we're usually fairly flexible on that here.

So, now, I'll turn it over to the ranking member from California, Ms. Eshoo.

ESHOO: That's great. So, I have seven minutes, right, Mr. Chairman?

(LAUGHTER)

Mr. Chairman, you said that it's your 39th day. What I'd like to add to that is that I think your adult lifetime of work has brought you to this. So, it's not just your -- really, your 39th day.

WHEELER: That's been a long lifetime at this.

ESHOO: It's a -- it's a -- it's a wonderful path that has prepared you for this position.

I have a whole list of -- of niche issues, which is really the way we deal with all of these things.

First of all, do you think you're going to get a deal on cell phones unlocking by the end of this year?

WHEELER: I hope that we will be presenting to the commission today -- as a matter of fact, I know that we will be presenting to the commission today -- the voluntary agreement that has been reached with the wireless industry. And so, the answer to your question is strongly yes.

ESHOO: That's just terrific.

My second question to you, Mr. Chairman, is last week, as you know, I joined with my colleagues, Representatives Doyle and Matsui, to ask you to take action to prevent AT&T from implementing the significant rate hike for their special access customers. I appreciate what you have done in terms of the suspension, but I think that there's much more that needs to be done on special access reform.

Can we expect further action on special access reform?

WHEELER: I -- I -- I apologize, Ms. Eshoo, but I am currently recused...

ESHOO: OK.

WHEELER: ... from that proceeding, and so I...

ESHOO: I see.

So, how will it happen?

WHEELER: It's -- it moves ahead with the other members of the -- of the commission.

ESHOO: I see. Well, I'm just going to assume that they're going to -- that this area is going to be examined. Because we really have to have a -- reasonable rates for -- for this important service.

On -- Commissioner Rosenworcel, thank you for your testimony. I love the way you present things. It's so clear. You can feel the sense of urgency and why it's urgent.

How are you going to pursue getting this done at the commission? The whole issue of E-Rate, everything that's attached to it. You presented an eloquent case. And I think that -- that you gave a fantastic speech last week on -- on 911 and the problems that we have between indoor and outdoor.

So, on both that and the E-Rate -- maybe I should be asking the chairman what he plans to do on E-Rate. I know what you want to do. But maybe we should just switch over to Chairman Wheeler?

WHEELER: Well, I think on -- on E-Rate, that there is a leader in this commission. And that Commissioner...

ESHOO: We only need five.

WHEELER: Huh?

ESHOO: We only need five.

WHEELER: They -- they -- but I'm -- I -- as you all say, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of...

ESHOO: Good, good.

WHEELER: ... Mr. Rosenworcel.

ESHOO: Well, we'll look forward to you joining her in that effort. And maybe the next time the commission comes before us, you can tell us the steps that you're going to take.

On the -- on...

WHEELER: Let me -- if I can do one thing -- I am -- we are going to put out a schedule, just like we have for the incentive auction and the I.T. transition, to address this issue.

ESHOO: That's terrific.

On the challenge of the -- the indoor versus outdoor, and wireless, and 911, what's your plan to address this?

ROSENWORCEL: Well, as the old saying goes, you may only make one 911 call in your life, but it will be the most important call...

ESHOO: Right.

ROSENWORCEL: ... you ever make. And right now, if you make that call from your wire line phone, your first responder knows exactly where you are.

ESHOO: Right.

ROSENWORCEL: You make that call outdoors, in a field, using your wireless phone, we have location accuracy standards so that first responder can find you.

ESHOO: I'm asking what you want to do about where the challenge lies.

ROSENWORCEL: So...

ESHOO: We know it's working.

ROSENWORCEL: ... indoors...

ESHOO: Mm-hmm.

ROSENWORCEL: ... is the problem. We have no standards. And increasingly, households are cutting the cord. More than one third of households rely exclusively on their wireless phones. So, I don't think it's acceptable that when people make emergency calls, first responders can't find them.

I've recommended in that speech that you mentioned, that we start a rulemaking to address this. Because we've heard both from carriers...

ESHOO: Mm-hmm.

ROSENWORCEL: ... and from public safety officials on the front line that this is an issue that...

ESHOO: Well, good for you for identifying this and taking it up. Because I think one of the things that I taught my children from their earliest memory was, 911, and putting their little fingers on the keypad so that they would understand that.

ROSENWORCEL: Me, too.

ESHOO: And I think that you're absolutely right.

On -- Commissioner Pai, you made a wonderful comment -- something about not one dime more on phone bills.

I want to raise something with the -- with the -- with the chairman, going back to it, about below-the-line fees. Representatives Doyle, Lujan, Matheson, myself -- we wrote to the -- our nation's leading wire -- wireless and wireline providers, and we asked them about their practice of applying below-the-line fees on monthly bills.

I agree with Commissioner Pai. That's why I -- you know, we wrote. We have a concern about what people are paying. These things are hidden. They think that they're -- they think everything on their bill is a tax. And I have to tell you, I brought my bills in. I couldn't tell what the heck they were, who was doing what to whom, and what it was for.

So, tell me what you think the agency, or if you have -- I know there's a long list of big challenges. But these are still important issues for consumers.

What steps can the agency take under existing statute to ensure that consumers know exactly how much they're paying each month, especially prior to signing up for their service. And this whole issue of below-the-line fees.

WHEELER (?): Yeah, this -- Ms. Eshoo, this is a -- a very legitimate concern. The specific one I believe you're referencing is a re-transmission consent...

ESHOO: That too.

WHEELER (?): ... be charged -- that cable operators have just begun putting on the bill.

ESHOO: Right.

WHEELER (?): And -- and I say just begun. And I'm trying to get our arms around that and figure out just exactly what our authorities are to answer your question.

It -- it does, however, strike me that it fits right in the broader issues that the chairman and Mr. Upton and others have talked about in terms of the kinds of issues that need to be addressed in a Telecom Act re-write here, is just what is going on.

ESHOO: Yeah, but that will be like seven years from now.

WHEELER (?): If all of the sudden -- well, no -- but I -- I think that...

WALDEN: Oh no.

ESHOO: Oh well, well.

(LAUGHTER)

WALDEN: I won't speak.

ESHOO: Let's see.

WALDEN: I won't get cross-wise between you and the chairman.

ESHOO: OK. Yeah, oh no.

Thank you. That you, Mr. Chairman and thank you, Chairman Walden.

WALDEN (?): Thank you.

ESHOO: And thank you to the entire commission.

I wanna say also, a welcome to the whole new team that has come in. And we wish you well, we really do. And the chairman and the commission will operate at a higher level because of the high level of people that have come in to support the works. So congratulations to each one of you.

WALDEN: We now move on to the vice chair of the full -- of the subcommittee, Mr. Latta from Ohio for five minutes.

LATTA: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, again, thanks very much for our commission members for being with us today.

And this question I would like to ask all of you. And this question is the incentive auction legislation prohibits the FCC from excluding qualified bidders from the auction.

Unfortunately while the incentive auction process works its way up to the commission, it appears that the wireless bureau is simultaneously working on the spectrum aggregation docket to achieve the de facto of (ph) spectrum caps.

Will you commit to -- to allowing any interested bidder that complies with the statutory requirements to participate fully in the auction? And, Chairman, if I could start with you? Because I notice in your -- in your testimony, page six that, you know, you talk about the incentive auction, you had said that you're looking at voluntary market oriented approach. So if I could start with you.

WHEELER: The statute is quite explicit in that regard that the commission may not exclude somebody from participating.

LATTA: Also on just aggregating, so it would be like -- it would be wide open for everyone to be involved in that?

WHEELER: Well, it's interesting, what's been developing here, I mean, the -- the CEO of the AT&T recently came out with a statement saying, "Wait a minute, I -- I think I would like to have rules to make sure that not one party can run away with all the spectrum."

So I think that in between those positions is -- is where -- a reality exist. But the statute, I agree, is quite clear.

The statute says that -- that you would not exclude anybody and the statute also says that the commission will design an auction so as to promote economic opportunity and competition and consumer choice to sustain a healthy wireless marketplace. And we'll do both.

LATTA: Madam Clyburn?

CLYBURN: Yes, Section 64:04 is clear that any party that abides -- obeys the rules, that they are qualified to participate. It also makes clear that the commission has the authority to enforce and introduce general -- rules of general applicability that will allow for spectrum aggregation in order to promote competition.

So again, my colleague mentioned that, you know, part of the reason for -- I think, for some of the robust participation and -- and the type of ideas that we're seeing it's because we took a dual path. On the same day we released the rules, or recent -- release the notice of oppose rule making on incentive auction, we also released a notice of propose rule-makings on trying to glean information about this dual path.

So I -- I think that this, in the long run, will help and improve our information -- information dissemination and acquisition and -- and rule-making once we decide on -- on a clear path forward.

LATTA: Thank you.

Commissioner?

ROSENWORCEL: The Middle Class Tax Relief and Job Creation Act says that we can have rules of general applicability, but we cannot exclude anyone from participation in the auction. I think it's easy and simple, we just have to follow the law.

LATTA: Commissioner Pai?

PAI: I would agree with my colleague and I would also point out that if you look at the end goal which is to have a successful auction that pushes out a lot of spectrum, it yields sufficient revenue to fund national priorities, and that provides a fairness to all parties involved, then we should not, preclusively, deter participation from wireless carriers by -- in adopting unduly strict spectrum policies.

LATTA: Commissioner O'Rielly?

O'RIELLY: I wanna thank my colleagues for say -- stating that the statute is clear because as many people who worked on it, it was a -- an effort to give the commission some authority in this space when members couldn't come to agreement.

I'm extremely hesitant to impose limitations on Spectrum Act, because we have certain obligations under the statute otherwise. We -- in a nice way, I -- I mean, the money has already been spent.

We have already spent the -- the money from the Spectrum Act and so we have obligations to provide $7 billion for FirstNet and we have deficit reduction numbers that -- that have already gone out the door.

So I'm worried about anything that would depress auction revenues. I'm -- I'm certainly aware of the statute and I want to remain open to considering but I'm -- I'm hesitant at this time to impose any type of limitation.

LATTA: Thank you. And many of you know that Roll Call completion has been an ongoing issue in my district. And I commend the FCC for producing the November 8 order and further notice propose rule-making to improve the commission's ability to monitor the delivery of calls to rural areas by mandating certain recording retention and recording requirements from carriers.

And Commissioner Pai, do you believe the November 8 order will resolve the Call completion problem, or does more need to be done?

PAI: Well, Congressman, I certainly hope that it will, whether it's in Toledo or Topeka, we need to figure out where the kink in the system is, whether it is in our media providers, whether it's the Last Mile (ph), what point of the network is failing.

And then, if it's a technical problem, then we can take steps to fix that technical problem. But if (inaudible) then the FCC needs to be empowered to take corrective action. So I certainly support taking the appropriate action soon, rather than later on (inaudible).

LATTA: Thank you very much. Mr. Chairman, I see my time has expired and I yield back.

WALDEN: Thank the gentleman. We now turn to the ranking member of the full committee, Mr. Waxman, for five minutes.

WAXMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, I just want to indicate that under the act, the FCC may not single out a specific provider for exclusion from a system of competitive bidding.

At the same time, the FCC is permitted to adopt and enforce rules of general applicability that promote competition. Even AT&T recently acknowledged they would support rules that limit the amount of spectrum any one company could acquire as long as the rules applied evenly to all auction participants.

Chairman Wheeler, as you know I'm a strong supporter of the FCC's open Internet rules, because I believe the Internet must remain an open platform for innovation and commerce.

You've emphasized the importance of the open -- open Internet order, at the same time, you recently made comments suggesting that an Internet service provider could charge a content provider, such as Netflix, a fee, in order to guarantee the best available transmission speed.

Do you see these type of business arrangements as consistent with the FCC's open Internet rules that you support?

WHEELER: Thank you, Mr. Waxman for -- for raising that issue because it gives me an opportunity to get more specific than I was in Ohio.

I am a strong supporter of the open Internet rules, full stop. The rules were written in such a way as to envision opportunities for innovation and experimentation and to impose on them a balance between protecting the open Internet, protecting consumers and stimulating innovation.

New ideas, under the -- under the open Internet order, new ideas such as those you've referenced in a wireless environment, particularly, are not prohibited. But there is a clear responsibility for the commission to make sure that what takes place does not interfere with Internet access, is not anti-competitive and does not provide preferential treatment. And we will enforce that. We -- we will maintain the balance between innovation and assuring there is an open Internet.

WAXMAN: I appreciate your expanding on that issue.

While, network infrastructure and technology have changed since the passage of the 1996 Telecommunications Act, the values embedded in the act have not.

And Mr. Chairman, I know the commission will soon begin a process to collect real-world information and data on the I.P. transitions. How will the commission continue to advance the long standing goals of competition, universal access and consumer protection throughout this transition process?

WHEELER: You know, Mr. Waxman, there are many people who have described the -- the trials, the I.P. trials as -- as a technology trial. I -- I don't think they were technology trial.

We know how to build I.P. networks. They are exactly what you just raised, they're values trial. They are how do we make sure that the values that for 100 years, Americans have come to expect from their networks, continue even after the way in which that network operates changes.

That's what we're gonna be looking for in these trials. It's not whether the Gazintas and the Gazoutas work. We know that -- that can get taken care of. It is what are the values -- what -- what -- how do you preserve the values in the new technological environment.

WAXMAN: Commissioner Rosenworcel, do you wanna add anything to that.

ROSENWORCEL: I think -- I think there are so many exciting things that can come with new networks and I think we should embrace the future rather than reject it.

So I think experimenting in these kind of trials is the smart way to go. But as we move into the future, what we do has to be informed by the values that have always been a part communications policy.

And I see four, public safety, universal access, competition and consumer protection.

WAXMAN: Thank you.

Commissioner O'Rielly, I appreciate your appeal to bipartisanship in your testimony. I know you played an important role in helping us get this bipartisan legislation in the passage of the Public Safety and Spectrum Act last year, because you helped negotiate the provisions in the availability of unlicensed spectrum in the broadcast incentive auction. What's your perspective on unlicensed spectrum generally? And do you think the commission is on the right track in balancing the availability of unlicensed and licensed bands?

O'RIELLY: Yes, I'm a strong proponent of unlicensed spectrum. I'm always amazed at what the innovators and the experimenters can do with unlicensed spectrum. I think there's great opportunity in the 600 megahertz for more unlicensed spectrum. The NPRM that was put out in this situation proposed a number of different ideas where unlicensed could fit. They proposed channel 37, the guard bands -- if there are going to be guard bands, depending on what our band plan looks like.

We talked about wireless microphones. There's going to be still white space, at least in the 500, maybe in the 600 as well. And then there's going to be residual conversions depending if you're talking about converting from six megahertz broadcast channels to five megahertz wireless channels.

So, there should be opportunities in the incentive auction after our rules are complete for unlicensed spectrum. And I'm strongly supportive of those. The only difficulty is figuring out how big those guard bands should be.

WAXMAN: OK. Thank you.

And my last question is to Commissioner Pai. You stated in your testimony that 92 percent of Americans now can choose from 10 or more wire-line competitors. If that number is accurate, doesn't it demonstrate that the pro-competitive policies of the '96 Telecom Act are working? And don't you believe we should continue to support a marketplace that gives non-incumbents a fair chance to compete?

PAI: Congressman Waxman, thank you for the question.

I think what the multiplicity of choices that consumers enjoy today demonstrates is that an I.P. environment where you have -- conversion is something that we only dreamed about during the '96 act, where you have telephone companies competing with cable companies, competing with wireless companies and others to provide the same services, that we can now rely in a way we could not in 1996 on the marketplace and technological innovation to drive consumer choice.

And so to the extent that there are values of competition embedded in the 1996 act, I of course embrace those. But I think we also need to be mindful of the fact that technology can quite often out-pace where laws and regulations are. And that appears to be where we are with respect to the I.P. ...

(CROSSTALK)

WAXMAN: But do you think we should support a marketplace that gives non-incumbents a fair chance to compete?

PAI: Oh, absolutely. I think the marketplace should give every competitor a fair chance to compete.
WAXMAN: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: I now turn to the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Rogers.

ROGERS: Thank you very much. And as the representative of Michigan State University, I want to say thank you for giving me a great weekend.

(LAUGHTER)

I do find it suspicious, however, that my phone has not worked since the game. I wonder if you might be looking into that for me, Mr. Chairman.

(LAUGHTER)

The FCC's recent Communications, Security, Reliability and Interoperability Council meeting, I understand you talked about the need to apply metrics and evaluate cybersecurity. Can you elaborate on that for me?

WHEELER: Yeah, the CSRIC, which is the shorthand for the group you're talking about, has done a terrific job in using the multi- stakeholder process to come up with rules on botnets, on DNSSEC, on router security -- important kinds of network security issues. But it's not enough just to say, "OK, here are the rules," and then walk away. The question is: Are the rules working?

And so what I've asked CSRIC to do, not for us to impose, but in the multi-stakeholder process, is to say, "How do you establish metrics to know if this is working?" Because that's the -- you know, this is the trust-but-verify kind of a situation.

ROGERS: Well, how do you find those -- how are they -- how are you working through that process to define metrics in threats that change literally by the hour?

WHEELER: But -- so on those three issues, for instance, on botnets, for instance, how can you track the movement of where botnets are going? They seem to have moved into data centers, for instance. And what do we know about that and what might that suggest. And -- and what are we seeing in terms of -- of results of the implementation of the kinds of things that CSRIC has suggested.

That's what we need to know.

ROGERS: So, and if you find that out and you find that you are in some disagreement with industry on meeting those standards, do you foresee a regulatory scheme?

WHEELER: Well, I wouldn't want to, you know, to presume a hypothetical. I would hope that we would be working with industry to identify what needs to be done. And much like we are going to announce today on cell phone unlocking, when we sat with industry and said, "Here's a problem, it's got to be solved." And by the way, we'll have metrics on that.

I think that's the preferable first approach and that's the approach that we're taking with CSRIC.

ROGERS: But when you say that, does that -- does that mean -- if I hear you correctly, that means you're at least contemplating a regulatory scheme of some sort beyond just the voluntary "here's our metrics; try to...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: That's the right question, but it's not -- the key word is "contemplating." I've talked repeatedly about what I called the "seesaw" -- the regulatory seesaw: You do this; we don't need to do this.

And so what CSRIC is doing is saying: "OK, here are the kinds of things that need to be done." I said, "Let's measure them (inaudible), because the result is that we don't." If the seesaw has to tip, it has to tip, but it only tips on the basis of need, not the basis of theory.

ROGERS: If I understood your answer right, there's a possibility you could regulate -- always a possibility. Sure. OK, we should have lots of conversations on that. I worry that by the time you process your regulatory framework, you're too late. You've missed the boat. The threat changes...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: I could not agree more. The challenge of networks and the reason why the multi-stakeholder process is preferred is because it is much more dynamic, much more flexible, moves much quicker than a regulatory process can. And then can stay flexible. And that's why I'm trying to say, "Yes, this is the preferred process to deal with it."

ROGERS: So you're not going to move away from the council.

WHEELER: I'm sorry?

ROGERS: You're not going to move away from the council model for regulation. You're going to continue to...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: The multi-stakeholder process on this is the right way to go.

ROGERS: Yes, perfect.

Can you talk about Team Telecom? It's an important complement to the CIFIUS process in terms of preventing investments or I.T. equipment purchases to prevent certainly a threat to our national security interests like Chinese attempts to gain control of I.T. and telecommunication nodes in the United States. Can you walk us through where you're at on that and give us an idea of what's your thinking?

WHEELER: Well, when issues come before the commission relative to mergers, acquisitions, whatever the case may be, the input from Team Telecom is always sought and taken into account, and is crucially important.

ROGERS: Do you see an improvement to that process? Can we do something different? You have a limited set of -- once that report comes back, you have a limited set of decisions you can make. You're either in, you're out or you disagree with the decision.

WHEELER: Correct.

ROGERS: Is there something better we should be doing there, providing some authority for you all to be -- given, again, the nature of the changing technology and how fast the changes...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: I would -- I -- I have not had to live through one of these yet, so I'm probably not qualified to opine here on the fly. I'd love to look into this and to have a discussion with you about it.

ROGERS: Super. We're looking at some reforms to CIFIUS to try to make sure we're keeping up and I look forward to dialogue...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: Great. I look forward to that.

ROGERS: Thank you very much for being here.

WALDEN: I thank the gentleman.

We now turn to committee chairman emeritus, Mr. Dingell, also from Michigan, I believe, for five minutes. Go ahead.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, I commend you for this very important hearing. And I have no comments on football or other matters.

(LAUGHTER)

I want to welcome my old friend Chairman Wheeler to the committee. We look forward to great things from you. I'm satisfied you will serve with distinction.

I want to also welcome Commissioner O'Rielly.

And I want to commend Commissioner Clyburn for her fine services as acting chairwoman. Quite frankly, your daddy would be very proud.

My questions this morning will be directed solely at Chairman Wheeler and will elicit, as you will not be surprised to hear, yes or no responses.

Chairman Wheeler, I'd like to start with the reverse auction of broadcast frequencies authorized by the Middle Class Tax Relief and Job Creation Act. I note you recently announced that the commission will not conduct such an auction until 2015. That gives you an extra year.

In the meantime, do you expect to complete negotiations concerning the relocation of broadcast frequencies with Canada, Mexico and our border areas? Yes or no.

WHEELER: No, but I'm very hopeful that we will be able to move it forward. And as DTV showed, you don't have to have the signature on the page.

DINGELL: And you know -- you know that that can cause an awful lot of viewers to lose service and an awful lot of screens to go dark in our part of the country.

Chairman Wheeler, similarly, paragraph 15 of the commission's notice of proposed rulemaking for the incentive auction states, quote, "The commission expects interested parties will have an opportunity for meaningful comment on all specific repackaging methodologies it is considering before it makes a decision." Does the commission publicly commit to sharing with the public the broadcast frequency repacking methodology it adopts, as well as the variables and other inputs it may use to predict repackaging results? Yes or no.

WHEELER: I'll go beyond yes and say absolutely.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Chairman, let's move on to the forward auction of broadcast frequencies. Section 6403(c) of the Middle Class Tax Relief and Job Creation Act provides the commission may not grant licenses through forward auction, reassign or reallocate broadcast frequencies or remote spectrum usage rights unless it proceeds -- unless the proceeds of the forward auction are greater than the following three factors combined of, first, the total amount of compensation the commission must pay successful bidders in the reverse auction; the costs of conducting a forward auction; and the estimated costs for the commission to pay for broadcaster reallocations.

In addition, it is in the public interest that the commission ensure the auction raises a significant amount of money in order to help build out of the first debt (ph).

Together, these constitute a significant pressure on the commission to raise sufficient revenues to accomplish these objectives, do they not?

Yes or no?

WHEELER: Yes.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Chairman, at the end will the commission adopt transparent and simple rules to encourage participation by the broadest group of wireless providers in the forward auction? Yes or no?

WHEELER: Yes. DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, it's -- let's focus our attention on intelligent transportation systems. This is of considerable importance to my part of the country and our principal industries, and the five gigahertz band.

Given that the commission licensed ITS almost 15 years ago, it is -- is it reasonable to say that it would be premature for the commission to authorize unlicensed use of the 5850-5925 megahertz band before the studies are completed that confirm such use would not cause harmful interference with ITS services and other incumbent users. Yes or no?

WHEELER: Yes, and let me go further. We will not authorize if there's harmful interference.

DINGELL: I am very comforted that you are here this morning, Mr. Chairman.

Now, Chairman Wheeler, do you believe that the commission should approve unlicensed use of the 5850-5925 megahertz band before definitively establishing no risk of harmful interference with ITS systems or practical strategies to mitigate such risk? Yes or no.

WHEELER: No. And I repeat, we'll do nothing that causes harmful interference.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Chairman, ordinately (ph) is the commission considering moving forward with rulemaking opening up only the 5350 megahertz band for unlicensed use? Yes or no?

WHEELER: So this is where I need to just ask a question, sir. The answer is yes, if it is are we considering. The answer is no, if we have decided.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Chairman, I'd like to commend you for your work in advancing the transition to I.P. based networks. Will the commission consider an order in January 2014 that will address geographic trials as well as how to protect in the best way consumers using I.P. based networks? Yes or no.

WHEELER: Yes.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, you have been most gracious to me, and I thank you for this. Mr. Chairman, your comments have been most enlightening and helpful. I want to thank you and the members of the commission for your presence and assistance to us this morning.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: Thank you very much.

The gentleman yields back, and the chair now recognizes for five minutes Mr. Guthrie.

GUTHRIE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate that.

Chairman Wheeler, and welcome to the FCC also.

Mr. O'Rielly (ph), let me say happy new year.

And, Commissioner Clyburn, again I echo the good work that you did in your -- your time as chairwoman.

But is -- there seems to be a lot of progress being made -- this is to Chairman Wheeler -- a lot of progress being made to free up the 1755-1780 hertz band for commercial use, megahertz band.

And I know the FCC has already sought comment on how this band should be used for commercial purposes.

Is the FCC on track to auction the 1755-1780 band, paired with the 2155-2180 band? And, if so, when will it occur?

WHEELER: So, the answer is yes, we are on track. There are some issues that still have to be worked out with NTI and DOD and -- and some other...

(CROSSTALK)

GUTHRIE: ... impediments...

WHEELER: But I think -- I'm sorry, what?

GUTHRIE: Are there some impediments that you can identify that are -- that -- you're on track, but you say there are some impediments.

WHEELER: I think these are just implementational kinds of things in -- in their agreement.

But to be specific to your question, I would hope that we could do it in the September time frame.

GUTHRIE: September time frame. Great.

Well, then, you've spent some time in the -- in the wireless industry, I know, and have seen firsthand how spectrum demand has grown exponentially. I realize that a lot of your short-term focus is on the incentive auction, on the 1755-1780 megahertz.

But, looking forward, what is the FCC doing to plan for future spectrum demand? And how can the FCC ensure that there continues to be a pipeline of new spectrum to satisfy what consumers want, the insatiable demand for band width anywhere, anytime?

So, looking, again, how do you plan for future spectrum demand beyond this? What kind of thoughts do you have beyond this...

WHEELER: Sure.

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: First, we say yea and verily to what you and Ms. Matsui have -- have done.

Applying the incentive auction concepts to government spectrum, I'm a believer that by the time that you peel everything away, it comes down to economics, no matter who you are.

GUTHRIE: Right.

WHEELER: And the economics of an agency where they can get cash to help them fulfill their mission is an important kind of decision they should make. And you've -- you've created, with Ms. Matsui, have created a structure where this can happen.

GUTHRIE: Well, we looked at that in our -- in our working group, and it just -- it's a lot of work for these agencies to do that. It's not something you can just wish away, as I learned more and more about it.

And I always say I didn't run around Kentucky saying, "Send me to Washington and I'll deliver you spectrum," and so you get -- you learn things when you get elected that you never thought you would deal with, that I found just fascinating, because, as I said, my consumers, my constituents, demand it. They want fast and -- the fast bandwidth.

WHEELER: But it's also interesting...

GUTHRIE: But it is true that we have to, we're looking at it just by law, by fiat, say you have to release spectrum. I mean, you could get numbers, well, it's gonna cost this, it's gonna cost that.

And so, it does give them a reason to go in and make this happen.

WHEELER: And the interesting thing is, so -- so I was involved in the negotiation for ADUMS 1 (ph), back in the year 2000. In the first negotiation with the Department of Defense.

And we kept saying to them, "but you're gonna get money." And they kept saying, "But we can't spend it, because it goes to the general treasury."

GUTHRIE: Right.

WHEELER: And so, what you have done is set up a structure to help compensate people. And the -- and the beauty of it is that what it does is that it -- creates a cash flow for them to be able to meet their new needs and to be able to upgrade their equipment.

And so, it's a winning situation all around.

GUTHRIE: I think -- Mrs. Matsui, I think yesterday you said win- win-win I think is -- it does for the consumers, for the agencies and for the taxpayers.

So beyond -- so the -- so in the future, what are you kind of looking at, do you think should happen, just for bandwidth and more spectrum as we move off -- move into the future?

WHEELER: I'm sorry, sir?

GUTHRIE: I mean, just as we move on into the -- beyond the immediate auctions and things, what other things do you think we can do to free spectrum?

WHEELER: Well, I think we have -- I mean -- so, first of all, we're constantly looking at how do you get the more efficient, most efficient use out of -- of the spectrum?

One of the more interesting things that we're going to be running a test on is what do you do with spectrum sharing, because there's probably -- not -- there is, in a digital world, the opportunity to -- to share spectrum. But our spectrum allocations were set up with analog assumptions.

And so, if we can share it, re-use it, it's a great opportunity, and we need to be pursuing that as well.

GUTHRIE: Yeah, a great metaphor that I always thought was -- you don't have any lane on a highway dedicated just for emergency vehicles. But when emergency vehicles come down the highway, people get out of the way.

And I think that's a great metaphor for that.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I yield back 15 seconds.

WALDEN: The chair recognizes the gentlelady from California for five minutes.

MATSUI: Thank you very much.

And let me just follow up on my partner's questions here.

I know back in the day, you were looking at the use of federal spectrum. And I think it's a concept now that has finally come to the point where we can actually do something about it.

And I believe that this is a way to really encourage the federal agencies to relinquish the noncritical spectrum. And as Congressman Guthrie says, it's not easy to do. But we worked with DOD, and when we made a lot of progress.

Now, I am also looking at what Commissioner Rosenworcel has also always said, about using the carrot-and-stick approach regarding the federal spectrum holders, and having them relinquish their spectrum.

Now, in your view, and I also want Chairman Wheeler to comment on this, too, are the financial incentives identified in the bill adequate to encourage federal agencies to relinquish noncritical spectrum?

And I think I'll go for you first, Chairman Wheeler.

WHEELER: I don't know the answer to that, because I haven't market tested it, you know. And I think that the -- is this enough incentive is a market test question.

So I'm gonna, with all due respect, punt.

What's important is the concept that has been developed. And it would seem to me that -- that once that concept is -- is codified, that then making sure that incentives are adequate is, frankly, the easier lift on the whole exercise.

MATSUI: Right. Thank you.

Commissioner Rosenworcel?

ROSENWORCEL: Thank you for the question.

I think, first of all, that the legislation that you and Congressman Guthrie have introduced is terrific. The demand on our airwaves is going up, and the supply of unencumbered spectrum is going down. It's time to be creative. This legislation is creative.

As far as the incentives go, I think it's a good starting point for conversation. Because right now, federal agencies, by some measures, have veto control over about 60 percent of our airwaves. They use their spectrum. They're mission focused, to protect our national defense, to keep our planes in the sky, to tell us what weather patterns are coming.

But they don't have structural incentives to be efficient with it. Your bill is the start of a conversation about how we should apply those incentives and if we get them right, we will have a catalyst for a lot more spectrum for new mobile broadband uses, which would be terrific thing for the economy.

MATSUI: Great. Thank you very much.

Chairman Wheeler, you've emphasized how important it is for you to lead the FCC in fact-based decision making.

In the five gigahertz proceeding, for example, this committee is looking to the FCC's engineering expertise to determine the conditions under which Wi-Fi could use a band in a way that protects the missions of federal systems and commercial systems.

How are you and your staff planning on responding to the challenge? And is this proceeding a priority for the commission?

WHEELER: So, as Commissioner O'Rielly said, I would associate myself with -- with his comment, that he's a strong supporter of -- of unlicense (ph).

The key, of course, is that you need to make sure that there's no harmful interference, as I discussed with Mr. Dingell. But I believe that if you take a look at the five gigahertz, and you look at block 1 -- NII 1 (ph). That we should be moving to ruling on that, which is something that Commissioner Pai has -- has often suggested. That when you look at -- at band two, which is DOD, and band four, which is ITS, that we have to address the questions that I was addressing with Mr. Dingell, and that is, to make sure there is no harmful interference, and there's nothing in the record that really gets to that at this point in time. But we need to build that record.

MATSUI: OK, fine. Thank you very much.

And I have to ask a broadband adoption question here. The FCC has, Chairman Wheeler, implemented broadband adoption pilots as part of the lifeline reform measures. Can you explain what the FCC plans to do here? And what is the goal of these pilot projects?

WHEELER: So, there are 14 projects that are taking place around the country that we're funding with some of the savings that we've had in other parts of the -- of the program. And we're going to be looking at, for instance, what is the impact of a lifeline-like subsidy on broadband adoption? And we're going to be looking at what are the kinds of training issues to help people understand what broadband can do for them, and the kinds of things that they can do, once they get on the Internet? Because those seem to go part and parcel. It's not just that you can access it, but also, that you can use it and you understand why you ought to be using it.

MATSUI: So, are you going to use this information (ph) to develop a responsible permanent broadband adoption program?

WHEELER: That's the goal. We're develop -- this is -- these are trials to inform our future actions. And broadband -- wireless broadband and broadband adoption are kind of the sine qua non of what the agency does.

MATSUI: I thank you.

I yield back my time.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back her time, and the chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas for five minutes.

BARTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I want to make a comment on the audience. This one's a lot bigger than the one upstairs with the joint hearing. And they seem to be more interested, too. So, I guess that's a...

(LAUGHTER)

... credit to this subcommittee and the -- and the FCC commissioners.

We have the NRCC commissioners -- not NRC -- NRC.

(LAUGHTER)

WALDEN (?): I think you need to be clear on that one.

BARTON: That would be news, wouldn't it? If Greg Walden was testifying upstairs?

Anyway, I just have one question. The Middle Class Tax Relief and Job Creation Act requires repackaging (ph) and auctioning of the 65 megahertz of spectrum in the low-powered TV stations, of which there are hundreds, if not thousands, are not guaranteed continued existence. But Chairman, this subcommittee and myself have a bill that we hope to introduce very soon.

While it doesn't guarantee them any additional rights, it does create, I hope, a pathway, so that they may continue to -- to exist.

As the new chairman of the commission, Mr. Wheeler, do you have any thoughts on what might be done to -- to give our low-powered TV industry a chance to continue to exist?

WHEELER: Thank you, Mr. Barton. Yes. And they probably fall in three -- three buckets.

One, there's been a lot of talk about following the statute. And -- and, as you point out, the statute says that LPTV translators are secondary services. We -- that's what the statute says.

Second is, we have actually opened a -- a public notice on the delivery of the content of LPTVs. How do we make sure that -- that the content -- and this ends up being more of a digital technology question than anything else. And how do you -- how do you use digital technology to get the content out? Because that's the consumer protection issue here -- to make sure the consumer gets the -- the content.

And then the -- the third point here is that there may be a safeguard in the reality that rural areas don't have that great demand for spectrum for wireless services to begin with. And so, they may be operating in areas where there will be less pressure to get spectrum. But we will find out as we go through this process.

BARTON: Mr. -- Commissioner O'Rielly, you're the new kid on the block, so to speak. You haven't had a chance publicly to comment on this issue. Do you have any thoughts about low-powered TV and what might be done to help them continue to exist?

O'RIELLY: Well, the chairman's right in the sense -- and you are right to introduce legislation and working for the members on the Spectrum Act. There was a decision made by the members to not protect low-power translators. And your legislation -- I would defer to your legislation to -- to whether they may resolve that.

You -- I know you and I had a chance to talk. I know some of the low-power representatives have argued it may be beneficial financially to the government to participate. I -- I'm not sure, and I don't know if it's accurate, but we have heard that argument, as well, and probably something we'd have to explore.

BARTON: That's my only question, Mr. Chairman. With that, I yield back.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back the balance of his time. And the chair now recognizes the gentleman from Utah for five minutes.

MATHESON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I appreciate all the commissioners taking the time to be here today. I think this is a very informative hearing.

First, Chairman Wheeler, in my city Utah, we have over 750 active translators that relay signals to many rural communities that rely on broadcast television to obtain their newscasts or public service announcements (ph) and entertainment.

Now, with the increased reliance on mobile data, there's no doubt that we need to take steps to move forward to making more spectrum available. I've heard concerns that the spectrum repackaging that could result in the incentive auctions could have a negative impact on those rural communities that tend to be more dependent on broadcast television. What steps is the FCC taking to protect these viewers from possible negative impacts?

WHEELER: Well, Congressman, the -- the -- the first issue is how threatened should they feel? And the fact that they are living in rural areas, where there is less of a demand for mobile spectrum may end up being a de facto shield for them.

Secondly is, as the statute says, this is a secondary service. It does not have protection. So, the question is, how do you protect consumers, as you're suggesting, who rely on it.

That's why we've had a public notice and are seeking comments on the question of how do you get what the translator or LPTV station does in terms of content out? And how does new technology fit into that, such as digital use of the airwaves, or whatever the case may be?

But this is clearly an issue where -- where we need to be focusing on what's the effect on the consumer, rather than what's the effect on the transmission need (ph). Because you have told us how we should look at that transition.

MATHESON: I appreciate that response.

There's been a lot of back and forth on how the incentive options should be structured. I think most would agree it's imperative we maximize participation, both with reverse auctions and the forward auctions. But, Chairman Wheeler, I was wondering, what do you see as the best way for us to maximize participation, and also, revenue for the federal government in both of those options?

WHEELER: You know, I -- before I took this job, I was in the business of doing business deals. And I think that's what we're talking about right here. This is a business transaction that someone who has a license needs to make it a business decision about. And -- and how do you do that? Well, I -- and what's our role.

First of all, we need to make sure that we're getting relevant information on a timely basis into the hands of those parties to make that decision. And that's why we've scheduled the -- the auction plan. We're saying in January, we're going to begin laying out exactly what that kind of information needs to be.

Secondly, I think it's incumbent on us to have an outreach program, in which we make sure that small and large broadcasters understand how the system -- how the program's going to work, what the economics could be, and maybe even begin to think in terms of what economic models might look like. Because at the end of the day, what we're really doing is, we're -- we're saying we want the marketplace to make a decision as to what is the highest and best use of spectrum. And the marketplace can't make that kind of decision until it's informed. So, it is incumbent on us to make sure that that kind of information is in a timely manner available to those, and to help with that process.

MATHESON: Commissioner Rosenworcel, I have a question for you about the ConnectEd program. You mentioned it briefly in your opening testimony. And you also mentioned that the current E-Rate program has some bureaucratic inefficiencies built into it right now.

What can the commission do to maximize efficiency to get more bang for the buck? What can you do with your existing authority, or what do you need for Congress to do to change it to also increase those efficiencies?

ROSENWORCEL: Thank you very much for the question.

I think this program is really important, and reinvigorating it is really important for education, infrastructure, and the economy.

I think we can do more with this program just as it is. As my colleague, Commissioner Pai, noted, we do subsidize a whole bunch of old-fashioned services right now. We should phase those out over time, and focus instead on capacity and bandwidth.

And, like you mentioned, we need to reduce bureaucracy. Bureaucracy gets in the way of small and often rural schools from participating in this program.

I'd like to see us encourage greater use of consortia to improve bulk buying power, and also, have multi-year applications to reduce the administrative burden on schools that do participate.

MATHESON: I appreciate that.

Mr. Chairman, I'll yield back.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back, and the chair now recognizes for five minutes the gentleman from Nebraska.

TERRY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And let me begin by thanking former Acting Chair Clyburn. And during your tenure as acting chair, you finished the low-power FM, and you guys did a wonderful job on it. You really did. And I want to thank all of you for that. But former acting chair, just now Member Clyburn...

CLYBURN: The commissioner formerly known as...

(CROSSTALK)

(LAUGHTER)

TERRY: Yeah, that works. And you can have a sign for your name now.

But you were extremely communicative. I love the way you'd reach out to us. And frankly, you were so extraordinary, that I think every chairman, including the new one, should model themselves after that. We -- we don't -- it's very rare that we see that level of communication, so I just want to thank all of you.

This really is a great board. You guys are really serious about the real issues. And I like how you filter out the politics that surrounds all of this. Keep it up.

The next -- I know that the quantile regression analysis has already been discussed to some point, but I just want to let you know that that's been a long-time concern for me. I think some of the concerns that we had that it could actually displace or retard capital investment in rural America, when this is all about getting resources and capital into rural America because of its high cost. And so it really needs to be reviewed.

And Chairman Wheeler, I appreciate -- I've been told your comments on the record here today is that you understand this problem. I'll invite you and all the commissioners out to rural Nebraska. You land in my district and then we go there. But it really is becoming a problem. I have -- there's one provider in Diller, Nebraska that we have used as the model for responsible rural telecom because there are businesses there that now have high speed and they're using it to monetize their businesses there, where they truly are a worldwide business, not just the two blocks of Diller.

But there's a wind farm that they are having trouble -- the wind farm that wants to go there, that needs a broadband hookup and they're saying, "With our cap, we don't have the money; we aren't allowed to use that money in that way." So it's having serious effects. It's just not that one house that's 30 miles (inaudible) and, you know, line in and out. It's really hurting rural economic development. So I want (inaudible).

And then in my two minutes left, I want to ask the real question. And to Chairman Wheeler, and if either of the commissioners wish to step in, but I want to ask about a rule that concerns the video market. Many of us are worried that the price of cable subscriptions -- and I'll tell you that's an often and frequent call to my congressional office.

And the current market for video is seeing an expansion in the scope of current law wasn't necessarily intended to address; that the FCC has defined "buying group" of NVPDs for the purpose of program access rules in a way that excludes the NCTC, essentially the only buying group out there.

So, are there plans by the commission to look into this, to maybe change it? Do you think that the NCTC should be excluded from this process?

Chairman Wheeler?

WHEELER: Thank you, Mr. Terry.

I've just become aware of the issues that have been raised about this, and want to get all over it, and would ask that we be able to get back to you with what the answer is. We are now aware and will be dealing with it.

TERRY: Any of the commissioners have concerns about NCTC being excluded from this rule?

Hearing none, Mr. Pai, you actually had an expression.

(LAUGHTER)

PAI: No good expression goes unpunished.

(LAUGHTER)

No, I mean, I supported the notice that teed up a lot of the questions. And we teed up a lot of different questions (inaudible) paragraph 84 (inaudible) that order, out-lifted all the issues under consideration. And I look forward to working with Chairman Wheeler and my colleagues to ensure that the FCC takes the appropriate action to ensure that (inaudible).

TERRY: Right, and others nodded.

Mr. O'Rielly, also known as the new guy.

(CROSSTALK)

O'RIELLY: The new guy, yes. I would have to agree with Chairman Wheeler. I don't have as much information on this and I look to get up to speed on it, so I apologize that I don't.

TERRY: Yield back.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back the balance of his time.

And the chair now recognizes the gentleman from New Mexico for five minutes.

LUJAN: Mr. Chairman, thank you very much.

And Chairman Wheeler, welcome today; to all the commissioners, welcome. Again, as we're announcing former positions and posts, Commissioner Clyburn, I know that you're very welcome here today. It's great to hear the recognition from my colleagues with your leadership and your work.

And I don't want to speak for former Public Utility Commissioner Ray Baum either, but I'm going to invoke his name a bit. It's good to have another fellow utility commissioner here and a leader. For those of you who aren't aware, myself and Ray served at the same time as utility commissions as Commissioner Clyburn. We had a chance to do some great things together. And it's great to have you again in that leadership capacity, Commissioner Clyburn.

Chairman Wheeler, I appreciate very much the conversation about quantile regression analysis. I think you'll see that there's many rural members of Congress or members that represent rural parts of America that are on this committee. As we look at this and encouraging investment in rural America, I hope that through all these deliberations and rulemaking, that we don't lose sight of the fact that if we can make a mobile call from an airline, that we should be able to make it anywhere in rural America.

And if technology is allowing for that to occur, I don't want to hear that we're not able to anymore. So thank you again for looking at this and making sure that rural America will not be left out, Mr. Chairman.

With that being said, I would also encourage and was encouraged by the fact that in a recent report, there was some conversation about the tribal coefficient and would encourage that that is critically important as we roll out the reevaluation of the QRA.

And lastly, I want to let you know that I'm planning on introducing a piece of legislation to include the elevation of the national tribal recognition of ONAP (ph) as a permanent office. And I would hope that we might be able to work with our colleagues to elevate that, (inaudible) reports directly to the chairman, especially with the evolution of what we're seeing with the extension of utilities across rural America, including tribal lands.

Mr. Chairman, I'm intrigued very much by the conversation around the I.P. transition. I think Chairman Rogers, chairman of the Intelligence Committee, was asking about the importance of security in networks, that we not lose sight of the fact of the importance of the protection of consumers and network security.

As we're looking forward into future technology, sometimes things that we've read about in fiction or we've seen in television. There's been a lot of concern recently about security of networks, about the infringement on individuals, peering eyes, if you will, sometimes into consumer information.

And I'm intrigued by your direction to move forward with real- world experiments that will be coming forward. I'd like your thoughts on anything that you're aware of or that the FCC may be looking at with laser-based quantum encryption, point-to-point work that's happening right now with our national labs. It's been written about.

I know it makes some people nervous, but it seems to me that as we're looking to protect consumer information and intellectual property, that the more advanced that we can make our networks with technology that's currently available, that we may take to the commercial marketplaces, is something that I'd like to encourage and see, and just like to get your thoughts on that.

WHEELER: I just learned quantum regression analysis, and now you want me to know laser-based quantum encryption?

LUJAN: Yes, sir.

(LAUGHTER)

WHEELER: I look forward to learning a lot about that. I don't mean to be light, but the -- the -- let me be specific on what I can comment on.

Our networks need to be secure, period. What I was trying to say to Mr. Rogers is that the best way for attacking that is through the multi-stakeholder process and moving with dispatch. Because the bad guys sure figure out a way to get around things and that we need to make sure that our responses are flexible.

We're working obviously with the president's executive order and the various steps that he is taking, or the executive agencies are taking in that regard. But I happen to believe that -- that two challenges of the I.P. transition is going to be the security of the networks and the privacy of the information.

And if you go back to the comment that I was making I believe to Mr. Waxman, about the trials need to be about measuring values, then we need to be addressing both of those issues inside that trial. And I look forward to learning more about how laser quantum can help the.

LUJAN: I appreciate it, Chairman.

And if I may, Mr. Chairman, you know, it wasn't too long ago that when the same idea was presented, that we may be able to move data over light and laser...

WHEELER: Right, exactly.

LUJAN: ... there were a lot of discouraging thoughts that were associated with that. But as we're moving now away from copper as a new medium, where even the ability to move data on fiber can't keep up with our processing speeds. If laser-based quantum encryption is good enough to keep national security secrets preserved, I would certainly hope that we find a way to extend these protections to consumers as well.

And again, with the real threats that are taking place with theft of intellectual property, right now we know that it works point to point, but there are ways to make this work with (inaudible) we have available. This is a serious area that I have tried to take up with the Intelligence Committee. They were very cautious with their conversations with me until I presented them with publications that have talked about this in open source and an unclassified way.

So I'm hoping that we might be able to look into this more and have a serious attempt to incorporate this into our day-to-day lives.

Thanks again, Mr. Chairman. I yield back.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back.

And the chair now recognizes the gentleman from Colorado for five minutes.

GARDNER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I want to commend all the commissioners for being here today, and congratulations on your new role and your newly retired-from role. Thank you for your service.

And Commissioner Pai, I want to thank you for your work on the quantile regression analysis, and the comments that you made at the beginning of your testimony, the question of Chairman Walden, I guess, was something that I have dealt with each and every day,

In a district bigger than the state of South Carolina, I have a number of rural telecom -- rural utilities that continue to face the uncertainty, as you have mentioned, about the QRA. And I appreciate it.

And so, Chairman Wheeler, thank you very much for your comments on that as well. I look forward to following up with you as those conversations and decisions move forward.

I wanted to ask a quick question to Commissioner Pai about the issue of connected (ph) and the E-Rate program .

Who is responsible for policing to make sure the E-Rate program is being used as it -- as appropriately, making sure there's no abuse of the program?

PAI: Congressman, thank you for the question.

In theory, the Universal Service Administrative Corp. or company (ph) overseen by us monitors it.

But in practice, given the limited resources that USAC has and given the limited resources the FCC has to oversee USAC, there's not a great deal of transparency and accountability in the system.

GARDNER: A question I had with that is two-fold. Number one, how do we ensure that there is no overlap of private sector service with E-Rate funding and programs, to make sure that we're not adding to government competition to the private sector. But, number two, if USAC has identified a problem with a E-Rate contractor or recipient, is there a way to police or perhaps are there barment issues that you can talk about?

Because I know one of the issues in Colorado is that there has been a company that is involved and has been morphed into a new company that has had significant issues with E-Rate violations, and is now involved in an other company in Colorado that is providing services to schools.

PAI: Yes, USAC has taken actions to -- such as the type you've indicated. And, as well, the Department of Justice in appropriate cases can take action where it suspects that something fraudulent has occurred.

And I know that I'm quite sure I speak for my colleagues when I say that the FCC has no interest in doing anything but enforcing the rules against people who abuse the E-Rate system.

With respect to the first part of your question, I think it's critical as we think about reforming the E-Rate program in addition to restructuring the basic planks of it that we ensure that at the end of the day, we don't supply or use our E-Rate funds to supplant or add to the problems on competitors who've, you know, taken the risk and invested private capital into pulling (ph) networks.

GARDNER: Commissioner Rosenworcel, I know you talked this as well. I don't know if you have anything to add.

ROSENWORCEL: You know, I'd echo largely the sentiment of my colleague. We wouldn't want government funds to displace private sector funds. We want to be efficient with the limited dollars we have and make sure we reach as many schools at as high speed as possible, including in rural Colorado.

And with respect to oversight, we could always benefit from more oversight. When we find bad actors in a program we have to take efforts to get them out.

GARDNER: Great. Thank you.

And Commissioner -- or Chairman Wheeler, a question I have, and this is maybe something that you need to get back to me on, are you familiar with a report on a next-generation 911 that is being put together by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration in connection with a blue ribbon panel that was convened by -- I'll get the name here -- the FCC's Communications Security, Reliability and Interoperability Council?

WHEELER: Right. That's CSRIC, yes,

GARDNER: CSRIC. Are you familiar with the report that is about to come out in January?

WHEELER: I am not familiar with the report that's about to come out. GARDNER: There was a -- the blue ribbon panel that was put together...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: Right. I know taht...

(CROSSTALK)

GARDNER: Apparently there is a blue ribbon panel -- or the report is coming out in January. And there is some questionable findings in this report. And I would hope that perhaps the FCC, because I believe some of the findings are not in line with FCC ideas at all. If you could take a look at that report before it's issued and public, to make sure that when we issue a report that has the stamped seal approval of the federal government that it's in line with FCC directives and beliefs...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: Consider that done.

GARDNER: Thank you very much.

And a final question in my time, regarding the I.P. transition issues. Heading in a good direction, but -- and there's significant strides being made to transition to I.P., but, you know, it's -- talking about rural America again, how do we further encourage this transition in a way that ensures consumers remain served in the long run, and particularly in rural America?

WHEELER: I'm sorry, that consumers be served in the long run?

GARDNER: In the long run, particularly in rural America.

WHEELER: Again, it is gonna be very important, for instance in these trials that we have trials in rural areas, to begin to answer those kind of questions.

I mean, you can't go to New York City or, you know, someplace like this and run a trial and say that it applies, you know, in the cities in your district.

And so, that's gonna be one of the criteria that we're looking at.

GARDNER: Thank you.

Yield back my time.

WALDEN: Thank you.

The gentleman yields back.

And the chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri for five minutes. LONG: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And, Chairman Wheeler, I came to Congress with a 30-year background in the auction business, so that's how -- was my profession for 30 years before I got here, so I've got a great interest in any time that we try to conduct an auction for anything. And it's tricky to me about this reverse auction thing, because I'm not sure exactly how that's supposed to work.

But can you provide us with a timeline of actions that need to occur before the incentive auctions would begin?

WHEELER: Yes, sir. We're going to -- and we're gonna in January, which -- at next month's open meeting we're gonna have a presentation that is going to lay out both the timeline and the policy issues that need to be decided, and some recommendations on those.

Then in the spring we're going to be voting on an important order that solicits offers to do trials, sets up a measurement scheme for them, and begins to address the kinds of policy issues that will be tangential to all of that.

And then, we will go forth with trials.

LONG: Can you also tell me what the FCC is doing to ensure that the maximum amount of revenue will be generated through these auctions, which was always a concern of mine as an auctioneer?

WHEELER: The -- and -- and -- and believe me, one of ours as well, because we have the responsibility not only to fund FirstNet and the auction activities themselves, but also to contribute to pay down the federal deficit.

And I think the key to -- to how you can maximize revenue comes down to multiple things.

One is -- is, we've got to be able to attract broadcasters. We've got to have something, as I was saying previously, that -- that are rules that are understandable, are rules that we're actually being aggressive and helping people understand the economic impact of them, because, as you know, you're only gonna bid to the point that your spreadsheets say it's gonna be making sense.

So that's the first thing, that we've got to attract broadcasters.

We also have this -- well, we have this perverse challenge here that we also have to be freeing up spectrum.

LONG: Have to be what?

WHEELER: Freeing up spectrum.

LONG: Which requires people to put spectrum...

(CROSSTALK) LONG: At the end of the auction.

WHEELER: There's the key. So you have to provide the appropriate incentive to get them to free up...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: And do you foresee that happening? From what I talk to -- the people I talk to, I don't know that that's gonna happen in as large a way as what you...

WHEELER: So, the Congress told us to make it happen. And -- and we are going to do our damndest to deliver on those instructions. And I believe that we will be able to fulfill the challenge that we have been given.

And in no way, shape or form, do I underestimate the magnitude of it. I have spent more time on this issue in the last 39 days than any other issue.

And I know my colleagues all feel the same way on this. We understand that we're biting off a huge chunk here.

LONG: And there's a article where you were speaking in Ohio and, to quote out of the article, "'the protection of competition,;'Mr. Wheeler said, 'would apply to the coming auction of additional airwaves or spectrum for mobile broadband.' In April, the Justice Department told the FCC that it could help to protect competition by ensuring that the two largest companies, AT&T and Verizon, were not allowed to use their financial might to buy up all the available spectrum being auctioned, shutting out smaller carriers."

So how do you balance that? How do you decide I want to get the most money for my product over here, but I want to limit my bidders over here? How does that...

WHEELER: I also think that -- and, as you know, the more people you get to the auction, presumably the better result.

And so, we want to make sure that we are creating an auction marketplace that will attract as many people as possible. Not -- and not just the giants.

As a former entrepreneur, we want to make sure that we have smaller wireless companies. We want to make sure there are entrepreneurial opportunities in here.

And that's one of the things that's most interesting about what we've recently put out for public notice, the proposal from the Competitive Carriers Association, the Rural Carriers Association, and the NTCA, the rural wireline association, on talking about smaller economic areas, so that they could bid for a smaller piece of geography, rather than a humongous piece, because for entrepreneurs, for smaller carriers, they can target their activities, they can take something that is a -- is a consumable bite, rather than be forced to go out and -- and -- and... (CROSSTALK)

LONG: But they (inaudible) have to put together a patchwork quilt of -- to make their system work correct, what they buy through the auction, they have to...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: So they can -- they can buy their areas, they can buy other, smaller areas, rather than having to buy -- this is -- and this is not a decision, I just want to clear. This is -- we've put this out for comment. But it is a certainly very interesting idea that...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: ... a,b, and c, and they get a and b, but then they can't get c, then a and b weren't worth anything to them...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: But that's kind of the history of the wireless industry. I've been -- we're about to conduct our 96th auction. And -- and I've been in them from the outset. And traditionally, that kind of situation has occurred. And then an aftermarket then develops in which various players say, "OK, how can I reorganize for the most efficiency?"

LONG: OK. I'm beyond my time by quite a little bit. So if I had any time, I'd yield it back.

WALDEN: The gentleman's time has expired.

And the chair now recognizes the gentlelady from North Carolina for five minutes.

ELLMERS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you to the commissioners for being here today.

Commissioner Clyburn, I'm going to direct my questions to you. I have an issue that has been raised from my sheriffs back home in North Carolina. And it has to do with one of the points that you made in your opening testimony.

And I'll just read from your opening statement. "We adopted an order to reform inmate calling services to finally provide relief to millions of families and 2.7 million children who have been paying unreasonably high rates to stay connected with incarcerated loved ones."

My sheriffs back home, do have some concerns on this issue and -- so they would like me to pose some questions to you on this issue, in regard to security measures that -- that they will now be putting in place, certainly they want to be able to provide, you know, access and information and the ability to communicate with family members. But they are concerned that this order or reform regulation is saying that basically their ability to -- to put forward call-blocking through the -- is that an issue? Is that looked upon as something that -- that we want to veer away from?

CLYBURN: So let me start -- again, thank you, and it's a pleasure meeting a -- a Carolinian.

ELLMERS: Absolutely. Yes

CLYBURN: We might have argued a bit about which...

ELLMERS: Yeah.

CLYBURN: Right.

ELLMERS: That's OK, though. We're -- we're brothers, cousins, sisters.

CLYBURN: Absolutely.

ELLMERS: That's right.

CLYBURN: So let me start with the latter, in terms of the call blocking concerns that some of -- of the sheriffs and persons who run jail facilities mentioned.

So as it relates to that particular item, I want to assure you that nothing within anything that we have delivered in this order prevents any type of security in security needed type of a blocking.

So if it's -- if -- if you know, a judge or a witness, or something, you know is -- is potentially at risk, then yes, these providers can block calls.

The -- the call blocking comes into play when there is not a business relationship with -- if someone is doing business with somebody else and then the supplier -- another supplier is blocking them, that is when we have some disconnects with our rules.

But when it comes to security protocols, that is in place.

So you've mentioned what is at the epicenter of our reasoning for reform. That family members that -- those who represent those who are incarcerated, not everybody incarcerated is -- is guilty.

And -- and those who are trying to help rehabilitate those inmates have complained to us for a number of years, for well over 10 years that the ability to communicate was just financially outrageous. That it was an unaffordable regime.

So what we did, after 10 long years, was act. And we looked at -- and reminded ourselves, Communications Act, in terms of universal service principles put forward, that is the providing of just and reasonable rates for all. And so we put in a -- a mechanism that will provide that. And what we also did, not only providing a -- a means for just and reasonable rates for those families and others who use the phone service, but providing the means for just and reasonable rate of return for those carries, at the same builds in those that just and reasonable rate of returns is the -- the amount of money needed to -- to provide a state of the art security protocols.

So nothing within the framework in terms of what we, you know, put forward in terms of the order and the further order that would deal with entrust state rates, will compromise security protocols. But it will bring more certainty and more -- I -- I guess I would -- again, just affordability for those -- for those who are making calls to the incarcerated.

ELLMERS: They are also concerned about the cost involved and -- and you know, if -- if you can give some guidance in anticipation of the cost that they will have to incur as the result of this, certainly again, wanting to ensure that everyone is protected...

CLYBURN: Right.

ELLMERS: ... and the security is there. That -- and also, would you consider, at the local level, the local jails, maybe being exempt until they can, you know, come up with a plan of action?

CLYBURN: So one of the things that we have put forth in -- in this engagement is the capacity for any provider that is under distress, they can apply for a waiver process. You know, for -- for a waiver.

And so that capacity is within and means, and so they do have the ability to do so.

But one of the things that I wanted to emphasize is when we came up with this particular rate structure, we looked at a number of cost studies and cost models that included a -- a wide array of -- of facilities and came up, actually, with a cost structure that was much higher than some the petitioners wanted us to.

But we thought that we needed to take into account facilities, large and small, in order to come up with a -- a rate structure that we think it strikes the right balance.

ELLMERS: Well, thank you very much and I look forward to and certainly will be working with my law enforcement back home, working with the commission on -- on this issue, and the subcommittee.

So thank you so much. I look forward to that.

CLYBURN: Thank you, ma'am.

ELLMERS: And I yield back the remainder of my time.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back, and seeing no other members to ask questions, I wanna thank the commission for being with us today. And I know that Chairman Walden does the same.

And I also wanna thank the commission for changing your time today for your meeting to be able to be here, and I understand your meeting is at 2 O'clock. So we appreciate you accommodating the committee to appear before us today.

And seeing no further business to come for the committee, the committee stand adjourned.

Surge seen in filings for unemployment benefits

BYLINE: Gary Gerew

LENGTH: 262 words

The U.S. Labor Department today said the number of people filing initial claims for unemployment benefits rose by 68,000 to 368,000 for the week ending Dec. 7.

The department's four-week moving average, considered a more accurate picture of employment, also rose by 6,000 from the previous week's revised average of 322,750.

In a related matter, Rep. Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District and Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham of the First District are among 166 Democratic members of the House who are asking Speaker John Boehner not to adjourn the House for the year without bringing up an extension of federal unemployment insurance.

Those benefits are scheduled to expire on Dec. 28.

"Speaker Boehner and House Republican leaders should not send the House home for the year until an extension of unemployment benefits is passed and sent to the president for his signature," Luján said in a statement. "Failure to act on this critical extension during this difficult economic time would leave 6,000 unemployed workers in New Mexico without benefits at the end of the year and an additional 9,700 people without benefits in the first six months of 2014. Too many families across our state are still struggling as we work to turn the economy around, and allowing unemployment benefits to end for thousands of people who are trying to get back to work will take a toll on our families as well as our economy."

NM senators praise deal; two reps say it has flaws

BYLINE: Michael Coleman Journal Washington Bureau

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. A6

LENGTH: 493 words

WASHINGTON - New Mexico's U.S. senators on Wednesday welcomed a proposed bipartisan budget agreement to avert a federal fiscal crisis, while two of the state's representatives said the deal had flaws.

Democratic Sens. Martin Heinrich and Tom Udall said the proposal, which would repeal some of the sequester cuts in fiscal 2014 and 2015, appears to be good starting point to avert a government shutdown in January. Both senators said they would review it carefully before deciding whether to vote for it.

"This bipartisan budget agreement will prevent a government shutdown and is an important step toward undoing some of the damaging across-the-board cuts from the sequester," Heinrich said. "At the very least, this agreement will give the economy the near-term stability it needs and Congress time to deal with long-term fiscal concerns. "

Udall said the deal would help restore a "rational budget process."

"It provides more time to get our economy working again while still acknowledging the need to keep our budgets in check," Udall said. "Governing from crisis to crisis has been bad for business, bad for middle-class families and bad for New Mexico, and this agreement will provide some real relief from the economically damaging sequestration cuts as well as welcome stability for our economy and the federal employees and contractors in New Mexico."

Republican Rep. Steve Pearce commended Ryan and Murray but said the deal contains "significant flaws."

"The proposal directly impacts New Mexican families by reducing New Mexico's share of receipts from commercial activity on federal lands-money that we rely on for schools and roads," Pearce said. "This budget does nothing to reduce our national debt. Our nation spends nearly a trillion more a year than we collect, but this proposal does not have any productive deficit reduction."

Democratic Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham was optimistic, saying, "While I am still reviewing the final details, this agreement can serve as the foundation for continued bipartisan negotiations that lead to a budget that provides complete relief from the sequester, gives stability to New Mexico working families and businesses, creates jobs and reduces the deficit in a balanced and responsible way."

Democratic Rep. Ben Ray Luján raised concerns that the deal doesn't include an extension of unemployment benefits.

"Failure to act on this critical extension during this difficult economic time would leave 6,000 unemployed workers in New Mexico without benefits at the end of the year and an additional 9,700 people without benefits in the first six months of 2014," Luján said.

Meanwhile, former Sen. Pete Domenici, a Republican former Senate Budget Committee chairman, praised the proposed accord.

"If this deal also leads to less drama over the debt ceiling and fiscal year 2015 appropriations, then the American people will see a much more functional Congress and a much less melodramatic fiscal discussion," Domenici said.

LUJAN STATEMENT ON BUDGET VOTE; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 302 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after voting for a compromise budget plan that reduces sequester cuts over the next two years.

"While this budget plan is not perfect, and neither side got everything they would have liked, it represents a compromise that takes important steps to chip away at the devastating cuts of the sequester. It rejects the calls of the extreme Tea Party elements that have demanded even deeper cuts that would harm New Mexico. Already in our state we have seen arbitrary sequester cuts negatively impact our economy and hurt our families. During this past year Head Start centers have shut down, workers were furloughed, and cuts to the national labs rippled through the state's economy.

"By reducing part of the sequester cuts and providing certainty and stability over the next two years, this plan puts Congress on a path to fund the government without legislating from one crisis to the next.

"Passing this budget plan is a small step forward; however, I am disappointed with the House's failure to act on other critical issues facing families in New Mexico. Yesterday, I called on Speaker Boehner to keep the House in session and pass an extension of unemployment benefits before recessing for the year. More work is needed to pass a Farm Bill that supports our farmers, ranchers, and dairy producers, and that provides funding for critical nutrition programs. And House Republicans have yet to allow a vote on much-needed immigration reform to fix our broken system. With all this important work that remains, the House should stay in session until more progress is made for the people of New Mexico."

TEXT:

WALDEN: I'll call to order the Subcommittee on Communication and Technology. And it's a delight to welcome all five members of the Federal Communications Commission, fully installed and bright and shiny faces and welcome to go today.

We welcome you. And Chairman Wheeler and Commissioner O'Rielly, we especially welcome you and look forward to working with you to set the communications agenda for the United States.

Federal Communications Commission is the arm of our government, tasked with fostering some of the most important parts of our national economy. And among them, the telecommunications industry, the video distribution industries and the Internet.

Give the economic significance of these industries, the changes from Congress -- the charge from Congress to encourage competition, license our national spectrum assets and facilitate technological advances is one that must be discharged with transparency, accountability and a long view of the technological landscape.

It is with this in mind, that the subcommittee has worked over the last three years on efforts to improve the commission's processes. As the subcommittee with jurisdiction over the Federal Communications Commission, take this task very seriously and with great care to ensure the commission not only remains a vital institution, but one that can serve as an example for other federal agencies of accountability and efficiency.

A bipartisan majority of this subcommittee is deeply committed to this cause, and it's proud to have reported out a bipartisan FCC Process Reform Bill to the full House of Representatives, yesterday.

Chairman Wheeler, it's clear you want to improve the agency. I've appreciated our conversations and your comments. And I'd like to commend for turning your attention to this task as one of your first roles as chairman by asking one of your top advisers to review the FCC process and submit recommendations for improvement by early 2014.

While there are a number of large proceedings currently pending at the commission, many of which we will talk about today, I'm particularly concerned with returning the commission to addressing some of its long overdue responsibilities.

For example, despite multiple unsuccessful trips to the Third Circuit Court of Appeals, the commission's responsibility to address the media ownership proceeding, remains unfulfilled.

Additionally, licensing, one of the original -- licensing, one of the original reasons for the creation of the commission, has fallen woefully behind.

Of particular note is the tragic pace of processing of applications in the commission's media bureau.

Now the AM radio industry has been clamoring for the ability to use FM translators to give new life to that classic medium. And I certainly appreciate what Commissioner Pai has done, taking on this issue and it's very good work.

And as a former licensee, I actually know firsthand, the commission has been in no rush to address translator applications. In fact, my own application sat unresolved at the commission for 10 years.

To put this in context, while the commission considered my application, my wife and I actually sold our radio stations, our son went off an graduated from college and every full power television station in the country converted from analog to digital broadcasting.

Look, the commission can do better than that. The commission should do better than that. And I'm hopeful that our shared commitment will lead to improvement in that bureau.

As the only one on the panel with the unique experience of having been a licensee of commercial broadcast and still under your jurisdiction with my amateur radio license, which I'm set to renew for March, hopefully I will get approved within 10 years, I'd like to offer two pieces of advice for you as you move forward with your change.

First, where Congress has spoken, I urge you to heed the words in statute and reject calls to act in ways contrary to congressional intent. For example, in the incentive auction proceeding, some are calling on the commission to exclude bidders from participating in the auction. Others, still are calling for excessive guard bands in the attempt to end-run requirements to license, reclaim TV band spectrum.

I'm just saying both are bad ideas.

Second, I urge you to bear in mine that even seemingly small changes in your rules can have significant impact on the market. The commission's recent decision to apply yet incomplete rules to its UHF discount has effectively frozen many plans for broadcast mergers and acquisition.

The problem here isn't that the commission wants to update or needs to update the UHF discount rule, the problem is that absent a decision how and importantly, when the commission will move forward, it has pressed paused for an indefinite period of time.

We all know that markets do not react favorable to this kind of open-ended uncertainty.

On the other hand, I applaud the recent announcement on the schedule for the spectrum incentive auctions. Both the broadcast and wireless industries are waiting with bated breath to see how the FCC addresses this first-of-a-kind auction.

To say nothing of the public safety agencies that are counting on the auction fund to fund FirstNet. The certainty of a timetable is good for both stakeholders and for the commission.

Finally, turning to those large proceedings the commission has on its plate. We're looking forward to working with you to tackle the tough issues like the I.P. transition, universal service reform and media ownership.

Chairman Upton and I recently launched a large proceeding of our own, an initiative to update the Communications Act. Each of you brings the unique perspective to your work on the commission, industry lobbyist, newspaper publisher, a couple of lawyers, even some former legislative Hill staffers. That experience, combined with your expertise on the Federal Communications Commission staff and your own work on the commission, will be valuable in our efforts as we work together to update and modernize the Communications Act.

So Congress -- or Chairman Wheeler...

(LAUGHTER)

We wouldn't want to demote you to level of congressman.

Chairman Wheeler -- yeah, our numbers aren't that great -- Commissioner O'Rielly, we especially welcome you aboard the FCC and Commissioners Clyburn, Rosenworcel and Pai, welcome back, not only the commission, but before our committee. We thank you all for joining us today, we look forward to working together in this very critical sector of America's economy to spur further innovation technology growth and jobs.

And with that, I will now yield to the ranking member of the subcommittee, my friend Ms. Eshoo from California.

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman for holding this hearing, it's wonderful to see a full Federal Communications Commission before us. Welcome to each one of you, special welcome to the new chairman.

I think that you started out with 100 percent goodwill with everyone that is on this committee, I think our full committee -- in fact I think the Congress.

We have -- there have been many months where we didn't have a full commission. I want to once again thank Commissioner Clyburn for her exceptional leadership during that period of time.

Welcome to each one of the commissioners, and of course, to the newest commissioner, Mike O'Rielly, who served on the other side of that table.

When I first came to the committee, he was here when we began -- began the Telecom Act. And now, guess what, you get to trudge through that all over again, according to the chairman.

So I guess there are some things that we just never finish with.

As Chairman Wheeler announced last week, the commission has made the upcoming incentive auction of broadcast television spectrum the top priority of the commission. And I agree.

This is a rare opportunity to auction beach-front spectrum under 1 gigahertz. And the FCC has to structure rules to promote a competitive wireless landscape and ensure carriers, of all sizes, both regional and national, have an opportunity to bid competitively for license spectrum.

And it has to be done right. It's the first in the history of the world that an auction has been structured this way. And I appreciate, Mr. Chairman, and all the commissioners, your understanding, the delicacy of this needing to be done right, well and successfully.

Similarly, recognizing the enormous economic and societal benefits of unlicensed spectrum which is tucked away in one corner of my telecom heart. The FCC has an opportunity to structure a band plan that ensures the nationwide block of spectrum under 1 gigahertz, dedicated for unlicensed innovation.

With unlicensed spectrum being a critical tool to bring broadband to unserved areas, including rural America, this opportunity really must be seized.

In addition to the important role the FCC has in freeing up more spectrum for mobile broadband, I'd like to highlight four issues that the commission should make a top priority in 2014. And I think you're going to.

First during the three months since I released a draft legislation, the message from individuals, communications companies and consumer groups has been abundantly clear. Our video laws are in need of reform, they're broken.

Independent of such legislation, the commission does have an important responsibility to promote competition, consumer choice and localism across the video marketplace.

Second, I hope the commission will continue its focus on modernizing the E-Rate program to support a 21st Century digital needs of our schools and libraries.

In June, together with Commissioner Rosenworcel, we called for such an update. And I'm pleased that the White House and the FCC agree with us and have made this issue a key priority. We have to stay on it. We have to move and we have to make it much better. It's gotta be a 21st century plan.

Third, the commission should uphold, I think, the goals (ph) of Section 629 and ensure a vibrant, competitive retail set-top box market. A successor to the current CableCARD regime, whether by FCC rule, or more preferably, a voluntary industry agreement, will usher in a new generation of technologies that will give consumers giver choice and ensure that innovation flourishes.

Finally, I'm pleased that the commission has made the transition to Next Generation 911, as well as improving the indoor location accuracy of 911 calls the key priority.

In fact, later today, it's my understanding that the commission will vote on an order to improve the reliability of 911. And I look forward to continued updates as the commission proceeds with the implementation of Next Gen 911.

Mr. Chairman, thank you for holding this morning's hearing. I look forward to the important testimony of Chairman Wheeler and each of the commissioners, most importantly, I pledge to work with each of you to make American's communications sector the most effective and the most admired in the world.

And with that, I yield back.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back.

Chair now recognizes the chairman of the full committee, Mr. Upton from Michigan, I believe.

UPTON: Great, (inaudible) Michigan.

WALDEN: (inaudible) Ohio.

UPTON: Thank you-- thank you, Mr. Chairman.

You know, today we welcome a fully constituted FCC back to the Energy and Commerce Committee. The -- the last time that we heard from the full commission was in July of 2012.

So the FCC has regulatory authority over a sector of our economy that is critical to innovation, jobs and our nation's global leadership in technology.

Communication sector is also an integral part of our daily lives, connecting us to loved ones, alerting us to natural disasters and entertaining and educating us every single day.

As the regulatory agency of these industries, the FCC has the immensely important task of promoting growth and competition. Our hearing today will examine actions that the FCC has taken since the commission last appeared and set expectations for the agency's future.

As the oversight authority for the commission, our committee works hard to ensure that the FCC functions to the benefit of America consumers as well as companies.

We also wanna make sure that this agency functions efficiently and transparently as all government agencies should.

I'm glad to say that this is not a partisan concern. Bipartisan majority on a voice vote of the full committee reported an FCC process reform bill yesterday that will help the FCC operate more openly and defectively. And we expect it to be on the House floor in the not too distant future.

And the bill is needed. There are several stalled proceedings and ambiguous projects at the commission that cause concern to me and other members of the committee. We've sent a number of letters in the past months regarding media ownership.

Subcommittee Vice Chair Latta has gone to the extent of drafting a bill to end the cable set-top box integration ban, a bill that seems to make a lot of sense, and which perhaps the FCC should have considered doing a while ago.

My concern and hope is that we can start a productive dialogue today with our esteemed witnesses on these and the many other important issues pending at the commission.

Commission O'Rielly, I'd like to welcome you back to the Energy and Commerce Committee, a committee you know well, having once served here as the staff.

And Chairman Wheeler, though you're from Ohio, this is often known as the big house, now the Dingell room. Hope you appreciate the -- the green and white decor.

(LAUGHTER)

And yes, we were first party.

(LAUGHTER)

Welcome back.

And I yield to other members, Republican members.

WALDEN: The chairman now recognizes the vice chair of the Subcommittee on Communications, Mr. Latta from Ohio.

(LAUGHTER)

Home of the speaker of the House.

(LAUGHTER)

LATTA: (inaudible) number two.

But thank you very much for yielding, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you very much to our commissioner for being with us today.

And welcome to our newest members for the commission. I really appreciate you -- having you here with us today.

The communications and technology industry has been a consistent bright spot in the U.S. economy. It's created millions of American jobs, spurred significant investment and innovation and, most importantly, empowered consumers, who are the driving force behind robust competition in the communications marketplace.

As U.S.-based businesses lead the world in technological advances, we have a responsibility to ensure the FCC fosters continued growth and development in the communications sector.

This can be achieved by the FCC incorporating more transparency and accountability in its processes, operating within the bounds of its statutory authority and acting upon legislation according to congressional intent.

I look forward to continuing working with Chairman Upton and the members of this committee and also Congressman Green on my H.R. 3196, which is the legislation to eliminate the integration ban on the set- top boxes and allow the marketplace to get to the next-generation innovation without the regulatory barriers being put in front of it.

I look forward to the hearing and hearing the testimony today.

And, Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

Thank you.

WALDEN: The chair recognizes the gentlelady from Tennessee, the vice chair of the full committee, for the remaining 40 seconds, if she wants it.

BLACKBURN: And I thank the chairman.

I want to welcome all of our commissioners and publicly commend Commissioner Clyburn for the wonderful work that she did when she served as the acting chair. We appreciate that leadership.

And, Chairman Wheeler, we look forward to having you continue and to work in a collaborative manner to find results for the private sector.

We would hope that the commission will be proactive, not get beyond its mission, but to stay focused on your core mission. Pay attention to economic analysis. Look at cost to benefit analysis. And make certain that you don't suffer mission creep, which is casting a shadow over the private sector.

With that, I yield back.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back.

The chair recognizes the ranking member of the full committee, Mr. Waxman.

WAXMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I want to welcome the members of the commission, Chairman Wheeler and all the commissioners.

And I also want to join in commending Commissioner Clyburn for the incredible job she did as acting chairwoman, from the industry agreement on interoperability to long overdue reforms on prison phone rates, your brief chairmanship will be remembered for the remarkable amount you accomplished.

Let me welcome Chairman Wheeler and Commissioner O'Rielly. I congratulate you on your appointment and confirmation, and we're pleased to have you here.

You join the FCC at a time when our country is undergoing dramatic and perhaps fundamental transformations in communications networks and technologies, and the decisions you make at the commission will no doubt have lasting impact on our nation's communications landscape.

At the top of the FCC agenda is the spectrum auctions authorized by the Public Safety and Spectrum Auction Act last year. And I'm pleased to see that the FCC is moving ahead to conduct the H Block auction in January.

In addition to allocating new wireless spectrum to address our nation's spectrum shortage, this auction will provide significant down payment for the nation-wide interoperable public safety network.

I also support, Chairman Wheeler, your recently announced timetable for the incentive auction. This auction has many layers of complexity, and I applaud your commitment to getting the technical issues right.

Congress gave the FCC the tools to unleash the economic opportunities for both licensed and unlicensed spectrum, revolutionize public safety communications, ensure a vibrant and competitive wireless market, all the while protecting consumer access to free over-the-air television.

And I think FCC must remain faithful to these goals as you implement the law.

You also must bear in mind the principles undergirding the Communications Act, as we consider the next evolution in our nation's wireless networks. Our values do not change with each successive generation of technology. Whether the infrastructure is copper or fiber optics, the commission's charge is to protect and promote the longstanding goals of competition, universal access and consumer protection.

Chairman Upton and Walden recently called for a multiyear examination of possible updates to the Communications Act, and I welcome the opportunity for a bipartisan consideration of these issues, and I hope the commission will be a partner in this endeavor.

In 2010, the commission and this committee spent many hours working to preserve the principle of an open Internet. That process led to a sensible set of rules governing the broadband market that was supported by a diverse groups of stakeholders and provided the foundation for the FCC's Open Internet Order.

I believe the Open Internet Order will be upheld in the court. But whatever the outcome, I'll be looking to you to assure that the Internet remains an open platform for innovation and economic growth.

I want to at this point yield the balance of my time to my fellow Californian and good friend, Congresswoman Matsui.

MATSUI: Thank you very much, Ranking Member Waxman for yielding me time.

It's wonderful to see the full complement of the commission here today.

I want to join in welcoming Chairman Wheeler, and who brings a wealth of knowledge and experience to the FCC.

And I'd also like to congratulate and welcome Commissioner O'Rielly.

And I also would like to commend Commissioner Clyburn for her leadership during the interim period. Thank you very much.

Mr. Chairman, the subcommittee is working diligently to find bipartisan solutions for smart and sound spectrum policy for our nation. We've worked want to create a path for DOD to reallocate the 1755 to 1780 megahertz band.

DOD and the broadcasters should be applauded for their leadership on a landmark sharing agreement.

Moreover, I've joined with Representative Guthrie to introduce H.R. 3674, the Federal Spectrum Incentive Act, which passed this committee yesterday in a bipartisan manner.

The bill is the first of its kind that offers a fresh approach that would create a federal spectrum incentive auction. I look forward to working closely with my colleagues and the administration in moving this bill to the floor.

There are tough decisions ahead, and I want to encourage also the FCC to move forward with the USF reform efforts. Modernizing the USF for broadband, particularly the lifeline program will provide a path toward universal broadband adoption in this country.

And, with that, I yield back the balance of my time.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back the balance of her time; all time's been consumed. We'll now go to our witnesses.

And, again, we thank you very much for being here today and the public service work you're all undertaking.

And, Mr. Wheeler, as chairman of the FCC, we're gonna lead off with you. So pull that microphone close, turn on the button, and you're good to go, sir.

WHEELER: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, Ms. Eshoo, other members of the committee. It's a privilege to be before you today, and a privilege to be joining my colleagues here, the full component of the commission. I think we will make a great team, and I know that all of us are honored to be able to work with the quality men and women that make up the FCC.

Today is my 39th day on the job. And I have enjoyed the informal discussions that I've been able to have with many of you in the interim and look forward to today having a even more complete discussions and to working with you afterwards.

As I think everybody in their statements has indicated, we are in a very exciting time, in the midst of a great network revolution.

The lesson of history is that revolutions like that come chock full of challenges. And we're gonna have to work together on how we address those challenges.

We've tended to look at those challenges through three prisms, if you will, and to say, OK, how do we make sure, first of all, that what policies we adopt promote economic growth and maintain national leadership?

And clearly at the root of those are issues such as competition and maintaining the necessary assets, such as spectrum.

The second prism is what we've begun to call the network compact. There has, for a century, developed a set of values that represent the relationship between those who operate networks and those who use networks. Those values must be preserved regardless of the type -- of the technology used in the network.

And, thirdly, is the -- is the goal that networks work for everyone, that it's -- it's not what broadband -- it's not just the delivery of broadband, but it's what broadband enables that is what is important.

If we don't have 21st century education capabilities, if we don't make sure that Americans with disabilities have access to the capabilities of the new network, if we don't make sure that tribal Americans have opportunities to use the new networks, then we have failed in our goal.

So, those three things, economic growth, the network compact and -- and what networks enable are the three pillars of policy. But at the heart of them is competition.

It has become a joke, at least in my office, that everybody keeps -- that I keep saying, "Competition. Competition. Competition."

But that is very much what -- what we believe.

Let me do a quick look at the three areas where the commission is keeping pace with innovation, that innovative economy.

First is process reform. The committee's bipartisan effort yesterday is significant and is noted and appreciated.

On my second day, Mr. Chairman, as you noted, I began a process that will produce a report in 60 days. We're gonna look at how to enhance accountability through deadlines and tracking systems, how to expedite the licensing process, like you referenced. How to shorten the processing time of applications for review and Commissioner Pai has an interesting idea in that regard.

How to streamline consumer complaint, collection and a searchable database, which Commissioner Rosenworcel has been a champion of. And how to attack the backlog as Commissioner Clyburn did when she was chairwoman.

We also wanna weed out outdated regulations, incorporate performance -- and incorporate performance measures.

Second focus is gonna be, as you have all appropriately said, the spectrum auctions, especially the incentive auction.

This committee, working with MTIA and DOD, has provided great leadership on the 1755 to 1780 band that we look forward to moving forward on that and moving that to auction.

The Guthrie-Matsui bill, which you all moved yesterday, which has been referenced, it takes the incentive auction idea and applies it to federal agencies, and that's a great step forward.

And then speaking of incentives, we have the incentive auction coming up. We're gonna have -- we have established a schedule now, we're gonna have policy recommendations in January. And we're gonna have consideration and discussion of that until spring, when we'll be making a decision. And we'll have an auction in the -- in mid-2015.

But while we're discussing spectrum and regulatory process, I would be remiss if I didn't bring up an item we will be considering today. A proposal to ask for comments on a rule to reflect the realities of new onboard aircraft technology.

And there have been lots of misconceptions about that. And let me just see if I can address these right upfront.

One, we are going to continue -- we are proposing to consider to continue the ban on mobile devices that can interfere with terrestrial networks. But where there is new onboard technology that eliminates that potential for interference, then there is no need for an interference rule.

This is the responsible thing to do, where the rationale for a rule doesn't exist, the rule shouldn't exist. We are the expert technical agency. And new technology removes the technical justification of this rule.

In that regard, I should mention that I have spoken with Transportation Secretary Foxx this morning. And he has told me that, yes, the FCC is the technical agency and that the Department of Transportation is the aviation agency and that they will be moving on a rule to address voice calls on airplanes.

I'm the last person in the world who wants to listen to somebody talking to me, while they fly across the country. But we are the technical agency and we will make the technical rules that reflect the -- the way the new technology works.

Finally, item three, you've all talked about the -- the I.P. transition -- transitions, I should say. Because it's not just one transition, it's a multi-faceted process. And at today's meeting, we're gonna hear a report from the technology transitions policy task force, which will lay out a schedule, including a plan for a January order that will invite experiments in the field, real life experiments, recommend data collection and create a framework for policy decisions.

So we have a full agenda, as you have all said. It is a privilege to be here, to be able to work with all of you and I look forward to doing that in the time coming (ph).

WALDEN: Chairman Wheeler, thank you for your public service and thank you for recognizing our concerns on the subcommittee and full committee.

And now we'll switch to -- I guess, once a chairman, always a chairman, right, highest title. Former Chairwoman Clyburn, we're delighted to have you back before the committee. Thanks for your work publicly and please go ahead with your opening statement.

CLYBURN: Thank you, Chairman Walden, Ranking Member Eshoo, and members of the committee.

Thank you, again, for allowing me to appear before you today. Since our last visit, I have had an incredible opportunity to serve as acting chair and I'm glad to note that with the support of my colleagues and the assistance of a skilled and dedicated staff, we were able to move a number of important items, which clearly advanced the public interest.

This hearing comes at a critical stage in our communications policy continuum. We are experiencing tremendous technological change that affects every aspect of our lives.

And as we look ahead to the challenges of tomorrow, I believe it is important to understand the terrain over which we have travelled. We reached a voluntary interoperability industry solution in the lower 700 megahertz band to address an issue, that for years, have been impeding the deployment of valuable spectrum.

We launched a proceeding to modernize the FCC's schools and libraries program, known as E-Rate, to ensure that our children have the resources and connectivity they need to support digital learning and become the leaders of tomorrow.

We adopted an order to address rule call completion because it is unacceptable in today's world that calls to non-urban areas are not being completed.

We adopted an order to reform inmate calling services to finally provide relief to millions of families who have been paying unreasonably high rate to stay connected with loved ones.

We enabled the H Block spectrum auction and the AWS-3 proposal to take major steps forward on government and commercial spectrum sharing. And we made ongoing reforms to lifeline and proposed significant forfeitures to companies not following the FCC's rules.

With Chairman Wheeler and my fellow commissioners, I look forward to building on the progress we have made.

As Chairman Wheeler has made clear, the voluntary incentive auction proceeding continues to be a top commission priority for those broadcast television licensees who want to continue to use their spectrum, the act mandates that the commission makes all reasonable efforts to preserve the coverage areas and population served.

The act also has clear directives for the proceeds from the forward auction, which includes much earned contributions to the Public Safety Trust Fund and the national deficit.

Congress also gave the commission authority to propose a band plan with an appropriate balance of unlicensed and licensed spectrum.

Unlicensed spectrum plays a critical role in advancing more efficient use of spectrum and commercial wireless carriers are increasingly using unlicensed Wi-Fi services to off load their smartphone traffic.

In addition to spectrum, Chairman Wheeler has also announced that the commission will consider an order next month to launch trials regarding the ongoing technology transitions.

I do believe that trials, if structured properly, can produce helpful insights into how best to approach reform. And I will be keeping a keen eye on how the trials and future reforms affect all consumers.

Process reform is where we have an opportunity to develop an even more efficient agency.

Yesterday, the committee passed the Federal Communications Commission Process Reform Act of 2013. I am pleased that the proposed modifications to the Sunshine Act would facilitate federal commissioners participation on the Federal-State Joint Board and the Joint Conference.

I would also encourage you to review the Paperwork Reduction Act and how it can be improved. For example, the FCC is using its website to better inform consumers in the industry.

Yet, to obtain voluntary feedback on our website, the PRA requires OMB approval. As a result, the commission cannot be as responsive to users without engaging in a lengthy OMB approval process.

So as you can see, Mr. Chairman, and distinguished members of the committee, we have both challenges and opportunities ahead.

I look forward to working with each of you to address our evolving communications landscape.

I appreciate your attention this morning and will be glad to answer any questions you may have.

WALDEN: Thank you for your work, your testimony, your recommendations, and we'll now go to Commissioner Rosenworcel. Thank you for being here this morning, we're delighted to have you back and please go ahead.

ROSENWORCEL: It's good to be back.

Good morning, Chairman Walden, Ranking Member Eshoo and members of the subcommittee, it is an honor to appear before you today in the company of my colleagues, new and old, at the FCC.

By some measures, communications technologies account for as much as one-sixth of our economy, no wonder. These are the networks that carry all aspects of our modern commercial and civic life.

They are changing at a breathtaking pace. Keeping up requires taking a fresh look at our policies, informed by the policies of the past, we have to think boldly about the future.

Now in the weeks ahead, we will do this, as we wrestle with the upcoming transition to Internet protocol and think about spectrum auctions, including incentive auctions.

But I think we make a mistake if we focus only on networks themselves. After all, there is great beauty and power in what we can do with them.

Our new networks can change the ways we connect, create and conduct commerce. They can change the ways we learn and seek security.

So in my brief time before you today, this is what I wanna talk about. How the broadband beneath us and the air waves all around us can improve education and improve public safety.

First, I wanna talk about the E-Rate program. E-Rate helps connects schools and libraries across the country to the Internet. It is a byproduct of the Telecommunications Act of 1996.

Remember in 1996, probably everyone in this room called the Internet the information superhighway. It was a long time ago. In 1996, only 14 percent of public schools were connected to the Internet.

Today, thanks to the E-Rate, that number is north of 95 percent, which sounds good. It sounds like the job is done, but nothing could be further from the truth, because the challenge today is not connection, it is capacity.

Too many of our E-Rate schools access the Internet at speeds as low as 3 megabits, that is too slow for high definition video, it is not fast enough for the most innovative teaching tools, and it is definitely not fast enough to prepare the next generation with the stem skills that are so essential to compete.

Contrast this with efforts under way in some of our world neighbors.

In South Korea, 100 percent of schools are connected to high speed broadband and all schools are converting to digital textbooks by 2016.

Ireland will have all schools connected to 100 megabits next year.

Finland will have all schools connected to 100 megabits the year after that.

Meanwhile, in both Turkey and Thailand, the government is seeking a vendor to supply tablet computers to millions of students for a new era of broadband enabled digital learning.

Now we can wait and see where the status quo takes us and let other nations lead the way, or we can chose a future where all American students have the access to the broadband that they need to compete, no matter who they are, where they live or where they go to school.

I think it's time to compete. I think it's time for E-Rate 2.0. The FCC has a rule-making proceeding under way to reboot and recharge the E-Rate program. I think we need to make it a high priority.

I think we need to find ways to bring 100 megabits to all schools in the near term, and one gigabit to all schools in the long term. While we're at it, we must find ways to reduce the bureaucracy of this program and make it easier for small and rural schools to participate.

Second, I want to talk about a number all of us know by heart, but none of us ever hopes to use. I want to talk about 9-1-1. In my time at the FCC, I have visited 9-1-1 call centers all across the country. I am always struck by the steely calm of those who answer the phones and help ensure that help is on the way.

I am also struck by how many emergency calls now come in from wireless phones. In fact, nationwide more than 70 percent of calls made to 9-1-1 are made from wireless phones. That is more than 400,000 calls per day. Now, if you use your wireless phone to call 9- 1-1 from outdoors, your location is reported, sometimes to within 50 meters under FCC location accuracy standards. But if you use your wireless phone to call 9-1-1 from indoors, you better cross your fingers because no FCC location accuracy standards apply.

I think this is an unacceptable gap in public safety communications. It deserves your attention and ours. Because no matter where you are when you call 9-1-1, you want first responders to find you. Moreover, as our networks evolve and the ways we use them change, we must make sure our public safety policies keep pace. In fact, our approaches to networks both wired and wireless need to evolve as markets evolve.

But in our efforts, we must not lose sight of why networks matter, because they can do more than connect us. They can strengthen education and enhance our security, and of course, grow our economy in new and exciting ways.

Thank you. I look forward to answering any questions you might have.

WALDEN: Commissioner Rosenworcel, thank you for your work and your testimony and your suggestions.

We go now to Commissioner Pai. Thank you for being here and thank you for all the work you've been doing. And please go ahead with your opening statement.

PAI: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Walden, Ranking Member Eshoo, members of the subcommittee, thank you for holding this hearing.

It has been exactly one year since I last appeared before you and much has happened in the time since. Most notably, we have lost two colleagues and we have gained two new ones. Chairman Wheeler and Commissioner O'Rielly have gotten off to strong starts and I am pleased that we are finally back at full strength.

Over the past year, we have made progress in a number of different areas, but there is much more to be done. This morning, I will touch on two of the issues that I find most pressing: the incentive auction and E-Rate reform. A fuller list of FCC priorities from cable forbearance to AM radio is detailed in my written testimony.

First, the incentive auction. Perhaps the most daunting challenge the commission faces is the looming spectrum crunch. To meet this challenges, we are focused on implementing the responsibilities that Congress gave us in the Spectrum Act, especially with respect to the broadcast incentive auction.

The incentive auction is the commission's best chance to push a large amount of spectrum, well suited for mobile broadband, into the commercial marketplace. I support Chairman Wheeler's recent announcement setting the middle of 2015 as our new target. It is more important to get the incentive auction done right than it is to get it done right now.

If, for example, any part of our software were to fail during the incentive auction, like another government website that shall not be named, the commission by law would not get a second bite at the apple. My greatest worry about the incentive auction, however, is not with the technology. It is about participation. In order for the incentive auction to be successful, we will need robust participation by both broadcasters and wireless carriers. So the commission must avoid choices that will deter participation in both the reverse auction and the forward auction.

For the reverse auction, prices paid to broadcasters should be determined by the market, not set by administrative fiat. Any attempt to restrict payments to broadcasters, including a complicated scoring scheme, will deter broadcaster participation and risk causing the incentive auction to fail.

For the forward auction, the commission should not limit carriers' ability to participate, such as by setting a spectrum cap or narrowing the spectrum screen. This would result in less spectrum for mobile broadband and less revenue to fund national priorities that this committee has identified, and a greater chance of a failed auction.

Another issue that will impact participation in the forward auction is the size of the geographic licenses to be offered. Our NPRM proposed using economic areas, but some argue that this would make it too difficult for smaller carrier to participate in the auction. Our goal should be to allow as many carriers as possible to bid, whether they be nationwide, regional or rural.

So I am pleased to see alternative proposals for license sizes, such as the newly coined partial economic areas. If technically feasible, these proposals deserve serious consideration.

Aside from the incentive auction, there are many other opportunities when it comes to spectrum, from the H block auction next month to the possible clearing of AWS-3, to the greater unlicensed use in the 5 gigahertz band. Consistent with my all-of-the-above approach, I hope we seize all of these opportunities in the near term.

The second issue I will discuss is the Universal Service Fund's schools and libraries program, better known as E-Rate. In many ways, E-Rate has been a success, as my colleague has pointed out. But it also has had difficulties. The funding process can stretch for years. Many schools and libraries feel compelled to hire outside consultants to handle all the complexities. Others don't bother applying at all.

Services like paging are prioritized over services like connecting classrooms. And there's no meaningful transparency into either the amount or the impact of E-Rate spending.

To solve these problems, I've proposed a student-centered E-Rate program. This means an up front allocation of funding and a matching requirement, so that applicants know how much money they can spend and have greater incentives to spend that money wisely. This means simplifying the application process. This means targeting funding at next-generation technologies, while still letting local schools set their own priorities. And this means making all funding and spending decisions accessible on a central website that everyone can see.

In its first year, a student-centered approach would provide an extra $1 billion for next-generation services, all without collecting an extra dime from the American people. Accordingly, I believe it would be premature to increase the program's budget. And under no circumstances should we do so without finding corresponding savings in other parts of the Universal Service Fund.

We cannot ask Americans to pay even more in their monthly phone bills, especially when median household income in this country is now lower than it was in 2007.

Thank you once again to Chairman Walden and Ranking Member Eshoo for holding this hearing. I look forward to answering your questions and continuing to work with you and my colleagues in months to come.

WALDEN: Thank you, Commissioner Pai. We appreciate your thoughtful testimony and your recommendations.

We'll now go to Commissioner O'Rielly. Welcome aboard the Federal Communications Commission. Welcome back before this committee. And you know how the rules work, so please go ahead and again thank you for being here today.

O'RIELLY: Thank you to the chairman and ranking member and members of the subcommittee.

In respect of the time of the subcommittee members, I'd like to make five points and then move on to answer your questions.

Point one, I'm truly honored to be before the subcommittee. I had the pleasure of working on the full committee staff for eight years and it was one of the greatest jobs I'll ever have. The breadth of knowledge and command of the diverse policy issues by the members of this committee are of the highest quality.

Point two, the FCC is an independent agency, not part of the executive branch. It was created by Congress and served to implement the statutes enacted by Congress. I firmly believe that our role is to follow the statute as written and not substitute our thoughts for your work. The commission has no right or authority to ignore the statute or statutory deadlines. Thankfully, I've worked on most communications policy statutes over the last 20 years and have first- hand knowledge of the intent behind many key provisions.

Point three, the commission has difficult, but exciting work ahead. If done correctly, it can have a significant positive impact on U.S. domestic product and on national productivity. Our communications companies are extremely important to the U.S. economy and we must allow them to flourish in the world marketplace. The commission's overall focus, however, must remain on the consumer.

Point four, in terms of specific items, my particular focus and attention will be on the immediate work before the commission. In the big picture, the FCC must finish rules for the incentive auctions, continue USF reform, proceed with the I.P. transition trials, and complete our media ownership proceedings.

Point five, part of the role of a FCC commissioner is to conduct outreach and provide information to the public. I take this function seriously and it's why I'm choosing to spend sometime on the issue of distracted driving caused by wireless device users. Drivers need to put away their wireless phones and focus their eyes on the drive.

Let me be clear. My view is the wireless industry is doing yeoman's work to get out the message. They're aware of the problem. They are dedicated considerable resources to finding solutions and education, and they're working hard to prevent the horrible tragedies by texting, viewing, e-mailing, tweeting, mapping, posting, among others, while driving.

It does not appear that more government regulation would be helpful in this space. Instead, I'm talking to my other colleagues to find ways to use our voice in non-regulatory, non-costly ways to educate the public and prevent senseless accidents.

Thank you.

WALDEN: You win the prize -- two minutes and 37 seconds, return.

O'RIELLY: I'm familiar with this committee very well.

(LAUGHTER)

WALDEN: Yes, indeed. Some will learn along the way.

(LAUGHTER)

We appreciate all your testimony and your recommendations. And it's just good to have all five commissioners in place, or four commissioners and chair in place. As Commissioner Pai said, it has been a year to the day, I think, since we had the commissioners here. So welcome aboard.

I know we all have a lot of questions. I'm going to -- I learned at the heels of the former chairman, Mr. Dingell, about trying to get answers at a relatively rapid rate. So I'm going to try and pose some of these, not as skillfully as he does in a yes or no format, but to the extent to which you can address them rapidly, that would be good.

And I want to start, Mr. Wheeler, with you as chairman. I know you all are voting on this NPRM today. I do want to stress it would be helpful if the public got to see that. As far as I know, you and your staffs are the only ones who see it in advance. That's one of the process issues I hope you'll break through and this maybe will be the last NPRM that's not public first.

But the commission's -- I want to follow up and figure out how you're going to permit, as your testimony indicates, airlines to choose whether to allow voice calls. And here's why I ask it. Is the commission planning to waive either the common carrier obligation to complete calls, or the net neutrality rules on blocking (inaudible) packets. Both would seem to be necessary in order to prevent voice calling from aircraft.

WHEELER: So, thank you, Mr. Chairman. So, first, to your point that -- that the MPRM that we are considering today will be complete in listing the rule -- the words of the rule...

WALDEN: Right.

WHEELER: ... that we are considering. That in -- in light with the philosophy that...

WALDEN: Thank you.

WHEELER: ... you and I share, which is, let's get it out there...

WALDEN: Right.

WHEELER: ... so that people can see it.

The purpose of this is to do just that, to put the language out so people can see it and give us their comments on it.

Now, to your specific question -- the -- the open Internet order specifically provides what's called the premises exemption. And that means that coffee shops, book stores and airlines mentioned by name are exempt from the order in that, under the definition of reasonable network management, which is one of the tools that are allowed, for premises owners -- which include airlines -- there is the ability to pick and choose exactly what comes over.

WALDEN: All right. We'll follow up more on the other piece that you might have to deal with, as well.

I want to ask you about Title 2. You've had a -- you haven't, but there's been a preceding open at the Commission for a long time that would -- the reclassification docket. Are you planning to keep that open, or are you planning to close it?

WHEELER: So, I think we're in a situation right now where we're waiting for a court opinion on exactly what our authorities are on a broad sense. And that there is no rush between now and then to make a decision on Title 2.

I will note, however, that, as you mentioned, this docket has been open for a long time. And it has not had the threatened chilling effect that some have worried about on investment in wireless and broadband infrastructure. This is an -- this is an issue that clearly is going to have to be dealt with, and we'll start with the court decision.

WALDEN: I've got about three more questions I want to try and get in here.

We understand the FCC's launched a study -- a multimarket study of critical information needs. Apparently, this study includes a qualitative media analysis, which would require interviewing reporters and editors to figure out how the media decides what news stories to run. Are these the kinds of questions that government entities should be asking of the news media? And with somebody with a journalism degree, I do get a little chill up my spine thinking about the government asking how these decisions are made.

Doesn't it have an effect on the -- doesn't it have an effect on the media that the regulatory body is even asking these questions? And how does it help you fulfill your Section 257 mandate, on which it's predicated?

WHEELER: So, I think this goes back to the root of the discussion you and I were having a moment about -- about making sure that the public understand what's going on.

The 257 requirement mandates lowering barriers to access to media for minorities, women, small business and other identified groups.

In order to make that kind of a judgment, you have to have facts. In order to have facts, you do studies. And what we did was, there is a study that has been proposed by a consulting firm that we were working with. And we put that out for public notice to exactly get the kind of input...

WALDEN: All right.

WHEELER: ... that you're suggesting.

WALDEN: All right, I...

WHEELER: And -- but it's not -- and this is -- I -- this is not an effort to influence the media. It...

WALDEN: I'm going to interrupt you just a second, because when you're spending somewhere between $209,918 -- and some of the questions of the media personnel include, "What's the news philosophy of the station?," "Who decides what stories are covered?," "What are the demographics of news management staff?," "Have you ever suggested coverage of what you consider to be a story with critical information of what consumers used?," "What was the reason given for the decision?"

These seem like really internal journalistic issues. Now, I -- I need to move on to one other, 'cause I'm actually over, but it's a very important question.

The quant -- quantile regression analysis -- QRA -- approach to providing universal support for rural companies -- that was part of the commission's U.S. (ph) reform efforts -- has had a negative impact -- negative impact on investment and the deployment of broadband services in rural America.

Commissioner Pai, you've been an advocate for the need to address this problem to ensure that rural Americans are not left behind. What do you recommend, Commissioner Pai, needs to be done with regard to the application of the QRA?

PAI: I thank you for the question, Mr. Chairman.

I've seen the problems on paper. The Obama administration's Department of Agriculture, for example, reported to us earlier this year that some 37 percent of funds from RUS are sitting on the table because there is so much uncertainty among rural carriers. And I've seen it in person from my home state of Kansas to carriers in rural Alaska, Because they are uncertain about what the future portends because of the QRA, they are not making additional investments in terms of broadband. And that creates a digital slide that we won't be able to bridge.

WALDEN: So, Chairman Wheeler, if I might, given the -- negative impact of the QRA -- that it's having on broadband development, especially in rural America, do you intend to reconsider its application?

WHEELER: Yes. As a matter of fact, I have asked the bureau to draft, and let me see, what an order that I could share with my colleagues would be to eliminate the QRA, and to return to the high- cost loop support model.

WALDEN: I appreciate that.

I've got other issues, obviously, with the F.M. translators for A.M., and delay in the rulemaking, dealing with cable operators and the groups utilized by them. And so, maybe we can follow up afterwards, but the committee's been kind to let me over-extend my questioning. But we're usually fairly flexible on that here.

So, now, I'll turn it over to the ranking member from California, Ms. Eshoo.

ESHOO: That's great. So, I have seven minutes, right, Mr. Chairman?

(LAUGHTER)

Mr. Chairman, you said that it's your 39th day. What I'd like to add to that is that I think your adult lifetime of work has brought you to this. So, it's not just your -- really, your 39th day.

WHEELER: That's been a long lifetime at this.

ESHOO: It's a -- it's a -- it's a wonderful path that has prepared you for this position.

I have a whole list of -- of niche issues, which is really the way we deal with all of these things.

First of all, do you think you're going to get a deal on cell phones unlocking by the end of this year?

WHEELER: I hope that we will be presenting to the commission today -- as a matter of fact, I know that we will be presenting to the commission today -- the voluntary agreement that has been reached with the wireless industry. And so, the answer to your question is strongly yes.

ESHOO: That's just terrific.

My second question to you, Mr. Chairman, is last week, as you know, I joined with my colleagues, Representatives Doyle and Matsui, to ask you to take action to prevent AT&T from implementing the significant rate hike for their special access customers. I appreciate what you have done in terms of the suspension, but I think that there's much more that needs to be done on special access reform.

Can we expect further action on special access reform?

WHEELER: I -- I -- I apologize, Ms. Eshoo, but I am currently recused...

ESHOO: OK.

WHEELER: ... from that proceeding, and so I...

ESHOO: I see.

So, how will it happen?

WHEELER: It's -- it moves ahead with the other members of the -- of the commission.

ESHOO: I see. Well, I'm just going to assume that they're going to -- that this area is going to be examined. Because we really have to have a -- reasonable rates for -- for this important service.

On -- Commissioner Rosenworcel, thank you for your testimony. I love the way you present things. It's so clear. You can feel the sense of urgency and why it's urgent.

How are you going to pursue getting this done at the commission? The whole issue of E-Rate, everything that's attached to it. You presented an eloquent case. And I think that -- that you gave a fantastic speech last week on -- on 911 and the problems that we have between indoor and outdoor.

So, on both that and the E-Rate -- maybe I should be asking the chairman what he plans to do on E-Rate. I know what you want to do. But maybe we should just switch over to Chairman Wheeler?

WHEELER: Well, I think on -- on E-Rate, that there is a leader in this commission. And that Commissioner...

ESHOO: We only need five.

WHEELER: Huh?

ESHOO: We only need five.

WHEELER: They -- they -- but I'm -- I -- as you all say, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of...

ESHOO: Good, good.

WHEELER: ... Mr. Rosenworcel.

ESHOO: Well, we'll look forward to you joining her in that effort. And maybe the next time the commission comes before us, you can tell us the steps that you're going to take.

On the -- on...

WHEELER: Let me -- if I can do one thing -- I am -- we are going to put out a schedule, just like we have for the incentive auction and the I.T. transition, to address this issue.

ESHOO: That's terrific.

On the challenge of the -- the indoor versus outdoor, and wireless, and 911, what's your plan to address this?

ROSENWORCEL: Well, as the old saying goes, you may only make one 911 call in your life, but it will be the most important call...

ESHOO: Right.

ROSENWORCEL: ... you ever make. And right now, if you make that call from your wire line phone, your first responder knows exactly where you are.

ESHOO: Right.

ROSENWORCEL: You make that call outdoors, in a field, using your wireless phone, we have location accuracy standards so that first responder can find you.

ESHOO: I'm asking what you want to do about where the challenge lies.

ROSENWORCEL: So...

ESHOO: We know it's working.

ROSENWORCEL: ... indoors...

ESHOO: Mm-hmm.

ROSENWORCEL: ... is the problem. We have no standards. And increasingly, households are cutting the cord. More than one third of households rely exclusively on their wireless phones. So, I don't think it's acceptable that when people make emergency calls, first responders can't find them.

I've recommended in that speech that you mentioned, that we start a rulemaking to address this. Because we've heard both from carriers...

ESHOO: Mm-hmm.

ROSENWORCEL: ... and from public safety officials on the front line that this is an issue that...

ESHOO: Well, good for you for identifying this and taking it up. Because I think one of the things that I taught my children from their earliest memory was, 911, and putting their little fingers on the keypad so that they would understand that.

ROSENWORCEL: Me, too.

ESHOO: And I think that you're absolutely right.

On -- Commissioner Pai, you made a wonderful comment -- something about not one dime more on phone bills.

I want to raise something with the -- with the -- with the chairman, going back to it, about below-the-line fees. Representatives Doyle, Lujan, Matheson, myself -- we wrote to the -- our nation's leading wire -- wireless and wireline providers, and we asked them about their practice of applying below-the-line fees on monthly bills.

I agree with Commissioner Pai. That's why I -- you know, we wrote. We have a concern about what people are paying. These things are hidden. They think that they're -- they think everything on their bill is a tax. And I have to tell you, I brought my bills in. I couldn't tell what the heck they were, who was doing what to whom, and what it was for.

So, tell me what you think the agency, or if you have -- I know there's a long list of big challenges. But these are still important issues for consumers.

What steps can the agency take under existing statute to ensure that consumers know exactly how much they're paying each month, especially prior to signing up for their service. And this whole issue of below-the-line fees.

WHEELER (?): Yeah, this -- Ms. Eshoo, this is a -- a very legitimate concern. The specific one I believe you're referencing is a re-transmission consent...

ESHOO: That too.

WHEELER (?): ... be charged -- that cable operators have just begun putting on the bill.

ESHOO: Right.

WHEELER (?): And -- and I say just begun. And I'm trying to get our arms around that and figure out just exactly what our authorities are to answer your question.

It -- it does, however, strike me that it fits right in the broader issues that the chairman and Mr. Upton and others have talked about in terms of the kinds of issues that need to be addressed in a Telecom Act re-write here, is just what is going on.

ESHOO: Yeah, but that will be like seven years from now.

WHEELER (?): If all of the sudden -- well, no -- but I -- I think that...

WALDEN: Oh no.

ESHOO: Oh well, well.

(LAUGHTER)

WALDEN: I won't speak.

ESHOO: Let's see.

WALDEN: I won't get cross-wise between you and the chairman.

ESHOO: OK. Yeah, oh no.

Thank you. That you, Mr. Chairman and thank you, Chairman Walden.

WALDEN (?): Thank you.

ESHOO: And thank you to the entire commission.

I wanna say also, a welcome to the whole new team that has come in. And we wish you well, we really do. And the chairman and the commission will operate at a higher level because of the high level of people that have come in to support the works. So congratulations to each one of you.

WALDEN: We now move on to the vice chair of the full -- of the subcommittee, Mr. Latta from Ohio for five minutes.

LATTA: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, again, thanks very much for our commission members for being with us today.

And this question I would like to ask all of you. And this question is the incentive auction legislation prohibits the FCC from excluding qualified bidders from the auction.

Unfortunately while the incentive auction process works its way up to the commission, it appears that the wireless bureau is simultaneously working on the spectrum aggregation docket to achieve the de facto of (ph) spectrum caps.

Will you commit to -- to allowing any interested bidder that complies with the statutory requirements to participate fully in the auction? And, Chairman, if I could start with you? Because I notice in your -- in your testimony, page six that, you know, you talk about the incentive auction, you had said that you're looking at voluntary market oriented approach. So if I could start with you.

WHEELER: The statute is quite explicit in that regard that the commission may not exclude somebody from participating.

LATTA: Also on just aggregating, so it would be like -- it would be wide open for everyone to be involved in that?

WHEELER: Well, it's interesting, what's been developing here, I mean, the -- the CEO of the AT&T recently came out with a statement saying, "Wait a minute, I -- I think I would like to have rules to make sure that not one party can run away with all the spectrum."

So I think that in between those positions is -- is where -- a reality exist. But the statute, I agree, is quite clear.

The statute says that -- that you would not exclude anybody and the statute also says that the commission will design an auction so as to promote economic opportunity and competition and consumer choice to sustain a healthy wireless marketplace. And we'll do both.

LATTA: Madam Clyburn?

CLYBURN: Yes, Section 64:04 is clear that any party that abides -- obeys the rules, that they are qualified to participate. It also makes clear that the commission has the authority to enforce and introduce general -- rules of general applicability that will allow for spectrum aggregation in order to promote competition.

So again, my colleague mentioned that, you know, part of the reason for -- I think, for some of the robust participation and -- and the type of ideas that we're seeing it's because we took a dual path. On the same day we released the rules, or recent -- release the notice of oppose rule making on incentive auction, we also released a notice of propose rule-makings on trying to glean information about this dual path.

So I -- I think that this, in the long run, will help and improve our information -- information dissemination and acquisition and -- and rule-making once we decide on -- on a clear path forward.

LATTA: Thank you.

Commissioner?

ROSENWORCEL: The Middle Class Tax Relief and Job Creation Act says that we can have rules of general applicability, but we cannot exclude anyone from participation in the auction. I think it's easy and simple, we just have to follow the law.

LATTA: Commissioner Pai?

PAI: I would agree with my colleague and I would also point out that if you look at the end goal which is to have a successful auction that pushes out a lot of spectrum, it yields sufficient revenue to fund national priorities, and that provides a fairness to all parties involved, then we should not, preclusively, deter participation from wireless carriers by -- in adopting unduly strict spectrum policies.

LATTA: Commissioner O'Rielly?

O'RIELLY: I wanna thank my colleagues for say -- stating that the statute is clear because as many people who worked on it, it was a -- an effort to give the commission some authority in this space when members couldn't come to agreement.

I'm extremely hesitant to impose limitations on Spectrum Act, because we have certain obligations under the statute otherwise. We -- in a nice way, I -- I mean, the money has already been spent.

We have already spent the -- the money from the Spectrum Act and so we have obligations to provide $7 billion for FirstNet and we have deficit reduction numbers that -- that have already gone out the door.

So I'm worried about anything that would depress auction revenues. I'm -- I'm certainly aware of the statute and I want to remain open to considering but I'm -- I'm hesitant at this time to impose any type of limitation.

LATTA: Thank you. And many of you know that Roll Call completion has been an ongoing issue in my district. And I commend the FCC for producing the November 8 order and further notice propose rule-making to improve the commission's ability to monitor the delivery of calls to rural areas by mandating certain recording retention and recording requirements from carriers.

And Commissioner Pai, do you believe the November 8 order will resolve the Call completion problem, or does more need to be done?

PAI: Well, Congressman, I certainly hope that it will, whether it's in Toledo or Topeka, we need to figure out where the kink in the system is, whether it is in our media providers, whether it's the Last Mile (ph), what point of the network is failing.

And then, if it's a technical problem, then we can take steps to fix that technical problem. But if (inaudible) then the FCC needs to be empowered to take corrective action. So I certainly support taking the appropriate action soon, rather than later on (inaudible).

LATTA: Thank you very much. Mr. Chairman, I see my time has expired and I yield back.

WALDEN: Thank the gentleman. We now turn to the ranking member of the full committee, Mr. Waxman, for five minutes.

WAXMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, I just want to indicate that under the act, the FCC may not single out a specific provider for exclusion from a system of competitive bidding.

At the same time, the FCC is permitted to adopt and enforce rules of general applicability that promote competition. Even AT&T recently acknowledged they would support rules that limit the amount of spectrum any one company could acquire as long as the rules applied evenly to all auction participants.

Chairman Wheeler, as you know I'm a strong supporter of the FCC's open Internet rules, because I believe the Internet must remain an open platform for innovation and commerce.

You've emphasized the importance of the open -- open Internet order, at the same time, you recently made comments suggesting that an Internet service provider could charge a content provider, such as Netflix, a fee, in order to guarantee the best available transmission speed.

Do you see these type of business arrangements as consistent with the FCC's open Internet rules that you support?

WHEELER: Thank you, Mr. Waxman for -- for raising that issue because it gives me an opportunity to get more specific than I was in Ohio.

I am a strong supporter of the open Internet rules, full stop. The rules were written in such a way as to envision opportunities for innovation and experimentation and to impose on them a balance between protecting the open Internet, protecting consumers and stimulating innovation.

New ideas, under the -- under the open Internet order, new ideas such as those you've referenced in a wireless environment, particularly, are not prohibited. But there is a clear responsibility for the commission to make sure that what takes place does not interfere with Internet access, is not anti-competitive and does not provide preferential treatment. And we will enforce that. We -- we will maintain the balance between innovation and assuring there is an open Internet.

WAXMAN: I appreciate your expanding on that issue.

While, network infrastructure and technology have changed since the passage of the 1996 Telecommunications Act, the values embedded in the act have not.

And Mr. Chairman, I know the commission will soon begin a process to collect real-world information and data on the I.P. transitions. How will the commission continue to advance the long standing goals of competition, universal access and consumer protection throughout this transition process?

WHEELER: You know, Mr. Waxman, there are many people who have described the -- the trials, the I.P. trials as -- as a technology trial. I -- I don't think they were technology trial.

We know how to build I.P. networks. They are exactly what you just raised, they're values trial. They are how do we make sure that the values that for 100 years, Americans have come to expect from their networks, continue even after the way in which that network operates changes.

That's what we're gonna be looking for in these trials. It's not whether the Gazintas and the Gazoutas work. We know that -- that can get taken care of. It is what are the values -- what -- what -- how do you preserve the values in the new technological environment.

WAXMAN: Commissioner Rosenworcel, do you wanna add anything to that.

ROSENWORCEL: I think -- I think there are so many exciting things that can come with new networks and I think we should embrace the future rather than reject it.

So I think experimenting in these kind of trials is the smart way to go. But as we move into the future, what we do has to be informed by the values that have always been a part communications policy.

And I see four, public safety, universal access, competition and consumer protection.

WAXMAN: Thank you.

Commissioner O'Rielly, I appreciate your appeal to bipartisanship in your testimony. I know you played an important role in helping us get this bipartisan legislation in the passage of the Public Safety and Spectrum Act last year, because you helped negotiate the provisions in the availability of unlicensed spectrum in the broadcast incentive auction.

What's your perspective on unlicensed spectrum generally? And do you think the commission is on the right track in balancing the availability of unlicensed and licensed bands?

O'RIELLY: Yes, I'm a strong proponent of unlicensed spectrum. I'm always amazed at what the innovators and the experimenters can do with unlicensed spectrum. I think there's great opportunity in the 600 megahertz for more unlicensed spectrum. The NPRM that was put out in this situation proposed a number of different ideas where unlicensed could fit. They proposed channel 37, the guard bands -- if there are going to be guard bands, depending on what our band plan looks like.

We talked about wireless microphones. There's going to be still white space, at least in the 500, maybe in the 600 as well. And then there's going to be residual conversions depending if you're talking about converting from six megahertz broadcast channels to five megahertz wireless channels.

So, there should be opportunities in the incentive auction after our rules are complete for unlicensed spectrum. And I'm strongly supportive of those. The only difficulty is figuring out how big those guard bands should be.

WAXMAN: OK. Thank you.

And my last question is to Commissioner Pai. You stated in your testimony that 92 percent of Americans now can choose from 10 or more wire-line competitors. If that number is accurate, doesn't it demonstrate that the pro-competitive policies of the '96 Telecom Act are working? And don't you believe we should continue to support a marketplace that gives non-incumbents a fair chance to compete?

PAI: Congressman Waxman, thank you for the question.

I think what the multiplicity of choices that consumers enjoy today demonstrates is that an I.P. environment where you have -- conversion is something that we only dreamed about during the '96 act, where you have telephone companies competing with cable companies, competing with wireless companies and others to provide the same services, that we can now rely in a way we could not in 1996 on the marketplace and technological innovation to drive consumer choice.

And so to the extent that there are values of competition embedded in the 1996 act, I of course embrace those. But I think we also need to be mindful of the fact that technology can quite often out-pace where laws and regulations are. And that appears to be where we are with respect to the I.P. ...

(CROSSTALK)

WAXMAN: But do you think we should support a marketplace that gives non-incumbents a fair chance to compete?

PAI: Oh, absolutely. I think the marketplace should give every competitor a fair chance to compete.

WAXMAN: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: I now turn to the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Rogers.

ROGERS: Thank you very much. And as the representative of Michigan State University, I want to say thank you for giving me a great weekend.

(LAUGHTER)

I do find it suspicious, however, that my phone has not worked since the game. I wonder if you might be looking into that for me, Mr. Chairman.

(LAUGHTER)

The FCC's recent Communications, Security, Reliability and Interoperability Council meeting, I understand you talked about the need to apply metrics and evaluate cybersecurity. Can you elaborate on that for me?

WHEELER: Yeah, the CSRIC, which is the shorthand for the group you're talking about, has done a terrific job in using the multi- stakeholder process to come up with rules on botnets, on DNSSEC, on router security -- important kinds of network security issues. But it's not enough just to say, "OK, here are the rules," and then walk away. The question is: Are the rules working?

And so what I've asked CSRIC to do, not for us to impose, but in the multi-stakeholder process, is to say, "How do you establish metrics to know if this is working?" Because that's the -- you know, this is the trust-but-verify kind of a situation.

ROGERS: Well, how do you find those -- how are they -- how are you working through that process to define metrics in threats that change literally by the hour?

WHEELER: But -- so on those three issues, for instance, on botnets, for instance, how can you track the movement of where botnets are going? They seem to have moved into data centers, for instance. And what do we know about that and what might that suggest. And -- and what are we seeing in terms of -- of results of the implementation of the kinds of things that CSRIC has suggested.

That's what we need to know.

ROGERS: So, and if you find that out and you find that you are in some disagreement with industry on meeting those standards, do you foresee a regulatory scheme?

WHEELER: Well, I wouldn't want to, you know, to presume a hypothetical. I would hope that we would be working with industry to identify what needs to be done. And much like we are going to announce today on cell phone unlocking, when we sat with industry and said, "Here's a problem, it's got to be solved." And by the way, we'll have metrics on that.

I think that's the preferable first approach and that's the approach that we're taking with CSRIC.

ROGERS: But when you say that, does that -- does that mean -- if I hear you correctly, that means you're at least contemplating a regulatory scheme of some sort beyond just the voluntary "here's our metrics; try to...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: That's the right question, but it's not -- the key word is "contemplating." I've talked repeatedly about what I called the "seesaw" -- the regulatory seesaw: You do this; we don't need to do this.

And so what CSRIC is doing is saying: "OK, here are the kinds of things that need to be done." I said, "Let's measure them (inaudible), because the result is that we don't." If the seesaw has to tip, it has to tip, but it only tips on the basis of need, not the basis of theory.

ROGERS: If I understood your answer right, there's a possibility you could regulate -- always a possibility. Sure. OK, we should have lots of conversations on that. I worry that by the time you process your regulatory framework, you're too late. You've missed the boat. The threat changes...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: I could not agree more. The challenge of networks and the reason why the multi-stakeholder process is preferred is because it is much more dynamic, much more flexible, moves much quicker than a regulatory process can. And then can stay flexible. And that's why I'm trying to say, "Yes, this is the preferred process to deal with it."

ROGERS: So you're not going to move away from the council.

WHEELER: I'm sorry?

ROGERS: You're not going to move away from the council model for regulation. You're going to continue to...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: The multi-stakeholder process on this is the right way to go.

ROGERS: Yes, perfect.

Can you talk about Team Telecom? It's an important complement to the CIFIUS process in terms of preventing investments or I.T. equipment purchases to prevent certainly a threat to our national security interests like Chinese attempts to gain control of I.T. and telecommunication nodes in the United States. Can you walk us through where you're at on that and give us an idea of what's your thinking?

WHEELER: Well, when issues come before the commission relative to mergers, acquisitions, whatever the case may be, the input from Team Telecom is always sought and taken into account, and is crucially important.

ROGERS: Do you see an improvement to that process? Can we do something different? You have a limited set of -- once that report comes back, you have a limited set of decisions you can make. You're either in, you're out or you disagree with the decision.

WHEELER: Correct.

ROGERS: Is there something better we should be doing there, providing some authority for you all to be -- given, again, the nature of the changing technology and how fast the changes...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: I would -- I -- I have not had to live through one of these yet, so I'm probably not qualified to opine here on the fly. I'd love to look into this and to have a discussion with you about it.

ROGERS: Super. We're looking at some reforms to CIFIUS to try to make sure we're keeping up and I look forward to dialogue...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: Great. I look forward to that.

ROGERS: Thank you very much for being here.

WALDEN: I thank the gentleman.

We now turn to committee chairman emeritus, Mr. Dingell, also from Michigan, I believe, for five minutes. Go ahead.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, I commend you for this very important hearing. And I have no comments on football or other matters.

(LAUGHTER)

I want to welcome my old friend Chairman Wheeler to the committee. We look forward to great things from you. I'm satisfied you will serve with distinction.

I want to also welcome Commissioner O'Rielly.

And I want to commend Commissioner Clyburn for her fine services as acting chairwoman. Quite frankly, your daddy would be very proud.

My questions this morning will be directed solely at Chairman Wheeler and will elicit, as you will not be surprised to hear, yes or no responses.

Chairman Wheeler, I'd like to start with the reverse auction of broadcast frequencies authorized by the Middle Class Tax Relief and Job Creation Act. I note you recently announced that the commission will not conduct such an auction until 2015. That gives you an extra year.

In the meantime, do you expect to complete negotiations concerning the relocation of broadcast frequencies with Canada, Mexico and our border areas? Yes or no.

WHEELER: No, but I'm very hopeful that we will be able to move it forward. And as DTV showed, you don't have to have the signature on the page.

DINGELL: And you know -- you know that that can cause an awful lot of viewers to lose service and an awful lot of screens to go dark in our part of the country.

Chairman Wheeler, similarly, paragraph 15 of the commission's notice of proposed rulemaking for the incentive auction states, quote, "The commission expects interested parties will have an opportunity for meaningful comment on all specific repackaging methodologies it is considering before it makes a decision." Does the commission publicly commit to sharing with the public the broadcast frequency repacking methodology it adopts, as well as the variables and other inputs it may use to predict repackaging results? Yes or no.

WHEELER: I'll go beyond yes and say absolutely.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Chairman, let's move on to the forward auction of broadcast frequencies. Section 6403(c) of the Middle Class Tax Relief and Job Creation Act provides the commission may not grant licenses through forward auction, reassign or reallocate broadcast frequencies or remote spectrum usage rights unless it proceeds -- unless the proceeds of the forward auction are greater than the following three factors combined of, first, the total amount of compensation the commission must pay successful bidders in the reverse auction; the costs of conducting a forward auction; and the estimated costs for the commission to pay for broadcaster reallocations.

In addition, it is in the public interest that the commission ensure the auction raises a significant amount of money in order to help build out of the first debt (ph).

Together, these constitute a significant pressure on the commission to raise sufficient revenues to accomplish these objectives, do they not?

Yes or no?

WHEELER: Yes.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Chairman, at the end will the commission adopt transparent and simple rules to encourage participation by the broadest group of wireless providers in the forward auction? Yes or no?

WHEELER: Yes.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, it's -- let's focus our attention on intelligent transportation systems. This is of considerable importance to my part of the country and our principal industries, and the five gigahertz band.

Given that the commission licensed ITS almost 15 years ago, it is -- is it reasonable to say that it would be premature for the commission to authorize unlicensed use of the 5850-5925 megahertz band before the studies are completed that confirm such use would not cause harmful interference with ITS services and other incumbent users. Yes or no?

WHEELER: Yes, and let me go further. We will not authorize if there's harmful interference.

DINGELL: I am very comforted that you are here this morning, Mr. Chairman.

Now, Chairman Wheeler, do you believe that the commission should approve unlicensed use of the 5850-5925 megahertz band before definitively establishing no risk of harmful interference with ITS systems or practical strategies to mitigate such risk? Yes or no.

WHEELER: No. And I repeat, we'll do nothing that causes harmful interference.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Chairman, ordinately (ph) is the commission considering moving forward with rulemaking opening up only the 5350 megahertz band for unlicensed use? Yes or no?

WHEELER: So this is where I need to just ask a question, sir. The answer is yes, if it is are we considering. The answer is no, if we have decided.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Chairman, I'd like to commend you for your work in advancing the transition to I.P. based networks. Will the commission consider an order in January 2014 that will address geographic trials as well as how to protect in the best way consumers using I.P. based networks? Yes or no.

WHEELER: Yes.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, you have been most gracious to me, and I thank you for this. Mr. Chairman, your comments have been most enlightening and helpful. I want to thank you and the members of the commission for your presence and assistance to us this morning.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: Thank you very much.

The gentleman yields back, and the chair now recognizes for five minutes Mr. Guthrie.

GUTHRIE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate that.

Chairman Wheeler, and welcome to the FCC also.

Mr. O'Rielly (ph), let me say happy new year.

And, Commissioner Clyburn, again I echo the good work that you did in your -- your time as chairwoman.

But is -- there seems to be a lot of progress being made -- this is to Chairman Wheeler -- a lot of progress being made to free up the 1755-1780 hertz band for commercial use, megahertz band.

And I know the FCC has already sought comment on how this band should be used for commercial purposes.

Is the FCC on track to auction the 1755-1780 band, paired with the 2155-2180 band? And, if so, when will it occur?

WHEELER: So, the answer is yes, we are on track. There are some issues that still have to be worked out with NTI and DOD and -- and some other...

(CROSSTALK)

GUTHRIE: ... impediments...

WHEELER: But I think -- I'm sorry, what?

GUTHRIE: Are there some impediments that you can identify that are -- that -- you're on track, but you say there are some impediments.

WHEELER: I think these are just implementational kinds of things in -- in their agreement.

But to be specific to your question, I would hope that we could do it in the September time frame.

GUTHRIE: September time frame. Great.

Well, then, you've spent some time in the -- in the wireless industry, I know, and have seen firsthand how spectrum demand has grown exponentially. I realize that a lot of your short-term focus is on the incentive auction, on the 1755-1780 megahertz.

But, looking forward, what is the FCC doing to plan for future spectrum demand? And how can the FCC ensure that there continues to be a pipeline of new spectrum to satisfy what consumers want, the insatiable demand for band width anywhere, anytime?

So, looking, again, how do you plan for future spectrum demand beyond this? What kind of thoughts do you have beyond this...

WHEELER: Sure.

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: First, we say yea and verily to what you and Ms. Matsui have -- have done.

Applying the incentive auction concepts to government spectrum, I'm a believer that by the time that you peel everything away, it comes down to economics, no matter who you are.

GUTHRIE: Right.

WHEELER: And the economics of an agency where they can get cash to help them fulfill their mission is an important kind of decision they should make. And you've -- you've created, with Ms. Matsui, have created a structure where this can happen.

GUTHRIE: Well, we looked at that in our -- in our working group, and it just -- it's a lot of work for these agencies to do that. It's not something you can just wish away, as I learned more and more about it.

And I always say I didn't run around Kentucky saying, "Send me to Washington and I'll deliver you spectrum," and so you get -- you learn things when you get elected that you never thought you would deal with, that I found just fascinating, because, as I said, my consumers, my constituents, demand it. They want fast and -- the fast bandwidth.

WHEELER: But it's also interesting...

GUTHRIE: But it is true that we have to, we're looking at it just by law, by fiat, say you have to release spectrum. I mean, you could get numbers, well, it's gonna cost this, it's gonna cost that.

And so, it does give them a reason to go in and make this happen.

WHEELER: And the interesting thing is, so -- so I was involved in the negotiation for ADUMS 1 (ph), back in the year 2000. In the first negotiation with the Department of Defense.

And we kept saying to them, "but you're gonna get money." And they kept saying, "But we can't spend it, because it goes to the general treasury."

GUTHRIE: Right.

WHEELER: And so, what you have done is set up a structure to help compensate people. And the -- and the beauty of it is that what it does is that it -- creates a cash flow for them to be able to meet their new needs and to be able to upgrade their equipment.

And so, it's a winning situation all around.

GUTHRIE: I think -- Mrs. Matsui, I think yesterday you said win- win-win I think is -- it does for the consumers, for the agencies and for the taxpayers.

So beyond -- so the -- so in the future, what are you kind of looking at, do you think should happen, just for bandwidth and more spectrum as we move off -- move into the future?

WHEELER: I'm sorry, sir?

GUTHRIE: I mean, just as we move on into the -- beyond the immediate auctions and things, what other things do you think we can do to free spectrum?

WHEELER: Well, I think we have -- I mean -- so, first of all, we're constantly looking at how do you get the more efficient, most efficient use out of -- of the spectrum?

One of the more interesting things that we're going to be running a test on is what do you do with spectrum sharing, because there's probably -- not -- there is, in a digital world, the opportunity to -- to share spectrum. But our spectrum allocations were set up with analog assumptions.

And so, if we can share it, re-use it, it's a great opportunity, and we need to be pursuing that as well.

GUTHRIE: Yeah, a great metaphor that I always thought was -- you don't have any lane on a highway dedicated just for emergency vehicles. But when emergency vehicles come down the highway, people get out of the way.

And I think that's a great metaphor for that.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I yield back 15 seconds.

WALDEN: The chair recognizes the gentlelady from California for five minutes.

MATSUI: Thank you very much.

And let me just follow up on my partner's questions here.

I know back in the day, you were looking at the use of federal spectrum. And I think it's a concept now that has finally come to the point where we can actually do something about it.

And I believe that this is a way to really encourage the federal agencies to relinquish the noncritical spectrum. And as Congressman Guthrie says, it's not easy to do. But we worked with DOD, and when we made a lot of progress.

Now, I am also looking at what Commissioner Rosenworcel has also always said, about using the carrot-and-stick approach regarding the federal spectrum holders, and having them relinquish their spectrum.

Now, in your view, and I also want Chairman Wheeler to comment on this, too, are the financial incentives identified in the bill adequate to encourage federal agencies to relinquish noncritical spectrum?

And I think I'll go for you first, Chairman Wheeler.

WHEELER: I don't know the answer to that, because I haven't market tested it, you know. And I think that the -- is this enough incentive is a market test question.

So I'm gonna, with all due respect, punt.

What's important is the concept that has been developed. And it would seem to me that -- that once that concept is -- is codified, that then making sure that incentives are adequate is, frankly, the easier lift on the whole exercise.

MATSUI: Right. Thank you.

Commissioner Rosenworcel?

ROSENWORCEL: Thank you for the question.

I think, first of all, that the legislation that you and Congressman Guthrie have introduced is terrific. The demand on our airwaves is going up, and the supply of unencumbered spectrum is going down. It's time to be creative. This legislation is creative.

As far as the incentives go, I think it's a good starting point for conversation. Because right now, federal agencies, by some measures, have veto control over about 60 percent of our airwaves. They use their spectrum. They're mission focused, to protect our national defense, to keep our planes in the sky, to tell us what weather patterns are coming.

But they don't have structural incentives to be efficient with it. Your bill is the start of a conversation about how we should apply those incentives and if we get them right, we will have a catalyst for a lot more spectrum for new mobile broadband uses, which would be terrific thing for the economy.

MATSUI: Great. Thank you very much.

Chairman Wheeler, you've emphasized how important it is for you to lead the FCC in fact-based decision making.

In the five gigahertz proceeding, for example, this committee is looking to the FCC's engineering expertise to determine the conditions under which Wi-Fi could use a band in a way that protects the missions of federal systems and commercial systems.

How are you and your staff planning on responding to the challenge? And is this proceeding a priority for the commission?

WHEELER: So, as Commissioner O'Rielly said, I would associate myself with -- with his comment, that he's a strong supporter of -- of unlicense (ph).

The key, of course, is that you need to make sure that there's no harmful interference, as I discussed with Mr. Dingell. But I believe that if you take a look at the five gigahertz, and you look at block 1 -- NII 1 (ph). That we should be moving to ruling on that, which is something that Commissioner Pai has -- has often suggested. That when you look at -- at band two, which is DOD, and band four, which is ITS, that we have to address the questions that I was addressing with Mr. Dingell, and that is, to make sure there is no harmful interference, and there's nothing in the record that really gets to that at this point in time. But we need to build that record.

MATSUI: OK, fine. Thank you very much.

And I have to ask a broadband adoption question here. The FCC has, Chairman Wheeler, implemented broadband adoption pilots as part of the lifeline reform measures. Can you explain what the FCC plans to do here? And what is the goal of these pilot projects?

WHEELER: So, there are 14 projects that are taking place around the country that we're funding with some of the savings that we've had in other parts of the -- of the program. And we're going to be looking at, for instance, what is the impact of a lifeline-like subsidy on broadband adoption? And we're going to be looking at what are the kinds of training issues to help people understand what broadband can do for them, and the kinds of things that they can do, once they get on the Internet? Because those seem to go part and parcel. It's not just that you can access it, but also, that you can use it and you understand why you ought to be using it.

MATSUI: So, are you going to use this information (ph) to develop a responsible permanent broadband adoption program?

WHEELER: That's the goal. We're develop -- this is -- these are trials to inform our future actions. And broadband -- wireless broadband and broadband adoption are kind of the sine qua non of what the agency does.

MATSUI: I thank you.

I yield back my time.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back her time, and the chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas for five minutes.

BARTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I want to make a comment on the audience. This one's a lot bigger than the one upstairs with the joint hearing. And they seem to be more interested, too. So, I guess that's a...

(LAUGHTER)

... credit to this subcommittee and the -- and the FCC commissioners.

We have the NRCC commissioners -- not NRC -- NRC.

(LAUGHTER)

WALDEN (?): I think you need to be clear on that one.

BARTON: That would be news, wouldn't it? If Greg Walden was testifying upstairs?

Anyway, I just have one question.

The Middle Class Tax Relief and Job Creation Act requires repackaging (ph) and auctioning of the 65 megahertz of spectrum in the low-powered TV stations, of which there are hundreds, if not thousands, are not guaranteed continued existence. But Chairman, this subcommittee and myself have a bill that we hope to introduce very soon.

While it doesn't guarantee them any additional rights, it does create, I hope, a pathway, so that they may continue to -- to exist.

As the new chairman of the commission, Mr. Wheeler, do you have any thoughts on what might be done to -- to give our low-powered TV industry a chance to continue to exist?

WHEELER: Thank you, Mr. Barton. Yes. And they probably fall in three -- three buckets.

One, there's been a lot of talk about following the statute. And -- and, as you point out, the statute says that LPTV translators are secondary services. We -- that's what the statute says.

Second is, we have actually opened a -- a public notice on the delivery of the content of LPTVs. How do we make sure that -- that the content -- and this ends up being more of a digital technology question than anything else. And how do you -- how do you use digital technology to get the content out? Because that's the consumer protection issue here -- to make sure the consumer gets the -- the content.

And then the -- the third point here is that there may be a safeguard in the reality that rural areas don't have that great demand for spectrum for wireless services to begin with. And so, they may be operating in areas where there will be less pressure to get spectrum. But we will find out as we go through this process.

BARTON: Mr. -- Commissioner O'Rielly, you're the new kid on the block, so to speak. You haven't had a chance publicly to comment on this issue. Do you have any thoughts about low-powered TV and what might be done to help them continue to exist?

O'RIELLY: Well, the chairman's right in the sense -- and you are right to introduce legislation and working for the members on the Spectrum Act. There was a decision made by the members to not protect low-power translators. And your legislation -- I would defer to your legislation to -- to whether they may resolve that.

You -- I know you and I had a chance to talk. I know some of the low-power representatives have argued it may be beneficial financially to the government to participate. I -- I'm not sure, and I don't know if it's accurate, but we have heard that argument, as well, and probably something we'd have to explore.

BARTON: That's my only question, Mr. Chairman. With that, I yield back.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back the balance of his time. And the chair now recognizes the gentleman from Utah for five minutes.

MATHESON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I appreciate all the commissioners taking the time to be here today. I think this is a very informative hearing.

First, Chairman Wheeler, in my city Utah, we have over 750 active translators that relay signals to many rural communities that rely on broadcast television to obtain their newscasts or public service announcements (ph) and entertainment.

Now, with the increased reliance on mobile data, there's no doubt that we need to take steps to move forward to making more spectrum available. I've heard concerns that the spectrum repackaging that could result in the incentive auctions could have a negative impact on those rural communities that tend to be more dependent on broadcast television. What steps is the FCC taking to protect these viewers from possible negative impacts?

WHEELER: Well, Congressman, the -- the -- the first issue is how threatened should they feel? And the fact that they are living in rural areas, where there is less of a demand for mobile spectrum may end up being a de facto shield for them.

Secondly is, as the statute says, this is a secondary service. It does not have protection. So, the question is, how do you protect consumers, as you're suggesting, who rely on it.

That's why we've had a public notice and are seeking comments on the question of how do you get what the translator or LPTV station does in terms of content out? And how does new technology fit into that, such as digital use of the airwaves, or whatever the case may be?

But this is clearly an issue where -- where we need to be focusing on what's the effect on the consumer, rather than what's the effect on the transmission need (ph). Because you have told us how we should look at that transition.

MATHESON: I appreciate that response.

There's been a lot of back and forth on how the incentive options should be structured. I think most would agree it's imperative we maximize participation, both with reverse auctions and the forward auctions. But, Chairman Wheeler, I was wondering, what do you see as the best way for us to maximize participation, and also, revenue for the federal government in both of those options?

WHEELER: You know, I -- before I took this job, I was in the business of doing business deals. And I think that's what we're talking about right here. This is a business transaction that someone who has a license needs to make it a business decision about. And -- and how do you do that? Well, I -- and what's our role.

First of all, we need to make sure that we're getting relevant information on a timely basis into the hands of those parties to make that decision. And that's why we've scheduled the -- the auction plan. We're saying in January, we're going to begin laying out exactly what that kind of information needs to be.

Secondly, I think it's incumbent on us to have an outreach program, in which we make sure that small and large broadcasters understand how the system -- how the program's going to work, what the economics could be, and maybe even begin to think in terms of what economic models might look like. Because at the end of the day, what we're really doing is, we're -- we're saying we want the marketplace to make a decision as to what is the highest and best use of spectrum. And the marketplace can't make that kind of decision until it's informed. So, it is incumbent on us to make sure that that kind of information is in a timely manner available to those, and to help with that process.

MATHESON: Commissioner Rosenworcel, I have a question for you about the ConnectEd program. You mentioned it briefly in your opening testimony. And you also mentioned that the current E-Rate program has some bureaucratic inefficiencies built into it right now.

What can the commission do to maximize efficiency to get more bang for the buck? What can you do with your existing authority, or what do you need for Congress to do to change it to also increase those efficiencies?

ROSENWORCEL: Thank you very much for the question.

I think this program is really important, and reinvigorating it is really important for education, infrastructure, and the economy.

I think we can do more with this program just as it is. As my colleague, Commissioner Pai, noted, we do subsidize a whole bunch of old-fashioned services right now. We should phase those out over time, and focus instead on capacity and bandwidth.

And, like you mentioned, we need to reduce bureaucracy. Bureaucracy gets in the way of small and often rural schools from participating in this program.

I'd like to see us encourage greater use of consortia to improve bulk buying power, and also, have multi-year applications to reduce the administrative burden on schools that do participate.

MATHESON: I appreciate that.

Mr. Chairman, I'll yield back.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back, and the chair now recognizes for five minutes the gentleman from Nebraska.

TERRY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And let me begin by thanking former Acting Chair Clyburn. And during your tenure as acting chair, you finished the low-power FM, and you guys did a wonderful job on it. You really did. And I want to thank all of you for that.

But former acting chair, just now Member Clyburn...

CLYBURN: The commissioner formerly known as...

(CROSSTALK)

(LAUGHTER)

TERRY: Yeah, that works. And you can have a sign for your name now.

But you were extremely communicative. I love the way you'd reach out to us. And frankly, you were so extraordinary, that I think every chairman, including the new one, should model themselves after that. We -- we don't -- it's very rare that we see that level of communication, so I just want to thank all of you.

This really is a great board. You guys are really serious about the real issues. And I like how you filter out the politics that surrounds all of this. Keep it up.

The next -- I know that the quantile regression analysis has already been discussed to some point, but I just want to let you know that that's been a long-time concern for me. I think some of the concerns that we had that it could actually displace or retard capital investment in rural America, when this is all about getting resources and capital into rural America because of its high cost. And so it really needs to be reviewed.

And Chairman Wheeler, I appreciate -- I've been told your comments on the record here today is that you understand this problem. I'll invite you and all the commissioners out to rural Nebraska. You land in my district and then we go there. But it really is becoming a problem. I have -- there's one provider in Diller, Nebraska that we have used as the model for responsible rural telecom because there are businesses there that now have high speed and they're using it to monetize their businesses there, where they truly are a worldwide business, not just the two blocks of Diller.

But there's a wind farm that they are having trouble -- the wind farm that wants to go there, that needs a broadband hookup and they're saying, "With our cap, we don't have the money; we aren't allowed to use that money in that way." So it's having serious effects. It's just not that one house that's 30 miles (inaudible) and, you know, line in and out. It's really hurting rural economic development. So I want (inaudible).

And then in my two minutes left, I want to ask the real question. And to Chairman Wheeler, and if either of the commissioners wish to step in, but I want to ask about a rule that concerns the video market. Many of us are worried that the price of cable subscriptions -- and I'll tell you that's an often and frequent call to my congressional office.

And the current market for video is seeing an expansion in the scope of current law wasn't necessarily intended to address; that the FCC has defined "buying group" of NVPDs for the purpose of program access rules in a way that excludes the NCTC, essentially the only buying group out there.

So, are there plans by the commission to look into this, to maybe change it? Do you think that the NCTC should be excluded from this process?

Chairman Wheeler?

WHEELER: Thank you, Mr. Terry.

I've just become aware of the issues that have been raised about this, and want to get all over it, and would ask that we be able to get back to you with what the answer is. We are now aware and will be dealing with it.

TERRY: Any of the commissioners have concerns about NCTC being excluded from this rule?

Hearing none, Mr. Pai, you actually had an expression.

(LAUGHTER)

PAI: No good expression goes unpunished.

(LAUGHTER)

No, I mean, I supported the notice that teed up a lot of the questions. And we teed up a lot of different questions (inaudible) paragraph 84 (inaudible) that order, out-lifted all the issues under consideration. And I look forward to working with Chairman Wheeler and my colleagues to ensure that the FCC takes the appropriate action to ensure that (inaudible).

TERRY: Right, and others nodded.

Mr. O'Rielly, also known as the new guy.

(CROSSTALK)

O'RIELLY: The new guy, yes. I would have to agree with Chairman Wheeler. I don't have as much information on this and I look to get up to speed on it, so I apologize that I don't.

TERRY: Yield back.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back the balance of his time.

And the chair now recognizes the gentleman from New Mexico for five minutes.

LUJAN: Mr. Chairman, thank you very much.

And Chairman Wheeler, welcome today; to all the commissioners, welcome.

Again, as we're announcing former positions and posts, Commissioner Clyburn, I know that you're very welcome here today. It's great to hear the recognition from my colleagues with your leadership and your work.

And I don't want to speak for former Public Utility Commissioner Ray Baum either, but I'm going to invoke his name a bit. It's good to have another fellow utility commissioner here and a leader. For those of you who aren't aware, myself and Ray served at the same time as utility commissions as Commissioner Clyburn. We had a chance to do some great things together. And it's great to have you again in that leadership capacity, Commissioner Clyburn.

Chairman Wheeler, I appreciate very much the conversation about quantile regression analysis. I think you'll see that there's many rural members of Congress or members that represent rural parts of America that are on this committee. As we look at this and encouraging investment in rural America, I hope that through all these deliberations and rulemaking, that we don't lose sight of the fact that if we can make a mobile call from an airline, that we should be able to make it anywhere in rural America.

And if technology is allowing for that to occur, I don't want to hear that we're not able to anymore. So thank you again for looking at this and making sure that rural America will not be left out, Mr. Chairman.

With that being said, I would also encourage and was encouraged by the fact that in a recent report, there was some conversation about the tribal coefficient and would encourage that that is critically important as we roll out the reevaluation of the QRA.

And lastly, I want to let you know that I'm planning on introducing a piece of legislation to include the elevation of the national tribal recognition of ONAP (ph) as a permanent office. And I would hope that we might be able to work with our colleagues to elevate that, (inaudible) reports directly to the chairman, especially with the evolution of what we're seeing with the extension of utilities across rural America, including tribal lands.

Mr. Chairman, I'm intrigued very much by the conversation around the I.P. transition. I think Chairman Rogers, chairman of the Intelligence Committee, was asking about the importance of security in networks, that we not lose sight of the fact of the importance of the protection of consumers and network security.

As we're looking forward into future technology, sometimes things that we've read about in fiction or we've seen in television. There's been a lot of concern recently about security of networks, about the infringement on individuals, peering eyes, if you will, sometimes into consumer information.

And I'm intrigued by your direction to move forward with real- world experiments that will be coming forward. I'd like your thoughts on anything that you're aware of or that the FCC may be looking at with laser-based quantum encryption, point-to-point work that's happening right now with our national labs. It's been written about.

I know it makes some people nervous, but it seems to me that as we're looking to protect consumer information and intellectual property, that the more advanced that we can make our networks with technology that's currently available, that we may take to the commercial marketplaces, is something that I'd like to encourage and see, and just like to get your thoughts on that.

WHEELER: I just learned quantum regression analysis, and now you want me to know laser-based quantum encryption?

LUJAN: Yes, sir.

(LAUGHTER)

WHEELER: I look forward to learning a lot about that. I don't mean to be light, but the -- the -- let me be specific on what I can comment on.

Our networks need to be secure, period. What I was trying to say to Mr. Rogers is that the best way for attacking that is through the multi-stakeholder process and moving with dispatch. Because the bad guys sure figure out a way to get around things and that we need to make sure that our responses are flexible.

We're working obviously with the president's executive order and the various steps that he is taking, or the executive agencies are taking in that regard. But I happen to believe that -- that two challenges of the I.P. transition is going to be the security of the networks and the privacy of the information.

And if you go back to the comment that I was making I believe to Mr. Waxman, about the trials need to be about measuring values, then we need to be addressing both of those issues inside that trial. And I look forward to learning more about how laser quantum can help the.

LUJAN: I appreciate it, Chairman.

And if I may, Mr. Chairman, you know, it wasn't too long ago that when the same idea was presented, that we may be able to move data over light and laser...

WHEELER: Right, exactly.

LUJAN: ... there were a lot of discouraging thoughts that were associated with that. But as we're moving now away from copper as a new medium, where even the ability to move data on fiber can't keep up with our processing speeds. If laser-based quantum encryption is good enough to keep national security secrets preserved, I would certainly hope that we find a way to extend these protections to consumers as well.

And again, with the real threats that are taking place with theft of intellectual property, right now we know that it works point to point, but there are ways to make this work with (inaudible) we have available.

This is a serious area that I have tried to take up with the Intelligence Committee. They were very cautious with their conversations with me until I presented them with publications that have talked about this in open source and an unclassified way.

So I'm hoping that we might be able to look into this more and have a serious attempt to incorporate this into our day-to-day lives.

Thanks again, Mr. Chairman. I yield back.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back.

And the chair now recognizes the gentleman from Colorado for five minutes.

GARDNER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I want to commend all the commissioners for being here today, and congratulations on your new role and your newly retired-from role. Thank you for your service.

And Commissioner Pai, I want to thank you for your work on the quantile regression analysis, and the comments that you made at the beginning of your testimony, the question of Chairman Walden, I guess, was something that I have dealt with each and every day,

In a district bigger than the state of South Carolina, I have a number of rural telecom -- rural utilities that continue to face the uncertainty, as you have mentioned, about the QRA. And I appreciate it.

And so, Chairman Wheeler, thank you very much for your comments on that as well. I look forward to following up with you as those conversations and decisions move forward.

I wanted to ask a quick question to Commissioner Pai about the issue of connected (ph) and the E-Rate program .

Who is responsible for policing to make sure the E-Rate program is being used as it -- as appropriately, making sure there's no abuse of the program?

PAI: Congressman, thank you for the question.

In theory, the Universal Service Administrative Corp. or company (ph) overseen by us monitors it.

But in practice, given the limited resources that USAC has and given the limited resources the FCC has to oversee USAC, there's not a great deal of transparency and accountability in the system.

GARDNER: A question I had with that is two-fold. Number one, how do we ensure that there is no overlap of private sector service with E-Rate funding and programs, to make sure that we're not adding to government competition to the private sector.

But, number two, if USAC has identified a problem with a E-Rate contractor or recipient, is there a way to police or perhaps are there barment issues that you can talk about?

Because I know one of the issues in Colorado is that there has been a company that is involved and has been morphed into a new company that has had significant issues with E-Rate violations, and is now involved in an other company in Colorado that is providing services to schools.

PAI: Yes, USAC has taken actions to -- such as the type you've indicated. And, as well, the Department of Justice in appropriate cases can take action where it suspects that something fraudulent has occurred.

And I know that I'm quite sure I speak for my colleagues when I say that the FCC has no interest in doing anything but enforcing the rules against people who abuse the E-Rate system.

With respect to the first part of your question, I think it's critical as we think about reforming the E-Rate program in addition to restructuring the basic planks of it that we ensure that at the end of the day, we don't supply or use our E-Rate funds to supplant or add to the problems on competitors who've, you know, taken the risk and invested private capital into pulling (ph) networks.

GARDNER: Commissioner Rosenworcel, I know you talked this as well. I don't know if you have anything to add.

ROSENWORCEL: You know, I'd echo largely the sentiment of my colleague. We wouldn't want government funds to displace private sector funds. We want to be efficient with the limited dollars we have and make sure we reach as many schools at as high speed as possible, including in rural Colorado.

And with respect to oversight, we could always benefit from more oversight. When we find bad actors in a program we have to take efforts to get them out.

GARDNER: Great. Thank you.

And Commissioner -- or Chairman Wheeler, a question I have, and this is maybe something that you need to get back to me on, are you familiar with a report on a next-generation 911 that is being put together by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration in connection with a blue ribbon panel that was convened by -- I'll get the name here -- the FCC's Communications Security, Reliability and Interoperability Council?

WHEELER: Right. That's CSRIC, yes,

GARDNER: CSRIC. Are you familiar with the report that is about to come out in January?

WHEELER: I am not familiar with the report that's about to come out.

GARDNER: There was a -- the blue ribbon panel that was put together...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: Right. I know taht...

(CROSSTALK)

GARDNER: Apparently there is a blue ribbon panel -- or the report is coming out in January. And there is some questionable findings in this report. And I would hope that perhaps the FCC, because I believe some of the findings are not in line with FCC ideas at all. If you could take a look at that report before it's issued and public, to make sure that when we issue a report that has the stamped seal approval of the federal government that it's in line with FCC directives and beliefs...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: Consider that done.

GARDNER: Thank you very much.

And a final question in my time, regarding the I.P. transition issues. Heading in a good direction, but -- and there's significant strides being made to transition to I.P., but, you know, it's -- talking about rural America again, how do we further encourage this transition in a way that ensures consumers remain served in the long run, and particularly in rural America?

WHEELER: I'm sorry, that consumers be served in the long run?

GARDNER: In the long run, particularly in rural America.

WHEELER: Again, it is gonna be very important, for instance in these trials that we have trials in rural areas, to begin to answer those kind of questions.

I mean, you can't go to New York City or, you know, someplace like this and run a trial and say that it applies, you know, in the cities in your district.

And so, that's gonna be one of the criteria that we're looking at.

GARDNER: Thank you.

Yield back my time.

WALDEN: Thank you.

The gentleman yields back.

And the chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri for five minutes.

LONG: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And, Chairman Wheeler, I came to Congress with a 30-year background in the auction business, so that's how -- was my profession for 30 years before I got here, so I've got a great interest in any time that we try to conduct an auction for anything. And it's tricky to me about this reverse auction thing, because I'm not sure exactly how that's supposed to work.

But can you provide us with a timeline of actions that need to occur before the incentive auctions would begin?

WHEELER: Yes, sir. We're going to -- and we're gonna in January, which -- at next month's open meeting we're gonna have a presentation that is going to lay out both the timeline and the policy issues that need to be decided, and some recommendations on those.

Then in the spring we're going to be voting on an important order that solicits offers to do trials, sets up a measurement scheme for them, and begins to address the kinds of policy issues that will be tangential to all of that.

And then, we will go forth with trials.

LONG: Can you also tell me what the FCC is doing to ensure that the maximum amount of revenue will be generated through these auctions, which was always a concern of mine as an auctioneer?

WHEELER: The -- and -- and -- and believe me, one of ours as well, because we have the responsibility not only to fund FirstNet and the auction activities themselves, but also to contribute to pay down the federal deficit.

And I think the key to -- to how you can maximize revenue comes down to multiple things.

One is -- is, we've got to be able to attract broadcasters. We've got to have something, as I was saying previously, that -- that are rules that are understandable, are rules that we're actually being aggressive and helping people understand the economic impact of them, because, as you know, you're only gonna bid to the point that your spreadsheets say it's gonna be making sense.

So that's the first thing, that we've got to attract broadcasters.

We also have this -- well, we have this perverse challenge here that we also have to be freeing up spectrum.

LONG: Have to be what?

WHEELER: Freeing up spectrum.

LONG: Which requires people to put spectrum...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: At the end of the auction.

WHEELER: There's the key. So you have to provide the appropriate incentive to get them to free up...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: And do you foresee that happening? From what I talk to -- the people I talk to, I don't know that that's gonna happen in as large a way as what you...

WHEELER: So, the Congress told us to make it happen. And -- and we are going to do our damndest to deliver on those instructions. And I believe that we will be able to fulfill the challenge that we have been given.

And in no way, shape or form, do I underestimate the magnitude of it. I have spent more time on this issue in the last 39 days than any other issue.

And I know my colleagues all feel the same way on this. We understand that we're biting off a huge chunk here.

LONG: And there's a article where you were speaking in Ohio and, to quote out of the article, "'the protection of competition,;'Mr. Wheeler said, 'would apply to the coming auction of additional airwaves or spectrum for mobile broadband.' In April, the Justice Department told the FCC that it could help to protect competition by ensuring that the two largest companies, AT&T and Verizon, were not allowed to use their financial might to buy up all the available spectrum being auctioned, shutting out smaller carriers."

So how do you balance that? How do you decide I want to get the most money for my product over here, but I want to limit my bidders over here? How does that...

WHEELER: I also think that -- and, as you know, the more people you get to the auction, presumably the better result.

And so, we want to make sure that we are creating an auction marketplace that will attract as many people as possible. Not -- and not just the giants.

As a former entrepreneur, we want to make sure that we have smaller wireless companies. We want to make sure there are entrepreneurial opportunities in here.

And that's one of the things that's most interesting about what we've recently put out for public notice, the proposal from the Competitive Carriers Association, the Rural Carriers Association, and the NTCA, the rural wireline association, on talking about smaller economic areas, so that they could bid for a smaller piece of geography, rather than a humongous piece, because for entrepreneurs, for smaller carriers, they can target their activities, they can take something that is a -- is a consumable bite, rather than be forced to go out and -- and -- and...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: But they (inaudible) have to put together a patchwork quilt of -- to make their system work correct, what they buy through the auction, they have to...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: So they can -- they can buy their areas, they can buy other, smaller areas, rather than having to buy -- this is -- and this is not a decision, I just want to clear. This is -- we've put this out for comment. But it is a certainly very interesting idea that...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: ... a,b, and c, and they get a and b, but then they can't get c, then a and b weren't worth anything to them...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: But that's kind of the history of the wireless industry. I've been -- we're about to conduct our 96th auction. And -- and I've been in them from the outset. And traditionally, that kind of situation has occurred. And then an aftermarket then develops in which various players say, "OK, how can I reorganize for the most efficiency?"

LONG: OK. I'm beyond my time by quite a little bit. So if I had any time, I'd yield it back.

WALDEN: The gentleman's time has expired.

And the chair now recognizes the gentlelady from North Carolina for five minutes.

ELLMERS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you to the commissioners for being here today.

Commissioner Clyburn, I'm going to direct my questions to you. I have an issue that has been raised from my sheriffs back home in North Carolina. And it has to do with one of the points that you made in your opening testimony.

And I'll just read from your opening statement. "We adopted an order to reform inmate calling services to finally provide relief to millions of families and 2.7 million children who have been paying unreasonably high rates to stay connected with incarcerated loved ones."

My sheriffs back home, do have some concerns on this issue and -- so they would like me to pose some questions to you on this issue, in regard to security measures that -- that they will now be putting in place, certainly they want to be able to provide, you know, access and information and the ability to communicate with family members.

But they are concerned that this order or reform regulation is saying that basically their ability to -- to put forward call-blocking through the -- is that an issue? Is that looked upon as something that -- that we want to veer away from?

CLYBURN: So let me start -- again, thank you, and it's a pleasure meeting a -- a Carolinian.

ELLMERS: Absolutely. Yes

CLYBURN: We might have argued a bit about which...

ELLMERS: Yeah.

CLYBURN: Right.

ELLMERS: That's OK, though. We're -- we're brothers, cousins, sisters.

CLYBURN: Absolutely.

ELLMERS: That's right.

CLYBURN: So let me start with the latter, in terms of the call blocking concerns that some of -- of the sheriffs and persons who run jail facilities mentioned.

So as it relates to that particular item, I want to assure you that nothing within anything that we have delivered in this order prevents any type of security in security needed type of a blocking.

So if it's -- if -- if you know, a judge or a witness, or something, you know is -- is potentially at risk, then yes, these providers can block calls.

The -- the call blocking comes into play when there is not a business relationship with -- if someone is doing business with somebody else and then the supplier -- another supplier is blocking them, that is when we have some disconnects with our rules.

But when it comes to security protocols, that is in place.

So you've mentioned what is at the epicenter of our reasoning for reform. That family members that -- those who represent those who are incarcerated, not everybody incarcerated is -- is guilty.

And -- and those who are trying to help rehabilitate those inmates have complained to us for a number of years, for well over 10 years that the ability to communicate was just financially outrageous. That it was an unaffordable regime.

So what we did, after 10 long years, was act. And we looked at -- and reminded ourselves, Communications Act, in terms of universal service principles put forward, that is the providing of just and reasonable rates for all.

And so we put in a -- a mechanism that will provide that. And what we also did, not only providing a -- a means for just and reasonable rates for those families and others who use the phone service, but providing the means for just and reasonable rate of return for those carries, at the same builds in those that just and reasonable rate of returns is the -- the amount of money needed to -- to provide a state of the art security protocols.

So nothing within the framework in terms of what we, you know, put forward in terms of the order and the further order that would deal with entrust state rates, will compromise security protocols. But it will bring more certainty and more -- I -- I guess I would -- again, just affordability for those -- for those who are making calls to the incarcerated.

ELLMERS: They are also concerned about the cost involved and -- and you know, if -- if you can give some guidance in anticipation of the cost that they will have to incur as the result of this, certainly again, wanting to ensure that everyone is protected...

CLYBURN: Right.

ELLMERS: ... and the security is there. That -- and also, would you consider, at the local level, the local jails, maybe being exempt until they can, you know, come up with a plan of action?

CLYBURN: So one of the things that we have put forth in -- in this engagement is the capacity for any provider that is under distress, they can apply for a waiver process. You know, for -- for a waiver.

And so that capacity is within and means, and so they do have the ability to do so.

But one of the things that I wanted to emphasize is when we came up with this particular rate structure, we looked at a number of cost studies and cost models that included a -- a wide array of -- of facilities and came up, actually, with a cost structure that was much higher than some the petitioners wanted us to.

But we thought that we needed to take into account facilities, large and small, in order to come up with a -- a rate structure that we think it strikes the right balance.

ELLMERS: Well, thank you very much and I look forward to and certainly will be working with my law enforcement back home, working with the commission on -- on this issue, and the subcommittee.

So thank you so much. I look forward to that.

CLYBURN: Thank you, ma'am.

ELLMERS: And I yield back the remainder of my time.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back, and seeing no other members to ask questions, I wanna thank the commission for being with us today. And I know that Chairman Walden does the same.

And I also wanna thank the commission for changing your time today for your meeting to be able to be here, and I understand your meeting is at 2 O'clock. So we appreciate you accommodating the committee to appear before us today.

And seeing no further business to come for the committee, the committee stand adjourned.

TEXT:

WALDEN: I'll call to order the Subcommittee on Communication and Technology. And it's a delight to welcome all five members of the Federal Communications Commission, fully installed and bright and shiny faces and welcome to go today.

We welcome you. And Chairman Wheeler and Commissioner O'Rielly, we especially welcome you and look forward to working with you to set the communications agenda for the United States.

Federal Communications Commission is the arm of our government, tasked with fostering some of the most important parts of our national economy. And among them, the telecommunications industry, the video distribution industries and the Internet.

Give the economic significance of these industries, the changes from Congress -- the charge from Congress to encourage competition, license our national spectrum assets and facilitate technological advances is one that must be discharged with transparency, accountability and a long view of the technological landscape.

It is with this in mind, that the subcommittee has worked over the last three years on efforts to improve the commission's processes. As the subcommittee with jurisdiction over the Federal Communications Commission, take this task very seriously and with great care to ensure the commission not only remains a vital institution, but one that can serve as an example for other federal agencies of accountability and efficiency.

A bipartisan majority of this subcommittee is deeply committed to this cause, and it's proud to have reported out a bipartisan FCC Process Reform Bill to the full House of Representatives, yesterday.

Chairman Wheeler, it's clear you want to improve the agency. I've appreciated our conversations and your comments. And I'd like to commend for turning your attention to this task as one of your first roles as chairman by asking one of your top advisers to review the FCC process and submit recommendations for improvement by early 2014.

While there are a number of large proceedings currently pending at the commission, many of which we will talk about today, I'm particularly concerned with returning the commission to addressing some of its long overdue responsibilities.

For example, despite multiple unsuccessful trips to the Third Circuit Court of Appeals, the commission's responsibility to address the media ownership proceeding, remains unfulfilled.

Additionally, licensing, one of the original -- licensing, one of the original reasons for the creation of the commission, has fallen woefully behind.

Of particular note is the tragic pace of processing of applications in the commission's media bureau.

Now the AM radio industry has been clamoring for the ability to use FM translators to give new life to that classic medium. And I certainly appreciate what Commissioner Pai has done, taking on this issue and it's very good work.

And as a former licensee, I actually know firsthand, the commission has been in no rush to address translator applications. In fact, my own application sat unresolved at the commission for 10 years.

To put this in context, while the commission considered my application, my wife and I actually sold our radio stations, our son went off an graduated from college and every full power television station in the country converted from analog to digital broadcasting.

Look, the commission can do better than that. The commission should do better than that. And I'm hopeful that our shared commitment will lead to improvement in that bureau.

As the only one on the panel with the unique experience of having been a licensee of commercial broadcast and still under your jurisdiction with my amateur radio license, which I'm set to renew for March, hopefully I will get approved within 10 years, I'd like to offer two pieces of advice for you as you move forward with your change.

First, where Congress has spoken, I urge you to heed the words in statute and reject calls to act in ways contrary to congressional intent. For example, in the incentive auction proceeding, some are calling on the commission to exclude bidders from participating in the auction. Others, still are calling for excessive guard bands in the attempt to end-run requirements to license, reclaim TV band spectrum.

I'm just saying both are bad ideas.

Second, I urge you to bear in mine that even seemingly small changes in your rules can have significant impact on the market. The commission's recent decision to apply yet incomplete rules to its UHF discount has effectively frozen many plans for broadcast mergers and acquisition.

The problem here isn't that the commission wants to update or needs to update the UHF discount rule, the problem is that absent a decision how and importantly, when the commission will move forward, it has pressed paused for an indefinite period of time.

We all know that markets do not react favorable to this kind of open-ended uncertainty.

On the other hand, I applaud the recent announcement on the schedule for the spectrum incentive auctions. Both the broadcast and wireless industries are waiting with bated breath to see how the FCC addresses this first-of-a-kind auction.

To say nothing of the public safety agencies that are counting on the auction fund to fund FirstNet. The certainty of a timetable is good for both stakeholders and for the commission.

Finally, turning to those large proceedings the commission has on its plate. We're looking forward to working with you to tackle the tough issues like the I.P. transition, universal service reform and media ownership.

Chairman Upton and I recently launched a large proceeding of our own, an initiative to update the Communications Act. Each of you brings the unique perspective to your work on the commission, industry lobbyist, newspaper publisher, a couple of lawyers, even some former legislative Hill staffers. That experience, combined with your expertise on the Federal Communications Commission staff and your own work on the commission, will be valuable in our efforts as we work together to update and modernize the Communications Act.

So Congress -- or Chairman Wheeler...

(LAUGHTER)

We wouldn't want to demote you to level of congressman.

Chairman Wheeler -- yeah, our numbers aren't that great -- Commissioner O'Rielly, we especially welcome you aboard the FCC and Commissioners Clyburn, Rosenworcel and Pai, welcome back, not only the commission, but before our committee. We thank you all for joining us today, we look forward to working together in this very critical sector of America's economy to spur further innovation technology growth and jobs.

And with that, I will now yield to the ranking member of the subcommittee, my friend Ms. Eshoo from California.

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman for holding this hearing, it's wonderful to see a full Federal Communications Commission before us. Welcome to each one of you, special welcome to the new chairman.

I think that you started out with 100 percent goodwill with everyone that is on this committee, I think our full committee -- in fact I think the Congress.

We have -- there have been many months where we didn't have a full commission. I want to once again thank Commissioner Clyburn for her exceptional leadership during that period of time.

Welcome to each one of the commissioners, and of course, to the newest commissioner, Mike O'Rielly, who served on the other side of that table.

When I first came to the committee, he was here when we began -- began the Telecom Act. And now, guess what, you get to trudge through that all over again, according to the chairman.

So I guess there are some things that we just never finish with.

As Chairman Wheeler announced last week, the commission has made the upcoming incentive auction of broadcast television spectrum the top priority of the commission. And I agree.

This is a rare opportunity to auction beach-front spectrum under 1 gigahertz. And the FCC has to structure rules to promote a competitive wireless landscape and ensure carriers, of all sizes, both regional and national, have an opportunity to bid competitively for license spectrum.

And it has to be done right. It's the first in the history of the world that an auction has been structured this way. And I appreciate, Mr. Chairman, and all the commissioners, your understanding, the delicacy of this needing to be done right, well and successfully.

Similarly, recognizing the enormous economic and societal benefits of unlicensed spectrum which is tucked away in one corner of my telecom heart. The FCC has an opportunity to structure a band plan that ensures the nationwide block of spectrum under 1 gigahertz, dedicated for unlicensed innovation.

With unlicensed spectrum being a critical tool to bring broadband to unserved areas, including rural America, this opportunity really must be seized.

In addition to the important role the FCC has in freeing up more spectrum for mobile broadband, I'd like to highlight four issues that the commission should make a top priority in 2014. And I think you're going to.

First during the three months since I released a draft legislation, the message from individuals, communications companies and consumer groups has been abundantly clear. Our video laws are in need of reform, they're broken.

Independent of such legislation, the commission does have an important responsibility to promote competition, consumer choice and localism across the video marketplace.

Second, I hope the commission will continue its focus on modernizing the E-Rate program to support a 21st Century digital needs of our schools and libraries.

In June, together with Commissioner Rosenworcel, we called for such an update. And I'm pleased that the White House and the FCC agree with us and have made this issue a key priority. We have to stay on it. We have to move and we have to make it much better. It's gotta be a 21st century plan.

Third, the commission should uphold, I think, the goals (ph) of Section 629 and ensure a vibrant, competitive retail set-top box market. A successor to the current CableCARD regime, whether by FCC rule, or more preferably, a voluntary industry agreement, will usher in a new generation of technologies that will give consumers giver choice and ensure that innovation flourishes.

Finally, I'm pleased that the commission has made the transition to Next Generation 911, as well as improving the indoor location accuracy of 911 calls the key priority.

In fact, later today, it's my understanding that the commission will vote on an order to improve the reliability of 911. And I look forward to continued updates as the commission proceeds with the implementation of Next Gen 911.

Mr. Chairman, thank you for holding this morning's hearing. I look forward to the important testimony of Chairman Wheeler and each of the commissioners, most importantly, I pledge to work with each of you to make American's communications sector the most effective and the most admired in the world.

And with that, I yield back.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back.

Chair now recognizes the chairman of the full committee, Mr. Upton from Michigan, I believe.

UPTON: Great, (inaudible) Michigan.

WALDEN: (inaudible) Ohio.

UPTON: Thank you-- thank you, Mr. Chairman.

You know, today we welcome a fully constituted FCC back to the Energy and Commerce Committee. The -- the last time that we heard from the full commission was in July of 2012.

So the FCC has regulatory authority over a sector of our economy that is critical to innovation, jobs and our nation's global leadership in technology.

Communication sector is also an integral part of our daily lives, connecting us to loved ones, alerting us to natural disasters and entertaining and educating us every single day.

As the regulatory agency of these industries, the FCC has the immensely important task of promoting growth and competition. Our hearing today will examine actions that the FCC has taken since the commission last appeared and set expectations for the agency's future.

As the oversight authority for the commission, our committee works hard to ensure that the FCC functions to the benefit of America consumers as well as companies.

We also wanna make sure that this agency functions efficiently and transparently as all government agencies should.

I'm glad to say that this is not a partisan concern. Bipartisan majority on a voice vote of the full committee reported an FCC process reform bill yesterday that will help the FCC operate more openly and defectively. And we expect it to be on the House floor in the not too distant future.

And the bill is needed. There are several stalled proceedings and ambiguous projects at the commission that cause concern to me and other members of the committee. We've sent a number of letters in the past months regarding media ownership.

Subcommittee Vice Chair Latta has gone to the extent of drafting a bill to end the cable set-top box integration ban, a bill that seems to make a lot of sense, and which perhaps the FCC should have considered doing a while ago.

My concern and hope is that we can start a productive dialogue today with our esteemed witnesses on these and the many other important issues pending at the commission.

Commission O'Rielly, I'd like to welcome you back to the Energy and Commerce Committee, a committee you know well, having once served here as the staff.

And Chairman Wheeler, though you're from Ohio, this is often known as the big house, now the Dingell room. Hope you appreciate the -- the green and white decor.

(LAUGHTER)

And yes, we were first party.

(LAUGHTER)

Welcome back.

And I yield to other members, Republican members.

WALDEN: The chairman now recognizes the vice chair of the Subcommittee on Communications, Mr. Latta from Ohio.

(LAUGHTER)

Home of the speaker of the House.

(LAUGHTER)

LATTA: (inaudible) number two.

But thank you very much for yielding, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you very much to our commissioner for being with us today.

And welcome to our newest members for the commission. I really appreciate you -- having you here with us today.

The communications and technology industry has been a consistent bright spot in the U.S. economy. It's created millions of American jobs, spurred significant investment and innovation and, most importantly, empowered consumers, who are the driving force behind robust competition in the communications marketplace.

As U.S.-based businesses lead the world in technological advances, we have a responsibility to ensure the FCC fosters continued growth and development in the communications sector.

This can be achieved by the FCC incorporating more transparency and accountability in its processes, operating within the bounds of its statutory authority and acting upon legislation according to congressional intent.

I look forward to continuing working with Chairman Upton and the members of this committee and also Congressman Green on my H.R. 3196, which is the legislation to eliminate the integration ban on the set- top boxes and allow the marketplace to get to the next-generation innovation without the regulatory barriers being put in front of it.

I look forward to the hearing and hearing the testimony today.

And, Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

Thank you.

WALDEN: The chair recognizes the gentlelady from Tennessee, the vice chair of the full committee, for the remaining 40 seconds, if she wants it.

BLACKBURN: And I thank the chairman.

I want to welcome all of our commissioners and publicly commend Commissioner Clyburn for the wonderful work that she did when she served as the acting chair. We appreciate that leadership.

And, Chairman Wheeler, we look forward to having you continue and to work in a collaborative manner to find results for the private sector.

We would hope that the commission will be proactive, not get beyond its mission, but to stay focused on your core mission. Pay attention to economic analysis. Look at cost to benefit analysis. And make certain that you don't suffer mission creep, which is casting a shadow over the private sector.

With that, I yield back.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back.

The chair recognizes the ranking member of the full committee, Mr. Waxman.

WAXMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I want to welcome the members of the commission, Chairman Wheeler and all the commissioners.

And I also want to join in commending Commissioner Clyburn for the incredible job she did as acting chairwoman, from the industry agreement on interoperability to long overdue reforms on prison phone rates, your brief chairmanship will be remembered for the remarkable amount you accomplished.

Let me welcome Chairman Wheeler and Commissioner O'Rielly. I congratulate you on your appointment and confirmation, and we're pleased to have you here.

You join the FCC at a time when our country is undergoing dramatic and perhaps fundamental transformations in communications networks and technologies, and the decisions you make at the commission will no doubt have lasting impact on our nation's communications landscape.

At the top of the FCC agenda is the spectrum auctions authorized by the Public Safety and Spectrum Auction Act last year. And I'm pleased to see that the FCC is moving ahead to conduct the H Block auction in January.

In addition to allocating new wireless spectrum to address our nation's spectrum shortage, this auction will provide significant down payment for the nation-wide interoperable public safety network.

I also support, Chairman Wheeler, your recently announced timetable for the incentive auction. This auction has many layers of complexity, and I applaud your commitment to getting the technical issues right.

Congress gave the FCC the tools to unleash the economic opportunities for both licensed and unlicensed spectrum, revolutionize public safety communications, ensure a vibrant and competitive wireless market, all the while protecting consumer access to free over-the-air television.

And I think FCC must remain faithful to these goals as you implement the law.

You also must bear in mind the principles undergirding the Communications Act, as we consider the next evolution in our nation's wireless networks. Our values do not change with each successive generation of technology. Whether the infrastructure is copper or fiber optics, the commission's charge is to protect and promote the longstanding goals of competition, universal access and consumer protection.

Chairman Upton and Walden recently called for a multiyear examination of possible updates to the Communications Act, and I welcome the opportunity for a bipartisan consideration of these issues, and I hope the commission will be a partner in this endeavor.

In 2010, the commission and this committee spent many hours working to preserve the principle of an open Internet. That process led to a sensible set of rules governing the broadband market that was supported by a diverse groups of stakeholders and provided the foundation for the FCC's Open Internet Order.

I believe the Open Internet Order will be upheld in the court. But whatever the outcome, I'll be looking to you to assure that the Internet remains an open platform for innovation and economic growth.

I want to at this point yield the balance of my time to my fellow Californian and good friend, Congresswoman Matsui.

MATSUI: Thank you very much, Ranking Member Waxman for yielding me time.

It's wonderful to see the full complement of the commission here today.

I want to join in welcoming Chairman Wheeler, and who brings a wealth of knowledge and experience to the FCC.

And I'd also like to congratulate and welcome Commissioner O'Rielly.

And I also would like to commend Commissioner Clyburn for her leadership during the interim period. Thank you very much.

Mr. Chairman, the subcommittee is working diligently to find bipartisan solutions for smart and sound spectrum policy for our nation. We've worked want to create a path for DOD to reallocate the 1755 to 1780 megahertz band.

DOD and the broadcasters should be applauded for their leadership on a landmark sharing agreement.

Moreover, I've joined with Representative Guthrie to introduce H.R. 3674, the Federal Spectrum Incentive Act, which passed this committee yesterday in a bipartisan manner.

The bill is the first of its kind that offers a fresh approach that would create a federal spectrum incentive auction. I look forward to working closely with my colleagues and the administration in moving this bill to the floor.

There are tough decisions ahead, and I want to encourage also the FCC to move forward with the USF reform efforts. Modernizing the USF for broadband, particularly the lifeline program will provide a path toward universal broadband adoption in this country.

And, with that, I yield back the balance of my time.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back the balance of her time; all time's been consumed. We'll now go to our witnesses.

And, again, we thank you very much for being here today and the public service work you're all undertaking.

And, Mr. Wheeler, as chairman of the FCC, we're gonna lead off with you. So pull that microphone close, turn on the button, and you're good to go, sir.

WHEELER: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, Ms. Eshoo, other members of the committee. It's a privilege to be before you today, and a privilege to be joining my colleagues here, the full component of the commission. I think we will make a great team, and I know that all of us are honored to be able to work with the quality men and women that make up the FCC.

Today is my 39th day on the job. And I have enjoyed the informal discussions that I've been able to have with many of you in the interim and look forward to today having a even more complete discussions and to working with you afterwards.

As I think everybody in their statements has indicated, we are in a very exciting time, in the midst of a great network revolution.

The lesson of history is that revolutions like that come chock full of challenges. And we're gonna have to work together on how we address those challenges.

We've tended to look at those challenges through three prisms, if you will, and to say, OK, how do we make sure, first of all, that what policies we adopt promote economic growth and maintain national leadership?

And clearly at the root of those are issues such as competition and maintaining the necessary assets, such as spectrum.

The second prism is what we've begun to call the network compact. There has, for a century, developed a set of values that represent the relationship between those who operate networks and those who use networks. Those values must be preserved regardless of the type -- of the technology used in the network.

And, thirdly, is the -- is the goal that networks work for everyone, that it's -- it's not what broadband -- it's not just the delivery of broadband, but it's what broadband enables that is what is important.

If we don't have 21st century education capabilities, if we don't make sure that Americans with disabilities have access to the capabilities of the new network, if we don't make sure that tribal Americans have opportunities to use the new networks, then we have failed in our goal.

So, those three things, economic growth, the network compact and -- and what networks enable are the three pillars of policy. But at the heart of them is competition.

It has become a joke, at least in my office, that everybody keeps -- that I keep saying, "Competition. Competition. Competition."

But that is very much what -- what we believe.

Let me do a quick look at the three areas where the commission is keeping pace with innovation, that innovative economy.

First is process reform. The committee's bipartisan effort yesterday is significant and is noted and appreciated.

On my second day, Mr. Chairman, as you noted, I began a process that will produce a report in 60 days. We're gonna look at how to enhance accountability through deadlines and tracking systems, how to expedite the licensing process, like you referenced. How to shorten the processing time of applications for review and Commissioner Pai has an interesting idea in that regard.

How to streamline consumer complaint, collection and a searchable database, which Commissioner Rosenworcel has been a champion of. And how to attack the backlog as Commissioner Clyburn did when she was chairwoman.

We also wanna weed out outdated regulations, incorporate performance -- and incorporate performance measures.

Second focus is gonna be, as you have all appropriately said, the spectrum auctions, especially the incentive auction.

This committee, working with MTIA and DOD, has provided great leadership on the 1755 to 1780 band that we look forward to moving forward on that and moving that to auction.

The Guthrie-Matsui bill, which you all moved yesterday, which has been referenced, it takes the incentive auction idea and applies it to federal agencies, and that's a great step forward.

And then speaking of incentives, we have the incentive auction coming up. We're gonna have -- we have established a schedule now, we're gonna have policy recommendations in January. And we're gonna have consideration and discussion of that until spring, when we'll be making a decision. And we'll have an auction in the -- in mid-2015.

But while we're discussing spectrum and regulatory process, I would be remiss if I didn't bring up an item we will be considering today. A proposal to ask for comments on a rule to reflect the realities of new onboard aircraft technology.

And there have been lots of misconceptions about that. And let me just see if I can address these right upfront.

One, we are going to continue -- we are proposing to consider to continue the ban on mobile devices that can interfere with terrestrial networks. But where there is new onboard technology that eliminates that potential for interference, then there is no need for an interference rule.

This is the responsible thing to do, where the rationale for a rule doesn't exist, the rule shouldn't exist. We are the expert technical agency. And new technology removes the technical justification of this rule.

In that regard, I should mention that I have spoken with Transportation Secretary Foxx this morning. And he has told me that, yes, the FCC is the technical agency and that the Department of Transportation is the aviation agency and that they will be moving on a rule to address voice calls on airplanes.

I'm the last person in the world who wants to listen to somebody talking to me, while they fly across the country. But we are the technical agency and we will make the technical rules that reflect the -- the way the new technology works.

Finally, item three, you've all talked about the -- the I.P. transition -- transitions, I should say. Because it's not just one transition, it's a multi-faceted process. And at today's meeting, we're gonna hear a report from the technology transitions policy task force, which will lay out a schedule, including a plan for a January order that will invite experiments in the field, real life experiments, recommend data collection and create a framework for policy decisions.

So we have a full agenda, as you have all said. It is a privilege to be here, to be able to work with all of you and I look forward to doing that in the time coming (ph).

WALDEN: Chairman Wheeler, thank you for your public service and thank you for recognizing our concerns on the subcommittee and full committee.

And now we'll switch to -- I guess, once a chairman, always a chairman, right, highest title. Former Chairwoman Clyburn, we're delighted to have you back before the committee. Thanks for your work publicly and please go ahead with your opening statement.

CLYBURN: Thank you, Chairman Walden, Ranking Member Eshoo, and members of the committee.

Thank you, again, for allowing me to appear before you today. Since our last visit, I have had an incredible opportunity to serve as acting chair and I'm glad to note that with the support of my colleagues and the assistance of a skilled and dedicated staff, we were able to move a number of important items, which clearly advanced the public interest.

This hearing comes at a critical stage in our communications policy continuum. We are experiencing tremendous technological change that affects every aspect of our lives.

And as we look ahead to the challenges of tomorrow, I believe it is important to understand the terrain over which we have travelled. We reached a voluntary interoperability industry solution in the lower 700 megahertz band to address an issue, that for years, have been impeding the deployment of valuable spectrum.

We launched a proceeding to modernize the FCC's schools and libraries program, known as E-Rate, to ensure that our children have the resources and connectivity they need to support digital learning and become the leaders of tomorrow.

We adopted an order to address rule call completion because it is unacceptable in today's world that calls to non-urban areas are not being completed.

We adopted an order to reform inmate calling services to finally provide relief to millions of families who have been paying unreasonably high rate to stay connected with loved ones.

We enabled the H Block spectrum auction and the AWS-3 proposal to take major steps forward on government and commercial spectrum sharing. And we made ongoing reforms to lifeline and proposed significant forfeitures to companies not following the FCC's rules.

With Chairman Wheeler and my fellow commissioners, I look forward to building on the progress we have made.

As Chairman Wheeler has made clear, the voluntary incentive auction proceeding continues to be a top commission priority for those broadcast television licensees who want to continue to use their spectrum, the act mandates that the commission makes all reasonable efforts to preserve the coverage areas and population served.

The act also has clear directives for the proceeds from the forward auction, which includes much earned contributions to the Public Safety Trust Fund and the national deficit.

Congress also gave the commission authority to propose a band plan with an appropriate balance of unlicensed and licensed spectrum.

Unlicensed spectrum plays a critical role in advancing more efficient use of spectrum and commercial wireless carriers are increasingly using unlicensed Wi-Fi services to off load their smartphone traffic.

In addition to spectrum, Chairman Wheeler has also announced that the commission will consider an order next month to launch trials regarding the ongoing technology transitions.

I do believe that trials, if structured properly, can produce helpful insights into how best to approach reform. And I will be keeping a keen eye on how the trials and future reforms affect all consumers.

Process reform is where we have an opportunity to develop an even more efficient agency.

Yesterday, the committee passed the Federal Communications Commission Process Reform Act of 2013. I am pleased that the proposed modifications to the Sunshine Act would facilitate federal commissioners participation on the Federal-State Joint Board and the Joint Conference.

I would also encourage you to review the Paperwork Reduction Act and how it can be improved. For example, the FCC is using its website to better inform consumers in the industry.

Yet, to obtain voluntary feedback on our website, the PRA requires OMB approval. As a result, the commission cannot be as responsive to users without engaging in a lengthy OMB approval process.

So as you can see, Mr. Chairman, and distinguished members of the committee, we have both challenges and opportunities ahead.

I look forward to working with each of you to address our evolving communications landscape.

I appreciate your attention this morning and will be glad to answer any questions you may have.

WALDEN: Thank you for your work, your testimony, your recommendations, and we'll now go to Commissioner Rosenworcel. Thank you for being here this morning, we're delighted to have you back and please go ahead.

ROSENWORCEL: It's good to be back.

Good morning, Chairman Walden, Ranking Member Eshoo and members of the subcommittee, it is an honor to appear before you today in the company of my colleagues, new and old, at the FCC.

By some measures, communications technologies account for as much as one-sixth of our economy, no wonder. These are the networks that carry all aspects of our modern commercial and civic life.

They are changing at a breathtaking pace. Keeping up requires taking a fresh look at our policies, informed by the policies of the past, we have to think boldly about the future.

Now in the weeks ahead, we will do this, as we wrestle with the upcoming transition to Internet protocol and think about spectrum auctions, including incentive auctions.

But I think we make a mistake if we focus only on networks themselves. After all, there is great beauty and power in what we can do with them.

Our new networks can change the ways we connect, create and conduct commerce. They can change the ways we learn and seek security.

So in my brief time before you today, this is what I wanna talk about. How the broadband beneath us and the air waves all around us can improve education and improve public safety.

First, I wanna talk about the E-Rate program. E-Rate helps connects schools and libraries across the country to the Internet. It is a byproduct of the Telecommunications Act of 1996.

Remember in 1996, probably everyone in this room called the Internet the information superhighway. It was a long time ago. In 1996, only 14 percent of public schools were connected to the Internet.

Today, thanks to the E-Rate, that number is north of 95 percent, which sounds good. It sounds like the job is done, but nothing could be further from the truth, because the challenge today is not connection, it is capacity.

Too many of our E-Rate schools access the Internet at speeds as low as 3 megabits, that is too slow for high definition video, it is not fast enough for the most innovative teaching tools, and it is definitely not fast enough to prepare the next generation with the stem skills that are so essential to compete.

Contrast this with efforts under way in some of our world neighbors.

In South Korea, 100 percent of schools are connected to high speed broadband and all schools are converting to digital textbooks by 2016.

Ireland will have all schools connected to 100 megabits next year.

Finland will have all schools connected to 100 megabits the year after that.

Meanwhile, in both Turkey and Thailand, the government is seeking a vendor to supply tablet computers to millions of students for a new era of broadband enabled digital learning.

Now we can wait and see where the status quo takes us and let other nations lead the way, or we can chose a future where all American students have the access to the broadband that they need to compete, no matter who they are, where they live or where they go to school.

I think it's time to compete. I think it's time for E-Rate 2.0. The FCC has a rule-making proceeding under way to reboot and recharge the E-Rate program. I think we need to make it a high priority.

I think we need to find ways to bring 100 megabits to all schools in the near term, and one gigabit to all schools in the long term. While we're at it, we must find ways to reduce the bureaucracy of this program and make it easier for small and rural schools to participate.

Second, I want to talk about a number all of us know by heart, but none of us ever hopes to use. I want to talk about 9-1-1. In my time at the FCC, I have visited 9-1-1 call centers all across the country. I am always struck by the steely calm of those who answer the phones and help ensure that help is on the way.

I am also struck by how many emergency calls now come in from wireless phones. In fact, nationwide more than 70 percent of calls made to 9-1-1 are made from wireless phones. That is more than 400,000 calls per day. Now, if you use your wireless phone to call 9- 1-1 from outdoors, your location is reported, sometimes to within 50 meters under FCC location accuracy standards. But if you use your wireless phone to call 9-1-1 from indoors, you better cross your fingers because no FCC location accuracy standards apply.

I think this is an unacceptable gap in public safety communications. It deserves your attention and ours. Because no matter where you are when you call 9-1-1, you want first responders to find you. Moreover, as our networks evolve and the ways we use them change, we must make sure our public safety policies keep pace. In fact, our approaches to networks both wired and wireless need to evolve as markets evolve.

But in our efforts, we must not lose sight of why networks matter, because they can do more than connect us. They can strengthen education and enhance our security, and of course, grow our economy in new and exciting ways.

Thank you. I look forward to answering any questions you might have.

WALDEN: Commissioner Rosenworcel, thank you for your work and your testimony and your suggestions.

We go now to Commissioner Pai. Thank you for being here and thank you for all the work you've been doing. And please go ahead with your opening statement.

PAI: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Walden, Ranking Member Eshoo, members of the subcommittee, thank you for holding this hearing.

It has been exactly one year since I last appeared before you and much has happened in the time since. Most notably, we have lost two colleagues and we have gained two new ones. Chairman

Wheeler and Commissioner O'Rielly have gotten off to strong starts and I am pleased that we are finally back at full strength.

Over the past year, we have made progress in a number of different areas, but there is much more to be done. This morning, I will touch on two of the issues that I find most pressing: the incentive auction and E-Rate reform. A fuller list of FCC priorities from cable forbearance to AM radio is detailed in my written testimony.

First, the incentive auction. Perhaps the most daunting challenge the commission faces is the looming spectrum crunch. To meet this challenges, we are focused on implementing the responsibilities that Congress gave us in the Spectrum Act, especially with respect to the broadcast incentive auction.

The incentive auction is the commission's best chance to push a large amount of spectrum, well suited for mobile broadband, into the commercial marketplace. I support Chairman Wheeler's recent announcement setting the middle of 2015 as our new target. It is more important to get the incentive auction done right than it is to get it done right now.

If, for example, any part of our software were to fail during the incentive auction, like another government website that shall not be named, the commission by law would not get a second bite at the apple. My greatest worry about the incentive auction, however, is not with the technology. It is about participation. In order for the incentive auction to be successful, we will need robust participation by both broadcasters and wireless carriers. So the commission must avoid choices that will deter participation in both the reverse auction and the forward auction.

For the reverse auction, prices paid to broadcasters should be determined by the market, not set by administrative fiat. Any attempt to restrict payments to broadcasters, including a complicated scoring scheme, will deter broadcaster participation and risk causing the incentive auction to fail.

For the forward auction, the commission should not limit carriers' ability to participate, such as by setting a spectrum cap or narrowing the spectrum screen. This would result in less spectrum for mobile broadband and less revenue to fund national priorities that this committee has identified, and a greater chance of a failed auction.

Another issue that will impact participation in the forward auction is the size of the geographic licenses to be offered. Our NPRM proposed using economic areas, but some argue that this would make it too difficult for smaller carrier to participate in the auction. Our goal should be to allow as many carriers as possible to bid, whether they be nationwide, regional or rural.

So I am pleased to see alternative proposals for license sizes, such as the newly coined partial economic areas. If technically feasible, these proposals deserve serious consideration.

Aside from the incentive auction, there are many other opportunities when it comes to spectrum, from the H block auction next month to the possible clearing of AWS-3, to the greater unlicensed use in the 5 gigahertz band. Consistent with my all-of-the-above approach, I hope we seize all of these opportunities in the near term.

The second issue I will discuss is the Universal Service Fund's schools and libraries program, better known as E-Rate. In many ways, E-Rate has been a success, as my colleague has pointed out. But it also has had difficulties. The funding process can stretch for years. Many schools and libraries feel compelled to hire outside consultants to handle all the complexities. Others don't bother applying at all.

Services like paging are prioritized over services like connecting classrooms. And there's no meaningful transparency into either the amount or the impact of E-Rate spending.

To solve these problems, I've proposed a student-centered E-Rate program. This means an up front allocation of funding and a matching requirement, so that applicants know how much money they can spend and have greater incentives to spend that money wisely. This means simplifying the application process. This means targeting funding at next-generation technologies, while still letting local schools set their own priorities. And this means making all funding and spending decisions accessible on a central website that everyone can see.

In its first year, a student-centered approach would provide an extra $1 billion for next-generation services, all without collecting an extra dime from the American people. Accordingly, I believe it would be premature to increase the program's budget. And under no circumstances should we do so without finding corresponding savings in other parts of the Universal Service Fund.

We cannot ask Americans to pay even more in their monthly phone bills, especially when median household income in this country is now lower than it was in 2007.

Thank you once again to Chairman Walden and Ranking Member Eshoo for holding this hearing. I look forward to answering your questions and continuing to work with you and my colleagues in months to come.

WALDEN: Thank you, Commissioner Pai. We appreciate your thoughtful testimony and your recommendations.

We'll now go to Commissioner O'Rielly. Welcome aboard the Federal Communications Commission. Welcome back before this committee. And you know how the rules work, so please go ahead and again thank you for being here today.

O'RIELLY: Thank you to the chairman and ranking member and members of the subcommittee.

In respect of the time of the subcommittee members, I'd like to make five points and then move on to answer your questions.

Point one, I'm truly honored to be before the subcommittee. I had the pleasure of working on the full committee staff for eight years and it was one of the greatest jobs I'll ever have. The breadth of knowledge and command of the diverse policy issues by the members of this committee are of the highest quality.

Point two, the FCC is an independent agency, not part of the executive branch. It was created by Congress and served to implement the statutes enacted by Congress. I firmly believe that our role is to follow the statute as written and not substitute our thoughts for your work. The commission has no right or authority to ignore the statute or statutory deadlines. Thankfully, I've worked on most communications policy statutes over the last 20 years and have first- hand knowledge of the intent behind many key provisions.

Point three, the commission has difficult, but exciting work ahead. If done correctly, it can have a significant positive impact on U.S. domestic product and on national productivity. Our communications companies are extremely important to the U.S. economy and we must allow them to flourish in the world marketplace. The commission's overall focus, however, must remain on the consumer.

Point four, in terms of specific items, my particular focus and attention will be on the immediate work before the commission. In the big picture, the FCC must finish rules for the incentive auctions, continue USF reform, proceed with the I.P. transition trials, and complete our media ownership proceedings.

Point five, part of the role of a FCC commissioner is to conduct outreach and provide information to the public. I take this function seriously and it's why I'm choosing to spend sometime on the issue of distracted driving caused by wireless device users. Drivers need to put away their wireless phones and focus their eyes on the drive.

Let me be clear. My view is the wireless industry is doing yeoman's work to get out the message. They're aware of the problem. They are dedicated considerable resources to finding solutions and education, and they're working hard to prevent the horrible tragedies by texting, viewing, e-mailing, tweeting, mapping, posting, among others, while driving.

It does not appear that more government regulation would be helpful in this space. Instead, I'm talking to my other colleagues to find ways to use our voice in non-regulatory, non-costly ways to educate the public and prevent senseless accidents.

Thank you.

WALDEN: You win the prize -- two minutes and 37 seconds, return.

O'RIELLY: I'm familiar with this committee very well.

(LAUGHTER)

WALDEN: Yes, indeed. Some will learn along the way.

(LAUGHTER)

We appreciate all your testimony and your recommendations. And it's just good to have all five commissioners in place, or four commissioners and chair in place. As Commissioner Pai said, it has been a year to the day, I think, since we had the commissioners here. So welcome aboard.

I know we all have a lot of questions. I'm going to -- I learned at the heels of the former chairman, Mr. Dingell, about trying to get answers at a relatively rapid rate. So I'm going to try and pose some of these, not as skillfully as he does in a yes or no format, but to the extent to which you can address them rapidly, that would be good.

And I want to start, Mr. Wheeler, with you as chairman. I know you all are voting on this NPRM today. I do want to stress it would be helpful if the public got to see that. As far as I know, you and your staffs are the only ones who see it in advance. That's one of the process issues I hope you'll break through and this maybe will be the last NPRM that's not public first.

But the commission's -- I want to follow up and figure out how you're going to permit, as your testimony indicates, airlines to choose whether to allow voice calls. And here's why I ask it. Is the commission planning to waive either the common carrier obligation to complete calls, or the net neutrality rules on blocking (inaudible) packets. Both would seem to be necessary in order to prevent voice calling from aircraft.

WHEELER: So, thank you, Mr. Chairman. So, first, to your point that -- that the MPRM that we are considering today will be complete in listing the rule -- the words of the rule...

WALDEN: Right.

WHEELER: ... that we are considering. That in -- in light with the philosophy that...

WALDEN: Thank you.

WHEELER: ... you and I share, which is, let's get it out there...

WALDEN: Right.

WHEELER: ... so that people can see it.

The purpose of this is to do just that, to put the language out so people can see it and give us their comments on it.

Now, to your specific question -- the -- the open Internet order specifically provides what's called the premises exemption. And that means that coffee shops, book stores and airlines mentioned by name are exempt from the order in that, under the definition of reasonable network management, which is one of the tools that are allowed, for premises owners -- which include airlines -- there is the ability to pick and choose exactly what comes over.

WALDEN: All right. We'll follow up more on the other piece that you might have to deal with, as well.

I want to ask you about Title 2. You've had a -- you haven't, but there's been a preceding open at the Commission for a long time that would -- the reclassification docket. Are you planning to keep that open, or are you planning to close it?

WHEELER: So, I think we're in a situation right now where we're waiting for a court opinion on exactly what our authorities are on a broad sense. And that there is no rush between now and then to make a decision on Title 2.

I will note, however, that, as you mentioned, this docket has been open for a long time. And it has not had the threatened chilling effect that some have worried about on investment in wireless and broadband infrastructure. This is an -- this is an issue that clearly is going to have to be dealt with, and we'll start with the court decision.

WALDEN: I've got about three more questions I want to try and get in here.

We understand the FCC's launched a study -- a multimarket study of critical information needs. Apparently, this study includes a qualitative media analysis, which would require interviewing reporters and editors to figure out how the media decides what news stories to run. Are these the kinds of questions that government entities should be asking of the news media? And with somebody with a journalism degree, I do get a little chill up my spine thinking about the government asking how these decisions are made.

Doesn't it have an effect on the -- doesn't it have an effect on the media that the regulatory body is even asking these questions? And how does it help you fulfill your Section 257 mandate, on which it's predicated?

WHEELER: So, I think this goes back to the root of the discussion you and I were having a moment about -- about making sure that the public understand what's going on.

The 257 requirement mandates lowering barriers to access to media for minorities, women, small business and other identified groups.

In order to make that kind of a judgment, you have to have facts. In order to have facts, you do studies. And what we did was, there is a study that has been proposed by a consulting firm that we were working with. And we put that out for public notice to exactly get the kind of input...

WALDEN: All right.

WHEELER: ... that you're suggesting.

WALDEN: All right, I...

WHEELER: And -- but it's not -- and this is -- I -- this is not an effort to influence the media. It...

WALDEN: I'm going to interrupt you just a second, because when you're spending somewhere between $209,918 -- and some of the questions of the media personnel include, "What's the news philosophy of the station?," "Who decides what stories are covered?," "What are the demographics of news management staff?," "Have you ever suggested coverage of what you consider to be a story with critical information of what consumers used?," "What was the reason given for the decision?"

These seem like really internal journalistic issues. Now, I -- I need to move on to one other, 'cause I'm actually over, but it's a very important question.

The quant -- quantile regression analysis -- QRA -- approach to providing universal support for rural companies -- that was part of the commission's U.S. (ph) reform efforts -- has had a negative impact -- negative impact on investment and the deployment of broadband services in rural America.

Commissioner Pai, you've been an advocate for the need to address this problem to ensure that rural Americans are not left behind. What do you recommend, Commissioner Pai, needs to be done with regard to the application of the QRA?

PAI: I thank you for the question, Mr. Chairman.

I've seen the problems on paper. The Obama administration's Department of Agriculture, for example, reported to us earlier this year that some 37 percent of funds from RUS are sitting on the table because there is so much uncertainty among rural carriers. And I've seen it in person from my home state of Kansas to carriers in rural Alaska, Because they are uncertain about what the future portends because of the QRA, they are not making additional investments in terms of broadband. And that creates a digital slide that we won't be able to bridge.

WALDEN: So, Chairman Wheeler, if I might, given the -- negative impact of the QRA -- that it's having on broadband development, especially in rural America, do you intend to reconsider its application?

WHEELER: Yes. As a matter of fact, I have asked the bureau to draft, and let me see, what an order that I could share with my colleagues would be to eliminate the QRA, and to return to the high- cost loop support model.

WALDEN: I appreciate that.

I've got other issues, obviously, with the F.M. translators for A.M., and delay in the rulemaking, dealing with cable operators and the groups utilized by them. And so, maybe we can follow up afterwards, but the committee's been kind to let me over-extend my questioning. But we're usually fairly flexible on that here.

So, now, I'll turn it over to the ranking member from California, Ms. Eshoo.

ESHOO: That's great. So, I have seven minutes, right, Mr. Chairman?

(LAUGHTER)

Mr. Chairman, you said that it's your 39th day. What I'd like to add to that is that I think your adult lifetime of work has brought you to this. So, it's not just your -- really, your 39th day.

WHEELER: That's been a long lifetime at this.

ESHOO: It's a -- it's a -- it's a wonderful path that has prepared you for this position.

I have a whole list of -- of niche issues, which is really the way we deal with all of these things.

First of all, do you think you're going to get a deal on cell phones unlocking by the end of this year?

WHEELER: I hope that we will be presenting to the commission today -- as a matter of fact, I know that we will be presenting to the commission today -- the voluntary agreement that has been reached with the wireless industry. And so, the answer to your question is strongly yes.

ESHOO: That's just terrific.

My second question to you, Mr. Chairman, is last week, as you know, I joined with my colleagues, Representatives Doyle and Matsui, to ask you to take action to prevent AT&T from implementing the significant rate hike for their special access customers. I appreciate what you have done in terms of the suspension, but I think that there's much more that needs to be done on special access reform.

Can we expect further action on special access reform?

WHEELER: I -- I -- I apologize, Ms. Eshoo, but I am currently recused...

ESHOO: OK.

WHEELER: ... from that proceeding, and so I...

ESHOO: I see.

So, how will it happen?

WHEELER: It's -- it moves ahead with the other members of the -- of the commission.

ESHOO: I see. Well, I'm just going to assume that they're going to -- that this area is going to be examined. Because we really have to have a -- reasonable rates for -- for this important service.

On -- Commissioner Rosenworcel, thank you for your testimony. I love the way you present things. It's so clear. You can feel the sense of urgency and why it's urgent.

How are you going to pursue getting this done at the commission? The whole issue of E-Rate, everything that's attached to it. You presented an eloquent case. And I think that -- that you gave a fantastic speech last week on -- on 911 and the problems that we have between indoor and outdoor.

So, on both that and the E-Rate -- maybe I should be asking the chairman what he plans to do on E-Rate. I know what you want to do. But maybe we should just switch over to Chairman Wheeler?

WHEELER: Well, I think on -- on E-Rate, that there is a leader in this commission. And that Commissioner...

ESHOO: We only need five.

WHEELER: Huh?

ESHOO: We only need five.

WHEELER: They -- they -- but I'm -- I -- as you all say, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of...

ESHOO: Good, good.

WHEELER: ... Mr. Rosenworcel.

ESHOO: Well, we'll look forward to you joining her in that effort. And maybe the next time the commission comes before us, you can tell us the steps that you're going to take.

On the -- on...

WHEELER: Let me -- if I can do one thing -- I am -- we are going to put out a schedule, just like we have for the incentive auction and the I.T. transition, to address this issue.

ESHOO: That's terrific.

On the challenge of the -- the indoor versus outdoor, and wireless, and 911, what's your plan to address this?

ROSENWORCEL: Well, as the old saying goes, you may only make one 911 call in your life, but it will be the most important call...

ESHOO: Right.

ROSENWORCEL: ... you ever make. And right now, if you make that call from your wire line phone, your first responder knows exactly where you are.

ESHOO: Right.

ROSENWORCEL: You make that call outdoors, in a field, using your wireless phone, we have location accuracy standards so that first responder can find you.

ESHOO: I'm asking what you want to do about where the challenge lies.

ROSENWORCEL: So...

ESHOO: We know it's working.

ROSENWORCEL: ... indoors...

ESHOO: Mm-hmm.

ROSENWORCEL: ... is the problem. We have no standards. And increasingly, households are cutting the cord. More than one third of households rely exclusively on their wireless phones. So, I don't think it's acceptable that when people make emergency calls, first responders can't find them.

I've recommended in that speech that you mentioned, that we start a rulemaking to address this. Because we've heard both from carriers...

ESHOO: Mm-hmm.

ROSENWORCEL: ... and from public safety officials on the front line that this is an issue that...

ESHOO: Well, good for you for identifying this and taking it up. Because I think one of the things that I taught my children from their earliest memory was, 911, and putting their little fingers on the keypad so that they would understand that.

ROSENWORCEL: Me, too.

ESHOO: And I think that you're absolutely right.

On -- Commissioner Pai, you made a wonderful comment -- something about not one dime more on phone bills.

I want to raise something with the -- with the -- with the chairman, going back to it, about below-the-line fees. Representatives Doyle, Lujan, Matheson, myself -- we wrote to the -- our nation's leading wire -- wireless and wireline providers, and we asked them about their practice of applying below-the-line fees on monthly bills.

I agree with Commissioner Pai. That's why I -- you know, we wrote. We have a concern about what people are paying. These things are hidden. They think that they're -- they think everything on their bill is a tax. And I have to tell you, I brought my bills in. I couldn't tell what the heck they were, who was doing what to whom, and what it was for.

So, tell me what you think the agency, or if you have -- I know there's a long list of big challenges. But these are still important issues for consumers.

What steps can the agency take under existing statute to ensure that consumers know exactly how much they're paying each month, especially prior to signing up for their service. And this whole issue of below-the-line fees.

WHEELER (?): Yeah, this -- Ms. Eshoo, this is a -- a very legitimate concern. The specific one I believe you're referencing is a re-transmission consent...

ESHOO: That too.

WHEELER (?): ... be charged -- that cable operators have just begun putting on the bill.

ESHOO: Right.

WHEELER (?): And -- and I say just begun. And I'm trying to get our arms around that and figure out just exactly what our authorities are to answer your question.

It -- it does, however, strike me that it fits right in the broader issues that the chairman and Mr. Upton and others have talked about in terms of the kinds of issues that need to be addressed in a Telecom Act re-write here, is just what is going on.

ESHOO: Yeah, but that will be like seven years from now.

WHEELER (?): If all of the sudden -- well, no -- but I -- I think that...

WALDEN: Oh no.

ESHOO: Oh well, well.

(LAUGHTER)

WALDEN: I won't speak.

ESHOO: Let's see.

WALDEN: I won't get cross-wise between you and the chairman.

ESHOO: OK. Yeah, oh no.

Thank you. That you, Mr. Chairman and thank you, Chairman Walden.

WALDEN (?): Thank you.

ESHOO: And thank you to the entire commission.

I wanna say also, a welcome to the whole new team that has come in. And we wish you well, we really do. And the chairman and the commission will operate at a higher level because of the high level of people that have come in to support the works. So congratulations to each one of you.

WALDEN: We now move on to the vice chair of the full -- of the subcommittee, Mr. Latta from Ohio for five minutes.

LATTA: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, again, thanks very much for our commission members for being with us today.

And this question I would like to ask all of you. And this question is the incentive auction legislation prohibits the FCC from excluding qualified bidders from the auction.

Unfortunately while the incentive auction process works its way up to the commission, it appears that the wireless bureau is simultaneously working on the spectrum aggregation docket to achieve the de facto of (ph) spectrum caps.

Will you commit to -- to allowing any interested bidder that complies with the statutory requirements to participate fully in the auction? And, Chairman, if I could start with you? Because I notice in your -- in your testimony, page six that, you know, you talk about the incentive auction, you had said that you're looking at voluntary market oriented approach. So if I could start with you.

WHEELER: The statute is quite explicit in that regard that the commission may not exclude somebody from participating.

LATTA: Also on just aggregating, so it would be like -- it would be wide open for everyone to be involved in that?

WHEELER: Well, it's interesting, what's been developing here, I mean, the -- the CEO of the AT&T recently came out with a statement saying, "Wait a minute, I -- I think I would like to have rules to make sure that not one party can run away with all the spectrum."

So I think that in between those positions is -- is where -- a reality exist. But the statute, I agree, is quite clear.

The statute says that -- that you would not exclude anybody and the statute also says that the commission will design an auction so as to promote economic opportunity and competition and consumer choice to sustain a healthy wireless marketplace. And we'll do both.

LATTA: Madam Clyburn?

CLYBURN: Yes, Section 64:04 is clear that any party that abides -- obeys the rules, that they are qualified to participate. It also makes clear that the commission has the authority to enforce and introduce general -- rules of general applicability that will allow for spectrum aggregation in order to promote competition.

So again, my colleague mentioned that, you know, part of the reason for -- I think, for some of the robust participation and -- and the type of ideas that we're seeing it's because we took a dual path. On the same day we released the rules, or recent -- release the notice of oppose rule making on incentive auction, we also released a notice of propose rule-makings on trying to glean information about this dual path.

So I -- I think that this, in the long run, will help and improve our information -- information dissemination and acquisition and -- and rule-making once we decide on -- on a clear path forward.

LATTA: Thank you.

Commissioner?

ROSENWORCEL: The Middle Class Tax Relief and Job Creation Act says that we can have rules of general applicability, but we cannot exclude anyone from participation in the auction. I think it's easy and simple, we just have to follow the law.

LATTA: Commissioner Pai?

PAI: I would agree with my colleague and I would also point out that if you look at the end goal which is to have a successful auction that pushes out a lot of spectrum, it yields sufficient revenue to fund national priorities, and that provides a fairness to all parties involved, then we should not, preclusively, deter participation from wireless carriers by -- in adopting unduly strict spectrum policies.

LATTA: Commissioner O'Rielly?

O'RIELLY: I wanna thank my colleagues for say -- stating that the statute is clear because as many people who worked on it, it was a -- an effort to give the commission some authority in this space when members couldn't come to agreement.

I'm extremely hesitant to impose limitations on Spectrum Act, because we have certain obligations under the statute otherwise. We -- in a nice way, I -- I mean, the money has already been spent.

We have already spent the -- the money from the Spectrum Act and so we have obligations to provide $7 billion for FirstNet and we have deficit reduction numbers that -- that have already gone out the door.

So I'm worried about anything that would depress auction revenues. I'm -- I'm certainly aware of the statute and I want to remain open to considering but I'm -- I'm hesitant at this time to impose any type of limitation.

LATTA: Thank you. And many of you know that Roll Call completion has been an ongoing issue in my district. And I commend the FCC for producing the November 8 order and further notice propose rule-making to improve the commission's ability to monitor the delivery of calls to rural areas by mandating certain recording retention and recording requirements from carriers.

And Commissioner Pai, do you believe the November 8 order will resolve the Call completion problem, or does more need to be done?

PAI: Well, Congressman, I certainly hope that it will, whether it's in Toledo or Topeka, we need to figure out where the kink in the system is, whether it is in our media providers, whether it's the Last Mile (ph), what point of the network is failing.

And then, if it's a technical problem, then we can take steps to fix that technical problem. But if (inaudible) then the FCC needs to be empowered to take corrective action. So I certainly support taking the appropriate action soon, rather than later on (inaudible).

LATTA: Thank you very much. Mr. Chairman, I see my time has expired and I yield back.

WALDEN: Thank the gentleman. We now turn to the ranking member of the full committee, Mr. Waxman, for five minutes.

WAXMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, I just want to indicate that under the act, the FCC may not single out a specific provider for exclusion from a system of competitive bidding.

At the same time, the FCC is permitted to adopt and enforce rules of general applicability that promote competition. Even AT&T recently acknowledged they would support rules that limit the amount of spectrum any one company could acquire as long as the rules applied evenly to all auction participants.

Chairman Wheeler, as you know I'm a strong supporter of the FCC's open Internet rules, because I believe the Internet must remain an open platform for innovation and commerce.

You've emphasized the importance of the open -- open Internet order, at the same time, you recently made comments suggesting that an Internet service provider could charge a content provider, such as Netflix, a fee, in order to guarantee the best available transmission speed.

Do you see these type of business arrangements as consistent with the FCC's open Internet rules that you support?

WHEELER: Thank you, Mr. Waxman for -- for raising that issue because it gives me an opportunity to get more specific than I was in Ohio.

I am a strong supporter of the open Internet rules, full stop. The rules were written in such a way as to envision opportunities for innovation and experimentation and to impose on them a balance between protecting the open Internet, protecting consumers and stimulating innovation.

New ideas, under the -- under the open Internet order, new ideas such as those you've referenced in a wireless environment, particularly, are not prohibited. But there is a clear responsibility for the commission to make sure that what takes place does not interfere with Internet access, is not anti-competitive and does not provide preferential treatment. And we will enforce that. We -- we will maintain the balance between innovation and assuring there is an open Internet.

WAXMAN: I appreciate your expanding on that issue.

While, network infrastructure and technology have changed since the passage of the 1996 Telecommunications Act, the values embedded in the act have not.

And Mr. Chairman, I know the commission will soon begin a process to collect real-world information and data on the I.P. transitions. How will the commission continue to advance the long standing goals of competition, universal access and consumer protection throughout this transition process?

WHEELER: You know, Mr. Waxman, there are many people who have described the -- the trials, the I.P. trials as -- as a technology trial. I -- I don't think they were technology trial.

We know how to build I.P. networks. They are exactly what you just raised, they're values trial. They are how do we make sure that the values that for 100 years, Americans have come to expect from their networks, continue even after the way in which that network operates changes.

That's what we're gonna be looking for in these trials. It's not whether the Gazintas and the Gazoutas work. We know that -- that can get taken care of. It is what are the values -- what -- what -- how do you preserve the values in the new technological environment.

WAXMAN: Commissioner Rosenworcel, do you wanna add anything to that.

ROSENWORCEL: I think -- I think there are so many exciting things that can come with new networks and I think we should embrace the future rather than reject it.

So I think experimenting in these kind of trials is the smart way to go. But as we move into the future, what we do has to be informed by the values that have always been a part communications policy.

And I see four, public safety, universal access, competition and consumer protection.

WAXMAN: Thank you.

Commissioner O'Rielly, I appreciate your appeal to bipartisanship in your testimony. I know you played an important role in helping us get this bipartisan legislation in the passage of the Public Safety and Spectrum Act last year, because you helped negotiate the provisions in the availability of unlicensed spectrum in the broadcast incentive auction.

What's your perspective on unlicensed spectrum generally? And do you think the commission is on the right track in balancing the availability of unlicensed and licensed bands?

O'RIELLY: Yes, I'm a strong proponent of unlicensed spectrum. I'm always amazed at what the innovators and the experimenters can do with unlicensed spectrum. I think there's great opportunity in the 600 megahertz for more unlicensed spectrum. The NPRM that was put out in this situation proposed a number of different ideas where unlicensed could fit. They proposed channel 37, the guard bands -- if there are going to be guard bands, depending on what our band plan looks like.

We talked about wireless microphones. There's going to be still white space, at least in the 500, maybe in the 600 as well. And then there's going to be residual conversions depending if you're talking about converting from six megahertz broadcast channels to five megahertz wireless channels.

So, there should be opportunities in the incentive auction after our rules are complete for unlicensed spectrum. And I'm strongly supportive of those. The only difficulty is figuring out how big those guard bands should be.

WAXMAN: OK. Thank you.

And my last question is to Commissioner Pai. You stated in your testimony that 92 percent of Americans now can choose from 10 or more wire-line competitors. If that number is accurate, doesn't it demonstrate that the pro-competitive policies of the '96 Telecom Act are working? And don't you believe we should continue to support a marketplace that gives non-incumbents a fair chance to compete?

PAI: Congressman Waxman, thank you for the question.

I think what the multiplicity of choices that consumers enjoy today demonstrates is that an I.P. environment where you have -- conversion is something that we only dreamed about during the '96 act, where you have telephone companies competing with cable companies, competing with wireless companies and others to provide the same services, that we can now rely in a way we could not in 1996 on the marketplace and technological innovation to drive consumer choice.

And so to the extent that there are values of competition embedded in the 1996 act, I of course embrace those. But I think we also need to be mindful of the fact that technology can quite often out-pace where laws and regulations are. And that appears to be where we are with respect to the I.P. ...

(CROSSTALK)

WAXMAN: But do you think we should support a marketplace that gives non-incumbents a fair chance to compete?

PAI: Oh, absolutely. I think the marketplace should give every competitor a fair chance to compete.

WAXMAN: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: I now turn to the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Rogers.

ROGERS: Thank you very much. And as the representative of Michigan State University, I want to say thank you for giving me a great weekend.

(LAUGHTER)

I do find it suspicious, however, that my phone has not worked since the game. I wonder if you might be looking into that for me, Mr. Chairman.

(LAUGHTER)

The FCC's recent Communications, Security, Reliability and Interoperability Council meeting, I understand you talked about the need to apply metrics and evaluate cybersecurity. Can you elaborate on that for me?

WHEELER: Yeah, the CSRIC, which is the shorthand for the group you're talking about, has done a terrific job in using the multi- stakeholder process to come up with rules on botnets, on DNSSEC, on router security -- important kinds of network security issues. But it's not enough just to say, "OK, here are the rules," and then walk away. The question is: Are the rules working?

And so what I've asked CSRIC to do, not for us to impose, but in the multi-stakeholder process, is to say, "How do you establish metrics to know if this is working?" Because that's the -- you know, this is the trust-but-verify kind of a situation.

ROGERS: Well, how do you find those -- how are they -- how are you working through that process to define metrics in threats that change literally by the hour?

WHEELER: But -- so on those three issues, for instance, on botnets, for instance, how can you track the movement of where botnets are going? They seem to have moved into data centers, for instance. And what do we know about that and what might that suggest. And -- and what are we seeing in terms of -- of results of the implementation of the kinds of things that CSRIC has suggested.

That's what we need to know.

ROGERS: So, and if you find that out and you find that you are in some disagreement with industry on meeting those standards, do you foresee a regulatory scheme?

WHEELER: Well, I wouldn't want to, you know, to presume a hypothetical. I would hope that we would be working with industry to identify what needs to be done. And much like we are going to announce today on cell phone unlocking, when we sat with industry and said, "Here's a problem, it's got to be solved." And by the way, we'll have metrics on that.

I think that's the preferable first approach and that's the approach that we're taking with CSRIC.

ROGERS: But when you say that, does that -- does that mean -- if I hear you correctly, that means you're at least contemplating a regulatory scheme of some sort beyond just the voluntary "here's our metrics; try to...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: That's the right question, but it's not -- the key word is "contemplating." I've talked repeatedly about what I called the "seesaw" -- the regulatory seesaw: You do this; we don't need to do this.

And so what CSRIC is doing is saying: "OK, here are the kinds of things that need to be done." I said, "Let's measure them (inaudible), because the result is that we don't." If the seesaw has to tip, it has to tip, but it only tips on the basis of need, not the basis of theory.

ROGERS: If I understood your answer right, there's a possibility you could regulate -- always a possibility. Sure. OK, we should have lots of conversations on that. I worry that by the time you process your regulatory framework, you're too late. You've missed the boat. The threat changes...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: I could not agree more. The challenge of networks and the reason why the multi-stakeholder process is preferred is because it is much more dynamic, much more flexible, moves much quicker than a regulatory process can. And then can stay flexible. And that's why I'm trying to say, "Yes, this is the preferred process to deal with it."

ROGERS: So you're not going to move away from the council.

WHEELER: I'm sorry?

ROGERS: You're not going to move away from the council model for regulation. You're going to continue to...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: The multi-stakeholder process on this is the right way to go.

ROGERS: Yes, perfect.

Can you talk about Team Telecom? It's an important complement to the CIFIUS process in terms of preventing investments or I.T. equipment purchases to prevent certainly a threat to our national security interests like Chinese attempts to gain control of I.T. and telecommunication nodes in the United States. Can you walk us through where you're at on that and give us an idea of what's your thinking?

WHEELER: Well, when issues come before the commission relative to mergers, acquisitions, whatever the case may be, the input from Team Telecom is always sought and taken into account, and is crucially important.

ROGERS: Do you see an improvement to that process? Can we do something different? You have a limited set of -- once that report comes back, you have a limited set of decisions you can make. You're either in, you're out or you disagree with the decision.

WHEELER: Correct.

ROGERS: Is there something better we should be doing there, providing some authority for you all to be -- given, again, the nature of the changing technology and how fast the changes...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: I would -- I -- I have not had to live through one of these yet, so I'm probably not qualified to opine here on the fly. I'd love to look into this and to have a discussion with you about it.

ROGERS: Super. We're looking at some reforms to CIFIUS to try to make sure we're keeping up and I look forward to dialogue...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: Great. I look forward to that.

ROGERS: Thank you very much for being here.

WALDEN: I thank the gentleman.

We now turn to committee chairman emeritus, Mr. Dingell, also from Michigan, I believe, for five minutes. Go ahead.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, I commend you for this very important hearing. And I have no comments on football or other matters.

(LAUGHTER)

I want to welcome my old friend Chairman Wheeler to the committee. We look forward to great things from you. I'm satisfied you will serve with distinction.

I want to also welcome Commissioner O'Rielly.

And I want to commend Commissioner Clyburn for her fine services as acting chairwoman. Quite frankly, your daddy would be very proud.

My questions this morning will be directed solely at Chairman Wheeler and will elicit, as you will not be surprised to hear, yes or no responses.

Chairman Wheeler, I'd like to start with the reverse auction of broadcast frequencies authorized by the Middle Class Tax Relief and Job Creation Act. I note you recently announced that the commission will not conduct such an auction until 2015. That gives you an extra year.

In the meantime, do you expect to complete negotiations concerning the relocation of broadcast frequencies with Canada, Mexico and our border areas? Yes or no.

WHEELER: No, but I'm very hopeful that we will be able to move it forward. And as DTV showed, you don't have to have the signature on the page.

DINGELL: And you know -- you know that that can cause an awful lot of viewers to lose service and an awful lot of screens to go dark in our part of the country.

Chairman Wheeler, similarly, paragraph 15 of the commission's notice of proposed rulemaking for the incentive auction states, quote, "The commission expects interested parties will have an opportunity for meaningful comment on all specific repackaging methodologies it is considering before it makes a decision." Does the commission publicly commit to sharing with the public the broadcast frequency repacking methodology it adopts, as well as the variables and other inputs it may use to predict repackaging results? Yes or no.

WHEELER: I'll go beyond yes and say absolutely.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Chairman, let's move on to the forward auction of broadcast frequencies. Section 6403(c) of the Middle Class Tax Relief and Job Creation Act provides the commission may not grant licenses through forward auction, reassign or reallocate broadcast frequencies or remote spectrum usage rights unless it proceeds -- unless the proceeds of the forward auction are greater than the following three factors combined of, first, the total amount of compensation the commission must pay successful bidders in the reverse auction; the costs of conducting a forward auction; and the estimated costs for the commission to pay for broadcaster reallocations.

In addition, it is in the public interest that the commission ensure the auction raises a significant amount of money in order to help build out of the first debt (ph).

Together, these constitute a significant pressure on the commission to raise sufficient revenues to accomplish these objectives, do they not?

Yes or no?

WHEELER: Yes.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Chairman, at the end will the commission adopt transparent and simple rules to encourage participation by the broadest group of wireless providers in the forward auction? Yes or no?

WHEELER: Yes.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, it's -- let's focus our attention on intelligent transportation systems. This is of considerable importance to my part of the country and our principal industries, and the five gigahertz band.

Given that the commission licensed ITS almost 15 years ago, it is -- is it reasonable to say that it would be premature for the commission to authorize unlicensed use of the 5850-5925 megahertz band before the studies are completed that confirm such use would not cause harmful interference with ITS services and other incumbent users. Yes or no?

WHEELER: Yes, and let me go further. We will not authorize if there's harmful interference.

DINGELL: I am very comforted that you are here this morning, Mr. Chairman.

Now, Chairman Wheeler, do you believe that the commission should approve unlicensed use of the 5850-5925 megahertz band before definitively establishing no risk of harmful interference with ITS systems or practical strategies to mitigate such risk? Yes or no.

WHEELER: No. And I repeat, we'll do nothing that causes harmful interference.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Chairman, ordinately (ph) is the commission considering moving forward with rulemaking opening up only the 5350 megahertz band for unlicensed use? Yes or no?

WHEELER: So this is where I need to just ask a question, sir. The answer is yes, if it is are we considering. The answer is no, if we have decided.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Chairman, I'd like to commend you for your work in advancing the transition to I.P. based networks. Will the commission consider an order in January 2014 that will address geographic trials as well as how to protect in the best way consumers using I.P. based networks? Yes or no.

WHEELER: Yes.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, you have been most gracious to me, and I thank you for this. Mr. Chairman, your comments have been most enlightening and helpful. I want to thank you and the members of the commission for your presence and assistance to us this morning.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: Thank you very much.

The gentleman yields back, and the chair now recognizes for five minutes Mr. Guthrie.

GUTHRIE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate that.

Chairman Wheeler, and welcome to the FCC also.

Mr. O'Rielly (ph), let me say happy new year.

And, Commissioner Clyburn, again I echo the good work that you did in your -- your time as chairwoman.

But is -- there seems to be a lot of progress being made -- this is to Chairman Wheeler -- a lot of progress being made to free up the 1755-1780 hertz band for commercial use, megahertz band.

And I know the FCC has already sought comment on how this band should be used for commercial purposes.

Is the FCC on track to auction the 1755-1780 band, paired with the 2155-2180 band? And, if so, when will it occur?

WHEELER: So, the answer is yes, we are on track. There are some issues that still have to be worked out with NTI and DOD and -- and some other...

(CROSSTALK)

GUTHRIE: ... impediments...

WHEELER: But I think -- I'm sorry, what?

GUTHRIE: Are there some impediments that you can identify that are -- that -- you're on track, but you say there are some impediments.

WHEELER: I think these are just implementational kinds of things in -- in their agreement.

But to be specific to your question, I would hope that we could do it in the September time frame.

GUTHRIE: September time frame. Great.

Well, then, you've spent some time in the -- in the wireless industry, I know, and have seen firsthand how spectrum demand has grown exponentially. I realize that a lot of your short-term focus is on the incentive auction, on the 1755-1780 megahertz.

But, looking forward, what is the FCC doing to plan for future spectrum demand? And how can the FCC ensure that there continues to be a pipeline of new spectrum to satisfy what consumers want, the insatiable demand for band width anywhere, anytime?

So, looking, again, how do you plan for future spectrum demand beyond this? What kind of thoughts do you have beyond this...

WHEELER: Sure.

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: First, we say yea and verily to what you and Ms. Matsui have -- have done.

Applying the incentive auction concepts to government spectrum, I'm a believer that by the time that you peel everything away, it comes down to economics, no matter who you are.

GUTHRIE: Right.

WHEELER: And the economics of an agency where they can get cash to help them fulfill their mission is an important kind of decision they should make. And you've -- you've created, with Ms. Matsui, have created a structure where this can happen.

GUTHRIE: Well, we looked at that in our -- in our working group, and it just -- it's a lot of work for these agencies to do that. It's not something you can just wish away, as I learned more and more about it.

And I always say I didn't run around Kentucky saying, "Send me to Washington and I'll deliver you spectrum," and so you get -- you learn things when you get elected that you never thought you would deal with, that I found just fascinating, because, as I said, my consumers, my constituents, demand it. They want fast and -- the fast bandwidth.

WHEELER: But it's also interesting...

GUTHRIE: But it is true that we have to, we're looking at it just by law, by fiat, say you have to release spectrum. I mean, you could get numbers, well, it's gonna cost this, it's gonna cost that.

And so, it does give them a reason to go in and make this happen.

WHEELER: And the interesting thing is, so -- so I was involved in the negotiation for ADUMS 1 (ph), back in the year 2000. In the first negotiation with the Department of Defense.

And we kept saying to them, "but you're gonna get money." And they kept saying, "But we can't spend it, because it goes to the general treasury."

GUTHRIE: Right.

WHEELER: And so, what you have done is set up a structure to help compensate people. And the -- and the beauty of it is that what it does is that it -- creates a cash flow for them to be able to meet their new needs and to be able to upgrade their equipment.

And so, it's a winning situation all around.

GUTHRIE: I think -- Mrs. Matsui, I think yesterday you said win- win-win I think is -- it does for the consumers, for the agencies and for the taxpayers.

So beyond -- so the -- so in the future, what are you kind of looking at, do you think should happen, just for bandwidth and more spectrum as we move off -- move into the future?

WHEELER: I'm sorry, sir?

GUTHRIE: I mean, just as we move on into the -- beyond the immediate auctions and things, what other things do you think we can do to free spectrum?

WHEELER: Well, I think we have -- I mean -- so, first of all, we're constantly looking at how do you get the more efficient, most efficient use out of -- of the spectrum?

One of the more interesting things that we're going to be running a test on is what do you do with spectrum sharing, because there's probably -- not -- there is, in a digital world, the opportunity to -- to share spectrum. But our spectrum allocations were set up with analog assumptions.

And so, if we can share it, re-use it, it's a great opportunity, and we need to be pursuing that as well.

GUTHRIE: Yeah, a great metaphor that I always thought was -- you don't have any lane on a highway dedicated just for emergency vehicles. But when emergency vehicles come down the highway, people get out of the way.

And I think that's a great metaphor for that.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I yield back 15 seconds.

WALDEN: The chair recognizes the gentlelady from California for five minutes.

MATSUI: Thank you very much.

And let me just follow up on my partner's questions here.

I know back in the day, you were looking at the use of federal spectrum. And I think it's a concept now that has finally come to the point where we can actually do something about it.

And I believe that this is a way to really encourage the federal agencies to relinquish the noncritical spectrum. And as Congressman Guthrie says, it's not easy to do. But we worked with DOD, and when we made a lot of progress.

Now, I am also looking at what Commissioner Rosenworcel has also always said, about using the carrot-and-stick approach regarding the federal spectrum holders, and having them relinquish their spectrum.

Now, in your view, and I also want Chairman Wheeler to comment on this, too, are the financial incentives identified in the bill adequate to encourage federal agencies to relinquish noncritical spectrum?

And I think I'll go for you first, Chairman Wheeler.

WHEELER: I don't know the answer to that, because I haven't market tested it, you know. And I think that the -- is this enough incentive is a market test question.

So I'm gonna, with all due respect, punt.

What's important is the concept that has been developed. And it would seem to me that -- that once that concept is -- is codified, that then making sure that incentives are adequate is, frankly, the easier lift on the whole exercise.

MATSUI: Right. Thank you.

Commissioner Rosenworcel?

ROSENWORCEL: Thank you for the question.

I think, first of all, that the legislation that you and Congressman Guthrie have introduced is terrific. The demand on our airwaves is going up, and the supply of unencumbered spectrum is going down. It's time to be creative. This legislation is creative.

As far as the incentives go, I think it's a good starting point for conversation. Because right now, federal agencies, by some measures, have veto control over about 60 percent of our airwaves. They use their spectrum. They're mission focused, to protect our national defense, to keep our planes in the sky, to tell us what weather patterns are coming.

But they don't have structural incentives to be efficient with it. Your bill is the start of a conversation about how we should apply those incentives and if we get them right, we will have a catalyst for a lot more spectrum for new mobile broadband uses, which would be terrific thing for the economy.

MATSUI: Great. Thank you very much.

Chairman Wheeler, you've emphasized how important it is for you to lead the FCC in fact-based decision making.

In the five gigahertz proceeding, for example, this committee is looking to the FCC's engineering expertise to determine the conditions under which Wi-Fi could use a band in a way that protects the missions of federal systems and commercial systems.

How are you and your staff planning on responding to the challenge? And is this proceeding a priority for the commission?

WHEELER: So, as Commissioner O'Rielly said, I would associate myself with -- with his comment, that he's a strong supporter of -- of unlicense (ph).

The key, of course, is that you need to make sure that there's no harmful interference, as I discussed with Mr. Dingell. But I believe that if you take a look at the five gigahertz, and you look at block 1 -- NII 1 (ph). That we should be moving to ruling on that, which is something that Commissioner Pai has -- has often suggested. That when you look at -- at band two, which is DOD, and band four, which is ITS, that we have to address the questions that I was addressing with Mr. Dingell, and that is, to make sure there is no harmful interference, and there's nothing in the record that really gets to that at this point in time. But we need to build that record.

MATSUI: OK, fine. Thank you very much.

And I have to ask a broadband adoption question here. The FCC has, Chairman Wheeler, implemented broadband adoption pilots as part of the lifeline reform measures. Can you explain what the FCC plans to do here? And what is the goal of these pilot projects?

WHEELER: So, there are 14 projects that are taking place around the country that we're funding with some of the savings that we've had in other parts of the -- of the program. And we're going to be looking at, for instance, what is the impact of a lifeline-like subsidy on broadband adoption? And we're going to be looking at what are the kinds of training issues to help people understand what broadband can do for them, and the kinds of things that they can do, once they get on the Internet? Because those seem to go part and parcel. It's not just that you can access it, but also, that you can use it and you understand why you ought to be using it.

MATSUI: So, are you going to use this information (ph) to develop a responsible permanent broadband adoption program?

WHEELER: That's the goal. We're develop -- this is -- these are trials to inform our future actions. And broadband -- wireless broadband and broadband adoption are kind of the sine qua non of what the agency does.

MATSUI: I thank you.

I yield back my time.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back her time, and the chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas for five minutes.

BARTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I want to make a comment on the audience. This one's a lot bigger than the one upstairs with the joint hearing. And they seem to be more interested, too. So, I guess that's a...

(LAUGHTER)

... credit to this subcommittee and the -- and the FCC commissioners.

We have the NRCC commissioners -- not NRC -- NRC.

(LAUGHTER)

WALDEN (?): I think you need to be clear on that one.

BARTON: That would be news, wouldn't it? If Greg Walden was testifying upstairs?

Anyway, I just have one question.

The Middle Class Tax Relief and Job Creation Act requires repackaging (ph) and auctioning of the 65 megahertz of spectrum in the low-powered TV stations, of which there are hundreds, if not thousands, are not guaranteed continued existence. But Chairman, this subcommittee and myself have a bill that we hope to introduce very soon.

While it doesn't guarantee them any additional rights, it does create, I hope, a pathway, so that they may continue to -- to exist.

As the new chairman of the commission, Mr. Wheeler, do you have any thoughts on what might be done to -- to give our low-powered TV industry a chance to continue to exist?

WHEELER: Thank you, Mr. Barton. Yes. And they probably fall in three -- three buckets.

One, there's been a lot of talk about following the statute. And -- and, as you point out, the statute says that LPTV translators are secondary services. We -- that's what the statute says.

Second is, we have actually opened a -- a public notice on the delivery of the content of LPTVs. How do we make sure that -- that the content -- and this ends up being more of a digital technology question than anything else. And how do you -- how do you use digital technology to get the content out? Because that's the consumer protection issue here -- to make sure the consumer gets the -- the content.

And then the -- the third point here is that there may be a safeguard in the reality that rural areas don't have that great demand for spectrum for wireless services to begin with. And so, they may be operating in areas where there will be less pressure to get spectrum. But we will find out as we go through this process.

BARTON: Mr. -- Commissioner O'Rielly, you're the new kid on the block, so to speak. You haven't had a chance publicly to comment on this issue. Do you have any thoughts about low-powered TV and what might be done to help them continue to exist?

O'RIELLY: Well, the chairman's right in the sense -- and you are right to introduce legislation and working for the members on the Spectrum Act. There was a decision made by the members to not protect low-power translators. And your legislation -- I would defer to your legislation to -- to whether they may resolve that.

You -- I know you and I had a chance to talk. I know some of the low-power representatives have argued it may be beneficial financially to the government to participate. I -- I'm not sure, and I don't know if it's accurate, but we have heard that argument, as well, and probably something we'd have to explore.

BARTON: That's my only question, Mr. Chairman. With that, I yield back.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back the balance of his time. And the chair now recognizes the gentleman from Utah for five minutes.

MATHESON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I appreciate all the commissioners taking the time to be here today. I think this is a very informative hearing.

First, Chairman Wheeler, in my city Utah, we have over 750 active translators that relay signals to many rural communities that rely on broadcast television to obtain their newscasts or public service announcements (ph) and entertainment.

Now, with the increased reliance on mobile data, there's no doubt that we need to take steps to move forward to making more spectrum available. I've heard concerns that the spectrum repackaging that could result in the incentive auctions could have a negative impact on those rural communities that tend to be more dependent on broadcast television. What steps is the FCC taking to protect these viewers from possible negative impacts?

WHEELER: Well, Congressman, the -- the -- the first issue is how threatened should they feel? And the fact that they are living in rural areas, where there is less of a demand for mobile spectrum may end up being a de facto shield for them.

Secondly is, as the statute says, this is a secondary service. It does not have protection. So, the question is, how do you protect consumers, as you're suggesting, who rely on it.

That's why we've had a public notice and are seeking comments on the question of how do you get what the translator or LPTV station does in terms of content out? And how does new technology fit into that, such as digital use of the airwaves, or whatever the case may be?

But this is clearly an issue where -- where we need to be focusing on what's the effect on the consumer, rather than what's the effect on the transmission need (ph). Because you have told us how we should look at that transition.

MATHESON: I appreciate that response.

There's been a lot of back and forth on how the incentive options should be structured. I think most would agree it's imperative we maximize participation, both with reverse auctions and the forward auctions. But, Chairman Wheeler, I was wondering, what do you see as the best way for us to maximize participation, and also, revenue for the federal government in both of those options?

WHEELER: You know, I -- before I took this job, I was in the business of doing business deals. And I think that's what we're talking about right here. This is a business transaction that someone who has a license needs to make it a business decision about. And -- and how do you do that? Well, I -- and what's our role.

First of all, we need to make sure that we're getting relevant information on a timely basis into the hands of those parties to make that decision. And that's why we've scheduled the -- the auction plan. We're saying in January, we're going to begin laying out exactly what that kind of information needs to be.

Secondly, I think it's incumbent on us to have an outreach program, in which we make sure that small and large broadcasters understand how the system -- how the program's going to work, what the economics could be, and maybe even begin to think in terms of what economic models might look like. Because at the end of the day, what we're really doing is, we're -- we're saying we want the marketplace to make a decision as to what is the highest and best use of spectrum. And the marketplace can't make that kind of decision until it's informed. So, it is incumbent on us to make sure that that kind of information is in a timely manner available to those, and to help with that process.

MATHESON: Commissioner Rosenworcel, I have a question for you about the ConnectEd program. You mentioned it briefly in your opening testimony. And you also mentioned that the current E-Rate program has some bureaucratic inefficiencies built into it right now.

What can the commission do to maximize efficiency to get more bang for the buck? What can you do with your existing authority, or what do you need for Congress to do to change it to also increase those efficiencies?

ROSENWORCEL: Thank you very much for the question.

I think this program is really important, and reinvigorating it is really important for education, infrastructure, and the economy.

I think we can do more with this program just as it is. As my colleague, Commissioner Pai, noted, we do subsidize a whole bunch of old-fashioned services right now. We should phase those out over time, and focus instead on capacity and bandwidth.

And, like you mentioned, we need to reduce bureaucracy. Bureaucracy gets in the way of small and often rural schools from participating in this program.

I'd like to see us encourage greater use of consortia to improve bulk buying power, and also, have multi-year applications to reduce the administrative burden on schools that do participate.

MATHESON: I appreciate that.

Mr. Chairman, I'll yield back.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back, and the chair now recognizes for five minutes the gentleman from Nebraska.

TERRY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And let me begin by thanking former Acting Chair Clyburn. And during your tenure as acting chair, you finished the low-power FM, and you guys did a wonderful job on it. You really did. And I want to thank all of you for that.

But former acting chair, just now Member Clyburn...

CLYBURN: The commissioner formerly known as...

(CROSSTALK)

(LAUGHTER)

TERRY: Yeah, that works. And you can have a sign for your name now.

But you were extremely communicative. I love the way you'd reach out to us. And frankly, you were so extraordinary, that I think every chairman, including the new one, should model themselves after that. We -- we don't -- it's very rare that we see that level of communication, so I just want to thank all of you.

This really is a great board. You guys are really serious about the real issues. And I like how you filter out the politics that surrounds all of this. Keep it up.

The next -- I know that the quantile regression analysis has already been discussed to some point, but I just want to let you know that that's been a long-time concern for me. I think some of the concerns that we had that it could actually displace or retard capital investment in rural America, when this is all about getting resources and capital into rural America because of its high cost. And so it really needs to be reviewed.

And Chairman Wheeler, I appreciate -- I've been told your comments on the record here today is that you understand this problem. I'll invite you and all the commissioners out to rural Nebraska. You land in my district and then we go there. But it really is becoming a problem. I have -- there's one provider in Diller, Nebraska that we have used as the model for responsible rural telecom because there are businesses there that now have high speed and they're using it to monetize their businesses there, where they truly are a worldwide business, not just the two blocks of Diller.

But there's a wind farm that they are having trouble -- the wind farm that wants to go there, that needs a broadband hookup and they're saying, "With our cap, we don't have the money; we aren't allowed to use that money in that way." So it's having serious effects. It's just not that one house that's 30 miles (inaudible) and, you know, line in and out. It's really hurting rural economic development. So I want (inaudible).

And then in my two minutes left, I want to ask the real question. And to Chairman Wheeler, and if either of the commissioners wish to step in, but I want to ask about a rule that concerns the video market. Many of us are worried that the price of cable subscriptions -- and I'll tell you that's an often and frequent call to my congressional office.

And the current market for video is seeing an expansion in the scope of current law wasn't necessarily intended to address; that the FCC has defined "buying group" of NVPDs for the purpose of program access rules in a way that excludes the NCTC, essentially the only buying group out there.

So, are there plans by the commission to look into this, to maybe change it? Do you think that the NCTC should be excluded from this process?

Chairman Wheeler?

WHEELER: Thank you, Mr. Terry.

I've just become aware of the issues that have been raised about this, and want to get all over it, and would ask that we be able to get back to you with what the answer is. We are now aware and will be dealing with it.

TERRY: Any of the commissioners have concerns about NCTC being excluded from this rule?

Hearing none, Mr. Pai, you actually had an expression.

(LAUGHTER)

PAI: No good expression goes unpunished.

(LAUGHTER)

No, I mean, I supported the notice that teed up a lot of the questions. And we teed up a lot of different questions (inaudible) paragraph 84 (inaudible) that order, out-lifted all the issues under consideration. And I look forward to working with Chairman Wheeler and my colleagues to ensure that the FCC takes the appropriate action to ensure that (inaudible).

TERRY: Right, and others nodded.

Mr. O'Rielly, also known as the new guy.

(CROSSTALK)

O'RIELLY: The new guy, yes. I would have to agree with Chairman Wheeler. I don't have as much information on this and I look to get up to speed on it, so I apologize that I don't.

TERRY: Yield back.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back the balance of his time.

And the chair now recognizes the gentleman from New Mexico for five minutes.

LUJAN: Mr. Chairman, thank you very much.

And Chairman Wheeler, welcome today; to all the commissioners, welcome.

Again, as we're announcing former positions and posts, Commissioner Clyburn, I know that you're very welcome here today. It's great to hear the recognition from my colleagues with your leadership and your work.

And I don't want to speak for former Public Utility Commissioner Ray Baum either, but I'm going to invoke his name a bit. It's good to have another fellow utility commissioner here and a leader. For those of you who aren't aware, myself and Ray served at the same time as utility commissions as Commissioner Clyburn. We had a chance to do some great things together. And it's great to have you again in that leadership capacity, Commissioner Clyburn.

Chairman Wheeler, I appreciate very much the conversation about quantile regression analysis. I think you'll see that there's many rural members of Congress or members that represent rural parts of America that are on this committee. As we look at this and encouraging investment in rural America, I hope that through all these deliberations and rulemaking, that we don't lose sight of the fact that if we can make a mobile call from an airline, that we should be able to make it anywhere in rural America.

And if technology is allowing for that to occur, I don't want to hear that we're not able to anymore. So thank you again for looking at this and making sure that rural America will not be left out, Mr. Chairman.

With that being said, I would also encourage and was encouraged by the fact that in a recent report, there was some conversation about the tribal coefficient and would encourage that that is critically important as we roll out the reevaluation of the QRA.

And lastly, I want to let you know that I'm planning on introducing a piece of legislation to include the elevation of the national tribal recognition of ONAP (ph) as a permanent office. And I would hope that we might be able to work with our colleagues to elevate that, (inaudible) reports directly to the chairman, especially with the evolution of what we're seeing with the extension of utilities across rural America, including tribal lands.

Mr. Chairman, I'm intrigued very much by the conversation around the I.P. transition. I think Chairman Rogers, chairman of the Intelligence Committee, was asking about the importance of security in networks, that we not lose sight of the fact of the importance of the protection of consumers and network security.

As we're looking forward into future technology, sometimes things that we've read about in fiction or we've seen in television. There's been a lot of concern recently about security of networks, about the infringement on individuals, peering eyes, if you will, sometimes into consumer information.

And I'm intrigued by your direction to move forward with real- world experiments that will be coming forward. I'd like your thoughts on anything that you're aware of or that the FCC may be looking at with laser-based quantum encryption, point-to-point work that's happening right now with our national labs. It's been written about.

I know it makes some people nervous, but it seems to me that as we're looking to protect consumer information and intellectual property, that the more advanced that we can make our networks with technology that's currently available, that we may take to the commercial marketplaces, is something that I'd like to encourage and see, and just like to get your thoughts on that.

WHEELER: I just learned quantum regression analysis, and now you want me to know laser-based quantum encryption?

LUJAN: Yes, sir.

(LAUGHTER)

WHEELER: I look forward to learning a lot about that. I don't mean to be light, but the -- the -- let me be specific on what I can comment on.

Our networks need to be secure, period. What I was trying to say to Mr. Rogers is that the best way for attacking that is through the multi-stakeholder process and moving with dispatch. Because the bad guys sure figure out a way to get around things and that we need to make sure that our responses are flexible.

We're working obviously with the president's executive order and the various steps that he is taking, or the executive agencies are taking in that regard. But I happen to believe that -- that two challenges of the I.P. transition is going to be the security of the networks and the privacy of the information.

And if you go back to the comment that I was making I believe to Mr. Waxman, about the trials need to be about measuring values, then we need to be addressing both of those issues inside that trial. And I look forward to learning more about how laser quantum can help the.

LUJAN: I appreciate it, Chairman.

And if I may, Mr. Chairman, you know, it wasn't too long ago that when the same idea was presented, that we may be able to move data over light and laser...

WHEELER: Right, exactly.

LUJAN: ... there were a lot of discouraging thoughts that were associated with that. But as we're moving now away from copper as a new medium, where even the ability to move data on fiber can't keep up with our processing speeds. If laser-based quantum encryption is good enough to keep national security secrets preserved, I would certainly hope that we find a way to extend these protections to consumers as well.

And again, with the real threats that are taking place with theft of intellectual property, right now we know that it works point to point, but there are ways to make this work with (inaudible) we have available.

This is a serious area that I have tried to take up with the Intelligence Committee. They were very cautious with their conversations with me until I presented them with publications that have talked about this in open source and an unclassified way.

So I'm hoping that we might be able to look into this more and have a serious attempt to incorporate this into our day-to-day lives.

Thanks again, Mr. Chairman. I yield back.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back.

And the chair now recognizes the gentleman from Colorado for five minutes.

GARDNER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I want to commend all the commissioners for being here today, and congratulations on your new role and your newly retired-from role. Thank you for your service.

And Commissioner Pai, I want to thank you for your work on the quantile regression analysis, and the comments that you made at the beginning of your testimony, the question of Chairman Walden, I guess, was something that I have dealt with each and every day,

In a district bigger than the state of South Carolina, I have a number of rural telecom -- rural utilities that continue to face the uncertainty, as you have mentioned, about the QRA. And I appreciate it.

And so, Chairman Wheeler, thank you very much for your comments on that as well. I look forward to following up with you as those conversations and decisions move forward.

I wanted to ask a quick question to Commissioner Pai about the issue of connected (ph) and the E-Rate program .

Who is responsible for policing to make sure the E-Rate program is being used as it -- as appropriately, making sure there's no abuse of the program?

PAI: Congressman, thank you for the question.

In theory, the Universal Service Administrative Corp. or company (ph) overseen by us monitors it.

But in practice, given the limited resources that USAC has and given the limited resources the FCC has to oversee USAC, there's not a great deal of transparency and accountability in the system.

GARDNER: A question I had with that is two-fold. Number one, how do we ensure that there is no overlap of private sector service with E-Rate funding and programs, to make sure that we're not adding to government competition to the private sector.

But, number two, if USAC has identified a problem with a E-Rate contractor or recipient, is there a way to police or perhaps are there barment issues that you can talk about?

Because I know one of the issues in Colorado is that there has been a company that is involved and has been morphed into a new company that has had significant issues with E-Rate violations, and is now involved in an other company in Colorado that is providing services to schools.

PAI: Yes, USAC has taken actions to -- such as the type you've indicated. And, as well, the Department of Justice in appropriate cases can take action where it suspects that something fraudulent has occurred.

And I know that I'm quite sure I speak for my colleagues when I say that the FCC has no interest in doing anything but enforcing the rules against people who abuse the E-Rate system.

With respect to the first part of your question, I think it's critical as we think about reforming the E-Rate program in addition to restructuring the basic planks of it that we ensure that at the end of the day, we don't supply or use our E-Rate funds to supplant or add to the problems on competitors who've, you know, taken the risk and invested private capital into pulling (ph) networks.

GARDNER: Commissioner Rosenworcel, I know you talked this as well. I don't know if you have anything to add.

ROSENWORCEL: You know, I'd echo largely the sentiment of my colleague. We wouldn't want government funds to displace private sector funds. We want to be efficient with the limited dollars we have and make sure we reach as many schools at as high speed as possible, including in rural Colorado.

And with respect to oversight, we could always benefit from more oversight. When we find bad actors in a program we have to take efforts to get them out.

GARDNER: Great. Thank you.

And Commissioner -- or Chairman Wheeler, a question I have, and this is maybe something that you need to get back to me on, are you familiar with a report on a next-generation 911 that is being put together by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration in connection with a blue ribbon panel that was convened by -- I'll get the name here -- the FCC's Communications Security, Reliability and Interoperability Council?

WHEELER: Right. That's CSRIC, yes,

GARDNER: CSRIC. Are you familiar with the report that is about to come out in January?

WHEELER: I am not familiar with the report that's about to come out.

GARDNER: There was a -- the blue ribbon panel that was put together...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: Right. I know taht...

(CROSSTALK)

GARDNER: Apparently there is a blue ribbon panel -- or the report is coming out in January. And there is some questionable findings in this report. And I would hope that perhaps the FCC, because I believe some of the findings are not in line with FCC ideas at all. If you could take a look at that report before it's issued and public, to make sure that when we issue a report that has the stamped seal approval of the federal government that it's in line with FCC directives and beliefs...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: Consider that done.

GARDNER: Thank you very much.

And a final question in my time, regarding the I.P. transition issues. Heading in a good direction, but -- and there's significant strides being made to transition to I.P., but, you know, it's -- talking about rural America again, how do we further encourage this transition in a way that ensures consumers remain served in the long run, and particularly in rural America?

WHEELER: I'm sorry, that consumers be served in the long run?

GARDNER: In the long run, particularly in rural America.

WHEELER: Again, it is gonna be very important, for instance in these trials that we have trials in rural areas, to begin to answer those kind of questions.

I mean, you can't go to New York City or, you know, someplace like this and run a trial and say that it applies, you know, in the cities in your district.

And so, that's gonna be one of the criteria that we're looking at.

GARDNER: Thank you.

Yield back my time.

WALDEN: Thank you.

The gentleman yields back.

And the chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri for five minutes.

LONG: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And, Chairman Wheeler, I came to Congress with a 30-year background in the auction business, so that's how -- was my profession for 30 years before I got here, so I've got a great interest in any time that we try to conduct an auction for anything. And it's tricky to me about this reverse auction thing, because I'm not sure exactly how that's supposed to work.

But can you provide us with a timeline of actions that need to occur before the incentive auctions would begin?

WHEELER: Yes, sir. We're going to -- and we're gonna in January, which -- at next month's open meeting we're gonna have a presentation that is going to lay out both the timeline and the policy issues that need to be decided, and some recommendations on those.

Then in the spring we're going to be voting on an important order that solicits offers to do trials, sets up a measurement scheme for them, and begins to address the kinds of policy issues that will be tangential to all of that.

And then, we will go forth with trials.

LONG: Can you also tell me what the FCC is doing to ensure that the maximum amount of revenue will be generated through these auctions, which was always a concern of mine as an auctioneer?

WHEELER: The -- and -- and -- and believe me, one of ours as well, because we have the responsibility not only to fund FirstNet and the auction activities themselves, but also to contribute to pay down the federal deficit.

And I think the key to -- to how you can maximize revenue comes down to multiple things.

One is -- is, we've got to be able to attract broadcasters. We've got to have something, as I was saying previously, that -- that are rules that are understandable, are rules that we're actually being aggressive and helping people understand the economic impact of them, because, as you know, you're only gonna bid to the point that your spreadsheets say it's gonna be making sense.

So that's the first thing, that we've got to attract broadcasters.

We also have this -- well, we have this perverse challenge here that we also have to be freeing up spectrum.

LONG: Have to be what?

WHEELER: Freeing up spectrum.

LONG: Which requires people to put spectrum...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: At the end of the auction.

WHEELER: There's the key. So you have to provide the appropriate incentive to get them to free up...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: And do you foresee that happening? From what I talk to -- the people I talk to, I don't know that that's gonna happen in as large a way as what you...

WHEELER: So, the Congress told us to make it happen. And -- and we are going to do our damndest to deliver on those instructions. And I believe that we will be able to fulfill the challenge that we have been given.

And in no way, shape or form, do I underestimate the magnitude of it. I have spent more time on this issue in the last 39 days than any other issue.

And I know my colleagues all feel the same way on this. We understand that we're biting off a huge chunk here.

LONG: And there's a article where you were speaking in Ohio and, to quote out of the article, "'the protection of competition,;'Mr. Wheeler said, 'would apply to the coming auction of additional airwaves or spectrum for mobile broadband.' In April, the Justice Department told the FCC that it could help to protect competition by ensuring that the two largest companies, AT&T and Verizon, were not allowed to use their financial might to buy up all the available spectrum being auctioned, shutting out smaller carriers."

So how do you balance that? How do you decide I want to get the most money for my product over here, but I want to limit my bidders over here? How does that...

WHEELER: I also think that -- and, as you know, the more people you get to the auction, presumably the better result.

And so, we want to make sure that we are creating an auction marketplace that will attract as many people as possible. Not -- and not just the giants.

As a former entrepreneur, we want to make sure that we have smaller wireless companies. We want to make sure there are entrepreneurial opportunities in here.

And that's one of the things that's most interesting about what we've recently put out for public notice, the proposal from the Competitive Carriers Association, the Rural Carriers Association, and the NTCA, the rural wireline association, on talking about smaller economic areas, so that they could bid for a smaller piece of geography, rather than a humongous piece, because for entrepreneurs, for smaller carriers, they can target their activities, they can take something that is a -- is a consumable bite, rather than be forced to go out and -- and -- and...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: But they (inaudible) have to put together a patchwork quilt of -- to make their system work correct, what they buy through the auction, they have to...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: So they can -- they can buy their areas, they can buy other, smaller areas, rather than having to buy -- this is -- and this is not a decision, I just want to clear. This is -- we've put this out for comment. But it is a certainly very interesting idea that...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: ... a,b, and c, and they get a and b, but then they can't get c, then a and b weren't worth anything to them...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: But that's kind of the history of the wireless industry. I've been -- we're about to conduct our 96th auction. And -- and I've been in them from the outset. And traditionally, that kind of situation has occurred. And then an aftermarket then develops in which various players say, "OK, how can I reorganize for the most efficiency?"

LONG: OK. I'm beyond my time by quite a little bit. So if I had any time, I'd yield it back.

WALDEN: The gentleman's time has expired.

And the chair now recognizes the gentlelady from North Carolina for five minutes.

ELLMERS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you to the commissioners for being here today.

Commissioner Clyburn, I'm going to direct my questions to you. I have an issue that has been raised from my sheriffs back home in North Carolina. And it has to do with one of the points that you made in your opening testimony.

And I'll just read from your opening statement. "We adopted an order to reform inmate calling services to finally provide relief to millions of families and 2.7 million children who have been paying unreasonably high rates to stay connected with incarcerated loved ones."

My sheriffs back home, do have some concerns on this issue and -- so they would like me to pose some questions to you on this issue, in regard to security measures that -- that they will now be putting in place, certainly they want to be able to provide, you know, access and information and the ability to communicate with family members.

But they are concerned that this order or reform regulation is saying that basically their ability to -- to put forward call-blocking through the -- is that an issue? Is that looked upon as something that -- that we want to veer away from?

CLYBURN: So let me start -- again, thank you, and it's a pleasure meeting a -- a Carolinian.

ELLMERS: Absolutely. Yes

CLYBURN: We might have argued a bit about which...

ELLMERS: Yeah.

CLYBURN: Right.

ELLMERS: That's OK, though. We're -- we're brothers, cousins, sisters.

CLYBURN: Absolutely.

ELLMERS: That's right.

CLYBURN: So let me start with the latter, in terms of the call blocking concerns that some of -- of the sheriffs and persons who run jail facilities mentioned.

So as it relates to that particular item, I want to assure you that nothing within anything that we have delivered in this order prevents any type of security in security needed type of a blocking.

So if it's -- if -- if you know, a judge or a witness, or something, you know is -- is potentially at risk, then yes, these providers can block calls.

The -- the call blocking comes into play when there is not a business relationship with -- if someone is doing business with somebody else and then the supplier -- another supplier is blocking them, that is when we have some disconnects with our rules.

But when it comes to security protocols, that is in place.

So you've mentioned what is at the epicenter of our reasoning for reform. That family members that -- those who represent those who are incarcerated, not everybody incarcerated is -- is guilty.

And -- and those who are trying to help rehabilitate those inmates have complained to us for a number of years, for well over 10 years that the ability to communicate was just financially outrageous. That it was an unaffordable regime.

So what we did, after 10 long years, was act. And we looked at -- and reminded ourselves, Communications Act, in terms of universal service principles put forward, that is the providing of just and reasonable rates for all.

And so we put in a -- a mechanism that will provide that. And what we also did, not only providing a -- a means for just and reasonable rates for those families and others who use the phone service, but providing the means for just and reasonable rate of return for those carries, at the same builds in those that just and reasonable rate of returns is the -- the amount of money needed to -- to provide a state of the art security protocols.

So nothing within the framework in terms of what we, you know, put forward in terms of the order and the further order that would deal with entrust state rates, will compromise security protocols. But it will bring more certainty and more -- I -- I guess I would -- again, just affordability for those -- for those who are making calls to the incarcerated.

ELLMERS: They are also concerned about the cost involved and -- and you know, if -- if you can give some guidance in anticipation of the cost that they will have to incur as the result of this, certainly again, wanting to ensure that everyone is protected...

CLYBURN: Right.

ELLMERS: ... and the security is there. That -- and also, would you consider, at the local level, the local jails, maybe being exempt until they can, you know, come up with a plan of action?

CLYBURN: So one of the things that we have put forth in -- in this engagement is the capacity for any provider that is under distress, they can apply for a waiver process. You know, for -- for a waiver.

And so that capacity is within and means, and so they do have the ability to do so.

But one of the things that I wanted to emphasize is when we came up with this particular rate structure, we looked at a number of cost studies and cost models that included a -- a wide array of -- of facilities and came up, actually, with a cost structure that was much higher than some the petitioners wanted us to.

But we thought that we needed to take into account facilities, large and small, in order to come up with a -- a rate structure that we think it strikes the right balance.

ELLMERS: Well, thank you very much and I look forward to and certainly will be working with my law enforcement back home, working with the commission on -- on this issue, and the subcommittee.

So thank you so much. I look forward to that.

CLYBURN: Thank you, ma'am.

ELLMERS: And I yield back the remainder of my time.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back, and seeing no other members to ask questions, I wanna thank the commission for being with us today. And I know that Chairman Walden does the same.

And I also wanna thank the commission for changing your time today for your meeting to be able to be here, and I understand your meeting is at 2 O'clock. So we appreciate you accommodating the committee to appear before us today.

And seeing no further business to come for the committee, the committee stand adjourned.

LUJAN HIGHLIGHTS COMPUTER SCIENCE EDUCATION WEEK AND VISIT WITH CAPITAL HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS ON HOUSE FLOOR

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 537 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District spoke on the House floor this morning to highlight Computer Science Education Week and the importance of encouraging students to learn computer science and coding.

On Monday, Lujan visited with students at Capital High School in Santa Fe and hosted a panel with computer science professionals to discuss careers in the field. Below are Lujan's remarks on the House floor.

"Mr. Speaker, to kick off this year's annual Computer Science Education Week, taking place from December 9th to December 15th, I had the pleasure of visiting with students at Capital High School in Santa Fe, New Mexico. We took part in the global Hour of Code campaign, organized by Computing in the Core and Code.org that offers introductory coding activities and tutorials.

"I also engaged with students about the importance of computer science by hosting a panel of industry professionals to highlight how diverse and exciting a career in computer science can truly be. Conversations like these that can be useful in helping young people navigate toward careers in computer science and STEM.

"In today's world a degree in computer science translates to high-paying, in-demand jobs. At a time when people are struggling to find work in our recovering economy, the computer science industry is growing and New Mexico is predicted to add 15,360 computing jobs by 2018. It has become increasingly essential for students to learn the language of code in the same way that they learn reading and writing and mathematics.

"If we are to remain economically competitive and have a highly skilled workforce, access to computer science curricula and coding instruction must be a priority. However, nationwide only one in ten schools offer computer science and there is a great lack of diversity in those that do - just 4% of students enrolled are female and 3% are students of color.

"In New Mexico only 57 students took the Computer Science AP exam in 2012. This is a result, in part, of the fact that New Mexico does not offer computer science teacher certifications for middle and high school teachers and is one of the 36 states that does not count computer science courses toward high school graduation requirements for math and science.

"Computer science provides students with the 21st century skills necessary for innovation by teaching design, logical reasoning, and problem solving. Yet too few students have access to this rigorous coursework. That is why I cosponsored HR 2536, the Computer Science Education Act that will help ensure that more students have access to computer science education by making it a core academic subject and including computer science teachers in professional development.

"I urge my colleagues to join me in support of Computer Science Education Week and the Computer Science Education Act. It is critically important that every student has the opportunity to learn computer science at an early age. When we show them that they have the power to create the next great app, not just use it, I believe we will capture their hearts and minds and foster the next generation of innovators."

LUJAN STATEMENT ON BUDGET VOTE

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 296 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, D.C

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after voting for a compromise budget plan that reduces sequester cuts over the next two years.

"While this budget plan is not perfect, and neither side got everything they would have liked, it represents a compromise that takes important steps to chip away at the devastating cuts of the sequester. It rejects the calls of the extreme Tea Party elements that have demanded even deeper cuts that would harm New Mexico. Already in our state we have seen arbitrary sequester cuts negatively impact our economy and hurt our families. During this past year Head Start centers have shut down, workers were furloughed, and cuts to the national labs rippled through the state's economy.

"By reducing part of the sequester cuts and providing certainty and stability over the next two years, this plan puts Congress on a path to fund the government without legislating from one crisis to the next.

"Passing this budget plan is a small step forward; however, I am disappointed with the House's failure to act on other critical issues facing families in New Mexico. Yesterday, I called on Speaker Boehner to keep the House in session and pass an extension of unemployment benefits before recessing for the year. More work is needed to pass a Farm Bill that supports our farmers, ranchers, and dairy producers, and that provides funding for critical nutrition programs. And House Republicans have yet to allow a vote on much-needed immigration reform to fix our broken system. With all this important work that remains, the House should stay in session until more progress is made for the people of New Mexico."

Lujan Statement on Budget Vote

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 305 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. (3rd CD), issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after voting for a compromise budget plan that reduces sequester cuts over the next two years.

"While this budget plan is not perfect, and neither side got everything they would have liked, it represents a compromise that takes important steps to chip away at the devastating cuts of the sequester. It rejects the calls of the extreme Tea Party elements that have demanded even deeper cuts that would harm New Mexico. Already in our state we have seen arbitrary sequester cuts negatively impact our economy and hurt our families. During this past year Head Start centers have shut down, workers were furloughed, and cuts to the national labs rippled through the state's economy.

"By reducing part of the sequester cuts and providing certainty and stability over the next two years, this plan puts Congress on a path to fund the government without legislating from one crisis to the next.

"Passing this budget plan is a small step forward; however, I am disappointed with the House's failure to act on other critical issues facing families in New Mexico. Yesterday, I called on Speaker Boehner to keep the House in session and pass an extension of unemployment benefits before recessing for the year. More work is needed to pass a Farm Bill that supports our farmers, ranchers, and dairy producers, and that provides funding for critical nutrition programs. And House Republicans have yet to allow a vote on much-needed immigration reform to fix our broken system. With all this important work that remains, the House should stay in session until more progress is made for the people of New Mexico."

New Mexico Dems: Congressman Ben Ray Lujan Signs Letter to John Boehner Calling for Extension of Unemployment Benefits

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 682 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District signed an open letter to Speaker John Boehner today urging him not to adjourn the House for the year without bringing up an extension of federal unemployment insurance, which is scheduled to expire on December 28. Lujan joined 165 of his Democratic colleagues in calling for the extension that will prevent 1.3 million Americans from losing their jobless aid before the end of the year. In addition, 1.9 million more Americans who are estimated to be eligible for federal unemployment insurance in the first half of 2014 would lose access to that coverage if Congressional action is not taken.

"Speaker Boehner and House Republican leaders should not send the House home for the year until an extension of unemployment benefits is passed and sent to the President for his signature," Congressman Lujan said. "Failure to act on this critical extension during this difficult economic time would leave 6,000 unemployed workers in New Mexico without benefits at the end of the year and an additional 9,700 people without benefits in the first six months of 2014. Too many families across our state are still struggling as we work to turn the economy around, and allowing unemployment benefits to end for thousands of people who are trying to get back to work will take a toll on our families as well as our economy."

Below is the text of the letter:

December 11, 2013

The Honorable John Boehner

Speaker, U.S. House of Representatives

H232, U.S. Capitol

Washington, DC 20515

Dear Speaker Boehner:

We write to urge you to address the looming expiration of unemployment benefits for millions of Americans before adjourning Congress for the remainder of the year. Without swift Congressional action, 1.3 million jobless workers will have their benefits cut off on December 28th, and nearly another 1.9 million will lose their unemployment benefits over the first half of next year. This would not only be a devastating blow for millions of Americans who are already struggling, but it would also hurt our economy.

The Emergency Unemployment Compensation (EUC) program is scheduled to immediately and completely stop at the end of 2013, during the holiday season, with the last payable week ending on December 28th. All current EUC beneficiaries will lose their benefits, and individuals exhausting their limited state unemployment benefits will no longer be eligible for EUC benefits in 2014. This cutoff will affect over 3 million Americans over the next six months, and thereby also negatively impact our economic growth. In fact, recent estimates indicate that the expiration of the EUC program would cost our economy 310,000 jobs and drain roughly four-tenths of a percentage point from first-quarter economic growth.

While unemployment benefits remain a critical lifeline for dislocated workers and their families, these benefits have recently been significantly scaled back. According to the Congressional Research Service, the total amount of weeks of unemployment benefits has dropped by more than a third across the states, and by more than 50 percent in some states, compared to two years ago. Furthermore, the recipients have seen their weekly benefit payment provided by the EUC program cut under sequestration.

Even with the progress our economy has seen since the depths of the recession, there are still 1.3 million fewer jobs today than when the recession started six years ago. Additionally, approximately 4 million Americans are considered long-term unemployed, and have been looking for work for more than six months. Now is certainly not the time to further decimate vital federal assistance to workers who have lost their job through no fault of their own and who must actively seek work in order to be eligible for unemployment benefits. We therefore strongly urge you to immediately bring up a one-year extension of the current EUC program.

Thank you for your attention to this critical issue.

LUJAN HIGHLIGHTS COMPUTER SCIENCE EDUCATION WEEK AND VISIT WITH CAPITAL HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS ON HOUSE FLOOR;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 557 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District spoke on the House floor this morning to highlight Computer Science Education Week and the importance of encouraging students to learn computer science and coding.

On Monday, Lujan visited with students at Capital High School in Santa Fe and hosted a panel with computer science professionals to discuss careers in the field. Below are Lujan's remarks on the House floor.

"Mr. Speaker, to kick off this year's annual Computer Science Education Week, taking place from December 9th to December 15th, I had the pleasure of visiting with students at Capital High School in Santa Fe, New Mexico. We took part in the global Hour of Code campaign, organized by Computing in the Core and Code.org that offers introductory coding activities and tutorials.

"I also engaged with students about the importance of computer science by hosting a panel of industry professionals to highlight how diverse and exciting a career in computer science can truly be. Conversations like these that can be useful in helping young people navigate toward careers in computer science and STEM.

"In today's world a degree in computer science translates to high-paying, in-demand jobs. At a time when people are struggling to find work in our recovering economy, the computer science industry is growing and New Mexico is predicted to add 15,360 computing jobs by 2018. It has become increasingly essential for students to learn the language of code in the same way that they learn reading and writing and mathematics.

"If we are to remain economically competitive and have a highly skilled workforce, access to computer science curricula and coding instruction must be a priority. However, nationwide only one in ten schools offer computer science and there is a great lack of diversity in those that do - just 4% of students enrolled are female and 3% are students of color.

"In New Mexico only 57 students took the Computer Science AP exam in 2012. This is a result, in part, of the fact that New Mexico does not offer computer science teacher certifications for middle and high school teachers and is one of the 36 states that does not count computer science courses toward high school graduation requirements for math and science.

"Computer science provides students with the 21st century skills necessary for innovation by teaching design, logical reasoning, and problem solving. Yet too few students have access to this rigorous coursework. That is why I cosponsored HR 2536, the Computer Science Education Act that will help ensure that more students have access to computer science education by making it a core academic subject and including computer science teachers in professional development.

"I urge my colleagues to join me in support of Computer Science Education Week and the Computer Science Education Act. It is critically important that every student has the opportunity to learn computer science at an early age. When we show them that they have the power to create the next great app, not just use it, I believe we will capture their hearts and minds and foster the next generation of innovators."

LUJAN: AFFORDABLE CARE ACT TO INCREASE ACCESS TO MENTAL HEALTH AND SUBSTANCE USE DISORDER BENEFITS; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 351 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District highlighted recent data that shows the Affordable Care Act (ACA) is expanding mental health and substance use disorder benefits for approximately 60 million Americans - including approximately 403,000 New Mexicans. This expansion of coverage for mental health and substance use disorders is one of the largest in a generation.

Thanks to the Affordable Care Act, insurance companies in the individual and small group market are required for the first time to cover mental health and substance use disorder services as one of ten categories of essential health benefits. In addition, insurance companies must cover these services at parity with medical and surgical benefits, meaning things like out-of-pocket costs for behavioral health services must generally be comparable to coverage for medical and surgical care.

"Sadly in New Mexico we are too familiar with the impact that substance abuse has on our families and our communities. Combating substance abuse requires a comprehensive strategy, and ensuring that people have access to health care that provides quality services that help address substance abuse disorder is an important step to building safer and stronger communities," Congressman Lujan said.

The Affordable Care Act requires most health plans to cover recommended preventive services like depression screenings for adults and behavioral assessments for children at no cost to consumers. With an estimated one in five adults experiencing mental illness in any given year, the ACA will help reduce the number of individuals who go untreated due to a lack of health insurance that covers mental health and substance use disorder services. In addition, because of the law, starting in 2014 insurers will not be able to deny coverage or charge individuals more due to pre-existing conditions, including mental illness and substance use disorders.

Combating substance abuse requires a comprehensive strategy, and ensuring that people have access to health care that provides quality services that help address substance abuse disorder is an important step to building safer and stronger communities," Congressman Lujan said.

The Affordable Care Act requires most health plans to cover recommended preventive services like depression screenings for adults and behavioral assessments for children at no cost to consumers. With an estimated one in five adults experiencing mental illness in any given year, the ACA will help reduce the number of individuals who go untreated due to a lack of health insurance that covers mental health and substance use disorder services. In addition, because of the law, starting in 2014 insurers will not be able to deny coverage or charge individuals more due to pre-existing conditions, including mental illness and substance use disorders.

Lujan: Affordable Care Act to Increase Access to Mental Health and Substance Use Disorder Benefits

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 343 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. (3rd CD), issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District highlighted recent data that shows the Affordable Care Act (ACA) is expanding mental health and substance use disorder benefits for approximately 60 million Americans - including approximately 403,000 New Mexicans. This expansion of coverage for mental health and substance use disorders is one of the largest in a generation.

Thanks to the Affordable Care Act, insurance companies in the individual and small group market are required for the first time to cover mental health and substance use disorder services as one of ten categories of essential health benefits. In addition, insurance companies must cover these services at parity with medical and surgical benefits, meaning things like out-of-pocket costs for behavioral health services must generally be comparable to coverage for medical and surgical care.

"Sadly in New Mexico we are too familiar with the impact that substance abuse has on our families and our communities. Combating substance abuse requires a comprehensive strategy, and ensuring that people have access to health care that provides quality services that help address substance abuse disorder is an important step to building safer and stronger communities," Congressman Lujan said.

The Affordable Care Act requires most health plans to cover recommended preventive services like depression screenings for adults and behavioral assessments for children at no cost to consumers. New Mexico Dems: New Mexico's Democratic Congressional Delegation Joins Together for Marriage Equality

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 433 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

New Mexico's Democratic Congressional delegation, Senator Tom Udall, Senator Martin Heinrich, Congressman Ben Ray Lujan, and Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham, the co-chair of the statewide campaign, have joined together in the historic effort to secure and defend the freedom to marry for all New Mexico families, and adding their voices in support for marriage equality.

"I enthusiastically support the freedom to marry for everyone in New Mexico," said Senator Tom Udall. "Family comes first for all of us and that's why it is imperative that we support all New Mexican families and work together to win marriage equality and defend it if we must."

"I am very hopeful that the New Mexico Supreme Court will find that our constitution supports full equality for all our citizens," said Senator Martin Heinrich. "Marriage is the foundation of a strong community and I will do all I can to secure and protect this freedom for loving gay and lesbian couples and their families."

"Now that legally married same-sex couples can access the critical federal protections so necessary in times of stress and crisis, it is important to ensure that every couple can make that personal choice of marriage," said Congressman Lujan. "Gay and lesbian couples make the same contributions and sacrifices that we all do, including paying taxes, owning business and caring for their families. It is time everyone is treated equally under the law."

"When everybody is treated fairly in this state, every one of us benefits" said Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham. "When committed gay and lesbian couples can marry and enjoy the same benefits and responsibilities as everyone else, it strengthens families, protects children and expands freedom for us all. After the progress we've made in the past few weeks, I'm more confident than ever that full marriage equality is not a question of if, but when."

Marriage Equality Campaign Manager Robert Adams thanked the members of New Mexico's congressional delegation for leading the charge to secure marriage equality in New Mexico once and for all:

"We are extremely grateful to have Senators Udall and Heinrich, Congressman Lujan and Congresswoman Lujan Grisham onboard to support our work to win and defend marriage equality. Over 1600 same-sex couples have already married in New Mexico, and that fundamental freedom belongs to everyone in the state. New Mexico Unites for Marriage is committed to making that dream a reality."

LUJAN STATEMENT ON THE PASSING OF NELSON MANDELA; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 221 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement on the death of Nelson Mandela, former president of South Africa.

"The global community has lost a true champion for justice and human rights with the passing of Nelson Mandela. Mr. Mandela leaves behind a tremendous legacy that will continue to inspire all those who share his passion for freedom and equality.

"As the first black president of South Africa, Nelson Mandela broke down barriers through a determined spirit and helped shape the future of a nation while influencing so many who have fought for social justice. Nelson Mandela demonstrated remarkable strength through his years striving for equal rights and freedom for all people in South Africa. Even in the face of years of imprisonment, he never wavered from the fight to defeat apartheid and bring equality to his fellow countrymen and women through peaceful means.

"While we mourn the passing of Nelson Mandela with a heavy heart, it is with great admiration that we reflect on the historic accomplishments of a humble leader who fought against oppression with kindness, hope, and love and stood up for the rights of all people."

Lujan Grisham, CHC Statements of Support On National Day To Act, Fast And Pray;
Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 847 words

WASHINGTON, DC - Today, U.S. Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham (NM-01) and Members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus issued statements of support on the National Day to Act, Fast and Pray.

Since November 12, a core group of leaders has been fasting for immigration reform on the National Mall. The group includes SEIU's Eliseo Medina, NAKASEC's Dae Joong Yoon, DREAMer and Mi Familia Vota's Christian Avila, and Sojourner's Lisa Sharon Harper. Across the country, over 5,000 people are joining in the fast and calling on House Republican Leadership to act on comprehensive immigration reform.

"The holiday season is traditionally a time to be grateful for our blessings in life while also renewing our commitment to helping others. For those of us fortunate enough to spend the holidays with our loved ones, these courageous fasters serve as a constant reminder that far too many immigrant families have empty places at their tables because of our broken immigration system. I recently participated in a 48-hour solidarity fast in Albuquerque and was truly inspired by the strength and conviction of the fasters - both in New Mexico and across the country - who are sacrificing their own well-being to send a clear message to Congress: It's time to side with a majority of the American people in addition to countless business, faith and community leaders and finally pass immigration reform with an earned path to citizenship." -- CHC Whip Michelle Lujan Grisham (NM-01).

"Eliseo Medina, Dae Joong Yoon, Christian Avila and Lisa Sharon Harper have demonstrated enormous strength, endurance and perseverance for the past 21 days. The personal sacrifice this group is making has encouraged thousands of others to participate in a national call for action. Today, on this 22nd day of fasting and National Day to Act, Fast and Pray, I call on House Republican Leadership to listen to the American people and allow a vote on comprehensive immigration reform." -- CHC Chairman Ruben Hinojosa (TX-15).

"For more than three weeks, a brave group dedicated to changing our broken immigration system has fasted to draw attention to and express the need for comprehensive reform. Their personal sacrifice on behalf of the DREAMers who want to contribute to the only home they have ever known, the hard-working immigrants who live in the shadows, and the families who have been separated has helped call attention to the need for action. I commend their enduring spirit and courage to stand up for what is right for our country and for the millions of people who want to add to the greatness of America." -- CHC First Vice Chair Ben Ray Lujan(NM-3).

"The courage and dedication shown by the fasters is inspiring. They are more than activists, these are real people who have to live with the consequences if Congress fails to pass comprehensive immigration reform. They haven't given up and neither should Congress. It's time for Republicans to summon some of the courage showed by the fasters to pass comprehensive immigration reform now." -- CHC Second Vice Chair Linda Sanchez (CA-38).

"My friend Eliseo Medina and the other fasters put their health on the line because a moral and just cause requires sacrifice when comfortable politicians seem content with inaction. The country cannot afford to let the immigration crisis fester, especially when the solution is so close at hand. The message to Congress is clear: doing nothing on immigration is not an option." -- CHC Immigration Task Force Chair Luis Gutierrez (IL -04).

"It is unfortunate these brave souls are suffering in the name of immigration reform. I commend their courageous efforts and call on Speaker Boehner to bring HR 15 to the floor for a vote this year, ending this great debate." -- Congressman Joe Garcia (FL-26).

"I ask Speaker Boehner to do what is in the best for our country and economy, and heed what millions of Americans across the nation want: To fix this broken immigration system." -- Congresswoman Gloria Negrete McLeod (CA-35).

"It has been almost one month since Fast 4 Families began their effort to bring comprehensive immigration reform to vote in the House. Passing a commonsense, comprehensive immigration reform bill is not only the right thing to do, but will lead to an economic boon in my home district and across the country. All those participating in this fast are in my thoughts and prayers, and have my continued and unrelenting support. Its time House leadership put aside the political posturing and do what's right for America - bring this comprehensive immigration reform bill to the floor for a vote." -- Congressman Raul Ruiz (CA-36).

"I am proud to support the Fasters, who through their own personal sacrifice, are highlighting the need for comprehensive immigration reform. We cannot have an immigration system that creates second-class citizens and stunts the progress of our immigrant community." -- Congressman Juan Vargas (CA-51).

Luján Highlights Pancreatic Cancer Awareness Month on House Floor

LENGTH: 267 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of the House of Representative Ben Ray Luján, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District spoke on the House floor today in recognition of Pancreatic Cancer Awareness Month and the importance of funding medical research that is essential to fighting the disease. Below are his remarks as delivered.

"Mr. Speaker, November is Pancreatic Cancer Awareness Month, when we bring awareness to a disease that takes the lives of too many men and women. Pancreatic cancer is the tenth most commonly diagnosed cancer in men and the ninth in women, but it's the fourth leading cause of cancer death. Sadly, it is estimated this year that 73 percent of patients with this disease will die within the first year of diagnosis.

"While these statistics are daunting, I believe that Pancreatic Cancer Awareness Month is a time for hope. It is a time when we stand up and call attention to this disease, when we call for more research to better find methods of early detection. It is a time to share the stories of those we have lost in the hope that they will help spur action and move us closer to more effective treatments.

"Mr. Speaker, pancreatic cancer patients and their families are among the countless Americans demanding that we fix sequestration that has reduced funding for the National Institutes of Health and the National Cancer Institute and held back progress toward live-saving medical research.

"It is critical that we work together to fight this terrible disease."

Udall, Heinrich, Luján Underscore Economic Value of Conservation In Continued Effort To Designate Columbine-Hondo As Wilderness

LENGTH: 360 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of the House of Representative Ben Ray Luján, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Today, during a Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources hearing, U.S. Senators Tom Udall (D-N.M.) and Martin Heinrich (D-N.M.), who serves on the committee, continued their effort to designate the 45,000-acre Columbine-Hondo area in Taos County as wilderness. Udall and Heinrich introduced the proposal, S. 776, the Columbine-Hondo Wilderness Act, earlier this year. A companion bill, H.R. 1683, was introduced in the House by Representative Ben Ray Luján (D-N.M.-03).

The legislation would expand the Wheeler Peak Wilderness by approximately 650 acres. The proposal would also modify a boundary that creates a loop trail accessible by mountain bikes along the Lost Lake trail from Taos Ski Valley to the East Fork trail to Red River.

"This bill is the result of years of work by many people on how best to protect the Columbine Hondo's economic, recreational and scenic values," Udall said. "Taos County residents, ranchers, governments and businesses resoundingly agree that this area deserves permanent wilderness status. By designating the Columbine Hondo as wilderness, we will open up new tourism and recreation opportunities and protect vital tributaries to the Río Grande, while providing for continued traditional land uses, such as hunting and grazing."

"The Columbine-Hondo is one of the most treasured places in New Mexico," Heinrich said. "Columbine-Hondo is a central attraction for visitors to Taos County, where outdoor recreation and tourism drive the local economy. People come to these mountains to hike, camp, hunt, fish, and spend time with their families, and invariably they leave Taos County with their wallets a little lighter. Permanent protection through this legislation will ensure that future generations have the same opportunities in the Columbine-Hondo that we have today. This legislation is a true community effort, and I want to thank all the members of the Taos community who have worked so hard for decades to make this wilderness area a reality."

LUJAN HONORS NATIVE AMERICAN CODE TALKERS; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 332 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after Native American Code Talkers were awarded the Congressional Gold Medal for their service in World War I and II. Lujan joined members of the Pueblo of Acoma - including tribal leaders, veterans, and family members of Code Talkers - at the National Museum of the American Indian during the presentation of silver medals to representatives of the Code Talkers.

"Today, Congress honored Native American Code Talkers by presenting them with the Congressional Gold Medal, the highest recognition that Congress bestows for distinguished achievements and contributions. The Native American Code Talkers who contributed to victories in World War I and World War II are deserving of such a high honor. They played a vital role in the effort to defeat the enemy by transmitting messages in their native languages.

"Thirty-three tribes from around the country were recognized with this honor and over 200 silver medals were presented to families of code talkers.

"The secure codes that Native American Code Talkers used remained unbroken in both World Wars, enabling essential communications between Allied forces that helped save the lives of countless soldiers and played a key role in victory.

"New Mexico is home to the Pueblo of Acoma and the Pueblo of Laguna, two tribes whose service we are proud to recognize and whose efforts deserve our gratitude. In my district in New Mexico, I am honored to represent part of the Navajo Nation and the brave individuals who served with distinction as Code Talkers during World War II.

"The efforts of these heroes and all of the Native American Code Talkers who answered the call to serve this country when they were needed most will forever be remembered. We thank them for their brave service and we honor their sacrifice."

Udall, Heinrich, Lujan Underscore Economic Value of Conservation In Continued Effort To Designate Columbine-Hondo As Wilderness;
Sen. Martin Heinrich (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. SENATE DOCUMENTS

WASHINGTON, D.C. - Today, during a Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources hearing, U.S. Senators Tom Udall (D-N.M.) and Martin Heinrich (D-N.M.), who serves on the committee, continued their effort to designate the 45,000-acre Columbine-Hondo area in Taos County as wilderness. "This bill is the result of years of work by many people on how best to protect the Columbine Hondo's economic, recreational and scenic values," Udall said. "Taos County residents, ranchers, governments and businesses resoundingly agree that this area deserves permanent wilderness status. By designating the Columbine Hondo as wilderness, we will open up new tourism and recreation opportunities and protect vital tributaries to the Rio Grande, while providing for continued traditional land uses, such as hunting and grazing."

This legislation is a true community effort, and I want to thank all the members of the Taos community who have worked so hard for decades to make this wilderness area a reality."

"The Columbine-Hondo Wilderness Act is the culmination of years of hard work and compromise between various stakeholders in Northern New Mexico, including the conservation community, the recreation community, local ranchers, local governments, small businesses and the Pueblo of Taos," Lujan said. "This piece of legislation will help bring certainty to land managers as well as new economic opportunities for those who utilize the Carson National Forest for their livelihoods and recreation."

Located in the Carson National Forest, the Columbine-Hondo has been managed as a "Wilderness Study Area" since 1980. A map of the proposal can be found here http://www.heinrich.senate.gov/download/columbine-hondo-wheeler-peak-wilderness-legislative-map.

The Columbine-Hondo includes lush forests and alpine meadows populated by a variety of Rocky Mountain wildlife, including elk, mule deer, mountain lions, black bears, and bighorn sheep. The area's watershed serves as the headwaters for the Rio Hondo and Red River, which flow into the Rio Grande and to downstream agricultural communities.

The legislation is supported by the Taos County Commission, Taos Pueblo, the towns of Taos and Red River, villages of Questa and Taos Ski Valley, Taos County Chamber of Commerce, sportsmen, ranchers, conservation organizations, farmers and irrigation districts (acequias), the Taos Cycling Coalition, International Mountain Bicycling Association, land grant heirs, and hundreds of small businesses.

A copy of the bill can be found here http://www.heinrich.senate.gov/download/columbine-hondo-wilderness-act.

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. (3rd CD), issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after Native American Code Talkers were awarded the Congressional Gold Medal for their service in World War I and II. Lujan joined members of the Pueblo of Acoma - including tribal leaders, veterans, and family members of Code Talkers - at the National Museum of the American Indian during the presentation of silver medals to representatives of the Code Talkers.

"Today, Congress honored Native American Code Talkers by presenting them with the Congressional Gold Medal, the highest recognition that Congress bestows for distinguished achievements and contributions. The Native American Code Talkers who contributed to victories in World War I and World War II are deserving of such a high honor. They played a vital role in the effort to defeat the enemy by transmitting messages in their native languages.

"Thirty-three tribes from around the country were recognized with this honor and over 200 silver medals were presented to families of code talkers.

"The secure codes that Native American Code Talkers used remained unbroken in both World Wars, enabling essential communications between Allied forces that helped save the lives of countless soldiers and played a key role in victory.

"New Mexico is home to the Pueblo of Acoma and the Pueblo of Laguna, two tribes whose service we are proud to recognize and whose efforts deserve our gratitude. In my district in New Mexico, I am honored to represent part of the Navajo Nation and the brave individuals who served with distinction as Code Talkers during World War II.

"The efforts of these heroes and all of the Native American Code Talkers who answered the call to serve this country when they were needed most will forever be remembered. We thank them for their brave service and we honor their sacrifice."

Washington: KEEP YOUR HEALTH PLAN ACT OF 2013

LENGTH: 42394 words

DATELINE: Washington

United States Congress has issued the following proceedings and debate details:

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 413 and ask for its immediate consideration. The Clerk read the resolution, as follows: H. Res. 413 Resolved, That upon adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to consider in the House the bill (H.R. 3350) to authorize health insurance issuers to continue to offer for sale current individual health insurance coverage in satisfaction of the minimum essential health insurance coverage requirement, and for other purposes. All points of order against consideration of the bill are waived.

The bill shall be considered as read. All points of order against provisions in the bill are waived. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and on any amendment thereto to final passage without intervening motion except: (1) one hour of debate equally divided and controlled by the chair and ranking minority member of the Committee on Energy and Commerce; and (2) one motion to recommit. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 1 hour. Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of debate only, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. McGovern), pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume. During consideration of this resolution, all time yielded is for the purpose of debate only. General Leave Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have 5 legislative days to revise and extend their remarks. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? There was no objection. Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 413 provides for consideration of H.R. 3350, the Keep Your Plan Act of 2013. The rule provides for 1 hour of debate controlled by the Committee on Energy and Commerce, equally divided between the majority and the minority. Because the bill addresses a targeted emergency situation caused by the lack of foresight in the Affordable Care Act, namely, the cancellation of millions of existing health insurance plans despite repeated promises to the contrary, because of that, the rule makes no amendments in order. However, the minority is afforded the customary opportunity to offer one motion to recommit, should they so choose. This is a fair rule to allow us to give some relief to Americans who actually want to keep their health insurance plan but are being told that because of the Affordable Care Act, they may not. We are now 6 weeks into the disastrous launch of the President's signature health care law, and more and more problems are uncovered with each succeeding day. It seems that the President has quickly forgotten all of the promises made over the past 4 years to the American people about this law. In 2009, in a speech before the American Medical Association, President Obama stated: We will keep this promise to the American people: if you like your doctor, you will be able to keep your doctor, period. If you like your health care plan, you'll be able to keep your health care plan, period. No one will take it away, no matter what. At the end of September, the President said: The first thing you need to know is this: if you already have health care, you don't have to do anything. Americans from across the country, from across the ideological spectrum agree that President Obama has broken his fundamental promise. And now his attempts to reconcile this broken promise only serve to bring further confusion and chaos. Today, H.R. 3350 offers a real solution. The bill would allow plans available on the individual market today to be offered in calendar year 2014. It would provide millions of Americans the opportunity to keep their health care plan in 2014. The bill would also ensure that Americans keeping their plans would not face a penalty under ObamaCare's individual mandate. Mr. Speaker, I have heard from constituents about the problems that they have faced because of the President's law. A Texan from Flower Mound, Texas, recently wrote me about how her insurance has doubled in recent years because of the Affordable Care Act. In short, she wrote me that ``I miss 2009 when our family health care was affordable.'' Millions of Americans, just like this Texan, are losing their health care coverage. They are facing massive increases in their premiums and losing access to their doctor under the Affordable Care Act. The Associated Press has reported that over 3.5 million people on the individual insurance market have had their insurance canceled. Let me restate that: the Associated Press has reported that over 3.5 million people on the individual insurance market have had their health care plans canceled. We learned just this week the number of people who successfully signed up on the President's Web site for the Affordable Care Act, under 27,000--3.5 million lose their insurance; 27,000 sign up. It doesn't sound like a fair trade-off. This is not the first time that the President has realized that his signature law is significantly flawed. Since the law was passed, the President has signed seven bills into law that have repealed portions of the Affordable Care Act. Those were laws passed by the House, passed by the Senate, and sent down to the White House for signature, the way it is supposed to happen in a constitutional Republic. But in addition to these statutory changes that were passed by the Congress and sent down to the President [[Page H7116]] for his signature, the President has taken it upon himself to issue a multitude of administrative fixes to the law. And now this same President wants to, once again, fix his own law? Can we really trust the administration that wrote this disastrous missive in the first place and so mishandled the implementation? Do we trust them to now fix it? Do we trust them not to change their minds in 2 or 3 weeks' time when perhaps winds are blowing from a different direction? The White House is saying that it will use its administrative authority to allow health plans that it deemed illegal to now still be able to be sold, but this bill that the House is considering today provides a fix that is both constitutional and follows the legal process. H.R. 3350 offers a legislative solution to help Americans get a lifeboat, a life raft up from under the crushing weight of this law. The bill would grandfather in all existing health care plans so that no American will lose their coverage as a result of the Affordable Care Act. President Obama is shifting the blame. He is saying it is up to States and the State insurance commissioners to fix the massive problem that his signature law has created for millions of Americans who are losing their health insurance. His attempt at another ``fix'' is quickly coming to a halt. Just hours after the President's announcement, the Washington State insurance commissioner announced that he will not allow insurance companies to continue offering the canceled plans: We will not be allowing insurance companies to extend their policies. I believe this is in the best interest of the health insurance market in Washington. It is clear that H.R. 3350 offers the only feasible lifeline to millions of Americans who are crying out for our help. They want to keep their health care plan. It is our job, it is the job of the Congress, to protect the American people from the excesses of this administration. And I urge my colleagues to pass this rule so Americans will have the opportunity to keep their health care plan. Let's be very clear here: this bill today cannot fix the Affordable Care Act. What has been visited upon the American people in the Affordable Care Act will not be resolved by this action today. It is merely to stop the bleeding. It is an effort to triage, to stabilize the patient. Maybe then we can get the same patient to the operating room to actually fix the problem that bedevils it. The bill we are voting on today serves to stop that hemorrhaging, and the hemorrhaging that is occurring is a consequence of the ill- conceived government takeover of the American health care industry. Any good triage doctor knows before they can fully treat or cure the patient they have to deal with the immediate problems. In this case, they have to stop the hemorrhage of people losing their private health insurance because of the Affordable Care Act. That is what the House of Representatives will do today. That is what House Republicans will be voting in favor of. I hope that our colleagues across the aisle will see the wisdom in this and join us. I encourage everyone in this House to vote ``yes'' on the rule and ``yes'' on the underlying bill. Let's stand with millions of Americans who are visited daily by cancelation notices in their mailboxes. Despite the promises made to them, they are losing their insurance because of this disastrous law. With that, I reserve the balance of my time. Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Texas (Mr. Burgess) for yielding me the time; and I yield myself such time as I may consume. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong, strong opposition to this closed rule and to the underlying bill. This is effort number 46, by my count, to gut the Affordable Care Act. Before I discuss the problems with the underlying bill, let me address, just so the record is clear, the latest example of lousy process foisted upon this House by the Republican leadership. The bill before us today would make sweeping and significant changes to the Affordable Care Act and, thus, to the Nation's health care system. It would profoundly affect the lives of millions of Americans, upend the individual market, and add confusion and uncertainty into an already complicated situation. So how many hearings did the Republicans hold on this bill? Zero. Let me repeat that: zero. How many expert witnesses did they call? Zip. How many markups did they have in the committees of jurisdiction? Nada. Yet again, Republican promises of regular order and a thoughtful legislative process have been thrown out the window. And with all due respect to my friend from Texas, to stand here and say with a straight face that this is some kind of an emergency, we can't have any amendments made in order, we just don't have the time, defies comprehension. We have a rule that is closed that allows for 1 hour of debate--not even split amongst the committees of jurisdiction. This bill, by right, is not only an Energy and Commerce bill, it is a Ways and Means bill, but the Ways and Means Committee doesn't get any time to debate this bill. Mr. Speaker, 1 hour. You mean we couldn't have 2 hours of debate and a few amendments? Or 3 hours of debate and a few more amendments? Or 5 hours of debate or a whole day of debate, given the fact that you didn't hold any hearings on this bill? Give me a break. This is not the way to run the House of Representatives. This is not the way you promised you would run the House of Representatives. And, by contrast, on the Affordable Care Act, we had hundreds of hours of debate and markups in which Republican amendments were actually accepted. Now you may not like the Affordable Care Act, but it went through a process. This went through no process. This was just brought up to the Rules Committee, and we are told to bring it right to the floor. This is not a serious attempt to fix the Affordable Care Act. This is a political statement, and I understand the temptation behind it. Believe me, no one is more frustrated by the problems with the rollout of the Affordable Care Act than those of us who voted for it, believe in it, and want it to work. But instead of working with us to try to actually fix the problems and make the law work, the Republicans have brought forth this Upton bill. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me be very clear about this bill. It is an attempt to drag us back to the bad old days of the American health care system. It would allow insurance companies to go back to offering cut-rate, shoddy policies that lack the consumer protections required by the Affordable Care Act. So if you want to go back to a system where insurance companies could turn people away because they are sick, by all means vote for this bill. If you want to go back to a time when women were charged higher rates than men because being a female counted as a preexisting condition, then vote for the Upton bill. If you believe that insurers should be allowed to eliminate somebody's coverage if they get sick or are older or if they have a child or for no good reason whatsoever, then the Upton bill is for you. In short, a vote for the Upton bill is a vote in favor of everything the American people say that they hate about the health care system in this country. {time} 0930 Yesterday, in the Rules Committee, my friend, Dr. Burgess, made it very clear that the Upton bill is not an attempt to fix the Affordable Care Act. They are only interested in full repeal. They are perfectly satisfied with 40 million Americans having no health insurance at all. Speaker Boehner made a similar statement yesterday. As I said, the rollout of the health care plan has not been perfect, and I know that my own home State of Massachusetts, the rollout of our State health care law was not perfect either. But Democrats in Massachusetts did not go out of their way over and over and over again to sabotage it just because a Republican Governor named Mitt Romney signed it into law. We worked to make it better. And by 2009, I am proud to say, my congressional district had the highest rate of insurance coverage in the entire country. That is a good thing. If my Republican friends think that we are going to go back to a system where we in Massachusetts did the right thing but ended up paying for the [[Page H7117]] uncompensated care of people in Texas, North Carolina, Utah, or anywhere else, they are wrong. At some point, we have to get serious about the goal of providing good quality, affordable health insurance to every American. The Upton bill gets us no closer to that goal. It is yet another political waste of time. Mr. Speaker, let me just close by making this observation. What this debate is about--and it has turned into an ideological debate--is whether or not you believe that every single American in this country is entitled to good quality health insurance or not. My friends on the other side of the aisle obviously believe that it is okay that 40 million Americans don't have health insurance, because for the last few years they haven't offered anything other than repeal--repeal, repeal, repeal--and offering nothing as a substitute. They think it is okay to let the insurance companies decide whether you get health care or not based on a preexisting condition or whether you are a female or whether or not you are too old or too sick or whatever. They have been perfectly satisfied with the broken system that was in place. So that is the choice here. And I would urge my colleagues to understand that there is something wrong with the fact that, in the greatest country in the world and the richest country in the history of the world, so many of our fellow citizens don't have health care, don't have access to health insurance. And we can fix that. By fixing that, we not only improve the quality of life for our neighbors, our friends, and our fellow citizens, but we also help control health care costs. Because one of the biggest drivers of increased health care costs is the uncompensated care pool. So let's get serious. Let's stop this political posturing. I know you don't like the President. You have gone out of your way to say some things that are so outrageous, it is hard for me to believe that Members of Congress would say such things. But get over it and do what is right for the American people. Vote ``no'' on this closed rule. Vote ``no'' on the underlying bill. I reserve the balance of my time. Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 minute. First off, I do need to point out that yesterday, the President of the United States thought that this situation represented an emergency that required his immediate attention, and he rushed a press conference at high noon yesterday to announce his resolution for the problem. As far as the issue of hearings, I will submit a list of eight hearings that were held in the Energy and Commerce Committee over calendar year 2013 on the issue of grandfathering health care plans. But the most important thing I wish to point out, for those of you who were here in 2009, we will remember, H.R. 3200 was the Democratic health care reform bill. That bill is now lost forever in the vapor, in the ether. No one knows what became of it. H.R. 3590 passed the House of Representatives in July of 2009. It passed as a housing bill. It went over to the Senate to await further action. The further action was an amendment by Harry Reid late in December of 2009 ``to strike all after the enacting clause and insert.'' All the housing language was taken out, all of the health care language was inserted. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. BURGESS. I yield myself an additional 30 seconds. As a consequence, this bill came over to the House and we just simply had to pass it. We had to pass it before we found out what was in it. We didn't have a hearing on H.R. 3590. We didn't have a markup in any committee that I sat on in 2010 on H.R. 3590. This was a bill that was visited upon the American people without the due caution and exercise of the United States House of Representatives. CBO Analysis: CBO analysis is not currently available. Rule Request: Chairman Upton (R-MI) sent a letter to Chairman Sessions requesting ``that the Committee on Rules hold a hearing and grant a closed rule to govern consideration of H.R. 3350 by the House.'' I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. Kline), the chairman of the Education and Labor Committee. Mr. KLINE. I thank the gentleman for yielding time and for his incredible leadership on this issue. Dr. Burgess has been championing real solutions for over 10 years. Mr. Speaker, 140,000; that is the number of people from my home State of Minnesota who have been notified their health coverage will be canceled as a result of the President's health care law. John, a constituent from Burnsville, recently learned his own health plan is no longer available. John liked the plan he had and now has to pay 20 percent more to secure coverage. For many people, a cancelation notice means more than the loss of an insurance policy. It means losing access to the trusted doctors, pediatricians, and nurses who care for their families. We all know how critical these relationships are, especially in difficult moments when a loved one is injured or ill; but for countless families, those relationships will soon be lost, all because Washington bureaucrats think they know best. The President promised time and again if people liked their health care plan, they could keep it; but the American people are discovering the President failed to keep his word, leaving them with only political gimmicks and a broken Web site. The President may have apologized--and we appreciate that--but the country deserves a President who not only admits when he is wrong, but does what is necessary to make it right. That is why I support this legislation. The Keep Your Health Plan Act is about fairness. It is only fair to let people keep the health plan they like. No one should be forced to purchase a more expensive policy because the President says so. It is only fair to help families who are hurting across the country. The President's plan for more administrative tricks is a disservice to each and every one of our constituents, and it is only fair to hold the President accountable for the promises he makes to the American people. If the President is sincere about undoing some of the damage this law has created, if he wants to provide real solutions for those losing their coverage, and if he wants to keep this promise to our Nation's families, then I urge the President to support the Keep Your Health Plan Act. Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, let me again remind my colleagues that not a single hearing was held on this bill. Not a single markup was held on this bill, nothing, and it is coming to the floor under a closed rule. My Republican friends believe that nobody in this House, Democrats or [[Page H7118]] Republicans, have any right to offer an opinion or an alternative. We are given 1 hour of debate on this. It is not evenly split among the committees of jurisdiction. One committee of jurisdiction. This is a joke. This is not what you promised. This is not the open process. This is not the transparent process on major pieces of legislation that we were promised. This is a joke. I will insert into the Record a Statement of Administration Policy that says that the President, if presented with H.R. 3350, would veto it. This is a colossal waste of time.

Statement of Administration Policy H.R. 3350--Keep Your Health Plan Act of 2013 (Rep. Upton, R-MI, and 161 cosponsors, Nov. 14, 2013) The Administration strongly opposes House passage of H.R. 3350 because it threatens the health care security of hard working, middle class families. The Nation is experiencing the slowest growth in health spending in the last 50 years. Since 2008, growth in private health insurance spending stayed between three and four percent--significantly lower than earlier this decade when growth reached almost 12 percent. With health care costs rising at such low rates, this bill would be a major step back. H.R. 3350 rolls back the progress made by allowing insurers to continue to sell new plans that deploy practices such as not offering coverage for people with pre-existing conditions, charging women more than men, and continuing yearly caps on the amount of care that enrollees receive. The Administration supports policies that allow people to keep the health plans that they have. But, policies that reverse the progress made to extend quality, affordable coverage to millions of uninsured, hardworking, middle class families are not the solution. Rather than refighting old political battles to sabotage the health care law, the Congress should work with the Administration to improve the law and move forward. If the President were presented with H.R. 3350, he would veto it. Mr. McGOVERN. I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. Jackson Lee). Ms. JACKSON LEE. I thank the distinguished gentleman. Today, Mr. Speaker, I rise to save lives and to ensure that the Affordable Care Act does what it was intended to do and what it is already doing: lifting the lifetime caps, providing preventative care, taking away the discrimination against women and other ethnic minorities by eliminating health disparities. This is a bill that has seen eons of hearings not only in the underlying committee, but also in the Judiciary Committee and other committees and ad hoc hearings and briefings over and over again. I remember sitting and hearing the painful stories of families whose children had died because they could not get access to health care. But the Upton bill comes today disguised as a sheep in wolf's clothing. It discriminates against people with preexisting conditions; it restores annual caps on the amount of care you can receive; and it forces women to pay more than men for the same coverage. This bill is not a fix. It is a dissolver of a good bill. By the way, Mr. Speaker, let me inform my colleagues that there was nothing in the Affordable Care Act that dictated to insurance companies that they had to send cancelation letters. Why don't we hold a hearing and call the CEOs of the insurance companies and ask them why they didn't send the normal letter indicating that you have the opportunity to have a modified policy that will comply with the Affordable Care Act and that your policies are not canceled because those individuals did not pay their premium? Ask that question. I will tell you that there are health professionals and organizations that believe this particular bill will not work, such as the American Cancer Society and the American Diabetes Society. I agree with my colleague that there should have been an open rule. And the reason that there should have been an open rule is because I had an amendment that indicated that the conditions specified in the subsection for health insurance insurer, they must notify enrollees eligible for such continued coverage. I am glad that the President yesterday put that language in and also said that you can opt in to your old policy. We have answered the call and concern of the American people, but we have not taken away from them the right to have consumer protections and insurance coverage that will make their lives better. I would also suggest that my amendment indicated health insurance companies are making decisions based on their bottom line, their self- interests, and have decided to terminate insurance plans that are not profitable in the new, highly competitive marketplace for health insurance or want to end insurance for those who are ill and thereby increase their profit margin by keeping only the healthy and marginally healthy while discarding the ill, and the amendment should have been included, because we need to speak to our friends in the health insurance industry that we are here working together and that those letters were not necessary. Mr. Speaker, I want to save lives. I want consumer protections. I want women not to be discriminated against. Tomorrow, in Houston, we are opening the doors for enrollment in a health fair that we hope thousands will come to. My friends, the Upton bill does not answer the question. Let us save lives today. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentlewoman has expired. Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentlewoman an additional 30 seconds. Ms. JACKSON LEE. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy. This is what we lived in preceding the Affordable Care Act: 18 percent of the underinsured postponed getting care or treatment, and some of those people died; 15 percent of the uninsured had problems paying their medical bills, hounded, hounded, hounded because they didn't have the resources and even went bankrupt; 10 percent of the uninsured needed prescription drugs but they could not afford them; 8 percent were hounded by collection agencies because they had to pay for their mortgage or their food; 6 percent did not seek treatment at all. Do you know what that equals to? One hundred percent of those individuals suffering bad health care. Let us vote down the Upton bill, vote against the underlying rule, and let's promote the Affordable Care Act and fix it like the President has done. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong opposition to the rule and the underlying bill, H.R. 3350, the so-called ``Keep Your Health Plan Act of 2013.'' I oppose the rule and the underlying bill for two reasons. First, the bill will not save lives. Second, the legislation is unnecessary in light of the action taken yesterday by President Obama, which should satisfy the proponents of this legislation while at the same time minimizing the risk to the health and safety of underinsured Americans, who are persons who have insurance but spend more than 10% of their income on out-of-pocket medical expenses. Were it to become law, H.R. 3350 would jeopardize the life and health of those underinsured who purchase these plans it protects, even though health insurance plans are available that would in nearly every case provide more health coverage for less. Mr. Speaker, researchers have found the following disturbing facts regarding the underinsured: Eighteen percent of the underinsured postpone getting care or treatment; Fifteen percent of the underinsured had problems paying medical bills; Ten percent of the underinsured needed prescription drugs but could not afford them; Eight percent were hounded by collection agencies for nonpayment of medical bills; and Six percent did not seek treatment even though they needed it. Mr. Speaker, this is the cost of underinsurance in America--and this is what we can expect more of should H.R. 3350 become law. The express purpose of this bill is to allow underinsured persons to retain an inadequate ``health insurance'' plan on the ground that supposedly it is the plan the person ``wants to keep.'' Unfortunately, there is nothing in this bill that would provide consumer education on the inadequacies of the plan and that something much better is available. For example, there is no requirement in this bill for the insurer to notify the insured that health insurance provided through the exchange that provides more and better coverage for less money. This means that under H.R. 3350 people will still have problems paying their medical bills, they will have high bills, and they will not be able to afford prescription medication or be hounded by medical bill collectors. The second reason for opposing this rule and bill is that it is unnecessary in view of the actions taken yesterday by President Obama. As the President announced, insurers will be [[Page H7119]] permitted to offer consumers the option to renew their 2013 health plans in 2014, without change, allowing them to keep their plans. This should satisfy the proponents of the bill. But the President went further than that because he recognizes that inadequate insurance is really no insurance at all. That is why the President conditioned the ability of insurers to offer plan renewals upon the following: 1. That insurers notify enrollees that they can purchase coverage through the Health Insurance Marketplace where they can potentially qualify for premium tax credits; and 2. Those insurers must inform consumers of the protections they are giving up to keep the plan they have. Taken together, President Obama's actions are a tempered and measured response to the alleged problem that this bill seeks to remedy. I fully applaud what the President has done and I offered an amendment that would achieve precisely the same results but the Rules Committee did not make my amendment in order. The text of Jackson Lee Amendment #1 provides: (C) Conditions for Continued Offering of Coverage.--The conditions specified in this subsection for a health insurance issuer offering continued coverage under subsection (a) are as follows: (1) The issuer must notify enrollees eligible for such continued coverage that they can purchase health insurance coverage through the Health Insurance Marketplace where they can potentially qualify for premium tax credits. (2) The issuer must tell consumers what protections they are giving up to accept the continued coverage they have. (3) The issuer must provide notice by mail of the offering of such continued coverage to each affected enrollee; and post these notices on the issuer's website. The Jackson Lee Amendment, like the action announced by the President, is practical, efficient, and addresses the concerns of those who received cancellation letters from their insurance companies. It should be noted again that Jackson Lee Amendment #1, and the President's actions, are each superior to H.R. 3350, which contains no provision or requirement that consumers who received these notices be advised by their insurers that they may receive lower insurance rates with better coverage by shopping online or calling the toll free number. Now there may be some who think the availability of the types of health care insurance that H.R. 3350 would protect is sufficient for Americans. I do not. Neither does President Obama. The majority of the American people do not. We believe, and the Affordable Care Act ensures, that healthcare should be available, accessible and adequate. Mr. Speaker, adequate health plans have in common the inclusion of certain minimal benefits and services. The second amendment I offered to the legislation before us documented the differences between adequate and inadequate health insurance plans. Unfortunately, the Rules Committee elected not to make my amendment in order. The text of Jackson Lee Amendment #2 is as follows: SEC. 2. FINDINGS. Congress finds the following: 1. Health Insurance companies are making decisions based on their bottom line self interest and have decided to terminate insurance plans that are not profitable in the new highly competitive market place for health insurance, or want to end insurance for those who are ill and thereby increase their profit margin by keeping only the healthy or marginally healthy, while discarding the ill. 2. Insurance companies make huge profits when they take premiums and pay little to no benefits. 3. The plans offered by some insurance companies called ``health insurance'', in fact offered little if any health care protection should people with these policies become seriously ill or involved in an accident that required hospitalization. 4. Catastrophic health plans sold to Americans as insurance were not first dollar or even the first thousand dollar policies; some required the first $5,000 to $10,000 of health care costs to be paid by the holder of the insurance plan whose income was not sufficient to incur an expense of this magnitude. 5. These plans did not provide many of the minimal benefits of the Affordable Care Act, such as ambulatory patient services, that provide treatment using advanced medical devices or technology like an MRI X- ray. 6. Emergency services were not covered even though emergency room visits could cost tens of thousands of dollars depending on the nature of the emergency. Hospitalization coverage was not included in most of these insurance policies. 7. Maternity and newborn care was not covered nor were pediatric services so that a healthy birth did not mean that the newborn child would have a healthy childhood. Mental health, substance abuse disorder services, and behavioral health treatment were not covered by most of these insurance plans. 8. Prescription drug benefits and necessary laboratory tests also were excluded under these insurance plans. Also excluded under these plans were preventive and wellness services and chronic disease management. 9. Oral and vision care were not part of these plans, which meant that one tooth infection or change in eyesight could set someone back thousands of dollars if they wanted to get treatment. 10. Prescription drug benefits and necessary laboratory tests also were excluded under these insurance plans. Also excluded under these plans were preventive and wellness services and chronic disease management. 12. Oral and vision care were not part of these plans, which meant that one tooth infection or change in eyesight could set someone back thousands of dollars if they wanted to get treatment. Mr. Speaker, my constituents in the 18th Congressional District of Texas favor the Affordable Care Act because they understand the insecurity and feeling of helplessness of being uninsured or underinsured. My home state of Texas has the highest percentage of uninsured (27.6%) in the Nation, 4% more than Louisiana, the next state on the list. The state of Massachusetts, in contrast, boasts the lowest uninsured rate in the country (4%). This is because Massachusetts several years ago adopted the health insurance system upon which the Affordable Health Care Act is based. The Affordable Care Act when fully implemented will yield the same benefits for my home state of Texas. In fact, it has already begun to do so. Take the case of Lucy, who was insured--I should say underinsured--but had a $7,500 a year deductible. Thanks to the Health Insurance Exchange she is now much better off. Here is what Lucy has to say about the Affordable Care Act compared to the plan she had before: I signed up at Healthcare.gov and I'm going to save $2,300 a year on my premium alone--and more, because my deductible will drop from $7,500 a year to $3,000 a year. It's still Blue Cross insurance, and I don't have to change doctors, either. I had a choice of over 30 plans and several different companies. Mr. Speaker, health care coverage must be not only available and affordable but also adequate in order for consumers to have the health security and financial protection they need and deserve. The Affordable Care Act satisfies these criteria; the bill before us does not. That is why we should reject this rule and the underlying bill. H.R. 3350 is nothing more than the House Republicans' newest variation on their very old theme, which is to repeal, impede or undermine the Affordable Care Act. This bill is the 46th attempt by the Republicans to deprive the American people of the security and peace of mind that comes with health care that is affordable, accessible and adequate. Of course we should not be surprised. After all, it was the House Republicans who shut down the federal government for 16 days and cost the economy $24 billion while refusing to consider any legislation that would create jobs or address the real needs of the American people. Mr. Speaker, the bill before us is strongly opposed by a coalition of some of the Nation's leading health and consumer organizations, including the following: Paralyzed Veterans of America American Cancer Society Cancer Action Network American Diabetes Association American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME) American Heart Association/American Stroke Association American Music Therapy Association The Arc of the United States The Autistic Self Advocacy Network Community Catalyst Families USA Health and Wholeness Ministries, Disciples Center for Public Witness Health Care for America Now National Alliance on Mental Illness National Association of County Behavioral Health & Developmental Disability Directors National Council of Jewish Women National Partnership for Women & Families These groups oppose the bill for substantially the same reasons I have discussed. While sympathizing with consumers who are receiving notices from their insurance companies that their policies are not being renewed for next year because they do not comply with the ACA's consumer protections, the Coalition rightly observes that: [T]he solution is not to allow for the continued sale of inadequate policies[.] Rather, we must educate consumers about their new health insurance options and ensure that notices being sent by insurers clearly inform them of the shortfalls with their current coverage and explain all of their options for finding better coverage. I agree. Therefore, I urge all Members to join me in voting against this rule and the underlying bill. [[Page H7120]] November 13, 2013. Hon. John Boehner, Speaker of the House, House of Representatives, Washington, DC. Hon. Nancy Pelosi, Minority Leader, House of Representatives, Washington, DC. Dear Speaker Boehner and Minority Leader Pelosi: Health care coverage must be not only available and affordable but also adequate in order for consumers to have the health and financial protection they need from health insurance. The Affordable Care Act (ACA) was designed to ensure that, beginning in 2014, Americans would have access to health insurance that meets all three of these important objectives. Our organizations support these goals, and we are therefore opposed to H.R. 3350, legislation that would allow health insurers to continue to sell individual health insurance policies that are inadequate. The number of people who are underinsured--meaning that their insurance does not provide adequate financial protection when they are sick--has been growing over the last decade. According to one study, the number of underinsured adults has increased 80 percent since 2003. More than 60 percent of all bankruptcies in 2007 were a result of illness and medical bills, and nearly 80 percent of those who filed for medical bankruptcy were insured. Many consumers with inadequate coverage do not realize how poor it is until they are diagnosed with a serious illness and the bills start rolling in. Only then do they find out that their coverage may have very low annual coverage limits or exclude coverage for important and costly services, such as those provided during a hospital stay. The ACA includes a number of important protections in response to the large number of uninsured and to help guarantee that consumers have access to comprehensive coverage. The ACA minimizes bankruptcy risk and ensures that the full range of care consumers need in the event of a serious or catastrophic illness will be covered. We cannot afford to go another year without these protections. Among these protections that apply to non-grandfathered plans sold in the individual and small group markets are: A ban on annual limits on coverage. More than 105 million Americans no longer have lifetime dollar limits on their coverage because of the ACA, but health plans would still be able to sell plans with annual limits under this legislation. A requirement that plans cover 10 categories of essential health benefits, including doctor visits, hospital care, preventive care, maternity care, mental health care, prescription drugs, and rehabilitation services. Many of these critical benefits are not readily available in the individual market. For example, only 12 percent of health plans sold on the individual market cover maternity coverage, and only 6 percent in the states that do not have a mandate, leaving women without necessary coverage when they become pregnant. A cap on consumers' annual out-of-pocket spending for their health care to help the nearly 10 million Americans with health insurance who are unable to afford their medical bills. In addition, many consumers who are uninsured or do not have access to an affordable, adequate health plan from their employer are also eligible for a premium tax credit to help them buy such coverage through the Health Insurance Marketplaces. Our understanding of this legislation is that it would also allow insurers to continue to market and sell these plans to new consumers through 2014, without complying with the rules that take effect for other plans on January 1. In other words, insurers marketing these plans outside of the Health Insurance Marketplaces could continue to refuse to cover people with pre-existing medical conditions or charge them higher premiums because of their age or health status. As a result, younger and healthier people would be more likely to remain on or newly enroll in these plans, and plans sold through the Health Insurance Marketplaces would end up covering mostly older and sicker people. This would drive up health insurance premiums in the Marketplaces. We very much sympathize with consumers who are receiving notices from their insurance companies that their policies are not being renewed for next year because they do not comply with the ACA's consumer protections. In at least some instances, these notices have been very alarming and misleading for consumers because they fail to let them know that they may have better, more affordable insurance options available to them. At least one insurer was fined by a Department of Insurance for a letter that regulators called ``misleading.'' However, the solution is not to allow for the continued sale of inadequate policies, particularly now that more comprehensive coverage is available along with financial assistance to help make better coverage affordable. Rather, we must educate consumers about their new health insurance options and ensure that notices being sent by insurers clearly inform them of the shortfalls with their current coverage and explain all of their options for finding better coverage. We look forward to working with you to help your constituents get information about their new options for fairer, more comprehensive, and more affordable health care coverage and to make adequate coverage more affordable to everyone. Sincerely, American Cancer Society Cancer Action Network, American Diabetes Association, American Federation of State, County and

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 minute. Mr. Speaker, that evening in March of 2010 when the Senate bill was finally going to be considered by the House, there was a meeting of the Rules Committee that night. Democrats were in charge. I presented myself to that meeting with 18 amendments to H.R. 3590 that had been passed by the Senate. Every one of those was summarily rejected. The problem the Democrats had that day was, should we change a single word in H.R. 3590 as passed by the Senate, the bill would have to go back to the Senate and concur with the House amendment to H.R. 3590. The Majority Leader in the Senate, having lost his 60th vote in a special election in Massachusetts that year, felt that he could not pass anything. He could not achieve cloture with only 59 Democrats to vote in favor of that motion for cloture. That is the reason why not one word was changed between Christmas Eve of 2009 and the time this bill was actually passed. But after H.R. 3590 came back from the Senate, came to the Rules Committee, did it come to the House under an open rule? No, it did not. It was a closed rule. We were kept out of the process. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. BURGESS. I yield myself an additional 30 seconds. It is hard to feel too sad for the gentleman from Massachusetts when a bill of this magnitude came with so little debate, so little input from the minority. We have got a 1-page bill before the House today. This was a 2,700-page bill that affected every man, woman, and child in this country, not just today, not just tomorrow, but for the next three decades they will be living under this. And it came under a closed rule. I reserve the balance of my time. Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume. What the gentleman conveniently leaves out are the hundreds of hours of hearings and markups that occurred in the committees of jurisdiction on the Affordable Care Act. The committees of jurisdiction were just cut out of this. It is becoming a pattern in this House. This is not the only bill where the committees of jurisdiction have been cut out of the process, where Members' voices have been silenced, where they are enforcing rules with an iron fist in this Chamber. So this, unfortunately, is not unique. It is a pattern. But to suggest that we don't have the time to offer amendments is just ridiculous. We have plenty of time. We could debate this all day if we wanted to, and Members could have an opportunity, both Democrats and Republicans, to amend this, given the fact that they were denied that right in the committees of jurisdiction. Mr. Speaker, I will enter into the Record an article that appeared in the National Review Online, entitled, ``Boehner: Upton Bill a Step on Path to ObamaCare Repeal,'' because what is going on here is very simple. {time} 0945 If you believe that 40 million Americans should be without health insurance, then vote for this bill. That is what they want to do. They want to repeal the Affordable Care Act to go back to a point at which it was perfectly acceptable and okay to have 40 million Americans without health insurance. Now, many of us found that statistic unconscionable in this country, the richest country in the history of the world, and we thought it was bad policy to allow for so many uninsured Americans because that also resulted in higher health care costs, but that is what the goal here is. The goal here is to undo all of the protections that allow you to keep [[Page H7121]] your kids on your insurance policies until they are 26, that prohibit insurance companies from discriminating against women because they define being a female as a preexisting condition, and all of these artificial rules and regulations that insurance companies threw upon people, these insurance policies that people bought thinking they had insurance only to find out when they got sick they had nothing. If you want to go back to that, then side with my Republican friends; but what we want to do here is work as we did in Massachusetts, by the way, with Governor Romney, in order to make this work. I will tell you, for the life of me, I don't understand why this is such a radical idea to guarantee everybody in this country good, quality health insurance. [From the National Review, Nov. 13, 2013] Boehner: Upton Bill a Step on Path to Obamacare Repeal (By Jonathan Strong) Before the government shutdown in July, as the defund push from Senators Ted Cruz and Mike Lee was just starting to gain steam, Speaker John Boehner laid-out his preferred Obamacare strategy to House Republicans in a closed-door conference meeting, telling them the GOP could repeal the law with ``targeted strikes that will ultimately dissolve the Obamacare coalition.'' This morning, in another conference meeting, Boehner reminded his colleagues about that strategy and explained how bringing the ``keep your plan'' bill introduced by Representative Fred Upton to the House floor Friday fits into it. ``Remember the strategy for stopping Obamacare we laid out to you back in July. It had two components: Aggressive, coordinated oversight, and targeted legislative strikes aimed at shattering the legislative coalition the president has used to force his law on the nation,'' Boehner said, according to a person in the room. ``That plan is being executed as we speak. But none of it will be effective if we aren't communicating. If we aren't telling the stories our constituents are sharing, then we're letting them down. It means we aren't doing our best to stop this law,'' he added. With that, Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. Pallone), the ranking member of the Energy and Commerce Committee, who suffered a long and arduous Rules Committee last night. Mr. PALLONE. I want to thank my colleague from Massachusetts, not only for having to deal with the ordeal in Rules last night but every day, but also for what he said about the lack of regular order when this Upton bill--this bill by the chairman, Mr. Upton--came to the Rules Committee. Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the Health Subcommittee of the Energy and Commerce Committee. I said in Rules last night--and I will say it again today--that we have had many hearings in the Health Subcommittee and that we have had hearings in the full Energy and Commerce Committee. Over the last 2 or 3 weeks, there was ample opportunity to have this bill proceed with regular order with a subcommittee hearing markup and with a full committee hearing markup. None of that was done. This bill just comes here to the floor directly from Rules, and it is a flawed bill. I want to stress that. I really believe, Mr. Speaker, that this legislation is just another attempt by the GOP to undermine the Affordable Care Act. In fact, I will call this the 46th attempt at repeal. My GOP colleagues have zero interest in helping people gain and keep their health insurance. They have zero interest in fixing any problems that may be occurring with the rollout of the law. They simply want to demonize the President and his policies, as you have heard over and over again, and they will go to any length to do so. At the top of the list are their efforts to sabotage ObamaCare and to force its failure. Yesterday, the President took some action to help Americans who want to renew their insurance policies if their insurance companies are willing to offer that option. Ultimately, though, I believe that these people will look at the quality plans available in the new Affordable Care Act insurance marketplace and like what they see because, in most cases, they will find that they are able to purchase better coverage at lower prices than their original policies so that, when they get sick or when they need care, their policies will actually provide it because most of these older policies simply do not provide adequate insurance. As I said before, the Upton bill before us is not about giving people access to health care. It is about sabotaging ObamaCare. One of my colleagues on the Republican side said they want to have people keep their insurance. The President's initiative yesterday allows them to keep their insurance if they want to, but what the Upton bill does is allow anybody now--anybody, even if they didn't have the old insurance policies--to buy these new skeletal policies that don't provide adequate insurance. So, if you take away the rhetoric of the Republicans, the Upton bill's practical effect would be to continue to allow insurers to exclude people from coverage based on preexisting conditions and to allow insurers to charge women twice as much as men for the same coverage. It would allow insurers to jack up premiums on a family if its child gets sick. It would allow insurers to set harsh annual caps on coverage. All of the discriminatory practices that the ACA and ObamaCare were designed to eliminate come back under the Upton bill. This bill would not require health insurers to allow individuals to keep their current health care plans because insurers can still do whatever they want. You can't force the insurers to offer the plans. It basically allows them to sell low-quality 2013 plans all through 2014. Nothing else. Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 3 minutes. We have talked about the votes in this House to delay or to modify portions of the Affordable Care Act. Indeed, the House has passed seven of those, and they have been signed by the President. What really doesn't ever get much attention are the multiple times that the administration--the President, himself--has changed parts of the Affordable Care Act. If you want to talk about something that was done without any hearings, if you want to talk about something that was done in a non-transparent fashion, if you want to talk about something that was done without the ability to amend or debate on the floor of the House, then let's go through a few of these. Number one: A congressional opt-out. The administration gave Members of Congress and their staffs the option of exempting themselves from the ObamaCare exchanges that were created by the Affordable Care Act, which is contrary to the language of the law. Exchange enrollment: The administration extended by 6 weeks--from February 14 to March 31, 2014--the period in which people can enroll for coverage in order to avoid the individual mandate tax penalty. The employer delay: By an administrative action, which is also contrary to statutory language in the Affordable Care Act, the reporting requirements for employers were delayed by 1 year. Self-attestation: Because of the difficulty of verifying income after the employer reporting requirement was delayed, the administration decided it would allow the self-attestation of income by applicants for health insurance exchanges. Small businesses on hold: The administration said that the Federal exchanges for small businesses would not be ready by the 2014 statutory deadline. Instead, officials delayed until 2015 the implementation of the Federal shop exchanges. Closing the high-risk pools: This one was, I thought, particularly egregious. Mr. Speaker, I, frankly, do not understand why this was not covered by the Nation's press. The administration decided to halt the enrollment in Federal high-risk pools, blocking coverage for an estimated 40,000 new applicants, and it decided, rather than using the money from a fund under Health and Human Services Secretary Sebelius' control to extend coverage for Americans with preexisting conditions, that it would, instead, use this money to pay for advertising for the Affordable Care Act. Remember, the Affordable Care Act was sold to the American people because--remember the quotes?--there were 8 to 12 million people with preexisting conditions. Yet the President's own preexisting pool, which was started in this law when it was signed in March of 2010, was closed on February 1 of 2013, barely 2\1/2\ years into its lifespan. Why have we not heard more about that? This was an administrative action to restrict people from access to the risk pools that they were told they were going to get as a consequence of [[Page H7122]] the President's health care law. Many of these people probably voted for the President in November of 2012 because, after all, he was going to provide them their risk pool insurance for another year--until it didn't happen. Is it any wonder why there is no faith in what the administration says it will do by administrative edict? Why there is no faith in what has come out of the White House? Why congressional action is not just constitutionally required but is required for the people of this country to continue to have faith in their government? I reserve the balance of my time. Mr. McGOVERN. I yield myself such time as I may consume. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman talks about faith. I think the American people have lost faith in the Republican leadership of this House. My friends are so obsessed with this health care bill that they actually shut the government down. Ted Cruz was the Speaker of the House here for a month. I mean, they shut the government down because they do not believe that 40 million uninsured Americans ought to have health insurance. Ezra Klein, in his Washington Post piece on November 14, writes about the Upton bill. He says: It doesn't solve the cancelations problem, but it does manage to put Republicans on the side of insurers, who want to continue discriminating against preexisting conditions. That is what this is all about: giving the insurance companies more of what they want. If you want to know why, follow the money. It is no secret where the insurance companies' allegiances are. Quite frankly, my friends have had 3 years in control to give us their alternative. They have said ``no'' to everything. No, no, no. They try to undercut and repeal everything. What have they offered in 3 years? What is their prescription for the uninsured in America? Take two tax breaks and call me in the morning. That is the best they could come up with. This is a good bill, and we need to work to implement it so that we can make sure that every single American has access to good, quality health insurance. With that, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from New York (Mrs. Maloney). Mrs. CAROLYN B. MALONEY of New York. I thank the gentleman for yielding and for his leadership in providing health care for over 40 million Americans who did not have it. Mr. Speaker, this is the 46th time that our Republican colleagues have tried to repeal or to undermine the Affordable Care Act. I rise in opposition to this closed rule, and I urge a ``no'' vote on the Upton bill. We are here today supposedly to help those people who unexpectedly had their insurance policies canceled. This is a real issue as the President, himself, clearly acknowledged last night. That is why he is taking steps to help these people in the private health care market keep their plans. However, the bill before us now not only fails to solve the problem, it makes things worse by fundamentally undermining the Affordable Care Act in a way that is calculated to doom it to eventual failure. You would be changing the rules in the middle of a game and virtually guaranteeing that premiums would eventually skyrocket for people who did the right thing--who went to the exchange and got a plan. This would price the program out of existence. Doing that would take us all back to a time when over 40 million Americans did not have access to affordable health insurance, including 2.6 million New Yorkers. We must not turn our backs on those people now. We absolutely have problems we need to fix, and we have issues we need to solve, but we are on the verge of finally covering millions of Americans who lack the fundamental security of affordable health coverage for their families. We are finally close to achieving a goal for millions that has been pursued for nearly a century under Republican and Democratic administrations alike. This is a problem we must solve without turning our backs on those families forced into bankruptcy simply because someone in the household got sick. This is a problem we must solve for the sake of all of those women who were denied insurance or who had to pay up to 40 percent more for insurance simply because they were women. This is a problem we must solve for the sake of all of those people with preexisting conditions and for all of those young adults who can stay on their parents' plans until they turn 27. We did not embark on this effort because we thought it would be easy. We embarked on this effort to provide health care to millions because we thought it was a moral imperative, an economic necessity, and a fundamental human right. Yes, it is hard to get it right, but ultimately this is an effort that history will judge not by the number of computer errors but by the number of lives saved. Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to vote ``no'' on this bill and ``yes'' for health care for millions of Americans. Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 minute for the purposes of response. Talk about changing the rules in the middle of the game. What in the world was that Presidential press conference 24 hours ago all about? It was about changing the rules by executive fiat. Again, I just went through a list of many of the 27 times that the President has changed the rules in the middle of the game. What about the times the administration has been engaged in ``hide the ball'' from the American people, from the Nation's Governors, from the Nation's insured? What about the fact that the rule for the essential health benefit was held up until 2 days after Election Day last year? Then the Governors had to make a decision as to whether or not to participate in the exchanges in their States a week later. Is it any wonder they could not make a decision of that amount of import in a week's time? Sure, they were given another month's extension, but eventually, 26 Governors said, I can't do it based on the information provided. Another six Governors said, Okay, but the Federal Government is going to have to set up the exchanges. That is why you have 32 States for which the Federal Government is having to set up the Federal fallback exchange. I reserve the balance of my time. Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, at this point, it is my privilege to yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. Andrews). {time} 1000 (Mr. ANDREWS asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.) Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend for the time. In March of 2010, the President signed the Affordable Care Act. In that law, there was a revision that said on January 1 of 2014 if insurance plans did not have important consumer protections, like getting rid of lifetime policy limits and annual limits, that they couldn't be sold anymore. For over 3\1/2\ years, the insurance industry had noticed that the day was coming when they could not sell these plans anymore. They chose to wait until the last couple of weeks to send out notices to millions of Americans saying they couldn't renew their plans next year. This is unfair to those Americans, and it is a problem that ought to be fixed. The President has stepped forward with a plan to address this to help those Americans. I support what he is doing. The House Democrats will have an opportunity to put on the floor some votes that will further improve that situation as this debate goes on. This problem of people having their policies canceled is unwarranted and unwelcome, and we should work together to fix it. The underlying bill here does not fix the problem; it creates a problem. It is very important to understand what the underlying bill does. It says that insurance plans that discriminate against you because you are a woman or because you had skin cancer, or insurance plans that say that in the middle of your chemotherapy you can run out of coverage, or insurance plans that say that after you paid your premiums for months or even years the insurance company can cancel you because you got sick, those plans can continue to be sold to everyone--to everyone. The problem that we are trying to address is people that have such plans and want to keep them be given the opportunity to keep them. That is what [[Page H7123]] the President's decision does, which is why we support it. The underlying bill says that these plans can be opened up to anybody who wants to buy this. That sounds kind of fair at first glance. If someone wants to buy that kind of plan, shouldn't they be able to? Well, ladies and gentlemen of the House, here is the question: If someone buys a plan that pulls the plug on their chemotherapy in the middle and they keep getting care, who pays for it? The taxpayers do and the other premium payers do. That is who pays for it. This plan that is before the House today, this Republican bill, is a guarantee of rate shock for the American people because here is what will happen. If anyone who wants to can buy one of these cars without an airbag or cars without seatbelts--and that is what these plans are--then you will find that the new marketplaces don't have enough people in them. When they don't have enough people in them, the rates will rise. When the rates spike for people in the marketplaces, they will spike for people who get employer-sponsored health care because the possibility of the marketplaces is already reducing the premium increases that employers are seeing. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. McGOVERN. I yield an additional minute to the gentleman. Mr. ANDREWS. I thank the gentleman. So the employer rates, which have risen at the slowest rates in the last 5 or 6 years, would once again be subject to the kind of spikes that happen here. Look, I think there is bipartisan agreement in this Chamber this morning that if someone has gotten a cancelation notice, we want to help that person keep their plan if they choose to keep it. We agree with that, the President agrees with that. That is what he set out to do. What we do not want, and what this bill does, is to guarantee rate shock, guarantee a premium spike for Americans, whether they are in these plans that we are talking about today, whether they are in the new marketplaces, or whether they receive insurance through their employer. We need additional protections where insurance commissioners around this country can step forward and investigate arbitrary and unfair practices, where they can protect consumers, and

House Democrats are going to put forward such an opportunity to vote on that at the conclusion of this debate. Let's not in the guise of solving one problem magnify another one. We should oppose this rule and oppose the underlying bill. Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire as to how much time is remaining. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas has 13 minutes remaining. The gentleman from Colorado has 4\1/2\ minutes remaining. Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 3 minutes for purposes of a response. The rate shock issue is one about which every Member of this House should be concerned. Let me read to you from a letter I received from a constituent who lives in The Colony, Texas, a city within my congressional district. They are complaining about the cost and lack of transparency on the healthcare.gov Web site: The prices the ObamaCare Web site say we can expect based on our ages are $372 to $600. But when I go to actually purchase, those prices automatically become $870. We don't qualify for subsidies so that was not part of any of the calculations. The constituent goes on to say: It is bad enough the President has lied to us on multiple points--$2,500 a year savings, keep your plan, keep your doctor--but also the Web site is designed to mislead us about the price as well. What is the reason that the ObamaCare site and health carrier sites don't agree? I just saw a North Carolina couple on the news who had the same experience and the insurance carrier told them that the prices on the carrier sites are correct and those prices on healthcare.gov are incorrect. There is rate shock going on in the country right now. That is what part of this debate is about today. But let me just caution my colleagues on the other side of the aisle that the true rate shock experience is likely to hit in September of 2014, about 6 weeks before election day on November 14. What is the reason for that rate shock? Well, we all know that the healthcare.gov Web site was, so far, the abysmal failure. The administration is counting on a certain demographic to flood that Web site and sign up for their wonderful new Elysian Fields of ObamaCare. It is hard, so they are not going to do it. But people who are older, perhaps have multiple chronic conditions, who are actually fearful about losing their health care coverage, they are going to keep at it. Bless their hearts. They will keep going. They will keep coming back day after day after day until they can finally get through and sign up for the insurance policy. Yeah, it is more expensive than I want, it doesn't cover as much as I want, but, by golly, I will have something at the start of the year. The problem is the demographic that the administration counted on to sign up is not going to sign up. Beginning about April of next year, the insurance companies are going to begin to price risk. That is what they do. That is what they do well. So they are going to post risk and they will post their prices somewhere along the lines of July 1 to September 30. Those prices for the renewal of health insurance are going to be staggeringly high; they will be astonishingly high. The rate shock that is fixing to happen, you ain't seen nothing yet. It is coming in the fall, and it will be unbelievable compared to anything you have seen to date. I reserve the balance of my time. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Members are reminded to refrain from engaging in personalities toward the President. This restriction includes quoting from extraneous materials. Without objection, the gentleman from Colorado now controls the time and is recognized. There was no objection. Mr. POLIS. The Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from California (Ms. Pelosi), the Democratic leader. Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding. I thank him for his leadership and that of the full Rules Committee on having to field some really strange notions masquerading as proposals to improve the lives of the American people. We see a lot of that these days. This one on the floor today really takes the cake because it is essentially to pull the plug on the Affordable Care Act. While it says that they want to delay the cancelations that the insurance companies have written to policyholders, the bill does not mandate. This is a conversation that is not an action, but it does violence to the bill in other ways. The idea that it was helping consumers was sort of the Trojan horse whose underbelly is poisonous in terms of the health and well-being of the American people. Mr. Speaker, I come to the floor to speak on the rule because I think it is really important for Members to vote against the rule as a point of fairness. If we reject this rule and allow the Rules Committee to come back to the floor with an opportunity for there to be a Democratic alternative, that would be fair. What we would do in the vote on the previous question, which I urge people to vote ``no'' on, would be able to vote ``yes,'' or consider voting ``yes,'' on a bill that does exactly what consumers need in terms of this cancelation area. First of all, it would say that there would be a real delay--a real delay--for 1 year for the implementation in terms of the individual policyholders. That is just this piece of the bill that is the question--individual policyholders. Ninety-five percent of the American people, as has been said, who have policies that they like can keep them. It is this 5 percent--and that is a lot of people, I don't want to minimize that--but, nonetheless, it is a discrete market. Let's address that discrete market and in our previous question we bring up a bill that addresses that discrete market not only by enabling them to hold their policies for a year, but by requiring that the insurance companies must tell people not that you are canceled and we want to sign you up again at a higher cost; instead, insurance companies would be obliged to tell people what their options are, what their options are under the Affordable Care Act in terms of having no lifetime limits on their policies, no annual limits [[Page H7124]] on their policies, no preexisting condition, increasing the cost of their policy, or preventing them from holding their policy should they become sick, A; B, it would also make sure that the insurance companies tell people what their options are in the exchanges, that they may qualify for a subsidy. In that marketplace the insurance companies are competing-- this is a free market, this exchange--they are competing for their policy; and, therefore, that has already lowered cost to consumers. So they may have a better policy with better benefits at a lower cost and, if they qualify, get a subsidy to do it. In addition to that, it is really important in every respect in everything we do, not only just for this individual marketplace, for people to understand the benefits of the Affordable Care Act that are available to them. I mentioned no preexisting condition, no annual limits, no lifetime limits, but also that already for over the past year young people can be on their parents' insurance. Over 3 million people have benefited in that regard. Tens of millions of seniors have benefited from the free prevention check-up--mammograms, whatever kinds of things--prevention and wellness exams free, no co-pay, no deductible. Already seniors are experiencing lower costs for their prescription drugs because of the Affordable Care Act. Already small children cannot be discriminated against, nor their families, in seeking insurance because they have a preexisting condition. Imagine a child born with a defect for life. They have a preexisting condition which will cost them dearly in terms of premiums, if they can even get insurance, and then it would be with limits. Not so. That has all changed. That is why on this Upton bill which, as I said, not only does bad things to the Affordable Care Act in terms of disrupting the risk pools, it tries to masquerade as something that does something positive, which it does not. That is why the Upton bill is opposed by a broad coalition of groups: the American Heart Association, the American Diabetes Association, the American Cancer Society Action Network, National Partnership for Women and Families, Paralyzed Veterans of America. Anyone with a preexisting medical condition--100 million people, families with people with preexisting medical conditions, all of them benefit. The stories are so glorious and so beautiful about what a difference the Affordable Care Act has made to families, especially those with small children or those with preexisting conditions, and to seniors. And, again, being a woman is no longer a preexisting medical condition. So this is politics; it is not about policy. It isn't any attempt to improve the Affordable Care Act. One way to improve it, though, is what we have in our previous question: give the State insurance commissioners the authority, all of them--some of them have it--but ensure that all of them have the authority to investigate and act upon rate increases, as well as the nature of these letters that were sent out without the integrity that they should have had. Again, we require that also in these letters the insurance companies make sure that people know what their opportunities are. {time} 1015 So what we are proposing today really does make a difference. In fact, we wanted to get this requirement of the insurance commissioners in the underlying bill, and then we said, okay, we will do that as an improvement. Today is the day that we can do that by voting ``no'' on the rule, enabling us to bring a bill to the floor that would do that. I urge our colleagues to support the Affordable Care Act, support what it does for American families, stand with those who fought for Social Security, for Medicare, and affordable care for all Americans because these are three pillars of equal weight in terms of the economic and health security of the American people. They honor the vows of our Founders for life, a healthier life; liberty, the liberty to pursue your happiness so that you are not job locked, constrained by a policy, but free to follow your passion to be self-employed, to start a business, to change jobs, to be entrepreneurial--life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Vote ``no'' on the rule. Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 3 minutes. Mr. Speaker, I want to remind Members of the House of Representatives about the President's press conference yesterday. I would like to read from the transcript of his remarks. The President yesterday, he first talked about the problems with the healthcare.gov Web site, ``big problems, and maybe we can talk about those a little bit,'' but then he went on to say: The other problem that has received a lot of attention concerns Americans who've received letters from their insurers that they may be losing the plans they bought in the old individual market, often because they no longer meet the law's requirements. It seems pretty straightforward to me what the President was saying yesterday. He goes on to say: Now, as I indicated earlier, I completely get how upsetting this can be for a lot of Americans, particularly after assurances they heard from me that, if they had a plan that they liked, they could keep it. And to those Americans, I hear you loud and clear. I said that I would do everything we can to fix this problem, and today I am offering an idea that will help do it. Already people who have plans that predate the Affordable Care Act can keep those plans if they haven't changed. That was already in the law. That's what's called a grandfather that was included in the law. Today, we're going to extend that principle both to the people whose plans have changed since the law took effect and to people who bought plans since the law took effect. You know, it is interesting, the 10th Amendment to the Constitution should actually protect the States to issue their own directives through their State insurance commissioners. They didn't need the President of the United States to do that. That is a power that has been enshrined to them in the Constitution. The problem is that power was taken away under the Affordable Care Act. Now they have attempted to bring it back. But the fact of the matter is, in many States, patients and constituents won't have that protection, but the Upton bill today will actually provide that protection. Make no mistake, the Upton bill is not a fix-it bill to the Affordable Care Act; it is a lifeline that we are extending to our constituents who have lost the coverage that they were told that they could keep. I reserve the balance of my time. Mr. POLIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Fattah). Mr. FATTAH. Mr. Speaker, I only have a minute, so let me be concise. On Monday, I was in San Diego with 30,000 brain researchers excited about the age of discovery and attacking diseases like Alzheimer's and bipolar and schizophrenia. Yesterday, via satellite, I spoke to a public health conference in Brussels for the European Union. Their theme was that the wealth of their member countries was the health of their population. And then I come to the floor today where we see people who want to retreat from the idea which is to make sure that every single person in our country, for the first time in this Nation's history, has access to affordable health care coverage. There will be no retreat, no equivocation. I know there is this desire among Members on the other team always to somehow go backwards, to some other age in our country as if our future is in the past. Our future and the shaping impulse of our country is in the future, and it is in the health of the citizens of our country. Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from Tennessee (Mrs. Blackburn), the vice chair of the full committee. Mrs. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to stand in support of the rule that will allow us to bring the Keep Your Health Plan Act to the floor. It is important that we take this action today on H.R. 3350 because we have heard from the American people, from coast to coast, that they do not want the President's health care law. They do not like the President's health care law. They feel as if, and have realized that what is happening with this law is that, number one, it is restricting their choice and options when it comes to health insurance, and, number two, the cost is skyrocketing. [[Page H7125]] Now, we know that that is very important to our families who have chosen health plans that meet their needs--health savings accounts that allowed them to take individual responsibility for their health care, allowed them the opportunities for choosing doctors and physicians and keeping those doctors and physicians--and what the American people are telling us and our constituents are telling us is that they do, indeed, feel betrayed by the empty promises that the President and this administration have made. They are also quite concerned about the botched Web site rollout; as I said, the insurance premiums; and, oh, those cancelation notices that are hitting the mailboxes of millions of Americans. They say, This is not what we bargained for. It is not what we were promised. It is not what we voted or spoke in favor of. And so they are asking us to take an action, and H.R. 3350 does take that action. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to go back to 2010 when we had a conference and the President was before us, and I asked him a question about the ability to keep plans and for individuals to stay insured. I spoke because of the experience we had had in my State of Tennessee with the test case for HillaryCare, which was called TennCare. We saw the effects of that. We knew it was the test case for a public option in health care; we knew it was too expensive to afford; and, overall, we knew it did not work. In his response, the President mentioned a little bit about some stray cats and dogs and that he thought they had that cleaned up. But I have to tell you that our constituents and their policies are not stray cats and dogs, and they deserve to have the opportunity to keep their health care and not to be treated in a disrespectful manner or to be discarded to the sidelines. So the President needs to realize he cannot go around waving a magic wand and fixing this by executive fiat. This is a law. We are a Nation of laws, and we abide by the rule of law. ObamaCare, the President's health care law, is the law of the land. In order to provide relief to the American people who have clearly spoken to say they do not want this law, it requires an action of Congress. Today's action will provide relief for some individuals--not as many as we would like, but it is one step in providing some relief. The American people have grown weary of this administration spending money that it does not have on programs the American people do not want. The President's health care law is a great example of a program that the American people do not want, so they have come to us as the people's representative and reminded us that we are a government of, by, and for the people that should be working for the people. And as one of my constituents told me Monday, we, the people, are going to start being the people and holding this administration and this Congress accountable. Today is one of those steps that we are taking on behalf of our constituents and the people of this great Nation. I thank the gentleman from Texas for the exceptional work that he has done in working with Chairman Upton from Michigan in bringing this to the floor. Mr. POLIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California (Mr. Becerra), the chair of the Democratic Caucus. Mr. BECERRA. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding. In the past month, 500,000 Americans have secured affordable health insurance. They are people that include folks in my State of California like Erin Kotecki Vest, who said the old plan she had had all sorts of deductibles and out-of-pocket costs. At the end of the day, what does she say after going on Covered California's marketplace exchange? She will be saving $18,900 per year by having shopped on the exchange under the Affordable Care Act. Paulo Dawud said he passed on an employer-based insurance policy that would have cost him $504 a month. He got on Covered California's Web site. He picked Kaiser. He now qualifies for a plan that charges $176 a month. Allen Pacela says his wife would not have insurance coverage at all as of January 1. They shopped on the Web site. They are now saving $8,000 a year for, as he says, ``a very much better plan.'' And Andrew Stryker from Los Angeles, California, 34 years old, lives in the city of Los Angeles, had to wait 3 hours to enroll--$6,000 savings. Let's improve this plan. Let's not destroy it. It is time to move forward and give Americans what they need--health security. Mr. POLIS. If I may inquire, does the gentleman have any remaining speakers? Mr. BURGESS. Well, I am always here, so I remain as a speaker. Mr. POLIS. Is the gentleman prepared to close? Mr. BURGESS. Absolutely. Mr. POLIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of my time. If we defeat the previous question, I will offer an amendment to the rule that will allow the House to vote on a substitute that allows Americans to keep their insurance if they like it. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert the text of the amendment in the Record, along with extraneous material, immediately prior to the vote on the previous question. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado? There was no objection. Mr. POLIS. Mr. Speaker, there are a number of ways that we can improve upon the Affordable Care Act. One of the ones that I would like to highlight that we could be bringing here to the floor today that the Senate already passed is comprehensive immigration reform. H.R. 15 here in the House, a bipartisan bill that I am confident would pass if brought to the floor, would finally make a dent in the fact that there are more than 10 million people here in this country illegally, the vast majority of whom don't have any access to health insurance. So American citizens are essentially being forced to pay for the health care costs of people who are here illegal every day until we pass comprehensive immigration reform. We are wondering why rates are going up. It is no surprise, Mr. Speaker. When somebody doesn't have insurance, their costs are shifted on to other people who do. Now, yes, there are Americans who don't have insurance, and the Affordable Care Act helps increase the access that many Americans have to insurance, but it doesn't do a thing about the fact that there are more than 10 million people here illegally in this country in violation of our laws who do not have health care insurance. If we can pass H.R. 15, Mr. Speaker, people who are here illegally will have to get insurance on their own instead of forcing Americans to pay for their insurance. I urge my colleagues to vote ``no'' on this rule, defeat the previous question. I yield back the balance of my time. Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of my time. I can't help but think back to that September evening in 2009 when the President stood before a joint session of Congress after the August recess and made a statement to the Nation that, yes, he was trying to change health care but not to worry, that no one who was in the country without the benefit of a Social Security number would be included in that cost because many people are concerned that the cost for the Affordable Care Act, already high, would expand unreasonably if that were to change; and the President made a promise to the American people that night. {time} 1030 Mr. Speaker, we have heard a lot of stuff today. I really wish there had been that much interest in improving the Affordable Care Act before it passed the first time. We all know the reasons why those improvements were not offered and why we just simply had to have a take it or leave it proposition that was ultimately signed into law. Mr. Speaker, today's rule provides for the consideration of a critical bill to protect the millions of Americans who are facing the loss of health insurance that they were promised that they could keep. I certainly thank my friend from Michigan (Mr. Upton), the chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, for producing this thoughtful piece of legislation. [[Page H7126]] Mr. Speaker, I ask for its approval by the body. The material previously referred to by Mr. Polis is as follows: Strike all and insert the following: Resolved, That immediately upon adoption of this resolution, it shall be in order to consider in the House the bill (H.R. 3350) to authorize health insurance issuers to continue to offer for sale current individual health insurance coverage in satisfaction of the minimum essential health insurance coverage requirement, and for other purposes. All points of order against consideration of the bill are waived. An amendment in the nature of a substitute consisting of the text printed in section 2 of this resolution shall be considered as adopted. The bill, as amended, shall be considered as read. All points of order against provisions in the bill, as amended, are waived. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill, as amended, and on any amendment thereto without intervening motion except: (1) one hour of debate equally divided and controlled by the chair and ranking minority member of the [Committee on Energy and Commerce]; and (2) one motion to recommit with or without instructions. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time and move the previous question on the resolution. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of House Resolution 413, I call up the bill (H.R. 3350) to authorize health insurance issuers to continue to offer for sale current individual health insurance coverage in satisfaction of the minimum essential health insurance coverage requirement, and for other purposes, and ask for its immediate consideration. The Clerk read the title of the bill. The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Yoder). Pursuant to House Resolution 413, the bill is considered read. The text of the bill is as follows: H.R. 3350 Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE. This Act may be cited as the ``Keep Your Health Plan Act of 2013''. SEC. 2. IF YOU LIKE YOUR HEALTH CARE PLAN, YOU CAN KEEP IT. (a) In General.--Notwithstanding any provision of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act (including any amendment made by such Act or by the Health Care and Education Reconciliation Act of 2010), a health insurance issuer that has in effect health insurance coverage in the individual market as of January 1, 2013, may continue after such date to offer such coverage for sale during 2014 in such market outside of an Exchange established under section 1311 or 1321 of such Act (42 U.S.C. 18031, 18041). (b) Treatment as Grandfathered Health Plan in Satisfaction of Minimum Essential Coverage.--Health insurance coverage described in subsection (a) shall be treated as a grandfathered health plan for purposes of the amendment made by section 1501(b) of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan (Mr. Upton) and the gentleman from California (Mr. Waxman) each will control 30 minutes. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan. General Leave Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material on H.R. 3350. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan? There was no objection. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1\1/2\ minutes. Mr. Speaker, across generations, Presidencies are often associated with one famous utterance: ``Ask not what your country can do for you,'' ``The only thing we have to fear,'' ``Tear down this wall.'' And our current President will be no different: ``If you like your health care plan, you can keep it, period.'' For the last 3 years, the President repeated this promise in selling his signature law, and he did so with the knowledge that it would not be met. Millions of Americans, including nearly 250,000 in Michigan, took the President at his word and now, unexpectedly, are receiving cancelation notices. They are confused, worried, and upset. Today we stand with those families with the Keep Your Health Plan Act. This bill is to help provide peace of mind to folks like the farmer in Bangor, Michigan, who just found out after purchasing his family's insurance for the last 30 years that he will be able to keep that plan no more. And the sticker shock will be unbearable, as the premiums double and their deductible jumps nearly $3,000. Sadly, they are not alone. For millions of Americans, it is cancelations today, sticker shock tomorrow. For the last 6 weeks, the White House stood idly by, ignoring the pleas of millions. But as the administration's allies in Congress panicked, the White House went from attacking our thoughtful bill to making an end run [[Page H7129]] around Congress with a universal ``fix.'' Our straightforward one-page bill says if you like your current coverage, you should be able to keep it. The President should heed his own advice and work with us, the Congress, as the Founders intended, not around the legislative process. Everyone today should embrace the Keep Your Health Plan Act, and our efforts to protect Americans from the damage of this law should not stop there. Let's keep the promise. I reserve the balance of my time. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 3 minutes. This bill is not a bill to let people keep their health insurance plans. The President took care of that issue yesterday. This bill is another vote to repeal the Affordable Care Act. It would take away the core protections of that law. This bill creates an entire shadow market of substandard health care plans. It will destabilize the health insurance exchanges, raise premiums, and continue to allow insurers to discriminate on the basis of preexisting conditions. The bill takes away the core consumer protections that are part of the law. Under the Republican bill, it ensures to cherry-pick the best risks and destabilize the insurance market for everyone else. That is what we would have if they repealed the law. People would still be out of a chance to get health insurance. Now, I understand the concern of many Members, that individuals should be able to keep their health insurance if they like it; but there is a profound difference between providing relief for individuals whose policies have been canceled, which is what the President did yesterday, and re-creating the discriminatory, inefficient insurance market that we had before health reform, which is what this bill will do. We need to have some perspective on this issue. For those currently in the individual insurance market, nearly 5 million people, they will be eligible for a tax credit worth an average of $5,000. Over a million more people will be eligible for Medicaid, which means additional savings. Because of better coverage that protects them from crippling medical costs, millions more will lower their out-of-pocket costs; and the 25 million Americans without insurance will finally get a good deal on quality coverage. No one can be denied coverage because of preexisting conditions. No one will see higher rates because they get sick. No one will see their rates go up. No one will run up against annual coverage limits or realize too late that their plan didn't cover the key benefits that they need. {time} 1115 This week, we learned that 1.5 million people have already applied for coverage--a faster signup rate than experienced in Massachusetts-- even with all the technical problems we have had. In my State of California, nearly 400,000 people have begun applications in the first month. There will be a total of 6 months to sign up. This program is going to work. These are significant signs of progress. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. WAXMAN. I yield myself an additional 10 seconds. They show us we are on our way to dramatically expanding health insurance coverage in this Nation. This bill will take us backwards. I urge a ``no'' vote, and I reserve the balance of my time. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from the good State of Oregon (Mr. Walden). Mr. WALDEN. I thank the chairman for yielding and for bringing this bill to the floor. Mr. Speaker, I rise today as the voice of at least 150,000 Oregonians who have already received their cancelation notices. They have been told that the policy they liked, that they wanted to keep, they cannot have any longer. I was out in my district for 8 straight days last week--36 meetings, 12 counties, 2,476 miles on the road, from morning to late at night. And I am going to tell you there are people like Chuck and Jan in Medford who had gone into retirement, had health insurance, and got a notice that their plan has been canceled. From Mitchell to Bend to Enterprise to Medford--all over--not only are their plans being canceled, the replacements are coming back with deductibles that are $12,000 to $15,000, when they were paying a couple thousand dollars. The premiums are going up--in some cases, double or more. Some of them may get a subsidy, a lot of them won't, and now they don't have the plan they were promised that they could keep. And another thing that is insidious that is going on below the surface, in meeting after meeting, hours are being cut back. People are losing their jobs. They are getting less take-home pay because of ObamaCare. This is a problem all across America. The promise that you could keep your plan was never to be kept, and they knew it. And they continued to say it, and it wasn't true. People are losing their plans, they are losing their coverage, and they are losing access to the specialists that may save their lives. They won't be able to keep their doctors. Oh, they may, but if the doctor is out of network, there is no cap on what they will pay in terms of a deductible. So financially, you take away their access to health care. The prices have gone up; the access has gone down. And by the way, in many cases, they have lost their jobs or their hours have been cut back. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. Rangel), who played such an important role in drafting the Affordable Care Act. Mr. RANGEL. Let me thank Congressman Waxman for giving me this opportunity. The majority has said that Presidents are remembered by certain things, and this outstanding President will be remembered because he said, if you have a plan--and he didn't say ``no matter how bad it is''--you can keep it. I think he will be remembered historically as being the first President in the United States of America that has told people that, for the first time, every American will have access to affordable health care. On the other side, history is going to record them, too. They never said that they had any concern at all and never had a plan for the 30 million people that every day are waiting for this plan to go into effect, and that they would publicly acknowledge that they don't want to improve upon mistakes that may have been made but they want to derail, to destroy, and to eliminate and to repeal universal health care for Americans. I say this. The President apologized yesterday, and I apologize for the United States Congress to those people without insurance today. If you believe that the administration has done something wrong, for God's sake, let's work together to correct it. But to just ignore the fact that 70 percent of Americans already have good insurance and it is going to be improved, to ignore the fact that 30 million people and their legacy is in jeopardy because they can't afford to have serious illnesses, and to believe that those that belong to the 5 percent that really get caught in what we are supposed to be fixing today, I tell you that there is no evidence at all that the Republican Party wanted to fix anything for the uninsured of America. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Georgia, Dr. Gingrey, a member of the Health Subcommittee. Mr. GINGREY of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York just said it: universal health care, single-payer system, a government takeover of one-sixth of our economy. That is what they wanted from the very beginning. I rise today in support of H.R. 3350, the Keep Your Health Plan Act now. The Obama administration's health exchange enrollment announcement on Wednesday is one of the myriad reasons we must pass this bill. Frankly, these long-awaited numbers did not come as a surprise to us. A mere 100,000 registered for health care on the new marketplaces when they anticipated 500,000. According to a Health and Human Services report, the number does not distinguish even between those that actually paid a premium and those that just selected a plan by clicking a button on the Web site. Mr. Speaker, the number of Americans who have had their health plans [[Page H7130]] canceled is in the millions--exponentially higher than those who receive coverage under ObamaCare. This disastrous law was destined to fail from the start. We on this side of the aisle, the Republicans--and indeed, the American people-- have known for 3 years that this plan is unworkable for small businesses; it is unfair for physicians and their patients; and it is unaffordable for we the taxpayer, we the people. I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 3350. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. Pallone), the top Democrat on the Health Subcommittee of Energy and Commerce. Mr. PALLONE. Thank you, Mr. Waxman. Unfortunately, today's bill is a ruse. It claims to make things better, but all it does is to make things terribly worse. Republicans will hide behind a sound bite and nice-sounding title. But what this bill really does is to go back to the old, broken health insurance system. This is just another attempt for the GOP to repeal the provisions of the Affordable Care Act. They have made it their mission to push the ACA to failure, and the only consequence is just that: seriously damaging the insurance provisions of the Affordable Care Act and the millions of Americans who are expected to benefit from the improved coverage and premium and cost-sharing subsidies available through the new health insurance marketplace. The GOP claims the bill allows people to keep their health plans, but actually it allows old policies with fewer benefits and sometimes higher prices to be sold to new enrollees. One of the major goals of the ACA was to improve the quality of health insurance policies sold on the private market. Beginning in 2014, health insurance plans can no longer deny coverage for adults with preexisting conditions or charge those individuals more for coverage. And there are a lot of other discriminatory practices that are eliminated by the ACA. We need to be open to constructive changes to make this law work to the best of its ability, but that is not what the GOP is doing today. No one believes the Republicans care about ensuring that people have health insurance. If they did, then Republicans would not, for purely political reasons, refuse to expand Medicaid with those Republican Governors in the States where now 5 million hardworking Americans across 26 States will not have Medicaid expansion because of Republican politics. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the President took action to help Americans who want to renew their old insurance policies. Ultimately, though, I hope that those Americans who want to renew those old policies will look at the quality plans available in the new Affordable Care Act insurance marketplace and like what they see. In most cases, they will find they are able to purchase better coverage at a lower price than their original policies, so, when they get sick or need care, they will actually have it--not with these old policies that, for the most part, are not going to provide them with good health insurance. I urge my colleagues to oppose this bill. This is just another repeal effort on the part of the Republicans. They are not serious about trying to provide insurance, and this will accomplish nothing for the American people. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. Barton), the chairman emeritus of the Energy and Commerce Committee. (Mr. BARTON asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.) Mr. BARTON. I appreciate the chairman yielding. Mr. Speaker, we are here today to begin the long process of amending--hopefully improving, and if that is not possible, at some point in time, repealing--the Affordable Care Act. The President, as everybody knows by now, repeatedly said that if you like your health insurance, you can keep it. Well, it has been proven that even when he said it, that was not true. Yesterday, the President admitted as much when he said for the next year he would try to honor that promise, if only in the breach. The Upton bill actually correctly honors that promise in the correct way by legislatively saying that insurance can continue to provide these private policies--and I would assume some employer-sponsored policies--regardless of whether they meet the new minimum standards under the Affordable Care Act. The bill does not require insurance companies to do so, but it does allow them to do so. As sponsors of the bill, it is our hope that many companies will do so. It is a reasonable expectation that millions of Americans, given that choice, will actually keep the plans that they have and that they like. At some point in time, though, Mr. Speaker--this bill is not the end of the process; it is the beginning--we need to come back and fix the rest of the law or perhaps even change it or repeal it. I have a bill that I hope will be brought to the floor at some point in the near future that will make ObamaCare voluntary. Let the American people choose what parts of the new law they like, and if they decide they don't like some parts or all of the law, they wouldn't be compelled--mandated--to continue to use some of these new policies. So, Mr. Speaker, I want to commend Chairman Upton and Subcommittee Chairman Pitts for bringing this bill so expeditiously to the floor. I would hope that we can have a unanimous vote in support of it. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will not get a unanimous vote. At this time, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. Levin), the ranking member of the Ways and Means Committee. (Mr. LEVIN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.) Mr. LEVIN. Mr. Speaker, the Republicans are on a mission of destruction. Nothing will satisfy them except that very mission. The Upton bill is another weapon in that mission. What the Republicans fear most of all is that health care reform will eventually work. The Upton bill is a bill to make sure that it does not work. The President has taken a step to help people keep their policies. The Upton bill opens the door to anyone at all to make sure that health care reform is not workable and that the private market cannot work. So back to the time of 50 million uninsured. So back to the time of cancelation for preexisting conditions. So back to the time of no cap. The alternative is bankruptcy. Eight years ago, the Medicare drug program that Republicans had passed got off to a rocky start. Did we Democrats pounce on it for political gain? No. We put the country first and helped make the program a success. The Republicans are marching in the opposite direction--the path of destroying instead of making something work. Let's work together to make it work rather than destroying what Americans want: a healthy health care program for all Americans. {time} 1130 Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Cantor), the majority leader of the House. Mr. CANTOR. I thank the chairman, the gentleman from Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of the Keep Your Health Plan Act. Many Americans today are worried. They are worried about their jobs, worried about saving for their children's college educations or worried about saving for their retirements, and now, Mr. Speaker, millions of Americans are worried about coming home and opening their mailboxes to find out that their health care coverage has been taken from them because of the President's health care law. The President repeatedly said that if you liked your health care plan, you could keep it. We knew this was a promise he could not keep, and now it is a promise he has broken. As a result, millions of Americans across the country are receiving cancelation letters just like this one. Mr. Speaker, this letter was sent to me by a constituent of mine. His name is Bruno Gora. He is from Richmond, Virginia. Bruno is self- employed, and he purchases his health care plan through Anthem BlueCross/Blue Shield. A few weeks ago, he was shocked to receive this letter because this letter clearly reads: ``To meet the [[Page H7131]] requirements of the new law, your current plan can no longer be offered.'' Purchasing a new plan could potentially cost Mr. Gora thousands of dollars. Why should he or anyone else be forced off their plan if they want to keep it? Working families across America were counting on the President to keep his promise. Now they are counting on us to ease some of the pain that his health care law has brought on them. Yesterday, President Obama announced that he was going to be making some unilateral changes, but the changes he proposed and the ones we are proposing in the House have some very clear differences. The President's plan restricts coverage previously available to only those who already had it while forcing others to purchase a plan from healthcare.gov or to buy more expensive coverage that may not fit their needs. The White House doesn't even know how they are going to implement the plan they announced yesterday. This proposal that we are talking about here, Chairman Upton's plan, aims to help Americans keep their health insurance and give their neighbors a chance to buy the same plans rather than forcing them onto a faulty Web site to buy new coverage they may not like or cannot afford. Under this legislation, there is no confusion. The Keep Your Health Plan Act removes the impediment in the law that restricts insurance plans from being offered. The only way to completely stop any more cancelation letters like the one Mr. Gora received is through a full repeal of ObamaCare. Today, however, we have an opportunity to stand united and pass a bipartisan measure that aims to slow the growing number of Americans harmed by this law. I would like to thank Chairman Upton for his hard work and dedication to the issue, and I urge all of my colleagues in the House to support this bill. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, at this time, I wish to yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. Dingell), the dean of the House, the chairman emeritus of the Energy and Commerce Committee and the longest- standing Member in support of universal health care coverage. (Mr. DINGELL asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.) Mr. DINGELL. I thank my friend for yielding me this time, and I express great affection and respect for my dear friend, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. Upton), who serves the House and his constituents well. However, Mr. Speaker, this is a regrettable piece of legislation. It is nothing more or less than the kind of insurance policies, which are being authorized by it, that were sold by snake oil salesmen around this country, policies which gave no relief, no help, and no benefit to the American people. The sad situation is that this not only allows some people to keep their policies, but it allows a lot of snake oil salesmen to run around the country, selling bad policies which undo almost all of the protections which we have put into the Affordable Care Act, things like protections against preexisting conditions or the fact that a woman who might be buying a policy can be charged more under this legislation on a new policy issued by some sneaky insurance company. The harsh fact of the matter is that this is not a help to citizens. The President said yesterday that he was going to take steps to correct the problems. If we really want to have this done properly, then that is the way to do it. Let us work together to have these matters corrected properly. Let us see to it that the American people get the protections they need against abusive practices and not that we return to them. H.R. 3350 allows the new sales of bad policies--which contain programs and practices that are barred by ACA--to new and gullible purchasers, the ones whom we say we seek to protect. As I observed yesterday, the insurance companies feel that this is going to cause huge confusion in the market, and they do not seek this legislation. The average citizen has been sold a bill of lading which is just plainly false. He is not going to be benefited by H.R. 3350. He is simply going to be afforded the opportunity to buy bad policies, whereas what we want to do is see to it that if he has his policy he can keep it. The hard fact of the matter is that he can keep it, and he doesn't need the legislation before us. The legislation before us simply assures that folks can run around selling bad policies under fictional and false misrepresentations to do hurt to the American people, who, frankly, need protection against the abuses that the Affordable Care Act would put in place. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I now yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. Scalise), a member of the Energy and Commerce Committee. Mr. SCALISE. I thank the gentleman from Michigan for bringing this bill to the floor, which I support. Mr. Speaker, we all heard that promise that if you like what you have, you can keep it. It is probably the most often repeated promise that Barack Obama has made in his 5 years as President. Yet the President is finally acknowledging that that promise will not be kept to millions of Americans who are losing the good plans they like. They can't feign that they didn't know this was going to happen, by the way, Mr. Speaker, because, back in 2010, the administration had a report that said over 60 percent of private plans would be canceled under the President's health care law. I have seen it myself in my district. I have got Chris from Covington and Aaron from Slidell who have gotten letters saying they are going to lose the good plans they have because of the President's health care law. The President's answer was, Oh, it was a lousy plan. Mr. Speaker, it was not a lousy plan for Chris or for Aaron or for the millions of Americans who are losing their plans. They liked their plans. Some Washington politician shouldn't be able to say, I don't think it is good enough, so I am going to take it from you even though it is right for your family. Let's put patients and doctors back in charge of these decisions. Let's empower hardworking families to be the ones in control of their health care decisions, not some Washington politician. I urge the passage of this bill. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, at this time, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlelady from Illinois (Ms. Schakowsky). Ms. SCHAKOWSKY. Mr. Speaker, the number one cause of personal bankruptcies in this country is the cost of health care. Most of those people are so-called ``insured.'' These are the policies that are being offered that people find out, when they get sick, that they really aren't insured. A major goal of ObamaCare is to protect every consumer from the worst abuses of the private health insurance industry. Starting next year, no consumer can be denied coverage or charged more due to a preexisting condition. This means that 129 million Americans will no longer have to live in fear that they could, one day, be unable to obtain affordable coverage needed to maintain their health or even to save their lives. The Upton bill would turn back the clock. The Upton bill would allow insurers to cherry-pick among all health care consumers--the young, the healthy--by offering non-ObamaCare-compliant policies, leaving only the old and sick to purchase coverage in the marketplace. This is something they have wanted to do and have been doing for decades. This is going to drive up premiums and allow just the type of discrimination that ObamaCare absolutely ends. Speaker Boehner said yesterday, We have currently the best health care delivery system in the world. Are you kidding me--with tens of millions of people uninsured and tens of millions more with bad policies that don't cover this? Rather than taking steps to weaken ObamaCare, my Republican colleagues should be taking this opportunity to build on ObamaCare; as the President said, to fix it. Last week, I spoke with the director of the Illinois Department of Insurance about some of the unreasonable rate increases my constituents have faced in the past and their concerns about the new rates being quoted in letters they received from their insurers this fall. He told me that he doesn't have the authority he wants in order to protect consumers from excessive premiums. This authority includes the [[Page H7132]] ability to deny or to modify any unreasonable premium. Illinois isn't alone. Today, Republicans denied us the opportunity to address this by refusing to consider legislation that would move us forward and provide rate modification authority in every State. Instead, they are choosing to move a bill that would drive up premium rates and undermine ObamaCare's new benefits and protections. I want to caution people. Rather than re-up with some of the policies they have, check it out. What is really covered? Is there hospitalization? Is the emergency room covered? How many times can you go see your doctor? Go to the marketplace. It will be fixed. Pick a plan that is going to provide you with the real coverage and the essential benefits that you need that are provided under ObamaCare. We want to protect you from junk plans that are out there, but we want to let you re-up in plans that actually offer you the kind of coverage you want, that is essential, which is what the President did yesterday. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, at this point, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. McCarthy), the Republican whip. Mr. McCARTHY of California. I thank the chairman for his work in keeping his pledge of bringing this bill to the floor. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of H.R. 3350, the Keep Your Health Plan Act. From the start, ObamaCare has been a disaster. First, the individual mandate was a bad idea before and is even more dangerous now because it is forcing people to choose health care they do not want, cannot afford, and isn't right for themselves and their families. Second, the President's credibility continues to crumble as independent news sources have confirmed that he intentionally broke his promise to every American about whether they can keep his insurance under this law. We will continue to see the shock waves of ObamaCare. Today, it is the fact that Americans cannot keep their coverage. Tomorrow, it will be the staggering and unexpected cost. Next month, it will be about losing access to their doctors, and the list continues. No administrative fix will undo the harm this law has caused. Republicans believe that we must try and help Americans who have been harmed by ObamaCare. That is why, today, we will pass a bill to allow Americans to continue to enroll in plans currently offered without facing the individual mandate penalty. What the American people and our constituents need is certainty. The only approach that begins to provide them certainty is the bill before us today. Our bill allows Americans a choice. It lets individuals keep their health care plans while giving others who currently are uninsured an escape hatch from ObamaCare. Our bill will allow individuals, whether one is a mother of a sick child, a small business owner, or a young, invincible adult, to keep their current plans. The National Federation of Independent Business and senior groups, such as 60 Plus, are urging Congress to fulfill its duty and pass this bill. I urge my Democratic friends to join with us. Many of them voted for this bill. They stated they had an intent that Americans could keep their plans. Today is their opportunity to keep that pledge. {time} 1145 Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, at this time, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from the State of Washington, Dr. McDermott, who is the ranking member of the Health Subcommittee of Ways and Means. (Mr. McDERMOTT asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.) Mr. McDERMOTT. Mr. Speaker, my mother used to say ``patience is a virtue.'' I haven't seen so much panic on this floor since 9/11. Now, the fact is that a couple of Members who used to be here--Jay Inslee, who is now Governor of the State of Washington, and Mike Kreidler, who is the insurance commissioner of the State of Washington--have already said they will not implement this because it is not good for the people of the State of Washington. They have looked at it. We have worked hard to implement the Affordable Care Act. Now we have a bill out here with no hearings whatsoever run out here, and we are told there will be no confusion. There will be nothing but confusion. You have 50 insurance commissioners around this country who are going to be suddenly given a bill after we write some rules and regulations here that require the insurance companies to sell policies to people. I can't believe what I am hearing. I thought that the Republicans believed in the free enterprise system. This is socialism. This is government saying to insurance companies: you must sell a policy to somebody next year that you sold to them this year. When did we shift on the Republican side to the Congress telling an insurance company who they have to sell a policy to or what is in the policy? The fact is that they are going to have to put the policy out there. They have been working on implementing this law for 3 years. Now 6 weeks before it actually begins to take effect, we run in here and say, wait a minute, wait a minute, you got to start selling policies like the ones that you sold last year. Do you think they didn't think through what they are doing? I mean, I don't understand. The free enterprise system is lions and they are eating antelopes. I urge you to vote ``no'' against this because you are going to create endless confusion in this country and the insurance market. Washington State Office of the Insurance Commissioner, November 14, 2013. Kreidler Statement on President Obama's Announcement Today Olympia, WA.--``We have worked for three years to implement the Affordable Care Act in a way that works best for Washingtonians. One goal of our efforts has been to build a stable, fair and competitive individual health insurance market. I know that many people who buy their own health insurance have struggled to keep their coverage. That is why we have worked so hard to make these significant changes. We have brought meaningful benefits to this market that the rest of us with employer-sponsored health plans have enjoyed for years; benefits like prescription drug coverage, maternity care, and reasonable limits on out-of-pocket costs. Our state-based Exchange--Wahealthplanfinder.org--is up and running and successfully enrolling thousands of consumers. I understand that many people are upset by the notices they have recently received from their health plans and they may not need the new benefits today. But I have serious concerns about how President Obama's proposal would be implemented and more significantly, its potential impact on the overall stability of our health insurance market. I do not believe his proposal is a good deal for the state of Washington. In the interest of keeping the consumer protections we have enacted and ensuring that we keep health insurance costs down for all consumers, we are staying the course. We will not be allowing insurance companies to extend their policies. I believe this is in the best interest of the health insurance market in Washington. We estimate that 290,000 people will need to buy new coverage and that at least half of them will qualify for a premium subsidy. I encourage anyone who is shopping for new health plans--whether you've been uninsured or have received a cancellation notice from your insurer--to look at all of your options. Don't just take what your insurance company says. You may find better, more affordable coverage with a different insurer. There are 46 individual health plans for sale in the Exchange and 51 plans available outside the Exchange. If you need help reviewing your options, contact a navigator or an agent or broker. ____ November 14, 2013. Gov. Inslee Statement on Obama Administration's Affordable Care Act Announcement Gov. Jay Inslee issued this statement in response to Thursday's announcement by President Obama that insurers could continue to offer individual insurance plans that don't comply with the ACA: ``We appreciate President Obama's efforts, through the administrative fix announced today, to address the concerns of those who have gotten `cancellation' letters from their insurance companies. ``Each state will be examining this option to see whether it works for them, and we know different states will come to different conclusions. ``Here in Washington, we are fortunate to have a robust insurance exchange, with 46 plans from eight different carriers. We're also fortunate that our exchange, the Washington Healthplanfinder, is up and running and enrolling tens of thousands of people in meaningful and affordable health coverage. ``Because of that, the majority of Washingtonians who get these letters are able to find [[Page H7133]] better plans and get tax subsidies to help pay for them. They are getting better coverage at a better price. ``Largely because of the success we've had implementing the Affordable Care Act so far, Insurance Commissioner Mike Kreidler has concluded that the option of extending old health plans is not a good solution for the state of Washington. ``We understand that these cancellation letters can be upsetting, and we want to make sure everyone knows how to find the best deal for themselves and their families. We encourage everyone to explore their options on the Washington Healthplanfinder--www.wahealthplanfinder.org--and seek out the help of an in-person assistor or broker to find a plan that fits their needs and their budgets. ``We also want to make sure that the people of our state have meaningful health insurance that will cover them when they get sick or end up in the hospital or find they need ongoing prescription drugs, and we know the plans we have in Washington will do that.'' Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 15 seconds. The gentleman needs to read our bill. It doesn't say that the insurance companies must sell those policies. That may be in the Senate bill, the Landrieu bill. It is not in this bill. I yield 1 minute to the vice chair of the Energy and Commerce Committee, the gentlelady from Tennessee (Mrs. Blackburn). Mrs. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman for the superb job that he has done on bringing H.R. 3350 to the floor; and I thank him for listening to millions of Americans who have been so forthright in saying we do not want the President's health care law; it is destroying our access to the health care that we like; it is taking away our health care plans. Never has there been a Federal mandate that has just swept so many people aside and said you must buy this product. Some of you have asked, why are we doing this? Let me tell you why. We are doing it for my constituents like Carolyn and Lucy and Cindy and Wilma, all small business owners, all female heads of households, who have written us and have said we are being forced out--forced out--of the plan that we like, we are being forced away from the doctor that we like, we are being forced to buy a product we do not like. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlelady from Connecticut, Rosa DeLauro. Ms. DeLAURO. Mr. Speaker, since this Republican majority took office, we have taken vote after vote after vote intended to disrupt, delay, defund, or outright repeal the Affordable Care Act. Last month, this House majority shut down the Federal Government. They threatened a catastrophic debt default in order to gut this law. Now, when the Affordable Care Act is going into effect, are we supposed to believe that this Republican majority is putting forth a good-faith effort to improve the bill? It doesn't wash, and it defies imagination. This bill is designed to weaken the health care law to roll back the clock on the reforms we worked so hard to pass. It takes us back to the unacceptable state of our health care system before we passed the Affordable Care Act. Remember, the health care system was failing people. Every year health care costs skyrocketed, small businesses priced out of the market, employers asking for higher contributions in co-pays and dropping coverage, people with preexisting conditions being socked or left on their own. Every year more people had no insurance whatsoever. This bill allows insurers to continue to provide substandard health insurance plans to families, even to new customers. Americans on these plans will be denied access to preventive services with no out-of- pocket costs. It takes us back to a time when people were not guaranteed coverage for maternity, pediatric care, hospitalizations, where families faced annual caps, lifetime caps. It takes us back to a health insurance market that rejects people with preexisting conditions. Once again, this Republican majority is trying to put insurers back in the driver's seat, let them control the health of American families. This majority was never interested in reforming our broken health care system. They have never been interested in the Affordable Care Act, and now they are not interested as well. This is a cynical, transparently political bill. Oppose it. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Dr. Tim Murphy, the chairman of the Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee on Energy and Commerce. Mr. MURPHY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the majority is very concerned about health insurance plans and very concerned about those people who have lost their plans. When this bill was originally marked up a couple of years ago in the Energy and Commerce Committee, repeatedly we heard from Members on the other side of the aisle saying that if people liked their plan they could keep it. Indefinitely they were grandfathered in. This needed a fix several months ago. The President of the United States has said he wants Republicans and Democrats to work together for a solution. We are offering to work together, and yet the President has said he would veto this. But the President offered only a partial fix. It will lead to more confusion. The question is: Will it lead to class action suits against insurance companies who fail to comply with the law? Many States are saying this partial fix is not sufficient. We need a legislative fix. We need a way that people can still have their option for buying their plan. What we have to see here is that it is a bigger problem for American families who have found that their insurance is lost and they want to be able to keep it. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how much time is remaining on both sides. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California has 10\1/2\ minutes remaining. The gentleman from Michigan has 16\3/4\ minutes remaining. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Hoyer). Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to this bill which will undermine the providing of health care at affordable prices for millions and millions and millions of Americans. We said to those Americans that prior to the adoption of this act if they had a policy, they could keep it. That was accurate. It didn't say that the insurance companies would have to continue to offer it, which, as I understand it, that side of the aisle wouldn't be for in any event. The fact of the matter is that statement was correct. Subsequent to that, there were policies offered and insurance companies knew and policyholders should have known because it was in the law that they would be subject to minimum requirements. Why? Because as The Heritage Foundation said when it originally came up with this idea, everybody ought to take personal responsibility. I have heard a lot of talk on your side of the aisle, Mr. Speaker, about personal responsibility. I believe in that. The Upton bill, as everybody knows, will skew the risk pool and encourage adverse selection. Anybody who knows anything about insurance knows that if you have adverse selection, the prices for those who need insurance will go up very substantially while, yes, the prices for those who don't need insurance will go down very sharply. Quite frankly, if all of us knew we would never be in an automobile accident, we wouldn't have to have automobile insurance, except, of course, the law in almost every State requires us to have it so that others will be protected as well. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield an additional minute to the gentleman. Mr. HOYER. I thank the gentleman. Ladies and gentlemen, this bill is offered by people who, according to their own rhetoric, want to repeal the Affordable Care Act. That is a fair position; but now they are trying to do so with a Trojan horse they call ``the Upton bill'' that, in effect, will fix what people are concerned about. The fact of the matter is it will not fix that problem, but what it will do is undermine the ability of millions and millions and millions of people to have health security. I would urge my colleagues to defeat this Trojan horse. I would urge my colleagues to say to the American people, look, we are prepared to work together. The President has offered a compromise which will have the effect of [[Page H7134]] not opening up the policies to everybody, but to those people that had a policy. That is a reasonable step to take. That is a step that, perhaps, we can take together and get accomplished. Let's reject this bill and let's stand with the millions of people who want affordable, quality health care for themselves and their families. Mr. Speaker, the Affordable Care Act is good for our country, and it is already benefiting millions of people. Today, those who are uninsured can sign up for affordable plans through the state and federal marketplaces--and over 1.5 million Americans have already applied for coverage. In spite of that, Republicans remain fixated on repealing this law--rather than working with us to improve it. Today, we are witnessing their latest assault on health care reform, with their 46th vote to undermine the Affordable Care Act. Once again, instead of providing a solution, their bill will only create more problems. This stands in sharp contrast with the approach of President Obama and Democrats, which is to work together to make improvements where needed. In that vein, President Obama announced yesterday that insurers can continue to sell 2013 plans through next year to those Americans who are already enrolled in an individual market policy. And the administration will require insurance companies to be more transparent by sharing information with consumers about other coverage options through the marketplaces--many that provide better benefits at a lower cost. The President's plan will also mitigate the risk of premium increases that could result from the grandfathering of these insurance policies. That is something the gentleman from Michigan's bill does not do--which means that his bill will lead to higher premiums and greater uncertainty for all consumers. And his bill would undermine the health care reforms that are yielding real benefits for millions of Americans. I urge my colleagues to oppose this legislation. Instead, let's work together to make sure the Affordable Care Act is implemented effectively and that Americans will continue to benefit from it. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. Lance), a member of the Health Subcommittee on Energy and Commerce. Mr. LANCE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of Chairman Upton's legislation, which will provide much-needed certainty and relief for millions of Americans, including 800,000 in New Jersey. Regarding this issue, The New York Times editorialized this morning that the President has ``damaged his credibility, and it is uncertain how he can earn back the public's trust.'' I would suggest support of this bipartisan legislation will earn back the President's trust. This matter should be addressed legislatively and permanently and not administratively and temporarily, as the President suggested yesterday. It is time for us to work together. I strongly support Chairman Upton's legislation. I am sure it will pass in a bipartisan fashion and there will be bipartisan support in the other House. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana, Dr. Cassidy, a member of the Health Subcommittee. Mr. CASSIDY. Mr. Speaker, for the last 30 years, I have worked in a hospital for the uninsured. What I have learned is that unless you trust the families, unless you give power to the patient, you truly cannot make good medical decisions. This is an email I got from someone who is my age--mid-50s. She says that we just got a letter from our health care provider, we had a major medical with a $10,000 deductible. We have lost that. We were told the insurance was not acceptable as written, so now our new policy has a $7,000 deductible and it cost us $10,000 more a year. The deductible goes down by $3,000, their premium up by $10,000. This is not power to the family or to the patient. This is Washington saying, thou shalt spend thy money in the way that we direct you to spend it. Frankly, I don't know if we can reconstruct the private insurance market. It may have been decimated by the Affordable Care Act. The last chance probably was the Enzi resolution on the Senate side in which it was pointed out that as many as 80 percent of Americans will lose their individual policy, but every Democrat voted against that Enzi resolution. There is hope. It is the Keep Your Health Plan Act, which allows the policies to be resold, to occasionally be tweaked and, by the way, to be sold to others, preserving, if you will, the power of big numbers, which is key to the insurance industry. {time} 1200 Now, the other option, the President and the others on the Senate side, don't allow these policies to be sold to others. And so without allowing that, of course they are eventually going to be actuarially unsound and collapse. It is a sleight of hand which is disingenuous in terms of its intent. We give power to the patients. We must trust families. We should pass the Keep Your Health Plan Act and allow families to make their own decisions. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlelady from New York (Ms. Velazquez). Ms. VELAZQUEZ. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding. Mr. Speaker, let's be clear about the bill before us today. This bill is not an attempt to help Americans keep their insurance plans. The President already announced a plan to help address that goal. Instead, this bill takes a meat cleaver approach, allowing insurance companies to market inadequate policies to new enrollees. Remember the bad old days when preexisting conditions were discriminated against? This bill brings back that practice. Remember women paying more for coverage simply because of their gender? That is A-okay under this bill. Remember annual caps that let insurance companies stop paying when a consumer came down with an expensive illness? That is back, too. And what about small businesses facing double-digit hikes in their premium costs? If we want to take up targeted legislation helping those whose policies are being discontinued, then let's do that. But let's call this bill what it is--a return to the day when insurance companies preyed on working families and the 46th attempt to repeal the Affordable Care Act. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from West Virginia (Mr. McKinley), a member of the Energy and Commerce Committee. Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman. I rise today to be the voice of the citizens of the First District of West Virginia and support House bill H.R. 3350. Let me share just two of the messages of the thousands that we have received. Linda from Philippi, West Virginia, writes: I am losing my health insurance due to ObamaCare. My policy has been canceled, and I am being forced to enter the exchange. I like my current policy. Under the exchange, I will be forced to pay $200 more. I am being hurt by ObamaCare. This simply isn't fair. And Sherry from Weirton, West Virginia, tells us: My parents, both retired, received a letter from their insurance company letting them know their new rate starting in January. The increase is so much they can't afford it. I pray that they can continue to receive the health care that they choose so they can continue to be healthy. They deserve better. Mr. Speaker, these are only two of the stories out of the thousands we could share. Consequently, I am urging my colleagues to support this particular legislation. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, how much time remains on both sides? The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California has 6 minutes remaining. The gentleman from Michigan has 12\3/4\ minutes remaining. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. Gardner). Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman of the committee for his work on this bill and the legislation before us. Mr. Speaker, 250,000 Coloradoans have had their health care plans canceled. I join them. Here is my letter. As one of the insurance policyholders in Colorado, I, too, had my insurance canceled. I am part of 250,000 people who had a health care plan they were told they could keep, but they won't be able to. Noel from eastern Colorado contacted my office to tell me that his insurance has been canceled, insurance [[Page H7135]] that he liked, that he was promised by the President that he would get to keep. Mr. Speaker, Noel tells the story that he has two kids and a third on the way. He tells the story that his premium is going to go up by about $400 as a result of the changes under the health care bill, and that with the addition of his third child, it will go up another $300 more a month. His family doesn't make much money. For eastern Colorado, they actually do better than others. They bring home $5,000 a month. But to see that kind of a health care cost increase when they were promised if they like their health care policy, they could keep it is simply wrong. We have been accused in this bill of rolling back the law. This bill does one thing. It rolls back a broken promise. It rolls back a broken promise so we can keep our health care plans and so that the 250,000 people in Colorado can keep their health care plans. In fact, it does go back. It goes back to a time when President Obama promised the American people that, if they liked their health care plan, they could keep it, period. It goes back to a time when Kathleen Sebelius, Secretary of HHS, said, if you like your health care plan, you can keep it. It goes back to a time when the majority who passed the legislation in the House and in the Senate said, if you like your health care plan, you can keep it, period. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. Blumenauer), a member of the Ways and Means Committee. Mr. BLUMENAUER. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman's courtesy in yielding me this time. Mr. Speaker, the expectation that somehow the elements of the Affordable Care Act would not be implemented is just simply false. People can keep health insurance, but there are always going to be the new standards to make sure that people no longer have insurance in name only. That is what we heard about repeatedly in the efforts to try to reform the health care system--that people had great health care plans until they got sick. We have minimum standards going forward, and all plans will be required to meet those standards. That was in the law, and that is reasonable. We are in the midst of the greatest, most significant reform of health care in a generation, and it is already having significant effects. Medical inflation, medical cost inflation is at a 40-year low over the course of the last 3 years. We have significant expansion of coverage already. Hundreds of thousands of people in lower incomes have been able to have access to health care for the first time. Small businesses that have been burdened for years by health care costs now get access to tax credits, and it gets better for them going forward. It is, I think, ironic for people to talk about somebody losing access to a doctor who is no longer in a network. That happens every year. It happened previously. It will happen in the future unless you are going to somehow sentence doctors to participate in plans. You can't force them. And shedding crocodile tears because there are some plans that are canceled, in the individual insurance market, routinely 40, 50, 60 percent every year are turned over. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. WAXMAN. I yield the gentleman an additional 30 seconds. Mr. BLUMENAUER. I sat on the floor and heard my colleague from Oregon (Mr. Walden) talk about a very attractive family from southern Oregon that is somehow going to now face a $12,000 deductible. I want to take a deep dive with Greg and find out what is going on with that family because we have found people have been using ObamaCare for an excuse for some things that are going to happen anyway, or that people misunderstand. Let's do this together. Let's explore these areas. Let's give people information going forward, and let's make the system work better, not create a parallel system that will make it work worse. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. Bilirakis), a member of the Health Subcommittee. Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman for sponsoring this great bill. In my State of Florida, 300,000 individuals have lost their health care plans due to ObamaCare, and hardworking Americans, like my constituent Mark from Pasco County, are being adversely affected by this law. Mark currently has a plan that he likes, but ObamaCare will take it away. His new equivalent plan on the exchange comes with a $12,000 deductible and $1,000 monthly premiums. He and his wife are about 60 years old and do not qualify for subsidies. They are very healthy, but they are punished, Mr. Speaker. I don't understand, they are punished by the President's health care law. That is why I am proud to be an original cosponsor of the Keep Your Health Plan Act to remove the barriers preventing hardworking Americans from keeping their health care plans under ObamaCare. We need to pass this bill so we can give the American people the peace of mind they deserve. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I continue to reserve the balance of my time. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. Terry), a member of the Energy and Commerce Committee. Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, this is really about trust, and people like Andrea from Omaha feels like that trust has been violated. It has been broken. She was told that she could keep her policy, but then she received her letter saying you cannot keep your policy. A working mom with two young children, her family's premium has risen to $770 from $450 per quarter. Her responsibility for coinsurance is now 50 percent, up from what it was before at 15 percent. Her out-of- pocket costs rose to over $2,000, and she is paying more for less now. This isn't a better policy, as we have been told. It takes a big chunk of their family budget. Unfortunately, under ObamaCare, she can't keep her plan. She gets more with less. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I continue to reserve the balance of my time. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Guthrie). Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of this legislation allowing individuals to keep their plans into 2014. Yesterday, my colleagues and I shared powerful stories of many of our constituents who have experienced cancelations and mass rate increases due to ObamaCare. In addition to these individuals, I have many more stories of Kentuckians seeing their plans canceled due to ObamaCare. More recently, Sylvia Martin from Owensboro wrote to me that her coverage was canceled, and she so far has been unable to get insurance. H.R. 3350 would allow insurance companies to continue offering 2013 plans, which would benefit the millions of Americans who have seen their current plans canceled. The American people were told repeatedly that if they liked their plan, they can keep it. House Republicans today are trying to honor that promise. Mr. WAXMAN. I continue to reserve the balance of my time. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Roe). Mr. ROE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman, and I rise in support of the Keep Your Health Plan Act. This bill is important for many people in my district, including Joann. Joann lives in Limestone, Tennessee, and because her policy doesn't meet the minimum requirements set by ObamaCare, she has been forced to buy a more expensive health care plan. Her premiums will rise from about $95 a month to $200 a month. Joann thought $95 was affordable, but $200 not. Despite promises of more affordable health care, this law is making insurance unattainable for many across my home State. BlueCross BlueShield of Tennessee, our State's largest insurer, has announced it will be forced to send 66,000 cancelation notices to my fellow Tennesseeans because of ObamaCare; a Medicaid plan called Cover Tennessee, another 16,000 lose their care. Mr. Speaker, it is well past the time for President Obama to work with Members of Congress to provide relief to families hurting because of this law. I urge my colleagues to support the Keep Your Health Plan Act. [[Page H7136]] {time} 1215 Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I continue to reserve the balance of my time. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask how much time is remaining? The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan has 7 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from California has 3\1/2\ minutes remaining. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Meadows). Mr. MEADOWS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of H.R. 3350, the Keep Your Health Plan Act, and I would like to thank Chairman Upton for bringing this bill forward. Despite President Obama's reassurances that ``if you like your health care plan, you can keep it,'' 3.5 million plans have already been canceled because of ObamaCare. Cynthia, a constituent from Granite Falls, North Carolina, told me about her family recently. She and her husband and three boys have a premium that was $300 that has now risen to $1,206, Mr. Speaker. The rhetoric from the Democrats has said that the Republicans are only interested in pushing for a repeal of the health care law, rather than fixing it, but this is not true. So far this Congress, Republicans have introduced 102 bills designed to fix the broken areas of ObamaCare. The Democrats by contrast, a mere 17. Republicans are bringing another fix today, Mr. Speaker, to the House floor. The Keep your Health Plan Act allows families across the country like Cynthia's to keep their policies without penalty. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I continue to reserve the balance of my time. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Kelly). Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and I rise in strong support of H.R. 3350. This is a piece of legislation that protects the people, not a political party, not politicians, not Presidents who don't keep promises. This is a letter I got from Melissa and Riley from Hermitage, Pennsylvania. Riley is a college student paying for her own education. She is working part time at minimum wage in a local grocery store, paying for what she calls an affordable $70 per month for her health care coverage. Because of the Affordable Care Act, her hours at the store have been cut back, and now, to add insult to injury, she has been notified by the insurance provider that because of ObamaCare, she will be canceled after another year and that she is going to be forced to choose a plan that costs triple what she is paying now. Riley's mom, Melissa, also sent a letter to our office, a letter of desperation stating that her health insurance provider, the one she has always relied on, has now informed her that she will no longer be covered after November 25. In her letter to our office, Melissa writes: When my daughter or I purchase our own health care in an attempt to be self-sufficient in this country, we are penalized, not rewarded. Mr. President, keep your promise. I can't believe for 3 years we have told people you can keep these policies, you don't have to worry about it, period. If you like your doctor, you can keep your doctor, period. Now we find out that it was all just talk, and that is what this country is fed up with. They are tired of the talk that comes out of Washington. They want to have people start representing them. That is what we are here to do. Both sides of the aisle, ladies and gentlemen, both sides of the aisle. It is time to stop the spin. I really feel sorry for the people who sit in the gallery here. We need to put seatbelts in. This room is spinning so fast sometimes, it is hard for them to walk straight when they walk out of here. I tell you what. Our party will continue to commit ourselves to doing what is right for the American people. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Members are reminded to direct their remarks to the Chair. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I continue to reserve the balance of my time. Mr. UPTON. May I ask the gentleman from California how many speakers he has left? Mr. WAXMAN. We have two speakers left. Mr. UPTON. We just have two speakers as well, myself and Mrs. Ellmers. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from North Carolina (Mrs. Ellmers). Mrs. ELLMERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of H.R. 3350, the Keep Your Health Plan Act of 2013. As my colleagues across the aisle have pointed out over and over and over again, the ACA is law, but it cannot simply be undone by the White House, and it does call on us in the Congress to do so. Mr. Speaker, we women in this country make 80 percent of the health care decisions, and women in this country have now been told by the President and our Democratic colleagues that the health care choices that they have made to cover their families are not adequate. In fact, they are being called subpar, and they are trying to intervene. They are trying to keep the women in this country from providing that good, sound health care coverage for their families. That is why we are voting on this bill today, Mr. Speaker. We are voting on it because these are good decisions that have been made by the American people, they are good decisions that have been made by the moms across this country for their families, and we need to do everything we can to protect that. I call on my colleagues to vote ``yes'' on H.R. 3350, so that women in this country can continue to do the good job they are doing for their families and provide good health care coverage. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from California (Ms. Pelosi), the Democratic leader. Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I commend him for his great leadership in helping to pass the Affordable Care Act, honoring the vows of our Founders for liberty, the freedom to pursue their happiness. It is life, liberty, pursuit of happiness. A healthier life and freedom to pursue that happiness. It is a funny thing when people talk about Washington, D.C., and how people don't get along well, we disagree. We have major disagreements on policy, and one of them is whether health care is a right for all in our country or a privilege for the few, but it doesn't take away from the fact that we are people and we serve in this institution, and we have some areas of agreement one day and the kaleidoscope changes the next day to the point where people are always surprised when I say to them, ``I pray for the Congress every day, and on Sunday especially. I pray for our Republican colleagues, as well as our Democratic colleagues, as well as the President of the United States, Barack Obama or George W. Bush, or whoever he may be, because the success of the President and the success of all of us is a success for the American people, if we can work together to find common ground for the public good.'' When I pray for all of us, I have wishes for us. I wish that my Republican colleagues could see how successful the Affordable Care Act is in California. I wish you could hear the stories of family after family after family being liberated, freed from the constraint of being job-locked because the family has a preexisting condition so that now they can follow their passion and not be chained by a policy, follow their passion to be self-employed, to start a business, or to change jobs. I wish you could hear all of these stories. I wish you would not close your mind to them because this initiative has been transformative. I would have hoped that whatever had been proposed would be to strengthen or improve it, and we all have the humility to know that any bill, whatever our pride of involvement in it is, can be improved. That is why it is particularly disappointing to come to the floor today to see a bill that says to the Affordable Care Act and all of these people with all of their stories, we are going to unravel this, we are going to unravel all of the good things, whether it is preexisting conditions, ending that discrimination, whether it is lifetime limits, whether it is annual limits, whether it is being a women no longer being a preexisting condition, whether it is for seniors or for kids 18-26 years old or for little children, even now, before the bill is fully enacted. So I hope and I pray, and I wish that our colleagues [[Page H7137]] could see the evidence and that the decisions would be evidence-based rather than politically motivated. I think it is really important what this Congress does today. Each Member has to make his or her own decisions, but the fact is that in this body, our words weigh a ton and our votes are even weightier than that. I hope the message that comes out of this Congress is that there is a discussion going on, but there is a values decision that has been made in favor of the American people. If we have to thread a needle to get a result, let's do that, but let's not unravel the whole sweater because that would not be a comfort to the American people. Let's act to strengthen, not weaken. Let's vote ``no'' on the Upton bill. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time. Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Doyle), a very distinguished member of the Energy and Commerce Committee. Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, let's think about where America was prior to the enactment of the Affordable Care Act. There were 30 to 40 million of our citizens without insurance. People with preexisting conditions either couldn't get insurance or had to pay so much they couldn't afford their insurance.

Women were being charged twice as much as men. People that had insurance had annual and lifetime caps. Did you ever wonder why when you would see families holding fundraisers to raise money for their kid's drugs when a kid has cancer? These are people who had insurance and came up against the annual caps or lifetime caps, and the insurance company didn't pay any more. Half the families in America are filing bankruptcy. People with insurance up against caps, no more payments, families losing everything. We put an end to that with the Affordable Care Act. How did we do that? We come up with a private system that required everybody to participate--young and old, rich and poor, healthy and sick. When you put everybody in that risk pool, healthy people help us enable the insurance industry to keep rates at an affordable rate for those people who have preexisting conditions and who have chronic diseases. That is how the system works. What my colleague, Mr. Upton, is proposing today unravels that system. Make no mistake about it. If we continue to allow private insurance companies to sell policies that discriminate against women, that set annual caps and lifetime caps, if we continue to allow all of those practices that 80 percent to 90 percent of Americans say they want in their health care system, then that risk pool goes away, rates go sky high, and you will have raised premiums for every American in this country. I say to my colleagues, there are unforeseen circumstances we knew would come up in this bill. I led the charge in my caucus. I told my caucus if the President doesn't come up with a fix, if our leadership doesn't have an alternative solution to this, many of us would consider voting for the Upton bill, as bad as it is, because it undermines the health care bill. The good news is the President has responded. We will have a motion to recommit today that responds, and I want to make it clear that there is nothing in the Upton bill that mandates insurance companies to do this. This is a shallow bill. In the end, let me just say, my friends, have some credibility. You introduced 102 bills, and you never put one of them on the floor for a vote. So don't pretend you care about the American people's health care here. You are just trying to repeal the Affordable Care Act. Democrats are not going to let you do that. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Members are reminded to address their remarks to the Chair and not to others in the second person. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire as to how much time I have remaining? The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan has 2\1/2\ minutes remaining. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of my time. I say to my friend from Pennsylvania, we would have liked to have had some amendments when the Affordable Care Act passed. The rule denied us any amendments. Why are we here this afternoon? Most observers of the legislative process would say that the President's health care act would never have passed back in 2010 without the assurance that the President gave, even many times this year, that you could keep your health care if you liked it. If you liked it, you didn't have to do anything, period. I don't think it would have passed in this Chamber or in this Senate without that promise that the President gave. Then, millions of Americans in the last couple of months have gotten mail. In that mail, there are the cancelation notices. They are seeing their rates go up 200 percent, 300 percent, even 400 percent. Deductibles are going up in the thousands of dollars. People were coming to us all last week when we were home for our veterans events and parades and all the things that we did. They were bringing those letters to us and saying, Hey, what is going on? I thought I could keep this? Until yesterday afternoon, when it looked like we were going to get as many as 300 votes, including perhaps Mr. Doyle's and others, when it looked like we were going to get 300 votes for a bill that we introduced only a week and a half ago, all of a sudden the President felt that he needed to act. It wasn't until this bill that he came to the mic and said, You know what? I made a mistake. I am sorry. Maybe this thing will fix it. {time} 1230 But until then, he was going to sit on his hands and just watch us, watch millions of Americans literally watch their health care, watch maybe their economic lives, just go over the cliff. He was prepared to do that, until we showed that we had some bipartisan zip around here to try and, in fact, enforce, make whole his promise that he has said over and over and over again. That is what this bill does. Read it. It is not too long, a couple of sentences long. I commend our leadership for bringing this bill to the floor as fast as they can. Man, 5 or 6 legislative days from when it was introduced, that is pretty good. More importantly, it got a wake-up call to someone down the street on Pennsylvania Avenue, saying, hey, something is wrong. Let's restore what we might have said. I urge my colleagues to vote ``yes'' on the bill. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time. Mr. GENE GREEN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to this unnecessary legislation. The President has stepped up to the plate, admitted he made a mistake, and took steps to remedy it. This legislation rolls back too many important provisions without doing anything good beyond what the President has already done. I believe in the Affordable Care Act. This important legislation ended insurance company practices that prevented Americans from accessing quality health insurance. But, I am disappointed in how the law has been rolled out since October 1st. In fact, I think that we should extend open enrollment for an equal amount of time as the website has been down. Why are we not doing that today instead? This law is too important to fumble the roll out. I represent an area that has one of the highest uninsured rates in the country. Our district also has one of the highest rates of people who have jobs but no health insurance. Before the ACA, the individual marketplace wasn't the right solution for our constituents and after the ACA, the individual marketplace is still not the right place. The bill before us essentially restores the individual marketplace as it was prior to the ACA. It means insurance companies can refuse coverage because of pre-existing conditions and it means people can lose coverage because they have gotten too sick. I agree that we should allow people who are in the individual marketplace in 2013 and want to remain in it, to do so for another year. But the bill today is yet another attempt to undo some of the best parts of this law: the minimum essential benefits and I cannot support it. Ms. JACKSON LEE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong opposition to H.R. 3350, the ``Keep Your Health Plan Act of 2013.'' I oppose the bill for two reasons. First, the Affordable Care Act health insurance plans offered by private insurance companies have 10 basic options that saves lives. Second, the legislation is unnecessary in light of the action taken yesterday by President Obama, which should satisfy the proponents of this legislation while at the same time minimizing the risk to the health and safety of [[Page H7138]] underinsured Americans, who are persons who have insurance but spend more than 10 percent of their income on out-of-pocket medical expenses. Were it to become law, H.R. 3350 would jeopardize the life and health of those underinsured who purchase these plans this bill protects, even though health insurance plans are available that would in nearly every case provide more health coverage for less. Mr. Speaker, the Affordable Care Act that the Republicans have tried for 46 times to end, delay or impede is working my constituents of the 18th Congressional District and the people of Texas. Flora Alexandra Brewer of Fort Worth a real estate development business owner who works from home kept trying to sign into the website. She was determined to participate in the exchange. She said that her family had pre-existing conditions. Flora said that, ``There's nothing more expensive out there on any of the websites that I have looked at than what I am currently paying for COBRA. For the past 10 months, Flora has been paying nearly $1,900 a month for health insurance for her, her husband and one of her sons. She knows that she will most likely not qualify for any subsidies, but she believes she will save around $500 a month under the program commonly known as Obamacare. Those potential savings motivate Brewer not to give up on the exchange. On Wednesday, she called the toll free number listed on healthcare.gov. She spoke to a representative and enrolled in 15 minutes. She will soon receive an email and a packet in the mail detailing the polices and rates she and her family are eligible for.'' Mark Sullivan, an Entrepreneur from Austin, enrolled in a Plan that reduces his monthly premiums by half, expands his coverage, and gave him the financial security to focus on his small business. ``Mark now feels confident focusing on the success of his new consulting business, saying health insurance is 'one less thing I have to think about' as he pours his time and talent into this next major career move. Mark also thinks the marketplace will make it possible for more people to start new businesses and wants to share his success with the larger entrepreneurial community in Austin. After comparing plans, Mark settled on a bronze option and added dental insurance. He will receive an $82 per month subsidy, which will halve the monthly premium he will pay down to $78.'' Lucy after choosing from over 30 plans is saving $2,300 a year on her premium and $4,000 on her deductible, said that ``I signed up at Healthcare.gov and I'm going to save $2,300 a year on my premium alone--and more, because my deductible will drop from $7,500 a year to $3,000 a year. It's still Blue Cross insurance, and I don't have to change doctors, either. I had a choice of over 30 plans and several different companies.'' Mr. Speaker, according to the Kaiser Commission on Medicaid and the Uninsured 47 million persons under the age of retirement were uninsured in 2012. Most of the uninsured are self-employed or employed by small businesses. Another 28 million people were enrolled in Medicaid or CHIP programs to gain access to health insurance. The overwhelming majority (59 percent) of the insured receive their insurance through employer health plans. However, one in six of the uninsured have at least one working person in their household. Mr. Speaker, this is the cost of underinsurance in America--and this is what we can expect more of should H.R. 3350 become law. The express purpose of this bill is to allow underinsured persons to retain an inadequate ``health insurance'' plan on the ground that supposedly it is the plan the person ``wants to keep.'' Unfortunately, there is nothing in this bill that would provide consumer education on the inadequacies of the plan and that something much better is available. For example, there is no requirement in this bill for the insurer to notify the insured that health insurance provided through the exchange that provides more and better coverage for less money. This means that under H.R. 3350 people will still have problems paying their medical bills, they will have high bills, and they will not be able to afford prescription medication or be hounded by medical bill collectors. Further, this bill would allow these health insurance plans to be sold to new customers who may not know about the potentially better options available on the health insurance exchanges. The second reason for opposing this rule and bill is that it is unnecessary in view the actions taken yesterday by President Obama. As the President announced, insurers will be permitted to offer consumers the option to renew their 2013 health plans in 2014, without change, allowing them to keep their plans. This should satisfy the proponents of the bill. But the President went further than that because he recognizes that inadequate insurance is really no insurance at all. That is why the President conditioned the ability of insurers to offer plan renewals upon the following: 1. That insurers notify enrollees that they can purchase coverage through the Health Insurance Marketplace where they can potentially qualify for premium tax credits; and 2. Those insurers must inform consumers of the protections they are giving up to keep the plan they have. Taken together, President Obama's actions are a tempered and measured response to the alleged problem that this bill seeks to remedy. I fully applaud what the President has done. There may be some who think the availability of the types of health care insurance that H.R. 3350 would protect is sufficient for Americans. I do not. Neither does President Obama. The majority of the American people do not. We believe, and the Affordable Care Act ensures, that healthcare should be available, accessible and adequate. Mr. Speaker, adequate health plans have in common the inclusion of certain minimal benefits and services. Mr. Speaker, my constituents in the 18th Congressional District of Texas favor the Affordable Care Act because they understand the insecurity and feeling of helplessness of being uninsured or underinsured. My home state of Texas has the highest percentage of uninsured (27.6 percent) in the nation, 4 percent more than Louisiana the next state on the list. The state of Massachusetts, in contrast, boasts the lowest uninsured rate in the country (4 percent). This is because Massachusetts several years ago adopted the health insurance system upon which the Affordable Health Care Act is based. Mr. Speaker, health care coverage must be not only available and affordable but also adequate in order for consumers to have the health security and financial protection they need and deserve. The Affordable Care Act satisfies these criteria; the bill before us does not. That is why we should reject this rule and the underlying bill. H.R. 3350 is nothing more than the House Republicans' newest variation on their very old theme, which is to repeal, impede or undermine the Affordable Care Act. This bill is the 46th attempt by the Republicans to deprive the American people of the security and peace of mind that comes with health care that is affordable, accessible and adequate. Of course we should not be surprised. After all, it was the House Republicans who shut down the Federal Government for 16 days and cost the economy $24 billion while refusing to consider any legislation that would create jobs or address the real needs of the American people. Mr. Speaker, the bill before is strongly opposed by a coalition of some of the nation's leading health and consumer organizations, including the following: Paralyzed Veterans of America. American Cancer Society Cancer Action Network. American Diabetes Association. American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME). American Heart Association/American Stroke Association. American Music Therapy Association. The Arc of the United States. The Autistic Self Advocacy Network. Community Catalyst. Families USA. Health and Wholeness Ministries, Disciples Center for Public Witness. Health Care for America Now. National Alliance on Mental Illness. National Association of County Behavioral Health & Developmental Disability Directors. National Council of Jewish Women. National Partnership for Women & Families. These groups oppose the bill for substantially the same reasons I have discussed. While sympathizing with consumers who are receiving notices from their insurance companies that their policies are not being renewed for next year because they do not comply with the ACA's consumer protections, the Coalition rightly observes that: [T]he solution is not to allow for the continued sale of inadequate policies[.] Rather, we must educate consumers about their new health insurance options and ensure that notices being sent by insurers clearly inform them of the shortfalls with their current coverage and explain all of their options for finding better coverage. I agree. Therefore, I urge all Members to join me in voting against this bill. Mr. HOLT. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to H.R. 3350. This bill has no purpose, other than to destroy the effort to provide excellent, affordable health care to Americans in every walk of life. Yesterday, the President provided a workable solution to allow insurance companies to continue to offer existing policies to people who want to keep their policies. But the Upton bill we are considering today would allow both those that had these plans, and those that did not, to obtain care under these plans. Especially, people could buy plans that [[Page H7139]] don't really offer much ``insurance'' at all should anyone in their family get sick. The comprehensive health care reform legislation we passed in 2010 was a sincere and honorable effort to provide every American with access to affordable and quality health coverage. The law was designed to ensure that health coverage would include access to free preventive services, and would also be robust enough to actually help an individual afford critical, life-saving care should they fall ill.

The legislation that we are considering today accomplishes none of those goals. H.R. 3350 would allow insurance companies to continue to sell and attract new customers to substandard health plans that offer little protection. I have received calls and letters from constituents over the past several weeks who share with me their frustration that their health plan has been cancelled. And I sympathize with them. They tell me in complete sincerity that they like these plans--after all, they are not used to having any choice. They think their previous insurance plan is all they can afford. But under the Affordable Care Act they now have the ability to buy real insurance that will not drop them when their kid gets sick or require them to a huge deductible and with government subsidies in an active insurance marketplace, most will probably save money on their premiums. But I have also heard from constituents who have fallen ill, and during that time of personal turmoil, learn that their insurance does not cover the treatment they need. Their ``Basic and Essential Plan,'' as they're called in New Jersey, does not cover their basic or essential needs. They are on their own, and they will have to pay out- of-pocket for the chemotherapy, hospital tests, or physical therapy their doctor ordered. Prior to health reform, in 2007, more than 60 percent of all bankruptcies were a result of illness and medical bills, and nearly 80 percent of those who filed for medical bankruptcy were insured. We passed the Affordable Care Act not only to extend coverage to the 48 million uninsured Americans, but also to improve insurance for the millions more Americans who are underinsured. H.R. 3350 would undermine the Affordable Care Act by allowing new, additional customers to purchase health insurance that provides limited protection, and little prevention. It would result in even more Americans becoming underinsured and lead to additional family's filing for medical bankruptcy. Many parts of the ACA are working and have very beneficial effects for ordinary Americans--removing caps that cut off coverage even in the middle of critical treatments, allowing 25 year olds who are trying to get on their feet professionally to stay on their parent's policies, guaranteeing equally good coverage at equal cost for women, increasing access to preventive care, and other things. I would hope the sponsors of this bill would devote their best efforts to making the remaining parts of the legislation work. That is what they owe their constituents, rather than trying to destroy this sincere, honorable effort to make health care as good as possible in America. The rollout of the health insurance Marketplace has not been smooth, and I am as frustrated as everyone else, but the potential for Americans to gain affordable and comprehensive coverage is still enormous. Nearly one million New Jerseyans lack health insurance, and there are still many more underinsured. I am committed to protecting the provisions of health care reform so that New Jerseyans have access to health coverage that is affordable, comprehensive, and reliable. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to join me in opposing this bill and get to work on implementing the Affordable Care Act so Americans have access to better health care coverage. Mr. POSEY. ``Mr. Speaker, ``As a direct result of the health care law, 10 million Americans risk having their health insurance plans cancelled. Tens of millions more are seeing their costs go up and coverage changed, and they are losing access to their doctors and health care networks. ``I get messages daily from my constituents who have had their policies cancelled, seen 200%--400% increases in their health insurance premiums, or who have been cut to part-time work because of the new law. They are finding the Affordable Care Act (ACA) to be unaffordable for their families. ``Today the House will consider bipartisan legislation that will help reverse these effects of this law for many Americans, providing relief to some of those who have been harmed. ``The sad reality is that the ACA is inherently flawed and unworkable, and this reality is starting to catch-up with Americans across this nation. The broken website is just the tip of the disastrous iceberg as the law has fundamental and costly flaws. ``The fact that the Administration has now decided to waive ACA mandates is testimony to the fact that the health care law is directly responsible for millions of Americans losing their coverage, huge increases in health care premiums, along with the loss of access to doctors and hospital networks. There would be no need for the Administration to waive the health care law if the law was not the problem. ``Unfortunately, the Administration's proposal falls short by only providing a short-term waiver of the mandates. If it's so bad, then we really should be addressing the fundamental flaws, not simply trying to get beyond the next election. The only way to fix this situation, which will get worse, is for Washington to scrap this law and start over in a transparent process with bipartisan reforms that respect individual freedom and fairness.'' Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, today the House considered a bill introduced by Rep. Fred Upton deceptively titled the ``Keep Your Health Plan Act of 2013.'' The bill actually does nothing to address the situation in which some individuals have had their coverage canceled by their insurance provider. Rather this bill would allow insurance companies to continue selling substandard insurance plans to anyone, even those who currently do not have any insurance, on the open market without the new benefits or protections of the Affordable Care Act (ACA). In contrast, President Obama has put forth a reasonable solution that extends the grandfathering provision of the law.

Under that provision, insurance plans in place on March 23, 2010, the date the ACA was signed into law, are considered grandfathered. At issue now are those plans issued since then that do not meet the minimum standards of the ACA. This week, the President announced an extension of the grandfathering provisions that will empower insurance companies and state commissioners of insurance to allow those older plans to continue to be offered for one more year. If the insurance companies decide to continue offering those plans, they must notify all individuals who have received a cancellation notice and anyone else at risk of receiving one to inform them of their right to continue their previous coverage so long as the insurer discloses what benefits and protections-- such as caps on premiums and out-of-pocket expenses, free preventive care, or guaranteed coverage for pre-existing conditions-- will not be provided. They also have to inform these individuals of their right to pursue new coverage that does include the wide range of consumer protections and reforms through the health insurance exchanges. The reason I voted for and continue to support the ACA is precisely because of those consumer and patient protection reforms. We cannot allow Americans to be subjected to capricious cancellations, lifetime limits on their coverage, no coverage or unaffordable coverage because of pre-existing conditions, and higher premiums based on gender for the same basic coverage. Enrollment in the new insurance plans is increasing with each passing day along with reports of people being pleasantly surprised that they can in fact find insurance plans with premiums that are comparable to, or in many cases less than, their current coverage, and we expect that to continue. The SPEAKER pro tempore. All time for debate has expired. Pursuant to House Resolution 413, the previous question is ordered on the bill. The question is on engrossment and third reading of the bill. The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time. Motion to Recommit Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit at the desk. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill? Mr. ANDREWS. I am opposed to the bill. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order. The SPEAKER pro tempore. A point of order from the gentleman from Michigan has been reserved. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit. The Clerk read as follows: Mr. Andrews moves to recommit the bill H.R. 3350 to the Committee on Energy and Commerce with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: Strike all after the enacting clause and insert the following: SECTION 1. Mr. ANDREWS (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I object. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The Clerk will continue to read. The Clerk continued to read. Mr. UPTON (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the motion. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan? There was no objection. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for 5 minutes in support of his motion. (Mr. ANDREWS asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.) Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, and my colleagues, we have listened to the many stories told by people this morning with great empathy about people [[Page H7141]] who got a cancelation notice and want to keep the policy that they have. The issue before the House is whether we want to solve the problem or create another problem. That is the issue. If we want to work together, as we should, to solve the problem of Americans receiving cancelation notices and not being able to keep policies that they have, it requires us to do three things. First, we have to legally authorize insurance companies to offer these policies on into the future. The Democratic plan which I have proposed does that and, frankly, so does Mr. Upton's bill. The second thing that we have to do, though, is make sure that the insurance companies offer the plans for sale. It really does you no good at all if you have the right to buy a plan that the insurance company refuses to sell. Mr. Upton's bill is mute on that point. It might be called the ``Insurance Companies Bill of Rights'' because they have the right to do or not do anything they choose, but the people that we all say that we want to protect really have no rights at all. This is an important distinguishing point in the plan that I am offering now, and I would urge everyone to support. We have drawn from language offered by my friend from Illinois (Ms. Schakowsky) which requires State insurance commissioners around this country to be vigilant protectors of consumers, rather than corporate apologists for insurance companies. Our plan says that if someone's cancelation was arbitrary and thoughtless and unfair, the insurance commissioner must act and protect the people that we heard read in those letters today. Our plan says that if rate increases are discriminatory, if you got a rate increase because you are a woman who is pregnant, or you got a rate increase because you had skin cancer, or breast cancer, or diabetes, that the insurance commissioner must act and protect the consumer against that indignity. It does you no good that this bill is called the ``Keep Your Insurance If You Want To Bill.'' It should be called the ``Keep Your Insurance If You Want To And The Insurance Company Allows You To Bill.'' We are correcting that wrong and remedying that wrong with our plan. Thirdly, it doesn't do any good to give people the chance to renew their plans if that renewal results in a huge premium increase for everyone else in the country. That is what the underlying bill does. The underlying bill says that these plans, which I would really equate to selling an automobile with no airbags and no seatbelts--now, our plan says, look, if you want to keep driving a car with no airbags and no seatbelts, you can keep driving, but people can't sell a car with no airbags and no seatbelts to a new consumer, which is what the underlying bill permits. Now, when that happens, here is what is going to happen. People in the new State marketplaces are going to see a huge increase in their premiums. People who get covered at work are going to see a huge increase in their premiums. It is going to spill over to Medigap policies for seniors and people on Medicare. The bill really should be called the ``Guaranteed Premium Increase Act of 2013'' because that is what it is. Our bill corrects that by saying, let's help the people we say we want to try to help, people who like their plan and want to keep it, not everyone that the insurance company could dupe or lure into buying a car with no airbag and no seatbelts. Finally, working together means not forgetting about some other people who write letters we haven't heard much about today, the family that Mr. Doyle talked about, whose daughter has cancer, who has an insurance policy, but has to have a beef and beer or a golf tournament to raise money to pay their bills. I want to help that person and not repeal the Affordable Care Act. How about the woman who had breast cancer 10 years ago and can now be told, we are sorry, you can't buy an insurance policy. You have got to pay more if you do. I want to help her by banning discrimination based on preexisting conditions. If we really want to work together, let's adopt this plan. Let's really help the people we say we are trying to help, and not the insurance industry of the United States of America. I yield back the balance of my time. Point of Order Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I do insist on the point of order. In my opinion, the pending amendment violates clause 7 of rule XVI of the rules of the House which requires that an amendment be germane to the matter it is amending. It is not germane to the bill because section 3 imposes a mandate on State insurance commissioners, and section 4 amends the Public Health Service Act which is, in fact, beyond the scope of the base text. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does any Member wish to speak to the point of order? Mr. ANDREWS. I do, Mr. Speaker. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized to speak to the point of order. Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, my understanding is my friend, the chairman's objection is based on the principle of germaneness. The underlying bill, by its very title, purports to protect Americans who have received a cancelation notice for a policy that they want to keep. Now, there is a disagreement here over how to protect those Americans. The underlying bill does not have requirements that State insurance commissioners act to protect those individuals. Our plan does. Our plan does. This is a disagreement over the means to protect American consumers. The underlying bill says we will trust the insurance industry. Our bill says, no, we will enforce the insurance laws. I would respectfully submit this does not rise to a difference in germaneness. This is a difference of opinion. The bill on the floor purports to protect the Americans that I talked about. We think it doesn't. Our plan does protect those Americans in a different way. The underlying subject matter of this bill is how do you protect Americans who wish to keep the insurance plan that they have. We believe we have a more effective way of doing that. The majority disagrees. The House deserves a vote on that. No technicality, no procedural nicety should deny us the chance to take a vote on whose plan is right. We should proceed with this vote. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does any other Member wish to speak to the point of order? Seeing none, the Chair is prepared to rule. The gentleman from Michigan makes a point of order that the instructions proposed in the motion to recommit offered by the gentleman from New Jersey are not germane. Clause 7 of rule XVI, the germaneness rule, provides that no proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment. The bill permits health insurance issuers that offered health insurance coverage in the individual market on January 1, 2013, to continue to make such coverage available for sale during 2014. The amendment proposed in the motion to recommit, in pertinent part, requires State insurance commissioners to examine notices of health insurance cancelations or conversions. It also addresses the regulation of health insurance rates. Specifically, the amendment delineates what would constitute inadequate notice of cancelation or conversions of health insurance coverage, and directs State insurance commissioners to investigate such cases of inadequate notice. Additionally, it permits the Secretary of Health and Human Services or the relevant State insurance regulator to take corrective actions if health insurance rates are determined to be excessive, unjustified, or unfairly discriminatory. Such corrective action may include the assessment of civil monetary penalties. The bill does not address any of these subject matters. Instead, it is confined to the subject matter of extending into 2014 the authority to offer health insurance coverage that was for sale on the individual market in 2013. The Chair finds that the amendment proposed in the motion to recommit goes beyond the subject matter of the underlying bill. It is therefore not germane. The point of order is sustained. Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully appeal the ruling of the Chair. [[Page H7142]] The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House? Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to table the appeal of the ruling of the Chair. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to table. The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it. Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 9 of rule XX, this 15-minute vote on the motion to table will be followed by a 5-minute vote on passage of the bill, if arising without further proceedings in recommittal. The Clerk read as follows: Mr. Andrews moves to recommit the bill H.R. 3350 to the Committee on Energy and Commerce with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: Strike all after the enacting clause and insert the following: SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE. This Act may be cited as the ``Consumer Health Plan Protection Act of 2013''. SEC. 2. MAINTAINING EXISTING COVERAGE. (a) In General.--Notwithstanding any provision of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act (including any amendment made by such Act or by the Health Care and Education Reconciliation Act of 2010), in the case of health insurance coverage offered by a health insurance issuer in the individual market that is in effect for an individual as of October 1, 2013, the issuer may continue such coverage for such individual for a plan year beginning in 2014 in such market outside of an Exchange established under section 1311 or 1321 of such Act (42 U.S.C. 18031, 18041). (b) Treatment as Grandfathered Health Plan in Satisfaction of Minimum Essential Coverage.--Health insurance coverage described in subsection (a) shall be treated as a grandfathered health plan for purposes of the amendment made by section 1501(b) of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act. (c) Notice.--As a condition for a health insurance issuer to continue health insurance coverage under subsection (a), the issuer shall provide for notice to each individual to be offered such continued coverage (and for other individuals covered under health insurance coverage offered by such issuer for whom such continued coverage is not offered) prompt notice of the following: (1) The health insurance coverage options available to the individual through the Marketplace under the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act and how to exercise such options. (2) The premium and cost-sharing assistance available for coverage obtained through such Marketplace. (3) The consumer protections provided under such Act that are not provided under the continuing health insurance coverage. (d) Construction Regarding Notices of Cancellation or Conversion.-- (1) In general.--Nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of Health and Human Services from requiring State insurance commissioners-- (A) to investigate and take appropriate administrative or other actions (such as the imposition of a fine) on cases of inadequate notices of cancellations or conversions of health insurance coverage in the individual market that take effect on or after January 1, 2014; and (B) to submit to the Secretary reports on the investigations and actions so taken. [[Page H7143]] (2) Inadequate notice.--In this subection, a notice of the cancellation or conversion of individual health insurance coverage shall be treated as inadequate if the notice-- (A) fails to contain information contained in subsection (c); (B) fails to be transparent by inappropriately steering individuals to more expensive plans provided by the cancelling issuer; or (C) fails to otherwise comply with requirements of law. (e) Construction Regarding Protection Against Discriminatory Rates.--Nothing in this section shall be construed as preventing the Secretary or the relevant State insurance commissioner or State regulator from taking corrective actions to ensure that any excessive, unjustified, or unfairly discriminatory rates for the continued coverage offered under subsection (a) are corrected prior to renewal. (f) Construction Regarding Premium Protection.--Nothing in this section shall be construed as preventing the Secretary from using all available tools to ensure that Marketplace premiums are not adversely affected by the operation of this section. Mr. UPTON (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order. The SPEAKER pro tempore. A point of order is reserved. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for 5 minutes in support of his motion. (Mr. ANDREWS asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.) Mr. ANDREWS. We come here as stewards of a very sacred trust--to look after the people that are the backbone of this country. We are having this debate this afternoon because we have all heard from men and women across this country who are very upset that an insurance policy that they want to keep has been canceled. {time} 1315 These constituents are very upset and very troubled, and we are brought here to work together to figure out a solution to that problem. What is the solution? First of all, they ought to have the ability to have their insurance companies offer them the policies for sale. Frankly, the underlying bill does that, and so does the plan that I am presenting. Secondly, there ought to be some way that the insurance companies are given some incentive at the very at least, direction, to sell the policy. It doesn't do you a whole lot of good to have the right to buy a policy that the insurance company is not selling, and this plan has some measures which make it more likely that insurance companies would do that. Thirdly, to solve that person's problem, we have to make sure that in solving his problem we are not creating another one; that by permitting these policies to be sold for another year, which this does, that we are not spiking the premiums of people in the exchange marketplaces or of people who get their insurance through work. I have heard a number of Members say that they want a chance for us to work together to solve this problem. Here is that chance because this plan does the three things that I just talked about, but this plan, I think, is different than the underlying bill because this is not a step to unravel the Affordable Care Act; it is a step to improve it--which is the fundamental question, and there are some other people whose stories ought to be told here this afternoon, too. There is a family this weekend that is having a social to raise money to pay the medical bills for their son or daughter who has cancer, because the insurance policy they thought they had stopped paying their son's or daughter's bills. Their voice should be heard. If you repeal the Affordable Care Act, their voice is silenced. There are women in this country who go to try to start a business. They try to buy an insurance policy, and they are told, We won't sell you one because you had children or you are a female or you had breast cancer 10 years ago. If you repeal the Affordable Care Act, her voice is silenced. Mr. Speaker, there are sons and daughters of Americans who are 22, 23 years old who didn't have health insurance before because they couldn't get that first full-time job who now have health insurance because they are on their moms' or dads' policies. If you repeal the Affordable Care Act, their voices will be silenced. There are senior citizens who used to run out of drug coverage, prescription coverage, around Labor Day because the Medicare doughnut hole popped up. Because of the Affordable Care Act, they are now able to buy their prescriptions at an affordable price and are now able to pay their prescription bills until the end of the year. If you repeal the Affordable Care Act, their voices are silenced. We come here this afternoon to solve the problem of Americans who want to keep their coverage but who have had it canceled. We want to work together to solve that problem. That is what this plan does. When we look at women being turned away because of preexisting conditions, we will not be silenced. When we look at 22-year-olds who will lose their coverage if you repeal the Affordable Care Act, we will not be silenced. When you look at seniors who will lose the ability to pay their prescription drugs if you repeal the ACA, we will not be silenced. We are here to solve problems, not to create them. If you want to work together in a way that improves this law, we are your able and willing partner, but if the intention is to unravel this protection for the American people, we will stand, we will speak, we will fight, and we will oppose every such effort. Vote ``yes'' for this motion and ``no'' on the underlying bill. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my point of order and seek time in opposition to the motion to recommit. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is withdrawn. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 5 minutes. Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, the debate today on whether to support this bill comes down to a very simple question: Why not? If millions of Americans want the choice of keeping the insurance that they have, why not? If you believe Congress acting together, not the President acting unilaterally, should try to help people who have lost their coverage, why not? If you believe that ordinary Americans, not the Federal Government, should decide what their insurance plans look like, why not? We have a chance today to provide hope to millions of Americans who got that cancelation notice, hope that they can keep the insurance that they like, hope that they are going to have even more choices, and hope that they, not the Federal Government, can pick what their insurance plans actually look like. So let me be clear. Our bill, H.R. 3350, does not fix ObamaCare, the President's health care bill. It is only an attempt to help people harmed by this law. But if we can provide some relief to people from this disaster, why not? Let's defeat the motion to recommit and pass the underlying bill. I yield back the balance of my time. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to recommit. There was no objection. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit. The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it. Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 9 of rule XX, the Chair will reduce to 5 minutes the minimum time for any electronic vote on the question of passage. This is a 5-minute vote. The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were--yeas 187, nays 230, not voting 13, as follows: [Roll No. 586] YEAS--187 Andrews Barber Barrow (GA) Bass Beatty Bera (CA) Bishop (GA) Bishop (NY) Blumenauer Bonamici Brady (PA) Braley (IA) Brown (FL) Brownley (CA) Bustos Capps Capuano Cardenas Carney Carson (IN) Cartwright Castor (FL) Castro (TX) Chu Cicilline Clarke Clay Cleaver Clyburn Cohen Connolly Conyers Cooper Costa Courtney Crowley Cuellar Cummings Davis (CA) Davis, Danny DeFazio DeGette Delaney DeLauro DelBene Deutch Dingell Doggett Doyle Duckworth Edwards Ellison Engel Enyart Eshoo Esty Farr Fattah Foster Frankel (FL) Fudge Gabbard Gallego Garamendi Garcia Grayson Green, Al Grijalva Gutierrez [[Page H7144]] Hahn Hanabusa Hastings (FL) Heck (WA) Higgins Himes Hinojosa Holt Honda Horsford Hoyer Huffman Israel Jackson Lee Johnson (GA) Johnson, E. Copper-mine bill stalls in House

BYLINE: By, Erin Kelly, Republic Washington Bureau

LENGTH: 1069 words

Plans to build North America's largest copper mine near Superior were dealt a major blow Wednesday when congressional supporters of the project canceled a vote on their bill after a strong lobbying effort against the mine by Native American tribes throughout the nation.

For the second time in two months, Rep. Paul Gosar, R-Ariz., was forced to pull his bill, the Southeast Arizona Land Exchange and Conservation Act, from the House floor or risk defeat.

Gosar is the lead sponsor of the bill, which is co-sponsored by Rep. Ann Kirkpatrick, D-Ariz.

Supporters and opponents of the bill credited heavy lobbying by tribes for derailing the bill.

The San Carlos Apache Tribe, which fears the mine will destroy its sacred land, reached out to tribes across the country for help in stopping the project.

Those tribes then lobbied Republican House members in states with significant Native American populations to oppose a federal land swap that would have paved the way for Resolution Copper Co. to build the mine.

Lawmakers who didn't care one way or another about a copper mine in Arizona began to oppose Gosar's bill to avoid getting in political trouble with their own tribal constituents, according to supporters and opponents of Gosar's bill.

To make matters worse for mine supporters, the bill was scheduled to come to a vote Wednesday in the midst of a Tribal Nations Conference this week that brought tribal leaders, including San Carlos Chairman Terry Rambler, to the nation's capital to meet with White House officials.

President Barack Obama spoke to the tribal leaders Wednesday. Those leaders included representatives from tribes in states such as Oklahoma, where lawmakers had been wavering on Gosar's bill.

Opponents of the mine say it would weaken the ground beneath sacred Native American lands such as Apache Leap, harm the environment and rock-climbing areas, and threaten the Phoenix area's water supply.

Gosar was angry about Wednesday's setback but said he will try again if he can secure the votes. He and other supporters of the mine say it would create more than 3,700 jobs, generate more than $61billion in economic activity over the 66-year life of the mine, and supply 25percent or more of the nation's demand for copper.

"Today's setback will not discourage me from my continued fight for this important Arizona jobs bill," Gosar said in a statement. "I am disappointed that a mine of national significance that would have employed so many Native Americans was opposed by the leadership of the San Carlos Apache Tribe - a tribe plagued with excessively high unemployment and poverty.

"It is inexplicable decisions like this that directly result in the continued poverty of the tribe and the deterioration of the economic prospects of the town of Superior and the entire state of Arizona."

Gosar accused San Carlos leaders of misleading other tribes about the project. Tribal leaders had no immediate comment Wednesday.

"Polls show the majority of San Carlos Apache tribal members support the mine and the jobs," Gosar said. "Their tribal leadership is out of touch with its own people. I am confident that the truth will prevail and the will of the members of the tribe and surrounding communities will be done."

Kirkpatrick also vowed to keep trying.

"The families in Arizona's Copper Corridor need these jobs, and Arizona's economy needs this boost," she said in a statement. "I remain committed to moving this forward, working across the aisle with Congressman Gosar and my colleagues and bringing local stakeholders together. When it comes to creating jobs and strengthening the economy, we need to find common ground."

Rep. Raúl Grijalva, D-Ariz., one of the major opponents of the mine, had no immediate reaction to Wednesday's turn of events.

But he said in an interview last week that he believed an amendment to Gosar's bill proposed by Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., was causing a problem for the mine's supporters. Any attempt to ignore or kill the amendment would cause "a political firestorm" for mine supporters, Grijalva said.

Lujan's amendment had been scheduled for a vote Wednesday, in advance of Gosar's bill. The amendment would have given the federal government greater authority to protect sacred Native American land not under tribal ownership.

Supporters of the copper mine said it was intended as a "poison pill" to kill the Resolution Copper project. But Lujan said his amendment would improve the bill, and tribal leaders urged their members of Congress to support his proposed change.

Lujan, in a recent speech on the House floor, cited strong tribal opposition to Gosar's bill as a key reason he wanted to amend the legislation. Among the groups opposing the bill are the National Congress of American Indians, the United South and Eastern Tribes, the All Indian Pueblo Council of New Mexico, and the Jicarilla and Mescalero Apache tribes of New Mexico.

"The cultural and sacred sites of Apache Leap and Oak Flat are located on public land and not on an Indian reservation," Lujan said. "Although these sites are not on an Indian reservation, they are still sacred to the San Carlos Apache, the Yavapai Indian Tribe, and other tribes in Arizona - just as a Catholic church, where I practice my faith, is considered a holy place even though it's not located in Vatican City."

However, Resolution Copper officials have said they would not mine beneath Apache Leap.

The decision by the mine's supporters to pull their bill is the latest twist in a saga that dates to 2005, when Resolution Copper began seeking a federal land exchange. Eleven versions of a land-exchange bill have been introduced in Congress.

If the bill was approved by both chambers of Congress, Resolution Copper would get about 2,400 acres in the Oak Flat area of the Tonto National Forest in return for giving more than 5,000 acres of environmentally sensitive land throughout Arizona to the federal government.

"Resolution Copper is disappointed that a vote on (the bill) did not occur today," company spokesman Troy Corder said. "We are focusing on the submission of our Mine Plan of Operation to the U.S. Forest Service this week. We are confident that our MPO will dispel misinformation around the project and establish that we have submitted the project for regulatory review. We feel that as the details of the MPO emerge, support will continue to grow for the legislation."

House vote on Resolution Copper mine put off indefinitely

WASHINGTON -- Plans to build North America's largest copper mine were dealt a major blow Wednesday when congressional supporters of the southeast Arizona project canceled a vote on their bill after a strong lobbying effort against the mine by Native American tribes throughout the nation.

For the second time in two months, Rep. Paul Gosar, R-Ariz., was forced to pull his bill -- the Southeast Arizona Land Exchange and Conservation Act -- from the House floor or risk defeat. Gosar is the lead sponsor of the bill, which is co-sponsored by Rep. Ann Kirkpatrick, D-Ariz.

The San Carlos Apache Tribe, which fears the mine will destroy its sacred tribal lands in Arizona, reached out to tribes across the country for help in stopping the project. Those tribes then lobbied Republican House members in states with significant Native American populations to oppose a federal land swap that would have paved the way for Resolution Copper Co. to build the mine near Superior, Ariz.

Lawmakers who didn't really care one way or another about a copper mine in Arizona began to oppose Gosar's bill to avoid getting in political trouble with their own tribal constituents, supporters and opponents of Gosar's bill said.

To make matters worse for mine supporters, the bill was scheduled to come to a vote Wednesday in the midst of a Tribal Nations Conference this week that brought tribal leaders -- including San Carlos Apache Tribal Chairman Terry Rambler -- to the nation's capital to meet with Obama administration officials just as the House was scheduled to take up the bill. President Barack Obama spoke to the tribal leaders Wednesday. Those leaders included representatives from tribes in states such as Oklahoma, where lawmakers had been wavering on Gosar's bill.

Opponents of the mine say it would weaken the ground beneath sacred Native American lands such as Apache Leap, harm the environment and rock-climbing areas, and threaten the Phoenix area's water supply.

"Today's setback will not discourage me from my continued fight for this important Arizona jobs bill," Gosar said in a statement. "I am disappointed that a mine of national significance that would have employed so many Native Americans was opposed by the leadership of the San Carlos Apache Tribe -- a tribe plagued with excessively high unemployment and poverty. It is inexplicable decisions like this that directly result in the continued poverty of the tribe and the deterioration of the economic prospects of the town of Superior and the entire state of Arizona."

Gosar accused San Carlos Apache leaders of misleading other tribes about the project. Tribal leaders had no immediate comment Wednesday.

"Polls show the majority of San Carlos Apache tribal members support the mine and the jobs," Gosar said. "Their tribal leadership is out of touch with its own people. I am confident that the truth will prevail and the will of the members of the tribe and surrounding communities will be done."

Kirkpatrick also vowed to keep trying.

Rep. Raul Grijalva, D-Ariz., one of the major opponents of the mine, had no immediate reaction to Wednesday's turn of events. But he said in an interview last week that he believed an amendment to Gosar's bill proposed by Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., was causing a problem for the mine's supporters. Any attempt to ignore or kill the amendment would cause "a political firestorm" for mine supporters, Grijalva said.

Lujan's amendment had been scheduled for a vote Wednesday, in advance of Gosar's bill. The amendment would have given the federal government greater authority to protect sacred Native American lands that are not under tribal ownership.

Supporters of the copper mine said it was intended as a "poison pill" to kill the Resolution Copper project. But Lujan said his amendment would improve the bill, and tribal leaders urged their members of Congress to support his proposed change.

Lujan, in a recent speech on the House floor, cited strong tribal opposition to Gosar's bill as a key reason why he wanted to amend the legislation. Among the groups opposing the bill are: the National Congress of American Indians, the United South and Eastern Tribes, the All Indian Pueblo Council of New Mexico, and the Jicarilla and Mescalero Apache tribes of New Mexico.

"The cultural and sacred sites of Apache Leap and Oak Flat are located on public land and not on an Indian Reservation," Lujan said. "Although these sites are not on an Indian Reservation, they are still sacred to the San Carlos Apache, the Yavapai Indian Tribe, and other tribes in Arizona -- just as a Catholic church, where I practice my faith, is considered a holy place even though it's not located in Vatican City."

Transferring the land from the federal to private ownership would take away its protections, Lujan argued.

However, Resolution Copper officials have said they would not mine beneath Apache Leap.

The decision by the mine's supporters to pull their bill is the latest twist in a saga that dates back nearly a decade.

Resolution Copper has been seeking a federal land exchange since 2005. Eleven versions of a land-exchange bill have been introduced in Congress. In 2011, the House approved a different version of Gosar's bill, but the legislation never came to a vote in the Senate.

If the bill is approved by both chambers of Congress, Resolution Copper would get about 2,400 acres in the Oak Flat area of the Tonto National Forest in return for giving more than 5,000 acres of environmentally sensitive land throughout Arizona to the federal government.

"Resolution Copper is disappointed that a vote on (the bill) did not occur today," said company spokesman Troy Corder. "We are focusing on the submission of our Mine Plan of Operation to the U.S. Forest Service this week. We are confident that our MPO will dispel misinformation around the project and establish that we have submitted the project for regulatory review. We feel that as the details of the MPO emerge, support will continue to grow for the legislation."

While the bill has now stalled in the House, the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee has scheduled a hearing on the mine project for Wednesday.

New Mexico Dems: Congressman Ben Ray Lujan Announces Federal Assistance for Santa Clara Pueblo

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 360 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan joined with U.S. Senator Tom Udall yesterday to announce that more than $2.8 million in federal assistance relief is being made available to Santa Clara Pueblo through the Public Assistance Grant Program to assist with the installation of debris collection structures. As a result of a disaster declaration in August of 2012 in response to severe flooding from June 22 to July 12, 2012, the pueblo was made eligible for funds from the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA).

Senator Udall, then-Senator Jeff Bingaman, and Rep. Lujan wrote letters in support of Santa Clara and the State's request for a disaster declaration to assist the pueblo.

"I am very glad to see this funding finally come to Santa Clara Pueblo. The Las Conchas fire caused significant damage that has been compounded by serious floods over two years," Udall said. "Santa Clara Pueblo had to wait too long for assistance, so it is very good to be able to announce this funding to help them rebuild and recover."

"The Las Conchas Fire left lasting scars that have continued to impact Santa Clara Pueblo over the past few years," Lujan said. "These vital funds will help the pueblo move forward with critical efforts to recover from flooding that occurred last summer, as well as more recent flooding that has impacted the community."

Santa Clara Pueblo will receive $2,841,759 that will allow the pueblo to take emergency protective measures and install temporary structures to collect debris resulting from flooding. These structures will reduce the flow of large vegetative and rock debris being washed down the side canyons leading to the main Santa Clara Creek Canyon.

Santa Clara Pueblo, which is downstream of land damaged in the 2011 Las Conchas Fire, has experienced severe flooding caused by runoff over the burn scar on multiple occasions in the years following the fire. These federal funds will be made available to State of New Mexico administrative agents, who will then distribute the money to Santa Clara Pueblo.

Veterans honored at ceremony

BYLINE: Thomas Garcia, Quay County Sun, Tucumcari, N.M.

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 691 words

Nov. 12--Veterans' Day is our way of honoring those who answered the call to serve, to fight for our rights and freedoms, and those who made the bravest sacrifice and did not return home, said Col. Timothy Paul, New Mexico National Guard Chief of Staff.

Paul was the guest speaker for Monday morning's Veterans' Day memorial ceremony at Tucumcari Memorial Park Cemetery, hosted by Tucumcari VFW Post 2528.

Paul said it is in human nature to have conflict and battle; it is not something that we want but is something that we cannot ignore. He said this nation stands for the ideal that all men are created equal and shall stand for those who cannot fight tyranny and bring freedom to those who are being oppressed.

"It is an honor to be here in Tucumcari, where so many brave men and women have served and continue to serve their country," Paul said.

Paul said New Mexico's residents have had a long, proud history of serving in the Armed Forces. He said the brave men of the 200th and 515th Coast Artillery, New Mexico National Guard unit had been sent to the Philippines to provide air defense for Clark Field.

The 200th, 515th Coast Artillery and Filipino defenders fought for four months until they had to retreat into the Bataan Peninsula. On April 9, 1942, the 200th and 515th Coast Artillery, along with the rest of the Bataan defenders, began the march to prison camps known as the Bataan Death March. They would then be interned for more than three years.

Paul said Quay County was the home to many who had survived the Bataan Death March. He said those men suffered horrible atrocities in defense of our liberties and freedom.

One of two remaining Bataan Death March survivors Melvin C. Waltmon died on Oct. 29. Alfred A. Haws currently resides in Logan.

Ron Wilmot, regional representative for U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan (D-N.M.), read a letter from Lujan.

"Today, our nation will join together to honor the brave service of the men and women who have worn our nation's uniform and who have sacrificed in order to uphold the values that make America great," Lujan's letter said.

Lujan said the sons and daughters of New Mexico bravely served when their country needed them most. He said New Mexicans are proud of the long tradition of service and the many contributions New Mexicans have made through military service.

"From the Navajo Code Talkers and the soldiers who endured the Bataan Death March in World War II, to Medal of Honor recipients Leroy Petry and Hiroshi Miyamura, their stories of heroism are inspiring," Lujan said. "For all those whose stories may not be as well-known, but whose service will never be forgotten."

Lujan said honoring these heroes is just one service we must provide for military veterans returning home. He said we must also thank them in deeds. Veterans deserve the benefits they have been promised -- from health care to education -- as well as the opportunity to succeed when their service has concluded.

"Just as these heroes have answered the call of duty, so must we, as a community and a country, answer the call to care for them when they return home," Lujan said.

Lujan said too many veterans struggle to find work when their military service ends despite the excellent training and leadership qualities they possess. He said Americans must work together so that when the country welcomes home the men and women who have protected the nation's freedoms, they are welcoming home the entrepreneurs and small-business owners who will be leaders in our community.

More than 90 people attended the American Legion Post 77 Veterans Day dinner and appreciation program Saturday in Logan. The dinner and program were free and was held to honor local Veterans and women currently serving in the military.

The Tucumcari chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution hosted an appreciation breakfast on Saturday for veterans and active-duty service personnel, and a ceremony honoring veterans and men and women currently serving in the armed forces on Sunday.

LUJAN STATEMENT CELEBRATING VETERANS DAY; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 360 words

Santa Fe, NM - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today in celebration of Veterans Day, which is on Monday, November 11.

"On Monday, our nation will join together to honor the brave service of the men and women who have worn our nation's uniform and who have sacrificed in order to uphold the values that make America great. In New Mexico, we are proud of the long tradition of service and the many contributions that the people of our great state have made through their military service.

"From the Navajo Code Talkers and the soldiers who endured the Bataan Death March in World War II to Medal of Honor recipients Leroy Petry and Hiroshi Miyamura, their stories of heroism are inspiring. And for all those whose stories may not be as well known, but whose service will never be forgotten - the sons and daughters of New Mexico have bravely served when their country needed them most.

"Just as these heroes have answered the call of duty, so must we, as a community and a country, answer the call to care for them when they return home. We must not only thank them in words, but in deeds as well. Our veterans deserve the benefits they have been promised - from health care to education - as well as the opportunity to succeed when their service has concluded. Too many veterans struggle to find work when their military service ends despite the excellent training and leadership qualities they possess. We must work together so that when we welcome home the men and women who have protected our freedoms, we are welcoming home the entrepreneurs and small business owners who will be leaders in our community. From job training to incentives to hire veterans, we must invest in the men and women who served with distinction.

"This Veterans Day, let us express our gratitude to our nation's veterans and recommit to ensuring that our veterans are given the opportunities that befit our nation's heroes. We also remember all of those still serving and hope for their safe and speedy return home."

New Mexico Dems: Congressmen Lujan and Lujan Grisham Applaud Historic Vote to End Discrimination in the Senate; Call for Passage in the House

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 443 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

Both of New Mexico's Democratic members of the U.S. House of Representatives joined in applauding the historic 64-32 vote in the United States Senate for passage of the Employment Non-Discrimination Act (http://www.gpo.gov/fdsys/pkg/BILLS-113s815rs/pdf/BILLS-113s815rs.pdf) (ENDA) yesterday, and called for swift passage in the House of Representatives.

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District and a cosponsor of the House version of the Employment Non-Discrimination Act (ENDA) applauded the Senate passage of legislation that would prohibit discrimination in the workplace on the basis of sexual orientation and gender identity.

"As a cosponsor and strong supporter of the Employment Non-Discrimination Act, I am encouraged that the Senate passed this important legislation, with strong bipartisan support, that would ensure no one is discriminated against in the workplace on the basis of sexual orientation. With more than 90 percent of Fortune 500 companies already implementing policies like ENDA, it is time to adopt these best practices into law, and provide the LGBT community assurance that discrimination will not be tolerated. Workers should be judged on their ability and work ethic, not their sexual orientation.

"Now that this bill has cleared the Senate, I hope that Republican leaders in the House will reconsider their opposition to this legislation and not stand in the way of the fight against discrimination. I call upon House Republican leaders to allow a vote on this important bill."

Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham of New Mexico's First Congressional District released the following statement after Senate passage of the Employment Non-Discrimination Act (ENDA):

"With its strong bipartisan vote to pass the Employment Non-Discrimination Act, the United States Senate today reaffirmed a basic but vital principle: everyone in this country should be treated equally under the law. Nobody should have to go to work every day fearful that they'll lose their job simply because of their sexual orientation or gender identity. America's workers should be judged based on their job performance, not on who they are or who they love.

"Now it's time for the House to side with most Fortune 500 companies, countless small businesses, the state of New Mexico and a majority of Americans by passing the Employment Non-Discrimination Act. I'm proud to join nearly 200 of my House colleagues in co-sponsoring ENDA, and I urge Speaker Boehner to allow a vote on this bipartisan legislation."

NM senators support federal Employment Non-Discrimination Act

BYLINE: Michael Coleman, JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: INSIDE THE BELTWAY

LENGTH: 521 words

New Mexico's U.S. senators voted for a bill Thursday that would ban workplace discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity, a measure which passed the Senate 64-32.

"In New Mexico, we are proud of our diverse people and also our work ethic and we believe individuals should be judged on their ability to do their job and their performance, not by anything else," Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., said after voting for the Employment Non-Discrimination Act. "We also have a strong history of protecting human rights, which is why we've had a similar state nondiscrimination law on the books for 10 years."

Current federal law prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex, race and national origin. But it doesn't stop an employer from firing or refusing to hire workers because they are gay, lesbian, bisexual, or transgender. The Senate bill would bar employers with 15 or more workers from using a person's sexual orientation or gender identity as the basis for making employment decisions, including hiring, firing, compensation, or promotion. The legislation would exempt religious institutions and the military.

New Mexico state law already prohibits hiring discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity, as well as in housing and consumer credit. The state is considered to have some of the nation's strictest protections.

"Passing the Employment Non-Discrimination Act ensures that every employee in every state is judged not on who they are or who they love, but on the quality of their work," said Sen. Martin Heinrich. "I'm proud to be a longtime supporter of ENDA and to represent a state that was at the forefront of providing these kinds of workplace protections for our LGBT community a decade ago."

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., said the bill makes good business sense.

"With more than 90 percent of Fortune 500 companies already implementing policies like ENDA, it is time to adopt these best practices into law, and provide the LGBT community assurance that discrimination will not be tolerated," he said. "Workers should be judged on their ability and work ethic, not their sexual orientation.

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., tweeted her support for the bill today, as well. Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., voted against a similar bill in 2007.

Meanwhile, gender equality made news in a New Mexico in a different way Wednesday when a top New Mexico regulator directed insurance companies to provide marital discounts to same-sex married couples in the state. As the Journal's Dan Boyd reported on today's front page of the Journal: "In an order released Wednesday by his office, state Insurance Superintendent John Franchini told insurance companies that failure to give such discounts would be viewed by his office as an unfair, and illegal, business practice.

"The superintendent expects all married couples to be treated equally and without prejudice by all persons engaged in the business of insurance in New Mexico," Franchini wrote. "The practice of applying discounts for policy-holders who are married shall apply to all policy-holders, regardless of gender or sexual orientation."

LUJAN ANNOUNCES $2.4 MILLION FOR COMMUNITY HEALTH CENTERS IN NEW MEXICO TO EXPAND ACCESS TO HEALTH CARE;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 288 words

Santa Fe, NM - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District announced today that, thanks to the Affordable Care Act, three community health centers in New Mexico are receiving $2,409,873 in grant awards to expand access to health care. These funds will allow the centers to serve 9,100 additional patients in New Mexico. Nationwide, more than 230 health center programs are receiving approximately $150 million to serve more than 1.25 million additional patients.

Lujan also announced that two of the community health centers receiving a grant are in his northern New Mexico congressional district. Presbyterian Medical Services in Santa Fe is receiving $733,333 and the Pueblo of Jemez is receiving $818,207.

"Community health centers provide vital primary health care services to our communities, and thanks to these federal funds, more of our families, friends, and neighbors will have access to affordable, quality care," Congressman Lujan said. "Strengthening and growing these essential centers is an important component of the Affordable Care Act's goal of offering greater access to the care New Mexicans need."

The grants under the Affordable Care Act will be used by the community health centers to support the establishment of new full-time service delivery sites. Nationwide, approximately 1,200 health centers operate more than 9,000 service delivery sites that provide care to more than 21 million patients in every state. In New Mexico last year, community health centers served 284,246 patients, 42 percent of whom were uninsured.

Battle for amendments to RECA law continues

BYLINE: Kathy Helms Diné Bureau navajo1@gallupindependent.com

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 1A

LENGTH: 1102 words

WINDOW ROCK - Norris Nez, a traditional Navajo medicine man, lives in the area of Coalmine Mesa by the Hosteen Nez uranium mine at Gold Spring.

"I used to haul truckloads of uranium for processing to Winslow, Gallup, Shiprock and Blanding. The only compensation my family got was some groceries," he once testified.

The mine operated from 1951 to 1956, first as Hosteen Nez Mining from 1951 to 1952, and United Exploration in 1956. Total production volume was 61 tons, according to documents from the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency. Nez said he drove for the mines for at least two years. "He hauled uranium, he slept in the pits, he's eaten in the pits for all those years. He feels ill," and now that it is known that many people who worked for the uranium mines have become ill, he feels that could be to blame, according to Larry Gordy of Cameron, who translated for Nez. "He said it's like a medicine. It's really strong and he can feel it, but he hasn't had a doctor completely evaluate him because, through their eyes, there's no paperwork that he's ever worked or been around uranium."

Contaminants still there Because Nez's work record is nonexistent, even if he has a compensable illness under the federal Radiation Exposure Compensation Act - which is designed to compensate individuals who worked in the uranium industry prior to Dec. 31, 1971 - he can't get compensation because of the missing paper trail.

For 20 years, radioactive clouds drifted across the United States leaving a trail of fallout from above-ground atomic testing at Nevada Test Site.The Navajo Nation was a hot spot for fallout on numerous occasions in the 1950s - three times just in March 1955 alone - and Nez said contamination from the blasts hasn't gone away.

"They put it in the atmosphere and we're still breathing it. Also, things flying in the air have contaminated the atmosphere. It has affected the breathing and the esophagus and down into your lungs. So there's a lot of things that we still have to cover and we need to hold (prayer) meetings for. Those are some of the things that people don't talk about," Nez said. Three years and counting J. Keith Killian of the Killian Davis Richter & Mayle law firm in Grand Junction, Colo., has spent years lobbying on behalf of the Navajo Nation for amendments to the Radiation Exposure Compensation Act. Killian and senior paralegal Jennifer McCall were scheduled to present a RECA update last Wednesday to the Navajo Nation Council's Health, Education and Human Services Committee, however, their plane was grounded due to engine trouble so the presentation had to be postponed. Since the RECA Amendments of 2013 were introduced in April by Sen. Tom Udall and Rep. Ben Ray Lujan Jr., the bill has been referred to the Judiciary Committee in the Senate, and three committees in the House, which then referred it to three subcommittees. On July 8, it moved from the House Education and the Workforce Committee to the Subcommittee on Workforce Protections, where, on Oct. 11, it gained three cosponsors: Reps. Carol Shea-Porter, DN.H., Dina Titus, D-Nev., and Paul Tonko, D-N.Y. In addition, Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., 2nd District, became a co-sponsor in May, followed by Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., 1st District, in June, and Ed Perlmutter, D-Colo., in August. "The new legislation was first introduced in 2010, so it's been three years now. Each year, Tom Udall and Ben Ray Lujan have introduced it, and each year there have been all these constraints on the budget. So this year is better than it was in 2010, '11 and '12," Killian said.

"Will it pass? We don't know. To be honest with you, it has to do with whether we're financially capable of doing it and whether it's politically acceptable. From a political standpoint, it's nice to have the Four Corners states basically pitching in and saying, 'Yes, this is a good idea for us.' And from a political standpoint.. it's likely that as we mine uranium, that we're going to want to take care of the ones that mined in the past in order to make it acceptable to do it in the future."

Killian said they are continuing to coordinate with Simon Boyce at the Navajo Nation Washington Office and with the New Mexico delegation. At some point, another trip to Washington could be in order to try to generate movement in the subcommittees. "That would be, in my mind, the best thing to do," Killian said.

Where's the logic?

Under the proposed amendments, downwind states would be expanded to include all of Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah and Wyoming. The Territory of Guam would be added for the Pacific Test Sites.

"One of the things that's very ironic to me is that the first nuclear test site (Trinity), we had all that radiation that was spread around New Mexico and there's never been compensation for that. It seems that there ought to be that," he said.

"The thing that is so sad to me, and of course Jennifer and I have seen this happen for 20 years, is that we know there are people that suffered and are dying and have died as a result of radiation exposure - uranium miners, millers, ore haulers, core drillers and downwinders - but we can't get them compensation" because proof can't be established under the current law. In the case of former workers such as Nez, the new law would expand the use of affidavits to substantiate their employment history as a miner, miller, core driller or ore transporter. For downwinders, affidavits could be used to establish proof of residency, and in the case of on-site participants, affidavits could establish proof of on-site presence when the blasts occurred.

Many of those who are now sick but not eligible for benefits are post-'71 uranium workers. Under the new law, coverage would extend from Dec. 31, 1971, to Dec. 31, 1990. Others who would be helped are core drillers, Killian said, who currently are not eligible.

The amendments also would include additional compensation for downwinders and expand the list of compensable diseases. "Right now, if you're a miner or miller, you can get $150, 000; but if you're a downwinder, of course, you can't. There are other things - like the renal cancers that are applicable to millers and not miners. There's a historical reason for it but when you start examining it from a logical standpoint, it doesn't work," Killian said.

"The fact that core drillers are not included either, it's just not logical. It's like the downwind counties: Why is one county included and the other is not? I guess the edges of the law are where the problems exist, and there are some harsh edges here."

Luj án touts Native American Heritage Month

BYLINE: Bernie Dotson Staff writer city@gallupindependent.com

LENGTH: 330 words

SANTA FE - U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., who is the co-chair of the Congressional Native American Caucus, released a statement Friday on Native American Heritage Month, which is celebrated during November.

"Native American Heritage Month is a time to look back at the many contributions of the First Americans, while also looking forward to ways we can build a brighter future for tribal communities," Luján stated. "As home to one of the richest indigenous tribal populations in the United States, New Mexico is proud of the influences and contributions of the 19 Pueblo nations, two Apache nations, and the Navajo Nation. Their impact on art, architecture and agriculture can be felt in so many facets of our lives today. New Mexico's history has been shaped by Native American culture and enriched by its deep-rooted traditions that will always be part of the fabric of our state.

"Native Americans have contributed to all aspects of American society and have a proud tradition of military service to our nation. Later this month, many will join together in Washington, D.C. to honor the Native American Code Talkers of World War I and World War II who played a key role in achieving victory. We remember their heroic efforts and thank them for their brave service. This month, let us remember all our Native American brothers and sisters who have worn our nation's uniform."

Lujan continued in the release, "As we celebrate Native American culture, Congress must also respect tribal sovereignty and do its part to protect it. From funding tribal programs to preserving traditional languages and protecting sacred and religious sites, Congress has important obligations to uphold. By working together to meet our trust responsibilities and strengthen government-togovernment relations, we can provide greater opportunities for Native Americans across our nation."

Luján represents the 3rd District, which includes McKinley County and most of the northwestern part of New Mexico.

Swalwell Introduces the Bipartisan National Laboratories Mean National Security Act

LENGTH: 366 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of the House of Representative Eric Swalwell, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

U.S. Representative Eric Swalwell (CA-15) introduced H.R. 3438, the National Laboratories Mean National Security Act, to ensure the full resources of Department of Energy (DOE) labs like Lawrence Livermore and Sandia National Laboratories are clearly available to help states and localities secure our country. The government-owned, contractor-operated structure of the national labs has caused some state and local recipients of federal homeland security grants to decline to utilize DOE labs because of a mistaken belief that these funds would be paid impermissibly to the federal government as opposed to contract operators.

"Lawrence Livermore, Sandia and our other DOE national laboratories are world-class scientific research and development institutions with expertise relevant to addressing our homeland security challenges," said Swalwell. "States and localities should feel free to utilize these capabilities, but the unique structure of these labs means they aren't always being used fully. It's in our homeland security interest to remove this existing barrier and clearly establish in statute that national labs can work with recipients of key federal homeland security initiatives and grants."

The research, expertise and knowledge of DOE labs are all directly relevant to addressing how to prevent and respond to attacks involving the worst threats, such as chemical, biological, and radiological weapons. Swalwell was joined on the bipartisan bill by U.S. Reps. Mike Simpson (R-ID), Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-NM), Ben Ray Lujan (D-NM), Zoe Lofgren (D-CA), Grace Napolitano (D-CA) and Bill Foster (D-IL). A similar bill passed the House of Representatives by voice vote in the 112th Congress but was not taken up by the Senate.

"We can't let a lack of clarity prevent states and localities from consulting with the best and brightest at our national labs on issues as critical as our homeland security. This is commonsense legislation that would provide a boost to the safety of our communities," Swalwell added.

Sen. Udall calls again for Senate rules reform

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN Washington Notebook

SECTION: METRO & NEW MEXICO; Pg. C1

LENGTH: 518 words

Sen. Tom Udall resurrected his call for Senate rules reform Thursday after Republicans blocked two of President Barack Obama's key nominees.

The New Mexico Democrat said the GOP's filibuster of Rep. Mel Watt's nomination as secretary of the Federal Housing Finance Agency, as well as that of Patricia Millett for the D.C. circuit Court of Appeals, again shows a dire need for a rules change.

Udall has tried since 2009 to convince his fellow senators to change the chamber's rules to require that senators who threaten a filibuster actually come to the floor and speak - much like Jimmy Stewart in the classic movie "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington."

Watt's backers are upset that the North Carolina Democrat would be the first sitting member of Congress to have his nomination blocked in more than 150 years. Republicans have questioned Watt's qualifications for the job.

"I have said for a long time: The Senate is broken. I called for changes in the Senate rules at the beginning of this Congress, but we didn't do enough," Udall said. "And now we're right back in the same dysfunctional situation. I'm going to keep fighting for a talking filibuster and other changes to end the tyranny of the minority."

OBAMACARE: Last week, Udall and Sen. Martin Heinrich, both Democrats, signed a letter urging the president to postpone the enrollment deadline for Obamacare, citing problems with the launch of the exchange website.

Few House Democrats have voiced support for a delay, but on Thursday Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., told the Journal he was open to the idea.

"The problems facing HealthCare.gov are disappointing and unacceptable," Lujan said. "The administration is working around the clock to fix them; however, if adjusting any deadlines will better achieve the overall goals of providing affordable, quality health care to the people of New Mexico, the Congress should certainly be open to doing so."

A spokesman for Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., said she does not support an enrollment deadline extension "at this point."

IMMIGRATION: Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., introduced legislation Thursday that could make it easier for select families separated by U.S. immigration laws to reunite in the United States.

A Pearce news release said his bill would allow for a Department of Homeland Security or a judge to review "only in very limited cases in which a small number of Americans who are separated from their families due to minor earlier violations which are technical in nature or occurred when the family member was a minor."

The legislation would not allow such reviews for those without a legal basis to live in the U.S., or with a serious criminal record.

Rep. Beto O'Rourke, a Democrat who represents the Texas border with Mexico, is a co-sponsor.

Pearce's legislation comes at a time when President Obama has called for a comprehensive overhaul of the nation's immigration laws. Pearce and other House Republicans have suggested that it would be easier to pass more targeted legislation to deal with the nation's roughly 12 million illegal immigrants.

LUJEN STATEMENT ON NATIVE AMERICAN HERITAGE MONTH; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 330 words

Santa Fe, NM - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District and Co-Vice Chair of the Congressional Native American Caucus released the following statement today on Native American Heritage Month, which is celebrated during November.

"Native American Heritage Month is a time to look back at the many contributions of the First Americans, while also looking forward to ways we can build a brighter future for tribal communities.

"As home to one of the richest indigenous tribal populations in the United States, New Mexico is proud of the influences and contributions of the 19 Pueblo nations, two Apache nations, and the Navajo Nation. Their impact on art, architecture, and agriculture can be felt in so many facets of our lives today. New Mexico's history has been shaped by Native American culture and enriched by its deep-rooted traditions that will always be part of the fabric of our state.

"Native Americans have contributed to all aspects of American society and have a proud tradition of military service to our nation. Later this month, many will join together in Washington, D.C. to honor the Native American Code Talkers of World War I and World War II who played a key role in achieving victory. We remember their heroic efforts and thank them for their brave service. This month, let us remember all our Native American brothers and sisters who have worn our nation's uniform.

"As we celebrate Native American culture, Congress must also respect tribal sovereignty and do its part to protect it. From funding tribal programs to preserving traditional languages and protecting sacred and religious sites, Congress has important obligations to uphold. By working together to meet our trust responsibilities and strengthen government-to-government relations, we can provide greater opportunities for Native Americans across our nation."

Rep. Lujan (gently) questions Sebelius on Obamacare

BYLINE: Michael Coleman, JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: INSIDE THE BELTWAY

LENGTH: 993 words

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., was among a slew of congressmen who questioned Health and Human Services Secretary Kathleen Sebelius today, but Lujan's queries surely came as a relief to the embattled health care chief.

Sebelius, under heavy fire for the botched rollout of Obamacare's enrollment wesbite, weathered a barrage of mostly Republican criticism at a hearing of the House Energy and Commerce committee today. But she also received some support from Democrats, including Lujan.

"Madam Secretary, I don't think that I've heard anyone from the other side of the aisle today, my Republican colleagues, ask you, "How can Congress work with you and support you in fixing this website and fixing this problem," Lujan said. "I hope that we all agree we want this website fixed. I would yield to anyone that would disagree. Seeing no one accepting that, I am glad to hear that we agree with this. Now Madam Secretary, what can Congress do to work with you to fix this website?

Here's the complete text (provided by Lujan's office) of the congressman's exchange with Sebelius:

Luján: Madam Secretary, I was intrigued by a line of questioning by Congressman [Gene] Green asking questions about the individual marketplace. How volatile was the individual marketplace before the Affordable Care Act became law?

Sebelius: I would say it wasn't a marketplace at all. It was unprotected, unregulated, and people were really on their own.

Luján: Madam Secretary, the Kaiser Family Foundation reports that over 50 percent churn - out of individuals that have coverage in the individual market - churn out of coverage every year. They lose coverage, they are priced out, or drop it. Is that consistent with what you are aware of?

Sebelius: That is an accurate snapshot. About a third of the people are in for about 6 months and over half are in for a year or less.

Luján: So individuals that were in the individual marketplace before the passage of the Affordable Care Act did not have the same protections as those that were in group coverage?

Sebelius: That's true.

Luján: And would those individuals in the individual marketplace sometimes have higher copays?

Sebelius: Higher copays, unlimited out-of-pocket costs for often coverage that was medically underwritten or excluded whatever medical condition they had in the first place.

Luján: So these were typically one-year contracts. If they use the plan because they got sick or in a car accident or a victim of domestic violence, sometimes they would be thrown off their plan or their rates would go up?

Sebelius: Yes.

Luján: I think that's important to note, Madam Secretary. And I'm intrigued, as well, that my understanding is last month HHS conducted an analysis that found that nearly 6 out of 10 uninsured Americans getting coverage through the marketplace will pay less than $100 per month. Is that correct?

Sebelius: They will have a plan available for less than $100 if that's their choice, yes.

Luján: And that number would be even higher - would be better - if more states chose the option of using federal funds to expand Medicaid to cover their low-income population?

Sebelius: Very definitely. That's just a marketplace snapshot. Those are people who will be in the marketplace.

Luján: Madam Secretary, I don't think that I've heard anyone from the other side of the aisle today, my Republican colleagues, ask you, "How can Congress work with you and support you in fixing this website and fixing this problem." I hope that we all agree we want this website fixed. I would yield to anyone that would disagree. Seeing no one accepting that, I am glad to hear that we agree with this. Now Madam Secretary, what can Congress do to work with you to fix this website?

Sebelius: Well, I'm not sure that there is hands-on work that you can do; maybe we have some technical expertise. But I would say getting accurate information to constituents is helpful, letting people know that they can check out the facts in the law, that they may be entitled to some financial support, that cancelation of policies means that the policy they had may not exist but they have a lot of choices of new policies and a law that now says they must be insured in a new policy - that they don't have to be insured by their company at a higher price.

Luján: I appreciate that Madam Secretary. Going back to the individual marketplace, Madam Secretary, did this Congress in previous years before the Affordable Care Act make it illegal for health insurance companies to raise rates on someone after they submitted a claim for going to the hospital or becoming sick or getting rid of pre-existing conditions.

Sebelius: No sir.

Luján: Madam Secretary, one last note here. It seems that we've received some horrible news that there are bad actors already taking place - fraudulent websites that imitate the health care exchange or misleading seniors into disclosing their personal information. I've signed onto a letter to you, led by my colleague Representative Raul Ruiz out of California, to request that you prioritize fraud prevention efforts. What has the administration done to prevent these fraudulent acts and protect personal information?

Sebelius: I can tell you, Congressman, that the President felt very strongly that that needed to be part of our outreach effort, which is why the Attorney General and I convened representatives of state Attorneys General, Insurance Commissioners, the U.S. Attorneys, and the Justice Department, and the Federal Trade Commission - which has jurisdiction - to make sure that we first got out ahead some of this, developing consumer outreach. No one should ever give personal health information because personal health information is not needed for these policies any longer. That is as red flag. We want to make sure that people turn over potential fraudulent acts. We have put training in place for navigators. We have our law enforcement folks doing outreach.

Congressional Hearing on Obamacare

SECTION: NEWS; Domestic

LENGTH: 4863 words

HIGHLIGHT: Kathleen Sebelius, secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services, testifies before the House Energy and Commerce Committee regarding the Obamacare rollout.

REP. GREGG HARPER, (R), MISSISSIPPI: The president is ultimately responsible for -- for the rollout, ultimately? You work --

KATHLEEN SEBELIUS, HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES SECRETARY: No, sir.

HARPER: OK. All right.

SEBELIUS: No, sir. We are responsible for the rollout.

HARPER: But who do you answer to?

SEBELIUS: I answer to the president.

HARPER: Is the president not ultimately responsible, like a company CEO would be?

SEBELIUS: Sir, he's the president of the United States. I have given him regular reports. And those -- I am responsible for the implementation of the Affordable Care Act. That's what he asked me to do and that's what I'll continue to do.

HARPER: So you're saying that the president is not responsible for HHS?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I didn't say that.

HARPER: OK. So the president ultimately is responsible. While I think that it's great that you're a team player and taking responsibility, it is the president's ultimate responsibility, correct?

SEBELIUS: You clearly -- whatever. Yes. He is the president. He is responsible for government programs.

HARPER: My time as expired.

REP. FRED UPTON, (R-MI), CHAIRMAN, HOUSE ENERGY AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE: Gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Lujan?

REP. BEN RAY LUJAN, (D), NEW MEXICO: Mr. Chairman, thank you very much. Before I begin, I would like to ask unanimous consent to submit into the record articles from New Mexico publications, "The Albuquerque Journal" and "The Albuquerque Business Journal," the first entitled "Small Business Owner: Health Exchange Will Save Me $1,000 a Month."

ROGER: Without objection.

LUJAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

And I see my time did begin there. So I'll try to get through this.

Madame Secretary, I was intrigued by a line of questioning by Congressman Green asking questions about the individual marketplace. How volatile was the individual marketplace before the Affordable Care Act became law?

We have put training in place for navigators. We have our law enforcement --

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Gentleman's time has expired. I would just note that we -- with the indulgence of the secretary, we're hoping that we can have all members ask some questions. We know that with four minutes we're going to have trouble. I'm going to ask unanimous consent that we try to limit our questions and answers to no more than two minutes.

And I've talked to Mr. Waxman.

Is that OK? Otherwise, we will -- they'll be a lot of folks who will not be allowed to ask questions at all.

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: And, Mr. Chairman, I would submit that if the questions get submitted, we would be happy to provide timely answers.

UPTON: OK. So with that, we'll try two minutes.

Mr. Lance?

REP. LEONARD LANCE, (R), NEW JERSEY: I guess I won the lottery on the two minutes --

(LAUGHTER)

-- Madame Secretary.

UPTON: Time is expired. OK.

(LAUGHTER)

LANCE: 20 seconds, Mr. Chairman.

On the website, Madame Secretary, the contractors testified last week that they need more than two weeks for end-to-end testing. Why, in your opinion, was there not more than two weeks?

SEBELIUS: Again, we had products. The insurance policies themselves by companies were loaded into the system. So we could test up until then. But it wasn't until September, mid-September, that that was done.

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: And again, the contractors said we would have loved more testing time, but we think we're ready to go ahead.

LANCE: I believe that will ultimately be a dispute between CMS and HHS and contractors. And if there's anything we can do regarding that, because obviously that didn't work. And I had thought, given this as the signature issue of the president, that the website would be ready.

Number two, in my judgment, the president's statements were overstatements. The four Pinocchios were an indication of that. There's a report in the New Jersey newspapers this morning that 800,000 people in New Jersey who purchased their policies in individual or small employer markets will be affected by this.

Mr. (INAUDIBLE), in a previous question, mentioned the fact that in an individual market you would be able to keep your policy grandfathered. Yet regulations issued by HHS say that grandfathered status would not be continued for so much as a $5 change in a copay. Is that accurate and do you believe that that is a significant change?

SEBELIUS: Sir, we gave, I think, in the grandfather regulations, a guide for how pricing could change, medical inflation, and I think it was in most cases, plus-15 percent. There were some individual consumer outfacing issues that were more ridged than that. But I would say that in terms of having companies being able to collect a profit margin, that was certainly built in to the grandfather status.

LANCE: I think that's two little a change (INAUDIBLE).

UPTON: Gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Tonko.

REP. PAUL TONKO, (D), NEW YORK: Thank you, Mr. Chair.

And welcome honorable secretary. Thank you for fielding our questions and for responding when you are extended the courtesy to offer a response.

As a strong supporter of the Affordable Care Act, I'm frustrated and I think it's fair to say that the American people are frustrated as well. And I heard you say many times this morning you're frustrated. I think by and large people want this law to work. When I talk to folks back home that I represent, even people who opposed the law initially aren't rooting for the failure of the Affordable Care Act. Instead, they want Congress to come together to fix these problems so we can move on to real issues that matter. My home state of New York, which also experienced website problems at the outset, has now completed enrollment on 150,000 New Yorkers, with more than that signing up.

Given that many states have had success overcoming these initial issues, has HHS looked at what it's doing and getting solutions for fixing it?

SEBELIUS: Absolutely. We shared a lot of the information going in. I think that the hub feature that we have in our website that all states are using, including the state of New York, is fully functional. And that's good news for the states running their own state websites. We are learning from them. We've shared information with them. And we are eager for all of the help and assistant moving forward.

TONKO: Many stated made the choice of rejecting Medicaid expansion that would help some of the poor steps get access to the health care. Can you comment broadly on HHS's plan in the future to encourage more states to run their own marketplaces and expand Medicaid so the law can function as it's designed?

SEBELIUS: Absolutely. Most recently, last week, the state of Ohio did move into the Medicaid market. And we now have 30 governors. I think 27 states have fully completed the process. Another three are in the process. Republicans and Democrats who -- some of who sued us about the constitutionality of the act, who are now deciding that for the citizens of their state, they want to be part of the expanding Medicaid. And we will continue to have those conversations. It's not just about the marketplace. It's also about Medicaid.

TONKO: Thank you very much.

UPTON: The gentleman's time is expired.

Mr. Cassidy -- Dr. Cassidy?

REP. BILL CASSIDY, (R), LOUISIANA: You said that only if an individual policy is only canceled if it changes significantly. But to be clear, after May 2010, if coinsurance went up by any amount, even by a dollar, according to your regulations, that would not qualified as a grandfathered clause. Just to have that out there for the record. I gather even by a dollar.

That said, I get a letter from someone in my district, Adrienne (ph). She says that she lost her coverage. She lost her coverage because spousal coverage is gone. She's going on the exchange and doesn't qualify for a subsidiary. But her premium and out-of-pocket costs under any plan is $10,000 a year. She writes this. She feels betrayed by her government. She has to sit there asking herself, is this fair? If you were she, do you think that this would be fair?

SEBELIUS: Dr. Cassidy, I want to start by the amount that you gave is not accurate. It told $5 not $1.

CASSIDY: That's for the copay, not for the coinsurance. For the coinsurance it's any amount. But I have limited time. Do you think that it's fair -- if you were she, if you were Adrianne (ph), do you think this is fair? Losses her spousal coverage, now it's 10K, no subsidies?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I don't have any idea what she's looking at. I can tell you, again, that what we've seen in the market and in the plans, people will be getting full insurance for the first time at --

(CROSSTALK)

CASSIDY: Again, this is what she reports. If what she reports is true, do you think it's fair?

SEBELIUS: I can't answer fair or not fair. I don't know what she was paying or what --

(CROSSTALK)

CASSIDY: That's OK. Let's move on.

SEBELIUS: Did she have full insurance in --

CASSIDY: Richard writes that his daughter received a note that the premium is going up because she's being lumped with older costlier patients. Now it's possible that only those that will sign up will be more costly. Does HHS have plans on what to do if that happens and premiums rise for everybody?

SEBELIUS: I think that's what we're trying to make sure that --

(CROSSTALK)

CASSIDY: But if only the costly sign up, do you have plans?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: That's of the importance of individual mandate that you've just out lined. Getting rid of preexisting conditions --

(CROSSTALK)

CASSIDY: But if only the more costly sign up, do you have backup plans?

SEBELIUS: We will encourage others to sign up. It's why there is a penalty and --

(CROSSTALK)

CASSIDY: Is this to assume there are no back-up plans --

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Yarmuth?

REP. JOHN YARMUTH, (D), KENTUCKY: Thank you Mr. Chairman.

Madame Secretary, nice to see you.

I come to this hearing with a little bit different perspective. Kentucky is doing a great job with our exchange. As of this morning we had 350,000 people who have explored the website. 59,000 started applications. 31,000 are fully enrolled in new coverage and 5,000 just in the last week. And I think very importantly more than 400 businesses have gun applying for their employees as well. The idea that somehow this is going to be bad for businesses is not born out in Kentucky.

Would it be safe to say that if 36 states had done what Kentucky and New York and California had done that the rollout would have been much smoother and the website would have been much easier to construct?

SEBELIUS: I don't think there's any question that in January of 2013 we knew how many states were not running their own website. In, I think, mid-February, we learned about partnerships. So it was northwest until that point that we learned that 36 stated -- having said that, we should have anticipated and planned better. That's not an excuse. But we clearly are running a different vehicle for enrollment than we thought we were going to run in March of 2010. YARMUTH: On the subject of cancelation of policies. Isn't it true that the federal government can't require insurance companies to sell insurance?

SEBELIUS: That they can't?

YARMUTH: The federal government can't require insurance companies to sell insurance?

SEBELIUS: Yes. Yes, sir.

YARMUTH: And, in fact, insurance companies all over the country are making difficult decisions now about where they want to participate and where they don't. And in some markets, they're trying to get out of the market, canceling people because they want to play in other markets and so forth. They're all making those decisions now.

SEBELIUS: Well, we know we have more insurers, 25 percent more insurers in the individual market than we did prior to the law being passed.

YARMUTH: So there a lot of dynamics going on here that are not necessarily an indication that the president misled anybody. There are business decisions being made all over now?

SEBELIUS: Now in cancelation of policies, again, the one-year contract notice is routine in the individual market. It has been in place for years. And for a lot of people, they are policies now, they're being canceled because they're being notified that you can no longer be medically underwritten. We can't charge you more because you're a woman. We won't ever have the kind of limitation on what your policy can pay out or charge exorbitant out-of-pocket rates. Those policies will cease to be offered in the marketplace.

UPTON: Gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Guthrie.

REP. BRETT GUTHRIE, (R), KENTUCKY: Thank you, Madame Secretary, for being here.

Last week, Mr. Lauh (ph) from Sirco (ph) was here. I know the president has talked about the alternatives to the website, his phone call, calling or using paper application, and what he said, and I think you said it, they take the paper application but enter it into the same web portal. But also, there are still issues with data within the web portal. As you said, you can't get reliable data who has even signed up. He also said, because of the surge in paper applications, it's like six to eight weeks to process. If November 30th is when this will be ready, they can use and somebody does lose their insurance so they're signing up to this and they get to January 1st, even though you have a March 31st open enrollment, is there a contingency plan for these people to continue their insurance?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I think that we have improvements every day on the speed of the site. Sirco (ph) was giving you early snapshots of difficulty of accessing the site. I think that's greatly improved.

GUTHRIE: They said just processing the paper, actually.

SEBELIUS: I understand. But it is the site for dash they put the application into the site and get a determination. That's part of what the process is. So the site is part of the portal all the way through. This is an integrated insurance vehicle. And so that will improve. And we, again, with four months of continuous service, which is far longer than most people had, some of these cancelation numbers, Mr. Garrity (ph), again, pointed this out from Florida BlueCross, but it's true of everyone else. These are not January 1st numbers. They are year-long numbers. So over the course of 2014 when an individual's policy is due to expire --

(CROSSTALK)

GUTHRIE: But somebody's could expire January 1st and not be able to get coverage in the website -- and the vendors said they needed and liked to have months and months to test. If we're going to --

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I would say we're testing as we go. This is beta testing going on right now. That's why we're fixing and how we can identify things. People are getting through every day.

GUTHRIE: But the paper process, if it takes four weeks, November 30th and people canceling on January 1st, there needs to be contingency for that person.

SEBELIUS: Well, again, typical insurance is two to four weeks of signup. They will have two full months of signup.

UPTON: Gentleman's time has expired.

Ms. Schakowsky?

REP. JAN SCHAKOWSKY, (D), ILLINOIS: Thank you, Madame Secretary, for bringing to millions of Americans access to affordable, comprehensive health care coverage that's going to be there when they that's going to be there.

I want to thank you especially as a woman. Being a woman can no longer be considered a pre-existing condition. Women can no longer be charged more than a man for coverage. Women have access to prescription drugs, free preventive screenings and free maternity care which is often left out of coverage. And the days of complicated pregnancy or diabetes or domestic violence being a pre-existing conditions, those days are over.

You know, I want to say to my colleagues, after a three-and-a-half year campaign to repeal to discredit, to even shut down the government over Obamacare, I want to say get over it. We all agree that there are problems, but these are problems that I see being fixed.

And so I want to ask one -- I want to say that what we did under Medicare Part D can be an example of how we can work together. And in fact, Chairman Upton and I both sent a letter asking for more money for community-based groups to help implement the program and make it work. We can work together.

So if you could just briefly say, how are the navigators, how important are they in making this system work for the American people?

SEBELIUS: Well, what we know, Congresswoman, is that a lot of people are not web savvy and are not frustrated because they don't trust a computer, they need a live human being to ask questions, get questions answered, talk about the plan, talk about insurance. So the navigators play a hugely important role. We have about 2500 trained navigators on the ground right now. We have thousands more community assisters trained and ready to go. About 45,000 agents and brokers have gone through Affordable Care Act training. But those individuals working with their clients, customers and, in the case of navigators and community assisters, is just the public at large. They are not paid by a company. They are not collecting a fee. They just want to help people get coverage. They're hugely important.

UPTON: The gentlelady's time.

Mr. Olson.

REP. PETE OLSON, (R), TEXAS: Welcome, Madame Secretary.

I'd like to open with a quote from an American icon and hold up a poster. It says, "If the user is having a problem, it's our problem."

I'm glad to hear that you embrace this is philosophy during your testimony today, ma'am.

Obamacare was signed into law 1,256 days ago. And since then, there's been user problem after user problem after user problem. Regarding healthcare.gov, your deputy administrator for consumer information, Gary Cohen, testified one month ago, right where you're sitting that, and this a quote, "CMS has worked hard to test the infrastructure that will allow Americans to enroll in coverage confidently, simply, and securely," end quote.

Yet, according to Forbes, and the "Wall Street Journal," you told them that you need five years of construction and one year of testing. The program has crashed and burned at least three times. And the user is still having problems.

Get up here, ma'am.

It's been down the whole time you've been testifying. The system is down at this moment.

My question, ma'am, is very simple: When did you know the exchanges were going down, a month, a day, a quarter, and did you tell the president what you knew?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I was informed that we were ready to launch on October 1st. The contractors, who we had as our private partners, told us and told this committee that have they had never suggested a delay, and that is accurate. Our CMS team felt we were ready to go. I told the president that we were ready to go. Clearly, I was wrong. We were wrong. We knew that in any big new complicated system, there would be problems. No one ever imagined the volume of issues and problems that we've had. And we must fix it.

OLSON: Yes, ma'am. Credible journalists said you knew you needed six years to get this program --

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: That quote has been repeated. I can guarantee I would have never stated that because the law was passed in March of 2010. I chose the open enrollment date. I don't know where that quote comes from, but that is not from me.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Barrow?

REP. JOHN BARROW, (D), GEORGIA: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thanks for attending today, Madame Secretary.

I suspect deep down most people on this committee accept the concept of the performing insurance markets so more people have access to better insurance coverage. We have disagreements about the means used to get to those ends which is why I voted against the Affordable Care Act.

It seems every day we're hearing of something new going wrong. I'm many concerned the long-term enrollment problems could be market problems. My students are losing confidence. The way to restore their trust is to delay the penalties till we're sure the system is going to work. It's not fair to penalize consumers. We also need to take the time to make sure fits and starts won't cause larger problems.

Right now, I'm less concerned about who's to blame and what went wrong and how to fix it and we'll assure it doesn't happen again.

Nearly all of our constituents want and need health insurance. It would be a huge mistake if we're so blinded by our love or hatred of Obamacare that we miss opportunities to address its flaws.

To the subject of technical problems becoming market problems. Can problems of folks getting into the system snowball into risk pool problems where those who choose not to enroll can actually affect the cost of those who do choose to enroll?

SEBELIUS: Certainly, a risk pool needs a balanced market. So you need people who are older and sicker to be balanced with people who are younger and healthier. That's how a pool works.

BARROW: At what point are we going to see a problem having the risk pool if the tech problems affect the folks entering? What are we going to look for? What are we going to use to decide something needs to be done?

SEBELIUS: Well, again, sir, we be monitoring during the six months of open enrollment as will our insurance partners who is coming into the pool. That's why we want to give this committee and others reliable, informed data about not only who it is but what the demographics are and where they live.

BARROW: If things aren't better by the end of this next month, at what point will we start thinking about further delays and imposing penalties?

SEBELIUS: Again, I think having a defined open enrollment period is one of the ways you make an assessment if you have a pool that works or not. You can't have an unlimited open enrollment period with any insurance company because that really doesn't work.

BARROW: Thank you.

UPTON: Mr. McKinley.

REP. DAVID MCKINLEY, (R), WEST VIRGINIA: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Last week, CGI representative Campbell said that she had met her contract obligations and specifications. And she said the only problem she had was pace. But the pace wasn't part of the specification. Do you -- and we asked her what you would testify to. Did -- she said you would testify that she did complete her contract in accordance with the specifications. Would you?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I don't think until the product is working the way it's designed to work that anybody has finished their job. That's really my --

MCKINLEY: I'm sorry. They've shortened our time.

So if she hasn't met their specifications but yet we're still using her, is the American taxpayer still paying money to fix the problems that she didn't do and her company didn't do appropriately in the first place?

SEBELIUS: None of our contractors have been paid the amount of their --

MCKINLEY: Will she be paid for this work into the future as we go to correct this problem?

SEBELIUS: We will make that determination as the work goes forward. I would tell you as we learn what needs to be fixed --

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: -- we'll know more about whether they delivered.

MCKINLEY: I'm very sorry, the time frame. I'm sorry but the time frame has been cut down.

Who owns the software now, now that this has been developed with taxpayer money to develop the software to do this?

SEBELIUS: It is owned by the Centers for Medicare, Medicaid Services.

MCKINLEY: So it's all owned by us. OK. Will they be able to use it by a license for other clients?

SEBELIUS: Not to my knowledge. I think it is specifically designed for the marketplace with these products in mind.

MCKINLEY: Then the last question --

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: And the clients are the American public.

MCKINLEY: -- that under I.V. & V, and she testified that she thought that was something we should have done. Under HHS, you recommend or the HHS recommends that for software development that they should you have an independent verification validation program, but it wasn't used in this case. Can you share with us -- the time is gone -- why we didn't use I.V. and V on something as crucial as this?

SEBELIUS: Again, I don't think that's accurate. At every point along the way, there is independent testing --

MCKINLEY: Independent?

SEBELIUS: Yes.

MCKINLEY: You recommend --

SEBELIUS: An outside --

MCKINLEY: -- independent testing and validation, not someone within your staff.

SEBELIUS: Pardon me. There is a level of company self-attested testing. There is a level of CMS testing and then there is an independent test on each piece of the contracting. An independent not --

(CROSSTALK)

MCKINLEY: What she's done independently. And that's what --

UPTON: Gentleman's time --

MCKINLEY: It needs to be done independently. People that do not have --

UPTON: -- has expired.

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: No, it isn't CMS. I will get you the information. One of the three levels of testing. One of them is independent for every piece of this contracting, yes.

UPTON: Mrs. Castor.

REP. KATHY CASTOR, D-FLA.: Good morning.

When open enrollment began a few weeks ago the people back home in Florida who are helping neighbors sort through the new options for coverage, the navigators, were taken aback by how grateful people are to have new pathway to the doctor's office and the care they need.

LUJAN QUESTIONS HHS SECRETARY SEBELIUS ON AFFORDABLE CARE ACT;
Highlights Improvements and Protections to Consumers in Individual Marketplace Under the Law;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 904 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District and a member of the Energy and Commerce Committee participated in a hearing today in which Health and Human Services Secretary Kathleen Sebelius testified on the Affordable Care Act. Below is a transcript of Lujan's exchange with the Secretary, in which they discussed important consumer protections under the law and their commitment to preventing and combating fraud.

Lujan: Madam Secretary, I was intrigued by a line of questioning by Congressman [Gene] Green asking questions about the individual marketplace. How volatile was the individual marketplace before the Affordable Care Act became law?

Sebelius: I would say it wasn't a marketplace at all. It was unprotected, unregulated, and people were really on their own.

Lujan: Madam Secretary, the Kaiser Family Foundation reports that over 50 percent churn - out of individuals that have coverage in the individual market - churn out of coverage every year. They lose coverage, they are priced out, or drop it. Is that consistent with what you are aware of?

Sebelius: That is an accurate snapshot. About a third of the people are in for about 6 months and over half are in for a year or less.

Lujan: So individuals that were in the individual marketplace before the passage of the Affordable Care Act did not have the same protections as those that were in group coverage?

Sebelius: That's true.

Lujan: And would those individuals in the individual marketplace sometimes have higher copays?

Sebelius: Higher copays, unlimited out-of-pocket costs for often coverage that was medically underwritten or excluded whatever medical condition they had in the first place.

Lujan: So these were typically one-year contracts. If they use the plan because they got sick or in a car accident or a victim of domestic violence, sometimes they would be thrown off their plan or their rates would go up?

Sebelius: Yes.

Lujan: I think that's important to note, Madam Secretary. And I'm intrigued, as well, that my understanding is last month HHS conducted an analysis that found that nearly 6 out of 10 uninsured Americans getting coverage through the marketplace will pay less than $100 per month. Is that correct?

Sebelius: They will have a plan available for less than $100 if that's their choice, yes.

Lujan: And that number would be even higher - would be better - if more states chose the option of using federal funds to expand Medicaid to cover their low-income population?

Sebelius: Very definitely. That's just a marketplace snapshot. Those are people who will be in the marketplace.

Lujan: Madam Secretary, I don't think that I've heard anyone from the other side of the aisle today, my Republican colleagues, ask you, "How can Congress work with you and support you in fixing this website and fixing this problem." I hope that we all agree we want this website fixed. I would yield to anyone that would disagree. Seeing no one accepting that, I am glad to hear that we agree with this. Now Madam Secretary, what can Congress do to work with you to fix this website?

Sebelius: Well, I'm not sure that there is hands-on work that you can do; maybe we have some technical expertise. But I would say getting accurate information to constituents is helpful, letting people know that they can check out the facts in the law, that they may be entitled to some financial support, that cancelation of policies means that the policy they had may not exist but they have a lot of choices of new policies and a law that now says they must be insured in a new policy - that they don't have to be insured by their company at a higher price.

Lujan: I appreciate that Madam Secretary. Going back to the individual marketplace, Madam Secretary, did this Congress in previous years before the Affordable Care Act make it illegal for health insurance companies to raise rates on someone after they submitted a claim for going to the hospital or becoming sick or getting rid of pre-existing conditions.

Sebelius: No sir.

Lujan: Madam Secretary, one last note here. It seems that we've received some horrible news that there are bad actors already taking place - fraudulent websites that imitate the health care exchange or misleading seniors into disclosing their personal information. I've signed onto a letter to you, led by my colleague Representative Raul Ruiz out of California, to request that you prioritize fraud prevention efforts. What has the administration done to prevent these fraudulent acts and protect personal information?

Sebelius: I can tell you, Congressman, that the President felt very strongly that that needed to be part of our outreach effort, which is why the Attorney General and I convened representatives of state Attorneys General, Insurance Commissioners, the U.S. Attorneys, and the Justice Department, and the Federal Trade Commission - which has jurisdiction - to make sure that we first got out ahead some of this, developing consumer outreach. No one should ever give personal health information because personal health information is not needed for these policies any longer. That is as red flag. We want to make sure that people turn over potential fraudulent acts. We have put training in place for navigators. We have our law enforcement folks doing outreach.

TEXT:

UPTON: Good morning.

The Energy and Commerce Committee welcomes the president's point person on health care, Secretary Sebelius, as part of our continuing oversight of the health care law.

And we look forward to a thoughtful conversation on a number of issues including transparency and fairness. Over the months leading up to October 1 launch, the secretary and her colleagues at HHS repeatedly looked us in the eye and testified that everything was on track. And despite the numerous red flags and lack of testing, they assured us that all systems were a go.

But something happened along the way. Either those officials did not know how bad the situation was, or they did not disclose it.

And, sadly, here we are now, five weeks into enrollment and the news seems to get worse by the day. Healthcare.gov was down last night at 5:00 p.m. It was also down on Monday, and it crashed last weekend.

And even this morning when we attempted to view the site before the hearing, we were hit with an error message.

But this is more than just a Web site problem. That was supposed to be the easy part, remember? Americans were assured that their experience would be similar to other online transactions, like purchasing a flight or ordering a pizza, and that their sensitive personal information would always be secure.

But, after more than three years to prepare, malfunctions have become the norm, and the administration has pivoted from saying they're on track to setting a new target date of November 30th.

And for those few Americans who have successfully applied, will the Web site glitches become provider glitches come January 1st?

Americans are scared and frustrated, and this situation should rise above politics. Many folks at home watching us today have spent hours or even days trying to sign up. They continue to take time away from work or loved ones, but have made little progress.

And soon they may worry about being on the wrong side of their government, facing potential penalties.

I recently spoke to a woman from Buchanan (ph), Michigan, who was excited to sign up, but has since become very disillusioned after spending hours on the phone and Web site with little success.

There are also millions of Americans coast to coast who no doubt believe that the president's repeated promises that if they liked their plan that they would be able to keep it, no matter what.

They are now receiving termination notices. And for those who lose their coverage, they, like -- they may be losing their faith in their government.

Today's hearing is about fairness for the American people who are losing their coverage or seeing their premiums skyrocket as high as 400 percent.

This hearing is also about transparency. While the administration continues to boast the number of Americans that have applied, they intentionally withhold precise enrollment numbers.

Why? These numbers are critical to fully understand the status and gauging the progress of implementation.

Lead contractor, CGI, testified only last week that they had the data, but needed the administration's permission to release it.

We asked the secretary on October 8th for those figures, but we still have not received a response. We hope to get one today. The American people deserve answers as well as the peace of mind that promises will be kept. The secretary has an opportunity today to embrace transparency and start restoring the public's faith in the administration and the government.

I yield to my colleague, ranking member of the committee, Mr. Waxman.

WAXMAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I'm pleased Secretary Sebelius is here today. She's here to discuss the Affordable Care Act. Just like with Medicare Part D, the launch of the new Web site has not gone well. But, just like Medicare Part D, the early glitches in this rollout will soon be forgotten.

A lot of the discussion today will focus on that Web site. This is an important issue, and I want to learn what the secretary can tell us about the problems being experienced and how they will be fixed.

But we should keep this issue in perspective. The Affordable Care Act is working. It has been improving the health security of millions of Americans for the past three years.

Because of the Affordable Care Act, more than 7 million people on Medicare have saved more than $8 billion on their prescription drugs. More than 100 million Americans have access to free preventive coverage and no longer face lifetime limits on their coverage. Over 10 million Americans have received rebates from insurance companies.

And, finally, this January, the worst abuses of insurance industry will be halted. Never again will a family be denied coverage because their child has a chronic health condition. Never again will individuals see their premiums shoot up because they got sick or faced an unexpected medical expense. Never again will a woman have to pay twice as much as a man for the same insurance.

That is why allowing insurers to continue offering deficient plans next year is such a bad policy. The law says that all plans except those that were grandfathered in 2010 must meet the new consumer protection standards.

If we don't enforce this policy, insurance companies can continue offering flimsy coverage that disappears when people actually need it, and no one should want that.

It is understandable that there will be a focus today on what isn't working, but we must also remember what is working. The health insurance plans that are being offered in the exchanges are good plans. Their premiums are much lower than expected. Sixty percent of the uninsured individuals shopping in the new marketplaces will be able to get coverage for less than $100 per month. Half of the young adults will be able to get coverage for less than $50 per month.

And since Congress adopted the Affordable Care Act, health care costs across the whole economy have grown at their lowest level in decades.

The success of the Affordable Care Act is due to the efforts of many people, but one individual more than any other is responsible for all the good that has been accomplished, and that is our witness today, Secretary Sebelius.

WAXMAN: So I would urge my colleagues to stop hyperventilating. The problems with healthcare.gov are unfortunate and we should investigate them, but they will be fixed. And then every American will have -- finally have access to affordable health insurance.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Thank you.

Before we swear in Secretary Sebelius, I want to clarify Energy and Commerce Committee practice for the swearing in of witnesses.

The committee typically has two types of hearings, oversight hearings and hearings that focus on legislation and policy.

Secretary Sebelius, for example, has testified previously before our committee to discuss issues related to the HHS budget or other policy matters. As is the case with all policy witnesses, Secretary Sebelius was not required to take an oath prior to testifying.

Today's hearing is different. It is an oversight hearing. It is a long standing committee practice to swear in all witnesses at oversight hearings whether they be private citizens or cabinet secretaries.

WAXMAN: Mr. Chairman, I thank you for your comments. And I just want to join you in simply explaining that it -- swearing in of the witness before an oversight committee hearing has always been under oath.

That is a standard procedure in this committee when we're conducting an oversight hearing, so it may seem strange to have the secretary of Health and Human Services have to be sworn in, but all witnesses in an oversight hearing are sworn in and that is our procedure.

UPTON: Thank you.

So I would now like to introduce our witness for today's hearing. The Honorable Kathleen Sebelius is the secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services. She was appointed to this position in April of 2009 and was sworn in as the 21st secretary on April 28th, 2009.

So I will now swear you in if you would rise.

As Ranking Waxman and I just discussed, the committee is holding an investigative hearing and when doing so have had the practice of taking testimony under oath.

Do you have any objection to testifying under oath?

SEBELIUS: (Inaudible).

UPTON: And the chair now advises you that you are -- see -- I would now read you -- do you swear that the testimony you are about to give is the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth?

SEBELIUS: (Inaudible).

UPTON: You are now under oath and subject to penalties set forth in Title 18, Section 1001 of the U.S. Code. You may now give a five- minute summary of your written statement.

Welcome again and thank you for being here.

You got to use that mike. You don't know how many people want to hear you this morning.

(LAUGHTER)

SEBELIUS: Thank you, Chairman Upton, Ranking Member Waxman, members of the committee.

I left my position as governor of Kansas 41/2 years ago for the opportunity to continue work I've been doing for most of my over 35 years of public service, to expand the opportunities for all Americans regardless of geography or gender or income to have affordable health coverage.

During my years as the state legislator, as an elected insurance commissioner, as head of the National Association of Insurance Commissioners and as a two-term governor and now as HHS secretary, I have worked on that effort that I care deeply about.

There are still millions of Americans who are uninsured as well as underinsured, people who have some coverage at some price for some illness but have no real protection from financial ruin and no real confidence they'll be able to take care of themselves and their families if they have an accident or an illness. And for them a new day has finally come.

In these early weeks, access to healthcare.gov has been a miserably frustrating experience for way too many Americans including many who have waited years, in some cases their entire lives for the security of health insurance. I am as frustrated and angry as anyone with the flawed launch of healthcare.gov.

So let me say directly to these Americans, you deserve better. I apologize. I'm accountable to you for fixing these problems. And I'm committed to earning your confidence back by fixing the site. We're working day and night and will continue until it's fixed.

We've recently added new management talent, additional technical expertise and a new general contractor to identify, prioritize and manage fixes across the system in two broad categories: performance, which deals with speed and reliability and function, which deals with bugs and problems in the system.

Our extensive assessment has determined that healthcare.gov is fixable. And I want to just outline a couple of the improvements we've made to date.

We now have more users successfully creating accounts. We can process up to 17,000 account registrations per hour or nearly five per second.

Instead of some of the users seeing a blank screen at the end of the application process, they can now see whether they're eligible for financial assistance and make more informed decisions.

Because we've improved performance, customers can now shop for plans quickly; filtering plans takes seconds and not minutes. Users are getting fewer errors and time-out messages as they move through the application process and the system has been strengthened with double the size of servers, software that's better optimized and a high-capacity physical database which replaces a virtual system.

The chairman referred to outages this weekend and again yesterday. And I would suggest to the committee that if you read the statement of Verizon who hosts the cloud service, it is the Verizon server that failed, not healthcare.gov, and it affected not only HHS but other customers.

We still have a lot of work to do. We have a plan in place to address key outstanding issues. It includes fixing bugs in software that prevented it from working the way it's supposed to and refreshing the user experience so folks can navigate the site without encountering error messages, time out and slow response times.

And by the end of November, we're committed that the vast majority of users will be able to review their options, shop for plans and enroll in coverage without the problems way too many have being experiencing.

But consumers are using the site every day and continue to do so. And problems are being solved. But we know that we don't have a fully functioning system that consumers need and deserve. We are still at the beginning of a six-month open enrollment which extends through the end of March and there's plenty of time to sign up.

And just to put it in perspective, the average open enrollment for an insurance plan is two to four weeks. The new marketplace has a 26-week open enrollment and those who enroll by December 15th will be able to access their benefits on day one.

Even with the unacceptable problems with healthcare.gov, which we are committed to fixing, the Affordable Care Act by any fair measure is working for millions of Americans who are benefiting from new health security, young adults, Americans living with pre-existing health conditions, seniors on Medicare.

Eighty-five percent of Americans who already have health coverage are protected with new rights and benefits.

The 15 percent of our neighbors and friends who are uninsured have affordable new options in a competitive market and cost growth for health care is lower than it's been in years. Millions of Americans are clearly eager to learn about their options and to finally achieve health security made possible by the Affordable Care Act.

And my commitment is to deliver on that promise.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Well, thank you very much.

Yes, if you -- the mike got pulled a little bit from you.

Yes, let's start this clock. Can you fix that? (Inaudible).

I appreciate you being here this morning and we've worked with our leadership to see that we don't have votes on the House floor this morning so we won't be interrupted.

I appreciate your time for sure and in an effort to allow every member to ask a question, we're going to be reducing the time for questions to be just four minutes, so hopefully we can get through all the members that are here. And I'm going to be pretty fast with the gavel, let me just say.

So we have got plenty of questions. So let's try and get through them.

(Inaudible).

You know, I think everyone in America remembers the president's words. If you like your health care plan, you can keep it, period. Under the Affordable Care Act insurance policies that were in effect on March 23rd, 2010, when the law was enacted, would be grandfathered.

Then a few months later, despite the president's word, HHS helped promulgate a new reg that in your own review showed that it effectively could deny perhaps as many as more than 50 percent, maybe even higher, of those holding individual policies the right to renew their own insurance plan.

UPTON: And I would guess that there are a lot of us on this panel today that are hearing from angry and confused constituents who are now being forced to go onto an inept website, whether they like it or not, to shop for a new replacement policy. They're finding premiums often more than 100 percent what they were paying before, some even as high as 400 percent, as I've heard from, and rising deductibles as well.

So when was the president specifically informed of the regulation change? And if so, was it pointed out that this totally undermines his biggest selling point? And I would note, that on the screen, in a statement that he made more than three years after the regulation change was promulgated, the President said again, "So the first thing you need to know is this. If you already have health care, you don't have to do anything." So he's been on the same page from the very start, yet the regulations changed months after the bill was enacted that are now causing perhaps millions of Americans to be denied the ability to renew their individual coverage.

Why was that change made, and did the President know it?

SEBELIUS: Well Mr. Chairman, there was no change. The regulation involving grandfathered plans, which applied to both the employer market and the individual market indicated that if a plan that was in effect in March of 2010 stayed in effect without unduly burdening the consumer with reducing benefits and adding on huge costs, that plan would stay in effect and never have to comply with any of the regulations of the Affordable Care Act. That's what the grandfather clause said. The individual market which affects about 12 million Americans, about 5 percent of the market, people move in and out, they often have coverage for less than a year. A third of them have coverage for about six months, and if a plan was in place of March of 2010 and again, did not impose additional burdens on the consumer, they still have it. It's grandfathered in.

UPTON: But why not let the consumer decide whether they want to renew it or not? Why was -- why were regulations promulgated in the summer of 2010 that then undermined the ability for those folks to re- sign up, which is one of the reasons for the large number of cancellation notes?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: And there were no regulations changed We outlined the grandfather policy so people could keep their own plan. We then began to implement the other features of the Affordable Care Act, so if someone is buying a brand new policy in the individual market today, or last week, they will have consumer protections for the first time. Many people in the under -- individual market are medically underwritten. That will be illegal. Many women are charged 50 percent more than men. That will be illegal. You cannot, again, eliminate someone because of a pre-existing health condition. You cannot dump someone out or lock someone out, so those provisions. But if again, a plan is in place, and was in place at the time that the President signed the bill and the consumer wants to keep the plan, those individuals are grandfathered in and that's happening across the country in the individual market.

UPTON: We're learning in fact that folks who did have a plan who liked it in fact are being told that it's canceled in the -- in the last -- my time is expired. Let me yield to the Ranking Member, Mr. Waxman for four minutes.

WAXMAN: Thank you Mr. Chairman. I have to smile at your line of questioning because everybody expected this hearing was about the website. That's all we've been hearing about is the website. But that's not the only complaint we've been hearing about since the Affordable Care Act was adopted. We were told by our Republican friends that millions of jobs would be lost and in fact, there have been a gain of 7 million jobs. They said that they -- the -- the cost for health care would skyrocket, and in fact, the opposite is true. They said there would be a massive shift to part-time jobs, and the evidence doesn't support that. They said tens of millions will lose their insurance, but in fact, everybody in this country has got to have access to health insurance because they won't be discriminated against. They said that it would explode the deficit, and yet all the reputable organizations like the Congressional Budget Office have told us that it's going to save us $100 billion over 10 years, so we've had a litany of objections for the Republicans about the Affordable Care Act which have driven them to such a frenzy they even closed the government.

So now we have you before the committee. And you're being asked, I suppose later you'll be asked about the website. But let me pursue this question about individuals who have gotten notices, that they're going to have their individual insurance policies canceled. They'll be able to get another plan, won't they?

SEBELIUS: Actually, it's the law that they must get another plan. Continuous coverage is part of the law.

WAXMAN: So the ...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: That wasn't the case in the past.

WAXMAN: So the Affordable Care Act said we're going to end the worst abuses of insurance companies. We're going to create consumer protections in the marketplace that they will be able to buy a policy even if they've been sick in the past. That women won't be charged more than me. That we're not going to let insurance companies deny coverage because of pre-existing conditions, and we're not going to let them put these lifetime caps. And there'll be an essential benefit package, so you're not just buying some things and not having other things covered. You're going to have the minimum that everybody should have, prescription drugs, mental health coverage, doctors and hospitals. Are these important consumer protections?

SEBELIUS: Well I would say, Mr. Waxman, they're very important. As a former insurance commissioner, I can tell you that the individual market in Kansas and anywhere in the country has never had consumer protections. People are on their own. They could be locked out, priced out, dumped out, and that happens each and every day. So this will finally provide the kind of protections that we all enjoy in our health care plans, as part of a group, as part of a plan that has pre-negotiated benefits, we enjoy that kind of health security, and individuals in the buying insurance on their own, farm families, young adults have never had that kind of health security.

WAXMAN: Well now they're going to have this health security, and most of the plans, as I understand it, that -- that they're no longer going to be able to keep, don't meet all the standards of the law.

SEBELIUS: Again, I think you may have heard Pat Geraghty from Florida Blues who was on some of the Sunday shows and he talks about the fact that the Florida plans want to keep their customers. They have new plans to offer, they feel that a lot of people, and these are Mr. Geraghty's words, "will have a much better plan at a similar or lower cost. Fifty percent of these 11 to 12 million people qualify for a subsidy, quality for financial help purchasing insurance for the first time ever."

WAXMAN: The bottom line is that people with good coverage like Medicare, Medicaid, employer coverage, can keep that. People with grandfathered plans in the individual market will be able to keep it. But if an insurance company sold you a new modified health insurance policy after the date of the enactment that does not meet the law's standards, then those people will be able to go into the exchange and buy a real solid health insurance plan that won't discriminate against them or anybody else. I think that's a good result. I'm pleased with it, and I think most people will be as well.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired. The Chair would recognize the Vice Chair of the committee, Ms. Blackburn.

BLACKBURN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Madam Secretary, during -- before, during and after the law was passed, the President kept saying, "if you like your health care plan, you can keep it," so is he keeping his promise?

SEBELIUS: Yes, he is.

BLACKBURN: OK. What do you say to the 300,000 people in Florida you just mentioned, or to the 28,000 in Tennessee that cannot get health insurance? Their plans are terminated. Is he keeping his promise to them?

SEBELIUS: Well first of all, Congresswoman, they can get health insurance. They must be offered new plans, new options either inside the marketplace, or if they don't qualify for a financial subsidy, they can shop in or out of the marketplace.

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: But would you say to ...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: They absolutely will have new coverage.

BLACKBURN: What would you say to NBC news who says, "Millions are going to lose their coverage?"

SEBELIUS: Well, in all deference to the press corps, many of whom are here today, I think it's -- it's important to be accurate about what is going on, and I would defer, again, to the President of the (inaudible) plan.

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: Reclaiming ...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: (inaudible) ongoing coverage, they will be offered new plans.

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: Madam Secretary, let me tell you something.

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Fifty percent of them in the market right now will -- will qualify for ...

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: What do you say to Mark and Lucinda in my district who had a plan, they liked it, it was affordable, but it is being terminated and now they do not have health insurance?

SEBELIUS: Insurance companies cancel individual policies year in and year out. They're a one-year contract with individuals. They are not lifetime plans, they are not an employer plan. Your constituents will have lots of options.

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: Let me -- let me move -- let me move on. It's what they wanted, and I will remind you, some people like to drive a Ford, not a Ferrari, and some people like to drink out of a red Solo cup and not a crystal stem. Your taking away their choice. Let's put the screen shot up. I want to go to the cost of the website and talk about the website. This is what is happening right now with this website. We've had somebody in the back trying to sign on. It is down. It is not working. Last week I asked for the cost from each of the contractors that were with us last week. So can you give me a ballpark on what you have spent on this website that does not work, that individuals cannot get to? What is your cost estimate?

SEBELIUS: So far, Congresswoman, we have spent about $118 million on the website itself, and about $56 million has been expended on other IT to support the web.

BLACKBURN: OK. Would you submit a detailed accounting of exactly what has been spent? And when do you expect constituents to stop getting these kind of error messages?

SEBELIUS: Again, I was with the -- I talked to the president of Verizon over the weekend on two occasions. Verizon hosts the cloud, which is not part of the website. It is a host for a number of websites. The Verizon system was taken down Saturday night into Sunday. It was down almost all day Sunday. They had an additional problem that they notified us about yesterday and it continues on. So I'd be happy to talk to the president of Verizon and get him to give you...

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: OK, let me -- let me come back to that, because I want to get to this issue of exactly who is in charge of this project. Because you're now blaming it on the contractors and saying it's Verizon's fault.

So let me ask you this: Did you ever look at outsourcing the role of the system integrator -- and obviously you did not from the contractors that we had last week -- you all -- they had several different people, whether it was you or Gary Cohen or Michelle Snyder or Henry Chao, that they thought were in charge. So who is responsible for overseeing this project? Is it you or your designee?

SEBELIUS: Let me be clear, I'm not pointing fingers at Verizon. I'm trying to explain the way the site operates. We are -- we own the site. The site has had serious problems. I...

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: Who is in charge, Madam Secretary?

SEBELIUS: The person now in charge as an integrator is QSSI, one of our...

BLACKBURN: Who was in charge as it was being built?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: ... CMS was in charge up...

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: At that team, who is the individual...

SEBELIUS: Michelle Snyder is...

BLACKBURN: Michelle Snyder is the one responsible for this debacle?

SEBELIUS: Well, excuse me, Congresswoman. Michelle Snyder is not responsible for the debacle. Hold me accountable for the debacle. I'm responsible.

BLACKBURN: Thank you. I yield back.

UPTON: Chair would recognize Mr. Dingell from the great state of Michigan.

DINGELL: Thank you for your courtesy.

I have a few questions I'll be asking you on behalf of Congresswoman Shea-Porter, but I'll do that by writing. I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to revise and extend my remarks.

UPTON: Without objection.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, I would like to begin by thanking you; welcoming the secretary to a room in which her distinguished father, former governor of Ohio, served for so many years.

I begin my questions by quoting from an expert for whom I have enormous respect. He said as follows: "As I mentioned earlier, the new benefits and its implementation are hardly perfect. Rather than trying to scare and confuse seniors, I would hope that we could work together as we go through the implementation phase to find out what is wrong with the program, and if we can make some changes to fix it.

"Let us do it, and let us do it in a bipartisan fashion. It is too big a program and is too important to too many people to do that. But having said that, it does appear that it is working. Let us admit it, you know, and not keep beating a dead horse."

My beloved friend, Mr. Barton -- who I think gave us the beginning of our efforts today.

Madam Secretary, I've seen reports that consumers receiving plan cancellation notices from their insurance companies saying that plans are no longer available. Does the ACA require insurance companies to discontinue the plans that people had when the law was passed, yes or no?

SEBELIUS: Not when the law was passed if the plans have not changed, no, sir.

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: That's the grandfather clause.

DINGELL: Now, that's because the plans existed prior to the passage of the law are grandfathered in, as you have said?

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

DINGELL: So if an insurance company is no longer offering a certain plan, that's because that insurance company made a decision to change their policies, and that caused them to take away the grandfather status from their insurance purchasers, is that right?

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

DINGELL: Now, Madam Secretary, I want you to submit for the record a statement of what it is we can do about insurance companies that run around canceling the policies of their people. And I don't have time to get -- get the answer, but I want to get a very clear statement from you as to what you can do so we can take some skin off some folks that have it coming.

(LAUGHTER)

Now, Madam Secretary, it's my understanding that these decisions of a business character are most common in the individual insurance market, and that much turnover already exists and existed prior to the enactment of the legislation.

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

DINGELL: Is that correct?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: Is it correct that 35 percent to 67 percent (ph) of the enrollees in the individual market leave their plan after one year for different reasons?

SEBELIUS: A third are in about less than six months in the individual market and over 50 percent are in for less than a year, yes, sir.

DINGELL: Now, in the cancellation letters, which move around from the insurance companies, some insurance companies are suggesting an alternative plan at a higher price. Do they have the right to do that?

SEBELIUS: Well, they have a right to do that, sir, but consumers have a right to shop anywhere to compare plans and they have choices now that they've never had before -- and some financial assistance...

DINGELL: And they have no right...

SEBELIUS: ... coming their way for about 50 percent of those people.

DINGELL: ... to enforce that demand on the insurance company?

SEBELIUS: Oh, absolutely not. No one is rolled over into a plan. And in fact, individuals for the first time ever will have the ability to compare plans, to shop, and to make a choice inside or outside the marketplace.

DINGELL: Looks to me like the insurance companies are trying to inflict on their -- on their customers the view that this is their right and that this is the only option available to them, is that correct?

SEBELIUS: Well, I -- I think that insurance companies would like to keep their customers. Having said that, customers for the first time have a lot of choices, because they can't be locked out...

(CROSSTALK)

DINGELL: But the insurance companies have no right to enforce that view on the customer?

SEBELIUS: There is no rule that says you have to stay with your company or you have to be rolled over...

(CROSSTALK)

DINGELL: And you don't...

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

(CROSSTALK)

DINGELL: ... when they come forward and tell you that you've got to buy a particular policy, is that right?

SEBELIUS: Absolutely.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

Chair would recognize the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Barton.

BARTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Before I ask my questions, we have a former member of the committee on the Democrat side from the great state of Kansas in the audience, Mr. Slattery. And we are -- we're glad to have you.

And Madam Secretary, we're glad to have you too.

SEBELIUS: Thank you, sir.

BARTON: There is a famous movie called the "Wizard of Oz," and in the "Wizard of Oz" there is a great line. Dorothy at some point in the movie turns to her little dog Toto and says, "Toto, we're not in Kansas anymore."

Well, Madam Secretary, while you're from Kansas, we're not in Kansas anymore. Some might say that we are actually in the "Wizard of Oz" land given the parallel universes we appear to be habitating.

Mr. Waxman and most of those on the Democrat side think things are great. You apparently, although you did apologize and you have said it's a debacle, you also seem to think that the Affordable Care Act is great. Well, myself and others have a different view. Ultimately the American people will decide.

Now, last week when the contractors were here, I focused my attention on the apparent lack of privacy in the website. If we'll put up the first slide that I had last week -- if we can.

This -- this is what's public, Madam Secretary. And it's -- it's basically a disclaimer that says that any unauthorized attempt to upload information or change information on the website is prohibited. It really doesn't say anything about privacy. But you do have to accept that in order to go forward with the application.

The next slide shows what's not public. And this is in the source code. We tried to determine this morning if it was still in the source code, but it's (ph) been pointed out, the website's down.

This is much more what I would say -- frightening to me. It says, "You have no reasonable expectation of privacy regarding any communication or data transiting or stored (ph) on the information system. At any time and for any lawful government purpose, the government may monitor, intercept, search and seize any communication or data transiting or stored (ph) on the information system. Any communication or data transiting or stored (ph) on this information system may be disclosed or used for any lawful government purpose."

Cheryl Campbell of CGI Federal said she was aware of it, but said that it wasn't her responsibility to put that in the source code. Were you a aware of it? And was it your responsibility to put this in the source code?

SEBELIUS: Mr. Barton, I did not put things in the source code. I can tell you, it's my understanding that that is boiler plate language that should not have been in this particular contract, because there are -- the highest security standards are in place, and people have every right to expect privacy.

BARTON: All right.

Now, the last time we could check, this was still there. You are given almost unlimited authority under the Affordable Care Act to administer it. Will you commit to the committee and to the American people that, one, you do want to protect their privacy and, two, you will take this out, fix it, make sure that it -- it doesn't have bearing on people that try to apply through the website?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir. And we have had those discussions with CGI, and it is under way. I do absolutely commit to protecting the privacy of the American public, and we have asked them to remove that statement. It is there in error. It needs to be taken down, and we should be held accountable for protecting privacy...

(CROSSTALK)

BARTON: Well, thank you, Madam Secretary. I -- I sincerely appreciate that, and I'm sure the American people do too.

My last question -- or it's really a comment. I've introduced H.R. 3348, which says, let's make this system voluntary for the first year since we're having so many problems and let the American people decide. What that means is, if people choose not to participate they will not be charged the penalty for non-participation. Would you support such a reasonable approach to this while we work out the problems in the system?

SEBELIUS: No, sir.

BARTON: OK. Well, that's an honest answer.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

BARTON: Thank you, Madam...

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Chair would recognize the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. Pallone.

PALLONE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I know we're not in Kansas, but I do believe increasingly we're in Oz because of what I see here.

(LAUGHTER)

So this "Wizard of Oz" comment by my colleague from Texas I think is particularly apropos, given what we hear (ph) on the other side of the aisle. I don't know how you keep your cool, Madam Secretary, you know, with this continuous effort on the part of the GOP to sabotage the ACA, to scare people and bring up red herrings. And I think that this privacy issue is another red herring. And I'm gonna ask you a question about that.

But before that, I just wanted to say, this whole idea that's being brought up today that somehow, you know, policies are being canceled and people don't have alternatives is just another red herring. You know, what I think my colleagues on the other side forget is that this is not socialized medicine. This is in fact private insurance in a competitive market.

And if I'm an insurance company and all of a sudden everyone else is selling a better policy with better benefits at a lower price, I can't continue to sell a lousy skeletal policy that doesn't provide benefits and cost more because I'll be out of the market. And so that's what's happening here. Insurance companies are canceling lousy policies with high prices because they can't compete. And that's what's gonna happen when you have a private insurance market, which is what we have here. We don't have a government-controlled system. We have private markets.

So I just wanted to make that point.

But I have to drill down on what Mr. Barton said here. You know, before reform, the individual insurance market was dysfunctional, premiums would shoot up if people got sick, their coverage could be canceled if they had a pre-existing condition, and they did not have secure, quality coverage.

Now, I've heard my Republican colleagues say that patient health information will be at risk in this application process, and this is flat out false. In fact, the ACA makes a giant leap forward for protecting health insurance by taking it completely out of the insurance application process by banning discrimination based on pre- existing conditions.

Mr. Barton, again, is, you know, raising this red herring just like the cancellation of insurance by talking about privacy. But Madam Secretary, prior to the ACA when people applied for insurance coverage, did insurers make them provide a long, detailed, invasive medical history, but now because the law bans discrimination based on pre-existing conditions, individuals will not have to provide this information in their applications?

So regardless of this clause, please comment on the privacy issue and why it's irrelevant.

SEBELIUS: Well, Mr. Pallone, in the past, any individual American who was in an employer-based coverage, in government coverage like the ones we enjoy in Medicare, in Medicaid, the V.A., a whole variety of plans, that's about 95 percent of insured Americans had no medical underwriting, had group protections, had consumer protections.

The people who were outside that consumer-protected space were individuals buying their own coverage in an individual market. Medical underwriting demanding health records and often going through extensive doctor interviews and getting health records was a standard for that market. Pricing could vary widely depending on gender, depending on health condition. People could be denied coverage and were frequently. That's the market that is currently being reformed with consumer protections.

If a person had a policy in place in March of 2010 like that policy and the insurance company made no changes to disadvantage the consumer, those policies are in place, you keep your plan, you like it, and that goes on.

For the people who, though, had a medically underwritten policy, were paying more than their neighbor because they happened to be female, could not get their health condition for a fixed hip written into their insurance plan, they will have a new day in a very competitive market; 25 percent of the insurers are brand new to the market and they are offering competitive plans.

PALLONE: Mr. Chairman, could I just ask that this document...

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Sure. Put it into the record without objection.

PALLONE: Thank you.

UPTON: Chair would recognize Mr. Hall.

HALL: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, I think Congresswoman Blackburn asked you about the federal government and how much they'd spent today and they're spending some money as we speak, aren't they?

It's down right now, isn't it?

Is that -- are you had -- you projected ongoing problems?

SEBELIUS: I'm sorry, sir. I'm having a hard time...

HALL: OK.

SEBELIUS: ... hearing.

What was the...

HALL: She asked you how much it had spent today and I'm asking what you expect to pay in addition to that on the repairs that the website is going to require and they're requiring them as we speak here.

So those are things you projected; you knew they would happen and they will happen. But you surely looked ahead and you have some estimate of what is going to happen.

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

HALL: And going to cost.

SEBELIUS: For our two major contractors who are USSI, a subsidiary of United and for CGI, there are obligated amounts. For CGI, who is in charge of the entire application, there has been $197 million obligated and that is to last through March of 2014.

And as I said before about $104 million has been expended in that obligated amount.

HALL: I'm going to try to be here on 2014 to be sure that your testimony is correct, OK?

(LAUGHTER)

I'm just joking with you.

(LAUGHTER)

SEBELIUS: OK.

HALL: And if -- were you born in Kansas, Meade (ph) -- Kansas?

SEBELIUS: I was not. I was born in Cincinnati, Ohio. I married a Kansan and went to Kansas.

HALL: All right. I was in the third grade there. And I thought I saw you on a tricycle there one day.

(LAUGHTER)

SEBELIUS: Well, it was an illusion.

HALL: Let me ask you a question, have you ever rejected a financial bill from one of the contractors?

Have you ever?

SEBELIUS: Have I ever...

HALL: Rejected a financial bill from one of them?

SEBELIUS: Sir, again, I -- our...

HALL: Well, I guess you can say yes or no.

SEBELIUS: ... our accounting office does a routine audit and review of every bill that comes in before they do it. I do not personally. I want to be very accurate about -- I don't personally pay contracts, negotiate contracts. By law and by precedent that's really illegal for someone who isn't a warranted contract officer to engage in the debate or discussion around federal contracts.

HALL: How much has the administration spent on the exchanges in total?

Not just healthcare.gov but all of the exchanges?

SEBELIUS: Sir...

HALL: How difficult is that figure to give me or if you can't give it to me...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I would like to get it to you in writing very quickly.

HALL: Madam Secretary, I'd like to talk -- I don't know how much time I have got left but I would like to talk about a couple of businesses in my district who are struggling with how to move forward. One is a manufacturing and one is in the pet boarding and training business. One has 85 employees and the other has 56.

Here's some quotes from some of their recent letters: "The situation we're in is we would have to pay $170,000 in penalties under Obamacare. This is another example of the government picking the winners and losers. We're the losers. There is no way I can be competitive if I have to raise my prices to cover $170,000. Here are my options: do not pay the penalty, raise my prices and go out of business. Eighty-five people lose their jobs, lay off 35 employees who don't have to pay the penalty and move more production to this country, reduce 35 jobs."

And here's a quote from the other: "Since they are high labor low margin, business cannot afford to pay for insurance for our employees we're faced with either closing our business perhaps through bankruptcy, though there are heavy financial obligations that would continue whether we operate or not.

"Fire enough employees to get under 50 employees limits and close some of our business. Even if we close the location we cannot escape many expenses such as rental agreements."

What am I supposed to tell these people?

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, I think that in the employer market, about 95 percent of all American businesses are exempt from any kind of requirement to cover employer -- employee insurance, and they are outside the law. They continue to be outside the law, but they will have some new options for those who want to cover their employees and some new tax credit possibilities.

For large employers, about 96 percent of them already cover their employees. And as you know, the penalty that your constituents referred to is not a penalty that is imposed in 2014. It is being discussed with businesses about what kind of information is exchanged and it will take place in 2015.

UPTON: The gentleman's time...

HALL: He's going to use the gavel on me if you don't hurry.

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

HALL: I yield back my time.

UPTON: At which time the Chair would recognize the gentlelady from California, Ms. Eshoo.

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Welcome, Madam Secretary. You're a distinguished woman, you have distinguished yourself and your state, the offices that you've held, and now working for the American people and I salute you for it. I -- I want to really congratulate my Republican pals for being absolutely 1000 percent consistent. You love what's wrong with the website, and you detest what's working in the Affordable Care Act. And I think that that is on full display here. But let's get back to the website, because that's what the hearing is about.

It's my understanding that November 31st (sic) is a -- is a hard date for having everything up and running. Do you have -- now, HHS did testify in September that they were 100 percent confident that the site would be launched and fully functional on time on October 1st. That didn't work. Do you have full confidence in this new hard date?

SEBELIUS: Congresswoman, I can tell you that the assessment that we have made is that it will take until the end of November for an optimally functioning website. I know that the only way I can restore confidence that we get it right is to get it right, so I -- I -- I have confidence, but I know that it -- it isn't fair to ask the American public to take our word for it. I've got to fix this problem, and we are underway doing just that.

ESHOO: But are you confident that -- I think I said November 31st, which is, which does not exist, but November 30th. You have confidence in November 30th?

SEBELIUS: I do.

ESHOO: Is there any penalty to QSSI or CGI for not delivering on what they promised?

SEBELIUS: Well, I think the, as you can see, we have a -- obligated funds for a contract. We certainly have not expended all those funds, and we expect not only the CMS team, but our contractor partners to fulfill their obligations and have to be...

(CROSSTALK)

ESHOO: But if they fail to fulfill their obligations. I don't know what's in the contract. Is there a penalty?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Well, I understand, but, there isn't a built-in penalty, but I can tell you that paying for work that isn't complete is not something that we will do. QSSI, as you know, has taken on a new role as integrator of the hub that they built and have in operation is -- is working extremely well, not only for the federal exchanges, but all the state-based markets are using the hub, and that's why we had confidence in their ability to actually take this next role on and coordinate the activities moving forward, which have to be driven with a very clear set of outcomes, very accountable timelines and deadlines, and they will be helping to manage that process.

ESHOO: On the issue of security, there was a security breach that arose recently, that I read about at any rate. And what I think is very important here, because the issue of privacy has been raised, and I think that that has been answered. Very importantly, there isn't any health information in these systems. But there is financial information, so my question to you is, has a security wall been built, and are you confident that it is there and that it will actually secure the financial information that applicants have to disclose?

SEBELIUS: Yes, ma'am, I -- I would tell you that there was not a breach, there was a blog by a sort of skilled hacker that if a certain series of incidents occurred, you could possibly get in and obtain somebody's personally identifiable...

(CROSSTALK)

ESHOO: But isn't that telling? Isn't that telling?

SEBELIUS: And we immediately corrected that problem, so there wasn't a -- it was a theoretical problem that was immediately fixed. I would tell you we are storing the minimum amount of data, because we think that's very important. The hub is not a data collector. It is actually using data centers at the IRS, at Homeland Security, at Social Security to verify information, but it stores none of that data, so we don't want to be...

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Gentlelady's time has expired. The Chair would recognize Mr. Shimkus.

SHIMKUS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Welcome, Madam Secretary. Madam Secretary, before I start my questions, the Washington Post gave the administration, the President, yourself, four Pinocchios on this whole debate of if you like the insurance you have, you can keep it. Would you recommend to the President that he stop using that term? Wouldn't it be helpful in this debate?

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, I think he used the term at the time that the law was passed, and he continues to say...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: And as of September 26th, also, so...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: That's why we wrote...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: So the answer is you don't buy -- you don't believe that the Washington Post, and therefore...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I haven't read the Washington Post, but thank you.

SHIMKUS: Well, we'll hand this down to you so you can see it. Have you ever shopped -- I know you have, but this is for a -- at a grocery store with a coupon? Ever used a coupon?

SEBELIUS: Yes.

SHIMKUS: So, the coupon gives you the terms and conditions of when you go to the checkout to -- to get whatever's off the price of the goods. When you all added the "See Plans Now" option, you in essence gave the searcher in essence a coupon based upon what they're seeing there. And the desire was, let people know what the price is. However, as the -- the news reported, and I followed up in last week's hearing, was that if you are under 50 years old, you get quoted the price of someone who's 27. If you're older than 50, if you're older than 50, could be 64, you get quoted a price of someone who's 50 -- 50 years old. Isn't that misleading?

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, the "Learn" side of the website, which has been up since actually late...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: So that's truthful, then. If you quote a price...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: It is clearly a hypothetical situation...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: Oh, are you -- do you -- wait...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: That for now people that...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: OK, on the "See Plans Now" option, are you saying this is a hypothetical? That's not what it says on the site. It says, "This is the price, when you put in your age," and if your age is 49, it quotes you as if you're 27.

SEBELIUS: Sir, the only way someone can get an accurate information about their price is to get their individual eligibility (inaudible)...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: Let me ask you another -- when did you decide to use this, the low 50 at 27, and above 50 at 50 years old. When did you make that decision?

SEBELIUS: That was decided by the team as...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: By who? Who made the -- the...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I withhold (ph) that information.

SHIMKUS: The problem with the whole debate is y'all won't tell us who made the decisions.

SEBELIUS: Well, I can tell you I did not design the site.

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: So who?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I will get...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: Well, who made the decision on the 27-year-old quote for someone who's 50?

SEBELIUS: I just said I will get you that information.

SHIMKUS: Thank -- thank you. Let me go to, because it's misleading and the White House insists it didn't mislead the public, and (inaudible) we find after you did. But let me -- let me finish on this debate. Another transparency issue. If someone, a constituent of mine or someone in this country has strongly held pro-life views...

(CROSSTALK)

(UNKNOWN): Oh, here we go.

SHIMKUS: Can you commit to us to make sure that the federal exchanges that offer that is clearly identified and so people can understand if they're going to buy a policy that has abortion coverage or not? Because right now, you cannot make that determination.

SEBELIUS: Sir, I -- I don't know. I -- I know exactly the -- the issue you're talking about. I will check and make sure that that is truly identifiable.

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: Here's -- here's -- OK, thank you. Well, here's -- here's our request. Can you provide for the committee the list of insurers in the federal exchange who do not offer, as part of their package, abortion coverage?

SEBELIUS: I think we can do that, sir.

SHIMKUS: Well, you should be able to do it, so...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I just said...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: No, you said "If we can do it."

SEBELIUS: No, I think we can do that is what I said.

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: I think, or I know we can do it?

SEBELIUS: I -- sir, I -- I can't tell you what I don't know firmly right now. I know that is the plan, I will get that information to you.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

The chair would recognize Mr. Engel from New York.

ENGEL: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, I appreciate your coming here today to answer questions about the Affordable Health Care Act (sic).

You know, my Republican colleagues' actions here remind me of a story I read when I was a little boy, and that's the story of Chicken Little, who ran around yelling, "The sky is falling. The sky is falling." But unlike Chicken Little, my Republican colleagues are actually rooting for the sky to fall.

Republicans are holding this hearing today under the auspices of an investigative hearing, as if they want to get to the bottom of what went wrong with the website in order to help fix it. But I don't think, Madam Secretary, there's one person in this room who is naive enough to actually think that the Republicans want to see this law work. They voted over 40 times to repeal the law, they shutdown the government and threatened to force a default in order to stop it. They're rooting for failure.

Madam Secretary, can you tell us what would be the impact on Americans' health insurance if Republicans had been successful in their efforts to de-fund or repeal the Affordable Care Act?

SEBELIUS: Well, I think that the estimates at the Congressional Budget Office is that would have increased the deficit by about $110 billion in the first decade and close to a trillion dollars in the second decade.

We know that we have 42 million or 43 million Americans without health insurance at all, some of them Medicaid eligible and some in the -- over the Medicaid eligibility. Thirty governors so far, Republicans and Democrats, have declared their support for moving ahead with Medicaid expansion, but absent that, the Affordable Care Act, those folks would be without any kind of health security.

And in the private market, what we know is it takes a real toll.

But I'd say the biggest issue is not just the financial toll, not the community toll, not the country toll -- which is significant. I have a good friend who runs the cancer center at the University of Kansas. I was with him and cancer researchers recently, and he said that if you get a cancer diagnosis, you are 60 percent more likely to live five years and beyond if you have insurance than if you don't. I think that's a pretty powerful statement for why we need affordable health care for all of our citizens.

ENGEL: Well, thank you. The -- the Republicans have not been able to de-fund or repeal it, but they have denied requested funding. They've raised specious arguments about death panels and socialized medicine, and they've worked to intimidate groups that could help the implementation effort. There's been a spreading of misinformation about the cost of coverage -- we hear some of that today -- and to actively dissuade the uninsured from seeking coverage.

So Madam Secretary, how are these tactics -- impacted your ability to implement the Affordable Care Act?

SEBELIUS: Well, I don't think there's any question that a lot of people need a lot of information. I think it's one of the reasons we had millions visit the site -- try to visit the site. It's why I am so frustrated and disappointed that the site is not fully functional, and why I'm so committed to getting it functional, because clearly there is a demand. We need to get information to people about the law.

This is the law. This is not any longer a debate. It was a law passed by both houses of Congress, signed by the president of the United States, upheld by the Supreme Court. The president was re-elected. It is the law. And people have benefits and rights under that law, and we've got to get that information so they can make good choices for themselves and their families.

ENGEL: Well, thank you.

It is the law, and, frankly, I find it disconcerting that my Republican colleagues have done nothing but root for this law to fail for the last three and a half years. And now there's a big show here of being upset at problems with the website...

(CROSSTALK)

ENGEL: ... keeping people from signing up for coverage fast enough.

So I would just say to my colleagues on the other side of the aisle, you're really on the wrong side of history here. The website will be fixed and millions of Americans will be able to get quality, affordable health insurance coverage through the Affordable Care Act.

And again, I thank you for being here today, Madam -- Madam.

UPTON: Mr. Pitts, chairman of the Health Committee.

PITTS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Welcome, Madam Secretary.

Have you personally tried to register or enroll on the website?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I created an early light account so I would see the prompts that were coming to people who were interested. I did work my way to the application feature fairly early on. But, frankly, I -- I have affordable health care, so I...

(CROSSTALK)

PITTS: No, I just wanted to know if you've been through the process that millions of Americans are having to go through.

Madam Secretary, the -- the initial website crashes appear to be largely a result of the decision to prevent browsing of the plans. CGI Federal testified at our hearing last week that they had designed the website to allow users to browse and compare plans before having to create an account.

Ms. Campbell told us that two weeks prior to the October 1st launch, they were told to turn off the browsing feature. Were you aware in September that this decision was made?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I wasn't aware of that particular decision that was made by the CMS team. I was aware that we were paring back some features to not put additional risk on the website, which is ironic at this point.

PITTS: And who made that decision? Who made that decision?

SEBELIUS: Administrator Tavenner made that decision.

PITTS: And do you know why that was made?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir, because we were anxious to get the website up and running and functional -- which we clearly have failed to do to date -- although I would suggest the website has never crashed. It is functional, but at a very slow speed and very low reliability, and has continued to function.

Having said that, they pared down some of the features, feeling that it would be better to load them in later. One was the shop and browse feature. Another was the Spanish version of the website and the Medicaid transfers. All three of those issues were paired down in September...

PITTS: Thank you.

SEBELIUS: ... to not load the system.

PITTS: Thank you.

Last week, CGI Federal and QSSI testified that CMS was responsible for end-to-end testing and that they believe that months of testing would have been preferable to two weeks.

Do you believe that two weeks was enough time to complete testing of the entire system?

SEBELIUS: Clearly, not.

PITTS: And when were you made aware of the result of the test, including the one where the system collapsed with only a few hundred users?

SEBELIUS: Leading up to the October 1st date, we had regular meetings with not only a team at CMS but administrators involved. I was made aware that we were testing, and as we found problems we were fixing those problems. And I think there is a CGI report at mid- August identifying some problems. And between August and October that became the punch list for CGI to fix those problems. That's why you test.

PITTS: Now, in The Washington Post on October 21st there was an article that said about a month before the exchange opened a testing group of 10 insurers urged agency officials not to launch the site because it was riddled with problems. Were you aware in September that insurers recommended a delay in the launch of the exchange?

SEBELIUS: I was not aware that they recommended delay. I know everyone was concerned that there were risks and there were likely to be problems with a brand new integrated insurance system. I don't think anyone ever estimated the degree to which we've had problems in the system, and, certainly, the contracting partners did not.

PITTS: And did HHS respond to the insurers' recommendation to delay the launch?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I can't -- I wasn't in the meeting. I don't know...

PITTS: Can you find out and...

SEBELIUS: ... what occurred at the meeting, and I don't know who they talked to.

PITTS: ... answer that question for us?

SEBELIUS: Sure, I will get back to you.

PITTS: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Mr. Green?

GREEN: Thank you, Mr. Chair.

Madam Secretary, thank you for taking time to be here today.

I represent parts of east and north Houston, Harris County, and our district has one of the highest uninsured rates in the country. Even worse, we have one of the highest rates of people who have jobs but don't receive their insurance through their employer.

It's for this reason that I believe Houston would be a good place for you to come and spend -- spread the word about the tremendous benefits of the Affordable Care Act. However, we learned (inaudible) your office that you're unable to attend because of scheduling conflicts. And I -- hopefully, we can have agreement that some time in the future you'll come to the fourth largest city that probably has the highest number of uninsured in a metropolitan area. And, of course, we're in the state of Texas that has the number of highest uninsured in the country.

The -- it's important to me and our constituents to get it right, and that's why I share your and the president's disappointment the website's not working as planned.

November 30th is not soon enough. Many of my constituents have been waiting for years to be able to purchase health insurance, and we owe it to them to get the marketplaces up and running.

The contractors have not served our country well and should fix it or not be paid.

Now we're hearing about the cancellation letters being sent by insurance companies (inaudible) customers notifying them that their plans are no longer offered. Are these Americans losing their health care coverage because of the Affordable Care Act, or is it because these plans were changed after the enactment of the act?

SEBELIUS: I would say it's the latter, sir. If a plan was in place since the enactment of the act, no one would have received a cancellation...

(CROSSTALK)

GREEN: So if somebody in America had an insurance plan before the act and -- the president was correct: If you have -- if you like what you have, you could keep it.

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

GREEN: The plans were changed, and so now they have to comply with the new law.

SEBELIUS: They can either choose to be grandfathered and keep the same plan, which meant the same benefits and -- and actually the regulation allows insurance companies to charge medical inflation plus a trend line so they didn't have to charge the same price. They could increase it; they could increase co-pays. They could increase co- insurance. What they couldn't do is cancel benefits that the policy holder relied on. They couldn't disadvantage the policy holder. But if that plan is in effect, absolutely, it is still in effect.

GREEN: OK, but some of these millions of letters we're hearing about are probably because their plans changed?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Absolutely. And again, in the individual market, plans change every year. Insurers design new products...

GREEN: And that's -- even in the small business market that happens. So these plans are not allowed now, because they're completely inadequate. They don't offer the minimum essential benefits, is that correct?

SEBELIUS: That is correct.

GREEN: OK. And having been a state legislator -- and I know as governor in Kansas -- I assume every state has some type of minimum mandated benefits that they have for their health insurance plans.

SEBELIUS: They do, but it applies, again, sir, in the past usually to the group markets, where 90 percent of covered Americans get their policies. This market has always been the wild west.

(CROSSTALK)

GREEN: OK. The Americans who received those letters from their companies about cancellations, they're eligible to purchase plans on the exchange?

SEBELIUS: Or out of the exchange. Individuals who don't -- aren't interested in some kind of financial help can go outside the exchange, inside the exchange. Their insurer can offer them plans. They have choices they've never had before.

GREEN: And because of the benefits of the Affordable Care Act, 80 percent of their premium dollar will come back to them?

SEBELIUS: That's correct. That's...

(CROSSTALK)

GREEN: OK. And that's not true -- and I don't -- I know it's not true in Texas, but I don't know what -- any states that have that 80 percent requirement.

SEBELIUS: Well, no state had it, I would suggest, in that kind of broad base prior to the Affordable Care Act, so it's...

(CROSSTALK)

GREEN: Let me give you an example of one of the plans I found out doing case work a few years ago. A large company provided $25,000 maximum benefit for their employees in the year. Most employees didn't know about it, and -- until this one constituent found out that she had cancer. And the bill ended up being $300,000. And so that's some of those plans that are not being allowed to be sold now, is that correct?

SEBELIUS: Well, not only will (ph) the plan have a limit on out- of-pocket costs per year, it will have a limit on a lifetime out-of- pocket costs and it will have -- it will take away the notion that you would run out of your coverage in the middle of a treatment, which a lot of plans do.

GREEN: I know I'm out of my time, but it's like buying a car...

(CROSSTALK)

GREEN: ... look good, but if it doesn't have a motor, it's no good to have that car.

(CROSSTALK)

GREEN: So that's why the Affordable Care Act has...

SEBELIUS: Save a lot of gas, but it doesn't get you...

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Gentleman's time has expired.

Gentleman from Oregon, Mr. Walden.

WALDEN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Governor -- Secretary, we're delighted to have you before the committee. You and I both know how important this issue is to all Americans that we get it right.

So I hope you can appreciate, we're trying to understand what we missed along the way. And -- and one of the things that bothered me was the letter that was sent from your agency to the GAO back in -- June 6th. And I'll read in part, it said, "We're in the final stages of finalizing and testing the I.T.

infrastructure that will support the application enrollment process. HHS is extremely confident that on October 1, the marketplace will open on schedule and millions of Americans will have access to affordable, quality health insurance."

I'm just an average guy from a small town in Oregon, but when I read that, it tells me you believed everything was good to go, the testing was in place, and we should have full confidence everything would work. Correct?

SEBELIUS: That's the letter I signed, yes, sir.

WALDEN: Actually, it was signed by your assistant.

SEBELIUS: Or whoever -- yes, yes.

WALDEN: But the same point.

And so I went into this believing in your response -- your agency's response to GAO, things were ready to go, we should have full confidence, because when somebody uses the word "extremely confident," tells me you're extremely confident.

Second piece, then when we had the testimony from the witnesses last week, I asked them about the end-to-end testing and what the industry standard would be, and they said it really should have been months, especially for a project of this magnitude. And yet we heard it was only two weeks.

Now in August, GCI told CMS in their report...

SEBELIUS: CGI.

WALDEN: I'm sorry, CGI, thank you.

That on August 9th that there was not enough time in the schedule to conduct adequate performance testing. Did that make its way all the way to you? And do you think there was adequate time?

SEBELIUS: Sir, clearly, as I've said before, we did not adequately do end-to-end testing. The products were not locked and loaded into the system until the third week in September. Each of the component parts...

WALDEN: Right...

SEBELIUS: ... was tested, validated...

WALDEN: ... they told us that.

SEBELIUS: ... independently validated end-to-end (ph).

WALDEN: I'm sorry.

All those worked, though, right? They told us last week that their individual modules were tested and met specification. Do you concur with that analysis based on what you know?

SEBELIUS: I do concur with the testing that was done, yes.

WALDEN: OK, so it really was the end-to-end -- which is why some of us thought we should delay until it could be done right to avoid this very collapse that now is upon us. And I realize not everybody agreed to (ph) that.

The second piece here gets back to The Washington Post, which I realize you haven't had -- and I understand -- a chance to read this morning, but the four Pinocchios about the president repeatedly saying, 'If you have a plan, you'll keep your plan.' We all heard that to mean, 'I've got a plan with a company. I'll continue to have it even if they make minor changes,' when in fact your own rules as written said, no, that's really isn't what's going to happen. If minor changes are made that means the plan changed; that means you don't get it.

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, that isn't true. They (ph) -- rules did not say what you just suggested, and I think the estimate, given that there would be turnover in the market, was really an outside projection. It wasn't our rules. It's -- it was a snapshot of what happens in the market; that plans change so dramatically...

WALDEN: Sure, every year.

SEBELIUS: ... over time that the estimate was -- they wouldn't be -- not because of our rules, but because of insurance companies' business decisions.

(CROSSTALK)

WALDEN: Well, but you set up what (ph) those market rules looked like they had to comply with, correct?

SEBELIUS: Only if they chose not to grandfather the policy. That's...

WALDEN: But that meant they couldn't make any change (ph)...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Any grandfathered policy stayed in place, still would be in place.

WALDEN: Right, but if they made...

SEBELIUS: ... none of these rules apply.

WALDEN: But if they made any change...

SEBELIUS: No, they could make changes in pricing. They could make changes in benefits. They couldn't dramatically disadvantage the consumer, but they could have trend lines. They -- they had a wide corridor to make sure that -- that a similar plan -- so if a consumer liked the plan, the plan, if it stayed...

(CROSSTALK)

WALDEN: So here's what the practical implication -- I've got letters from constituents all over my district who have gotten letters from their insurers who say because of Obamacare, they're no longer going to be in the individual market, or at least with that plan in the individual market. And the result is this person from Cove, Oregon, said, "I was paying $600 a month for a $3,000 deductible. Now it costs me $800 a month for a $5,000 deductible."

I've got others here, I'll put in the record.

A woman whose job -- she had 40 hours, now down to 29. Neither has health insurance, nor enough income to live on her own because of the way this law is getting implemented.

I realize my time's (ph) expired.

UPTON: Gentlelady from Colorado, Ms. DeGette.

DEGETTE: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you, Secretary, for being with us today.

I want to follow up on a couple of those questions that Mr. Walden was asking you about CGI. As you know, Chairman Issa last night released this document, monthly project status report from CGI last night, and it looks to me as sort of a technical document that has a punch list of outstanding open issues.

And some of them do highlight items that upon first read seem to be alarming. For example, one of the entries said, "Due to the compressed schedule there's not enough time built in to allow for adequate performance testing." And this certainly, in retrospect, sounds bad. But the date of the document that Chairman Issa released is September 6th, and then on September 10th, four days later, CGI came into this committee and testified under oath, quote, "CGI Federal is confident it will develop -- deliver the functionality that CMS has directed."

And -- and we're -- we're trying to figure out, or at least I'm trying to figure out, how CGI is now coming in and saying, you know, 'We warned everybody that this wasn't gonna be ready,' when they came in and directly told me that they would be ready to launch on October 1st.

So it kind of raises a question, how these statements can be reconciled. One explanation is that CGI was lying to this committee. I think that's unlikely. Another is that CGI thought that the items flagged in the report were like a punch list that could be addressed.

So here's my question to you, Madam Secretary: Was CGI telling your department the same thing that they told the committee on September 10th, that the company was confident that its programs would be ready?

SEBELIUS: Congresswoman, all of the contractors testified here in September and again, I think, last week before this committee. And the testimony was fairly similar, that they were ready to go in September. They were asked in -- last week if they had suggested that we should delay the launch date. Each of them said, no. I think the chairman...

(CROSSTALK)

DEGETTE: So they never asked you to delay the launch date?

SEBELIUS: They did not. And, frankly, I -- I think it is not valuable at this point...

DEGETTE: Right.

SEBELIUS: ... to do a lot of pointing blame, fixing the blame. What I want to do is fix the problem.

DEGETTE: And so do I...

SEBELIUS: I think we need the whole team to move ahead, and we will report back regularly.

DEGETTE: Right, but we're relying on these contractors to fix this. And so that goes to my last question, which is Mr. Zients has now come in and he says the site is going to be functional for the vast majority of users by the end of November. Is that right?

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

DEGETTE: And given what CGI told us and the other vendors, do you believe that that is correct? Do you believe it will be pretty much ready to go by the end of November?

SEBELIUS: I do. And I think that we are making improvements each and every day. It is easier to use now than it was two weeks. It is way from where we need it to be.

DEGETTE: So it's not like it's all going to be fine by the end of November. It's beginning to improve already. Is that your testimony?

SEBELIUS: It is a continuous process, as websites are. Patches are made, fixes are made on an ongoing basis. And as we find issues like Congresswoman Eshoo talked about, we are fixing them in real time.

DEGETTE: And you're going to guarantee yes or no that people will have privacy when they go on this site?

SEBELIUS: Absolutely.

DEGETTE: Now I just want to say one last thing. I was on the Washington Journal where callers call in this morning, and I had a man, Max, call in. And he said he got one of those letters from the insurance companies that his insurance was canceled. So what he did is he went on to the website and he -- under the federal exchange and he found a better plan, and now he's going to sign up. So I would hope that that's what everybody would be able to do. And I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Mr. Terry?

TERRY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I'm pleased to hear that the website will be fully operational by the end of November. And would be able to -- would you come back to our committee so we can see if that's actually accomplished and how it was accomplished?

SEBELIUS: I will make every effort to do that.

TERRY: OK. You were governor and state insurance commissioner in Kansas, and I reached out to our state insurance commissioner and governor and found out that they have absolutely no data about Nebraskans who have either tried to enroll or enrolled.

As you know, Nebraska is one of the states that opted not to do their own exchange and rely on the federal exchange. So it's interesting to me that neither our insurance commissioner nor the governor's office had any data about Nebraskans and this -- this -- and enrolling in these plans.

I also asked our insurance commissioner if any of the navigators, if they knew who the navigators were and whether they had to apply to be certified or licensed in essence like an insurance agent would be. And they told me they have no clue who's been authorized by HHS to be a navigator and work with people in Nebraska.

So this is concerning to me, so I'm going to ask you a few questions along this line. First of all, do you have data on how many people in general in the United States have tried to enroll in a plan through this website?

SEBELIUS: No, sir. We do not have any reliable data around enrollment, which is why we haven't given it to date.

TERRY: Or have any data on how many people have tried to enroll but because of the problems have not been able to accomplish that?

SEBELIUS: No, sir. I can tell you I met with insurers last week. And one of the priority fixes is the so-called 834s, the document that sends an individual's name to a company and verifies it. That is one of the systems that is not working.

TERRY: I appreciate that. And the contractors I asked specifically about the information of how many people have tried to enroll and enrolled, and they say they do have those numbers but can't tell us that because of a contract with HHS saying that they -- they're gagged on that information.

SEBELIUS: I would suggest that the numbers are not reliable according to (inaudible).

TERRY: Well, I'll tell you what. My question is going to be though will you on the record right now authorize them to give us those numbers and let us determine whether those are reliable?

SEBELIUS: No, sir. I want to give you reliable, confirmed data from every state and from the federal marketplace. We have said that we will do that on a monthly basis. By the middle of the month you will have that data, but I don't want to turn over anything that is not confirmed and reliable, and that's what we'll do.

TERRY: Well, but that data out there exists and you will not let us (inaudible)

SEBELIUS: Sir, I would -- I would tell you right now it is not reliable data. According to the insurance companies who are eager to have customers, they are not getting reliable data all the way through the system (inaudible) real problems that we have.

TERRY: The number of people that have clicked on and tried to get or enrolled, I'm not asking about what they enrolled in or whether they came in and said they were 65 and were quoted something that they were 27 years old. That should be a pretty reliable number just on the surface. So would you...

SEBELIUS: The system isn't functioning, so we are not getting that reliable data. Insurers who I met with said that that is the case. We know that there's 700,000 applications that have been (inaudible).

TERRY: The reliability of that data certainly flies in the face of the testimony from the contractors. All right. I yield back.

UPTON: Ms. Capps?

CAPPS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Secretary Sebelius, for your presence here today and your testimony. While I too am frustrated with the flawed rollout of healthcare.gov, I do appreciate your longstanding commitment to improving the health care options for all Americans and fixing this website quickly.

I think it's important to note that in my home state of California and other states as well, the new exchange marketplace, we call it Covered California, is working. And rates -- constituents are finding that rates are as much as 29 percent less than those that they found on the marketplace last year.

I'm thankful my constituents now have this option. And as I look around to implementation nationwide, it seems clear to me that political decisions in individual states have really made the difference for consumers.

The governors and legislators -- state legislators that embrace this law are delivering for their communities, but those elected who are trying to ignore the opportunities presented and continue to throw up road blocks both here in Congress and in state legislatures should not now seem surprised that there are significant bumps along the way.

This seems to me to be completely disingenuous. Having embraced the law since open enrollment began October 1, Californians have started nearly 180,000 applications with more beginning every day.

I know my time is limited, but I want to have a second to mention a conversation I had just last night with a (inaudible) town hall to my district on the central coast of California. One of the first callers I heard from was a mother from Santa Barbara. Her name's Meryl, and she wanted to tell me the story of her son.

Her son is 28 years old and he had been paying $425 a month for his insurance before the Affordable Care Act. She was happy to report that he has already applied through Covered California and has found a policy that works better for him. It has all the essential health benefits covered, which his former policy did not, and now will only cost him $109 a month.

This is significant savings for Meryl's son, and this is a story that's being repeated at least in California often. So there are millions of residents in many states who have now set up their own websites and marketplaces. In those states, tens of thousands of people are now as we speak signing up for coverage. And this is demonstrating that the Affordable Care Act is working.

In New York and Washington, over 30,000 people have enrolled. In Oregon, over 50,000 people have been enrolled. Kentucky, 31,000 people have been enrolled. We could go on and on. The success of the state exchanges, which is where this is meant to be implemented, shows how badly this law is wanted and needed, how much it will be of help to so many people who want quality, affordable health care.

So my three quick questions to you are this, Madam Speaker (ph). What is your assessment of how this first month have been gone -- has gone in the states that are running their own marketplaces, which this Congress intended that the Affordable Care Act work?

SEBELIUS: Well everything we hear from the state-based markets is that they are doing well. They have not submitted data yet. We, again, are working with them around a monthly schedule so that they will confirm Medicaid data and enrollment data. And we'll see the real numbers at the end of the month and make sure that the -- they're available to the public.

But everything we hear is that they see the same demand, they are eager to enroll folks and that that is going smoothly.

CAPPS: And what do you think this success shows about the demand and the interest for affordable health insurance on the part of constituents?

SEBELIUS: Well I don't think there's any question that in spite of a series of road blocks and blockades and a lot of misinformation driven by about a $400 million marketing campaign last year, Americans are eager to see what their benefits may be under the law, what their opportunities are, how to get health security for themselves and their families, and we want to make sure that they see those benefits.

The website is one of the ways to do that. The call center, on the ground enrollment, personal outreach, are a variety of ways, and I would tell your colleague, Mr. Congressman, I'd be happy to get you the list of the Nebraska folks who are on the ground. It's available easily. It's public record, so I'd be happy to send it to you, so you could share it with your insurance commissioner and governor.

UPTON: The gentlelady's time has expired.

Gentleman from the great state of Michigan, Mr. Rogers.

ROGERS: Thank you.

Thank you, Madam Secretary, for being here. Short time, get through some questions here, if I can.

Is it your testimony that the -- that there -- every night to try to increase the functionality of the system you're hot swapping codes?

So my understanding is that between 2:00 and 4:00, write new code, put it into the system, yes or no?

SEBELIUS: Clearly, I am not hot swapping code. There is a technical team...

(CROSSTALK)

ROGERS: No, no. You are in charge of the operation that hot swaps code on functionality. Is that -- you're trying to improve the functionality, yes?

So that happens every night, yes?

SEBELIUS: No, I don't think it does happen every night. It happens periodically during the hours of 1:00 and 5:00, but it is not a nightly feature.

ROGERS: Great.

Has each piece of that code that's been introduced in the system been security tested?

SEBELIUS: That's my understanding, yes, sir. And the testing...

ROGERS: Each piece of that code has been tested? Yes or no?

SEBELIUS: I don't know, but I can tell you that security...

ROGERS: That's a much safer answer, trust me.

SEBELIUS: ... is an ongoing operation that as code is loaded, you need to retest over and over and over again. So whether it's pretested, I can't tell you.

ROGERS: All right. You need to test the code.

Have any end-to-end security tests been conducted since healthcare.gov went live on October 1st, yes or no?

SEBELIUS: My understanding is, there's continuous testing as the -- our temporary authority to operate calls for.

ROGERS: Yes or no, has an end-to-end security test on healthcare.gov went live, yes or no?

SEBELIUS: I will find out exactly what testing they are doing. I know they are doing simultaneous testing as new code is loaded.

ROGERS: Are there any end-to-end security tests run after every new piece of code is put -- I'm not talking about testing the code now, I'm talking about an end-to-end security test.

SEBELIUS: I can tell you how...

ROGERS: Covers the cost of the boundaries...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: ... I can get you that information.

ROGERS: I can tell you they are not, and I'd be interested to hear why not.

Tab -- if you go to tab two quickly in your book, I'm going to read three things...

SEBELIUS: What book, sir?

ROGERS: You have a tab there. If you go to tab two -- right there.

Well, while you're looking, I'll read. It's dated September 27th, and it is to Marilyn Tavenner. Let me just -- a couple of pieces here.

"There are inherent security risks with not having all code tested in a single environment. Finally, the system requires rapid development and release of hot fixes and patches so it is not always available or stable during the duration of the testing."

Secondly, "The security contractor has not been able to test all of the security controls in one complete version of the system."

And if you look in the first part, which is most troubling at all, it says, "Due to system readiness issues, the security control assessment was only partly completed. This constitutes a risk that must be accepted before the marketplace day one operations."

And so let me tell you what you did.

You allowed the system to go forward with no encryption on back- up systems. They had no encryption on certain boundary crossings. You accepted a risk on behalf of every user of this computer that put their personal financial information at risk because you did not even have the most basic end-to-end test on security of this system.

Amazon would never do this. ProFlowers would never do this. Kayak would never do this.

This is completely an unacceptable level of security. And here's the scary part, we found out after the contractors last week that an end-to-end test hadn't been conducted on security, not functionality, because if it's not functioning, you know it's not secure.

Your ongoing hot patches without end-to-end tests: the private contractors told us it would take a very thorough two months just for an integrated end-to-end security test, that I'll tell you has not happened to date.

Why? Because you're constantly adding new code every night to protect the functionality of the system. You have exposed millions of Americans because you all, according to your memo, believed it was an acceptable risk.

Don't you think you had the obligation to tell the American people that we're going to put you in this system, but beware, your information is likely to be vulnerable?

Would you commit today, Secretary, to shut down the system and do an end-to-end security test so that these Americans can have their information...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: No, sir. If you read the memo...

ROGERS: Oh, I have read it.

SEBELIUS: ... say that weekly testing of our berta (ph) devices, including interface testing, daily, weekly scans are going on. This is a temporary authority...

ROGERS: (Inaudible), that's not what the memo says, number one, and number two, the contractors will tell you...

(CROSSTALK)

(UNKNOWN): Mr. Chairman, point of order. I think the witness ought to be allowed to answer what was a speech by the colleague, because he's raised a lot of issues.

UPTON: If the gentlelady will quickly answer.

ROGERS: (Inaudible) here today, that's...

UPTON: Does the secretary wish to respond briefly?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I would just say this document is a document signed by Administrator Tavenner, which discusses mitigation strategies for security that are ongoing and upgraded and a authorization to operate on a permanent basis will not be signed until these mitigation strategies are satisfied. It is under way right now, but daily and weekly monitoring and testing is under way.

ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, there are people using this system today and she's just admitted again the system isn't secure nor has (inaudible).

UPTON: The gentleman...

(UNKNOWN): Mr. Chairman, she didn't admit that. You said it, but she didn't say it.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

Mr. Doyle.

DOYLE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, welcome.

Those of us who fought for this law, who voted for this law, have a vested interest in its success, and the concerns that you here expressed on this side of the panel are real, because we want to see Americans get health care.

I think it's somewhat disingenuous for my colleagues on the other side of the podium here to have this faux anger and this faux concern over a bill that they absolutely want to fail and have rooted for its failure and have voted over 40-some times to repeal this bill, never putting an alternative plan on the floor for the American people, but just to simply say they want to make sure this plan doesn't succeed.

And I think the real fear is, that the plan will succeed and the American people will learn of the real benefits of this plan, not the propaganda campaign that's gone on by the Republicans for the last three years.

Madam Secretary, I think one of the keys to success of this plan is that we get young people to enroll in this plan. And I have some questions about some enrollment concerns that I have.

Now I understand that you've said approximately 700,000 people have applied for coverage via the healthcare.gov and the state exchanges, is that -- is that...?

SEBELIUS: They've completed an application.

DOYLE: Right. Which is different from enrollment.

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

DOYLE: So my question is, are you expecting -- I know you don't have exact numbers yet, but are you expecting a large number or a small month number of enrollments during the first month?

What is your thoughts on that?

SEBELIUS: Well, our projections prior to launch were always that there would be a very small number at the beginning. We watch the Massachusetts trend, which started slowly and built. I think there's no question that given our flawed launch of healthcare.gov, it will be a very small number.

DOYLE: Yes, I mean, in the Massachusetts plan, I think the first month it was 123 people signed up, less than 1 percent of the overall first-year enrollment in that first month. And we saw the same kind of numbers in Medicare Part D the first month of open enrollment back in 2006.

Madam Secretary, young Americans are the most likely age group to be uninsured, and a lot of us are concerned because of the problems that we've been having with the website, that a lot of these young folks may not come back on; you know, they have very short attention spans.

I've got four kids that all work on the Internet, and if they can't get something in five minutes, they are on to something else.

What do we do, and what plans are in place by your department to encourage young people to go back and revisit that site and to make sure that we're getting young people looking at that site and accessing it?

SEBELIUS: Well, step number one is fix the site, because we don't want people to be invited back and then have a bad experience a second time around. I think that's absolutely right. The site is particularly important to tech-savvy younger generation folks who we need to enroll.

I think that we have -- so fixing the site is step one.

And step number two is getting information to folks that the law even exists. A lot of young people haven't followed this dialogue for the last three and a half years.

(CROSSTALK)

DOYLE: Yes, I think we need a real marketing campaign, and we really need to reach out to young people, especially at the end of November when you say this site is going to be working a lot better, to make sure they are checking that site out.

SEBELIUS: You bet.

DOYLE: One of my four kids is self-employed. He's 33 years old, paying about $140 a month for a Blue Cross plan. He's eligible for a subsidy. We browsed that site. He's gonna able to get coverage for about half of what he's paying right now, and that's good news for us, because I think my wife is paying his premium, so I think we're going to save the money.

But I think it's important we had to prod him to go on that site and enroll, and I think for a lot of young people, they are not going to do it unless it's easy, so it's important we get that fixed. Thank you.

SEBELIUS: I agree.

UPTON: Dr. Murphy, chairman of the oversight subcommittee.

MURPHY: Thank you, Madam Secretary, and welcome.

You had mentioned that the people who did the technology on the website made a number of mistakes, you mentioned Verizon. When we had them before our committee last week, they said it wasn't their fault they were told within HHS there was some problems there.

SEBELIUS: Sir, Verizon wasn't involved in the website (inaudible)...

(CROSSTALK)

MURPHY: Right, with the data, I understand, I'm sorry.

But they had a role, CGI had a role, other companies, et cetera. I'm just curious in this process, what decisions did you make that affected this for better or worse in terms of the data, the ease, or problems with the implement and being able to track how many people are actually enrolled?

SEBELIUS: My decisions (sic) specifically to design the website, I was not involved. I am prohibited to choose contractors. We go by the federal procurement, and I got regular reports on exactly what was done...

MURPHY: What about the part with regard to getting data in terms of how many people are even enrolled or trying to enroll, did you have any decisions in that process?

SEBELIUS: The application process, at this point, does not work end to end very well.

MURPHY: Right, I understand it doesn't work, that's obvious.

SEBELIUS: We do not have reliable data about the end of...

MURPHY: I'm just trying to find out, if you had asked them, to say look, I'm in charge of this, I'm going to want a regular report, how many people have tried to enroll, how many people have enrolled, have you -- did you ask that question?

SEBELIUS: We have prioritized for our contractors that specific fix, and believe me, the insurance companies are eager for us to get reliable data to make sure their data matches ours, and that is not there yet.

MURPHY: I'm just trying to -- I appreciate that. I'm trying to find out if you told them that was part of the plan and what they're doing.

Let me -- real quick, I'm hearing -- we're hearing from thousands of people who have had their policies canceled. In fact, I heard from one insurer in Pittsburgh that just canceled 30,000 individual policies.

Now, they said they expect 50,000 to 30,000 to enroll in the exchange plans. Just so you know, to date, so far, the number of people who have signed up for their plan is 10, 10.

Now I'm concerned a lot of these individuals and families aren't going to be able to make it by January 1, so I'm wondering, do you know how many families will not have been able to keep their insurance by January 1, do you have any matrix (sic) to help you understand what that is going to be?

SEBELIUS: Sir, by law that has been in place at the state level, insurance companies must give their customers a 90-day notice about a policy change or a plan cancellation.

MURPHY: I'm just wondering if you have a mechanism whereby you will know if something built in this system...

SEBELIUS: Will I know if your constituents signed up for an individual plan, no.

MURPHY: People across America.

And do we know how many policies will be canceled? I mean, is it 1,000, 10,000, 1 million, 5 million, do we know?

SEBELIUS: We know that in the individual market, a number of the plans having sold are not grandfathered and are not currently meeting the law. Those notices have gone out. We know there are about 12 million people in the individual market. A number of them have grandfathered plans. A number of them have plans which meet the essential health benefits. So I can try to...

MURPHY: Let me put a face on that.

Person named Paul wrote to me, and says, "I'm supposedly one of the families this act is supposed to help, but it's, in fact, is hurting more, and would make it harder for my family to live. We'll have less money for food and other essential items. I have a wife and four children to take care of."

Another person wrote, "I received -- I had a 2013 plan which if you include the premiums, and out of pocket total liability was $5,300. For 2014, the same program liability is $9,000.

Single mom writes, "I want to convey, I'm one of the millions of people who's having their health insurance canceled, because it does not meet the standards of Obamacare. I liked my insurance. I especially liked the price. And now I'm being forced to sign up for something that will be way more expensive. As a single mom who is self employed, I'm worried about how I'm going to pay my bills."

I hope you have a mechanism to track who these people are. She's not eligible for other subsidies, but the costs are going to be driving her down.

SEBELIUS: Well sir, again, I would suggest there is no requirement that any of those consumers sign up for a plan suggested by their company at a higher price. They have now options...

MURPHY: But if a plan changes...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: (OFF-MIKE) health underwriting, without preexisting conditions, with some guarantees around...

MURPHY: She's searching around and she can't find a plan she could afford.

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: (OFF-MIKE) they never had before.

MURPHY: She can't find a plan she can afford.

UPTON: Gentleman's time expired.

Gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. Butterfield.

BUTTERFIELD: Mr. Chairman, before my time begins, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

UPTON: Yes, go ahead.

BUTTERFIELD: Mr. Chairman, I'm always sensitive to committee decorum and I want to ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to display the Democratic Twitter handle.

UPTON: Go ahead.

BUTTERFIELD: Hear no objection, thank you.

Secretary Sebelius, thank you so very much for coming today. I would like to ask you about the document that my Republican colleagues have just released.

This document is an authority to operate memorandum to operate the federally facilitated marketplace for six months and implement a security mitigation plan.

This document, as I understand it, describes security testing for healthcare.gov. It says that security testing of the marketplace was ongoing since its inception, and into September of this year. In fact, it says that, quote, "Throughout the three rounds of security control assessment testing, all of the security controls have been tested on different versions of the system." that's good news.

But the bad news is, that it goes on to say that, because of system readiness, a complete security assessment of all the security controls in one complete version of the system were not tested.

This document indicates that CMS postponed a final security assessment screening, but in its place, CMS did put in place a number of mitigation measures, and it concluded that these measures would mitigate any security risk.

Question, are you familiar with this document?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

BUTTERFIELD: Is it correct that this document recommends implementing a dedicated security team to monitor, track, and ensure the mitigation plan activities are completed?

SEBELIUS: Yes, it does.

BUTTERFIELD: Now is it correct that this document recommends monitoring and performing weekly testing on all berta (ph) devices, including Internet-facing web servers?

SEBELIUS: More than recommended, it's underway.

BUTTERFIELD: Is it correct this document recommends conducting daily and weekly scans?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

BUTTERFIELD: Does this document recommend conducting a full SEA test on the marketplace in a stable environment?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

BUTTERFIELD: Is it correct that this document recommends migrating the marketplace to CMS's virtual data center environment in the first quarter of next year?

SEBELIUS: Yes, it does.

BUTTERFIELD: My understanding is that an independent security expert, the MITRE Corporation, is performing security testing on the code that powers the website on an ongoing basis, is that correct?

SEBELIUS: That is correct, and MITRE did an assessment of the system, gave us a preliminary report, they are in the process of posting their final report. That did not raise flags about going ahead, and the mitigation strategy was put in place to make sure that we had a temporary authority to operate in place while the mitigation was going on, and then a permanent authority to operate will be signed.

BUTTERFIELD: Finally, do you have confidence in these and other measures you are taking to protect the security of Americans' personal information?

SEBELIUS: I do, sir.

BUTTERFIELD: Thank you.

This is the third time you've said it during the hearing, and we believe you. Thank you.

What you're telling us is that these remedial actions and the ongoing security testing from MITRE are protecting the security of the website. That's a message that it's important for the public to hear.

My Republican colleagues do not want this website to work.

I am convinced of that.

They want to block the ACA at all costs and even shut down the government to stop the law. For the last four years, they have taken every glitch, every simple glitch, and hiccup in the law and tried to exaggerate its significance, and that's happening today and it's so disappointing.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

UPTON: Dr. Burgess.

BURGESS: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I may make a unanimous consent request also?

UPTON: Yes, go ahead.

BURGESS: I would like to request unanimous consent my opening statement, which we were not allowed to be given could be made part of the record to this hearing.

UPTON: No -- no -- without objection.

BURGESS: And further, I do have a number of questions, many have come from constituents, I would also like to submit those as questions for the record...

UPTON: Without objection.

BURGESS: ... and ask the secretary for her attention to those so we can get answers, because they are, after all, important questions.

OK, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

It just came to my attention that on CNN -- the -- CNN's website, that the site was hacked just last week, and I will be happy to make this available to you. I don't think...

SEBELIUS: The CNN website?

BURGESS: The -- CNN ran a story that the healthcare.gov website was hacked last week. And again, I will get this to you and would appreciate your response to that.

Mr. Terry had asked a question about -- he wanted to get the information about the number of people who'd signed up. You said you wouldn't provide that because it wasn't accurate.

Would you provide us with the number of people who have been able to enroll on the telephone? The president gave an 800-number during his speech. Could we get a number of people who've enrolled on the telephone?

SEBELIUS: No, sir, we do not have reliable enrollment data. We will have that to you by the middle of November as we committed to. We are collecting state data, we are collection telephone data, we are collecting paper data, we are collecting website data. We want it to be reliable and accountable and that's what you'll have to...

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: OK. Reclaiming my time. Telephone data doesn't seem like it would be that difficult to compile since the number is likely quite low.

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: The telephone goes through the system.

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: You have, or the president designated, I call him a glitch czar, Jeffrey Zients. Your familiar with his appointment to the -- to oversee...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I asked him to serve in this capacity, yes.

BURGESS: OK. Many of us on the Subcommittee of Oversight and Investigations in Energy and Commerce were not as comforted as you by that selection because if you'll recall, Mr. Zients' history with this subcommittee is not great. He was involved with Solyndra, we asked him to come and talk to us about Solyndra in 2011. He refused, requiring a subpoena to be issued by this -- by this subcommittee. Will you commit to making Mr. Zients available to our subcommittee for our questions?

SEBELIUS: Congressman, you are welcome to ask Mr. Zients to come before the committee. He is volunteering his services to us for a period of time. He has been appointed by the President to start in January as the head of the National Economic Council. He was the Deputy Director at OMB for Management and Performance. I am thrilled that he is willing to take on this assignment and help us drive the management, but...

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: Again, his -- his appearance here will be important. Now a lot of people are asking if the president's words leading up to this law, if they matter, and the statement in the Washington Post today edited the President's statement, saying, "If you like your health care plan, you'll be able to keep your health care plan if we deem it adequate," but that seems like a more operational statement, and especially if you go back just a few years into the Federal Register, and I'm quoting here from the Federal Register from July 23rd of 2010, just a few months after the law was signed. The -- the rule, or the interim rule for dealing with the grandfathering written in the Federal Record, "because newly-purchased individual policies are not grandfathered, the department expects that a large population of individual policies will not be grandfathered, covering up to and perhaps exceeding 10 million people."

I hope the president was apprised of that before he made these statements, because clearly his statement wasn't operational.

SEBELIUS: Again, that's an insurance company choice, and that was a snapshot of what the market looks like.

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: Your...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: The President made it clear, and our policy was to put a grandfather clause in both employer-based coverage and in individual coverage.

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: Right, but in the Federal Register, those were the comments that were recorded. Now, I do have to...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: No, this isn't a government takeover of anything. These are private insurance plans making private decisions.

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: I do have to ask you this. I do have to ask you this. You serve at the pleasure of the President, we're all aware of that. But we have had many of your employees here in front of this committee, and you do have to ask yourself, are these being purposely misleading, or are they really not that smart? So I'm going to ask you this morning, for the sake of the future of health care in this country, will you please ask for the resignation of Gary Cohen, because he's repeatedly come to this committee and misled us.

SEBELIUS: I will not, sir.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

(UNKNOWN): Mr. Chairman, point of personal privilege. I just think the record ought to be clear about Jeffrey Zients. He was invited with less than a week's notice to come before this committee. He couldn't make it that day, he asked for some other day, he went to OMB and had nothing to do with the Solyndra contract, and he did come before us and talk about it, but his sole role was to represent OMB and I don't think he ought to have any -- there ought to be any disparagement of Jeffrey Zients. He's a very well-regarded public servant.

UPTON: The gentleman says the statement will stand. Ms. Matsui?

MATSUI: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Welcome, Madam Secretary. Now we all agree the website problems must be resolved. It's this country invented and developed the Internet and the concept of the websites, so there are high expectations. The fact that the hired private contractors could not build a ready website nearly three years is inexcusable, and after it's fixed, I hope the administration will hold those at fault accountable. But we can't lose sight of the big picture, that when this is all said and done, every American will have affordable quality health insurance and health care.

This is the goal, I believe, of all Democrats and Republicans. The ACA's working in California, and it's working in my district in Sacramento, and I just want to tell you about a letter I got from a constituent. "Dear Congresswoman Matsui, as a self-employed contract employee, I've had individually-purchased health insurance for 11 years now. Insurance has gone up every year, sometimes more than once, insurance that wouldn't let me add my daughter when my ex- husband stopped his insurance policy that covered them both, insurance that I have underused for fear they would drop me, insurance that has just dropped me anyway because they decided they would no longer offer individual plans. This could have happened to me at any time. I'm so grateful that the Affordable Care Act provisions make it possible to get health insurance beginning in January for me and my daughter. As all this is happening, I have finished graduate school and started my own business. Slowly but surely things are happening and I expect to be hiring my first employees in the next six months. The provisions of the ACA are helping me in this too. I can clearly see what it will cost me to provide health benefits for my future employees, understand these costs, and build my business plan accordingly." And that is just one of the letters I have received.

Now, I've also heard from my colleagues on the other side of the aisle complain again and again about how health care reform is increasing health care costs. But the empirical evidence shows something quite different. The recent trends in Medicare spending growth are really quite remarkable. Medicare spending growth is at historically low levels, growing by less than one-half of 1 percent in fiscal year 2012, following slow growth in 2010 and 2011. The same is true on the private side of health care. Personal consumption expenditures on health care, everything from health insurance to drugs to hospital care, rose by just over 1 percent in the past year. This is the slowest increase in nearly 50 years.

Madam Secretary, what does this data tell us about what has happened to health care costs since the ACA became law?

SEBELIUS: Well Congresswoman, you're absolutely right. In the last three and a half years since the President signed the Affordable Care Act, we have seen a great slowdown in the extraordinary cost increases year in and year out for health care in the Medicare plan, in the Medicaid plan, in private insurance, and in underlying health care costs, which affect every American. Some of that has to do with some of the features that are currently in place around different care delivery and different payment systems that we are helping to drive, given the tools that we have with the Affordable Care Act, more quality outcomes, trying to prevent hospital readmissions, looking at hospital-acquired infections, medical homes that prevent people in the first place or help them stay healthy in their own homes and in their own places.

MATSUI: So it's true that the private insurance costs are growing at the slowest rate in decades also, is that true?

SEBELIUS: That is true.

MATSUI: So am I also correct that the ACA Act (sic) premiums are coming in even lower than projected by experts like the CBO?

SEBELIUS: Well, they're about, on an average, about 16 percent lower than was estimated, that those premiums would be, and that's the premium, not accounting for the number of uninsured or underinsured Americans who will then qualify for financial help. Since they don't have employer coverage, they get some help from the taxpayers paying for that coverage.

MATSUI: Thank you, Madam Secretary.

UPTON: Dr. Gingrey?

GINGREY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Madam Secretary, when you spoke at the Democratic National Convention in Charlotte last September, one of the first statements you made about the Affordable Care Act was, quote, "but for us Democrats, Obamacare is a badge of honor, because no matter who you are, what stage of life you're in, this law is a good thing. First, if you already have insurance you like, you can keep it," and I end the quote. I'd call this a red herring that misled voters, intentional or not. Now perhaps had you known that millions would lose their coverage, families would face financial disaster, as one constituent recently told me, or that the exchange rollout would be plagued by a multitude, multiple delays we've seen, you would not consider such a badge of honor.

GINGREY: The fact is, your words and those of the President as he campaigned last year, that "if you already have insurance you like, you can keep it," seemed to be directly refuted by the millions of cancellation notices already sent to Americans just in the past few weeks. Whether your statement was inaccurate, or as Mr. Hoyer said yesterday, "not precise enough," it does strike me that millions of individuals who, by listening to speeches like yours, voted, believing one thing, now find themselves without coverage and are now scrambling to find coverage in a marketplace that offers more expensive plans with fewer options.

In response to my constituents' calls for help, I created a portal on my website -- no patches or fixes needed -- that allows those who have experienced problems to reach out and tell me about their personal experiences.

In just the last few days, my office has received dozens of complaints regarding increases in their monthly premiums. I received one such notice from a mother in her early 50s who just received a notice that not only will her insurance premiums double, but she will also have to switch insurance -- insurers to keep her doctors due to the effect of the Affordable Care Act.

Can you imagine receiving notices like this? I can tell you that, just in my district, the 11th of Georgia, many more are experiencing this situation. Madam Secretary, this is akin to telling seniors that in a few weeks they're Medicare coverage will be dropped, or their premiums would double.

Now, I know that neither you nor the administration would ever advocate for such a policy. Yet, here you are subjecting those currently in the individual market to such government intervention. And I would hope that you would agree with me in recognizing that these increases are a heavy hardship on my constituents -- on all of our constituents, Republican or Democrat.

Now I'll get to my questions. You know the health care law included a hardship exemption from the individual mandate. Yet, the administration has failed to finalize the application form for the hardship exemption three and one-half years after we passed this law. As of today, can an individual apply for a hardship exemption from the individual mandate on healthcare.gov, yes or no?

SEBELIUS: I don't know.

GINGREY: I do: It's no.

On October 15th, Politico reported that if the online system for getting into Obamacare coverage is rickety, the system for getting out of the mandate doesn't even exist yet. HHS says, it will take another month at least for the administration to finalize the forms for the hardship exemption from the individual mandate.

Why has it taken three and one-half years to finalize a simple application form for an exemption from the individual mandate?

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, as you know, the individual mandate is not in place until next year. We have made it very clear that if somebody is Medicaid eligible in a state that doesn't choose...

(CROSSTALK)

GINGREY: My last question and my last second.

An estimated 16 million people in the individual market have or will receive cancellation notices stating their health insurance coverage does not meet minimum coverage requirements of the Affordable Care Act.

The bill specifically grants you, Madam Secretary, the power to determine the criteria for a hardship exemption. Will you provide all of these individuals a hardship exemption since the Affordable Care Act is taking away their plan? Will do you that?

SEBELIUS: No, sir. And I think those numbers are far from accurate: 95 percent of Americans who have health insurance will be in a continuous plan -- Medicare, Medicaid, employer-based, V.A. -- 95 percent.

Five percent who are in the individual market, a portion of those 5 percent -- a portion of them, about 12 million people -- a fraction of those 12 million will have a plan that doesn't meet the criteria and has not been grandfathered in.

They are indeed receiving notices. Many of those individuals -- half of them -- will be eligible for financial help getting a new plan and they have many more choices in the marketplace. So we will not have a blanket exemption.

GINGREY: Sounds like a hardship to me, Madam Secretary.

UPTON: The gentleman's time expired.

Ms. Christensen.

CHRISTENSEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you Madam Secretary for being here and thank you for all that you and your staff at HHS has done in implementing the Affordable Care Act to insure that it would provide the many benefits to children, to women, to Medicare beneficiaries and to ensure security to those who already have insurance as well as lower costs.

Of course, the biggest complaint has been about the application and the enrollment website, but we have heard over and over from you that those are being addressed.

But you would recall and I know my colleagues would recall that Congressman Rush and I have always been concerned about those who do not have Internet access, those who are uncomfortable using the Internet and would not use it.

So I just wanted to just remind everyone that there are other avenues for enrolling either by telephone or by paper, either alone or with the help of a certified, you know, application assistant.

But my question goes to one of the rumors that has been circulating. There many rumors about how the Affordable Care Act has affected part-time workers. And some of my colleagues on the other side claim that the companies are moving workers to part-time jobs, because of the health care reform law and that low wage workers are being detrimentally affected.

And I understand why these claims are being made as just another part of the on going effort to undermine the law. Would you take a few minutes and just set the record straight on the part-time issue?

SEBELIUS: Certainly.

Ninety-five percent of businesses in this country are small businesses; under 50 full-time employees. And there is no responsibility that any of those employers have to provide health coverage for their employees.

On the other hand, there are now tax credits available for some of the smaller employers who want to offer coverage to actually come into the marketplace.

For the other businesses, the businesses hiring 50 or more, there is a standard that says an employee is considered full-time if he or she works 30 hours a week. And that really came from a market snapshot with help from the small business administration of where employee benefits were in the private market based on hours of work.

What was a part-time or a full-time employee?

What we know about the economic data is the high point of part- time workers was in 2008 and 2009 at the height of the last recession. It has been decreasing each and every year. There is no data to support the fact that there is an up tick based on the impending Affordable Care Act. I'm sure that there may be some individual employers making some business decisions about how many workers they want full-time and how many part-time. But I can tell you there is no economic data or employment data that supports the notion that this is an effect of the law.

CHRISTENSEN: True, and in fact, it's my understanding, that part-time workers are at the lowest percentage of workers in many, many years right now.

SEBELIUS: Well, and for the first time, as you know Congresswoman, part-time workers will have options for affordable health care. They never had that before. They've never had options in the marketplace. They never had some health purchasing coverage for themselves and their families.

Their full-time colleagues have, but they have not. So they will have options.

CHRISTENSEN: And just to be clear, I had another really long question, but the last part of it -- it would be fair to say that the every point along the way you expected this website to work based on everything that you have been told by the contractors up until that point.

SEBELIUS: I expected it to work and I desperately want to get it working. I....

CHRISTENSEN: More than anyone else, I am sure.

SEBELIUS: ... can't tell you how frustrated I am, and we are committed to fixing it. The only thing that I think builds back the confidence of the public is fixing it.

CHRISTENSEN: Thank you.

UPTON: Gentlelady's time expired.

Mr. Scalise.

SCALISE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman for holding the hearing and thank you, Secretary Sebelius, for being with us.

Last week when the contractors built the system were here, I asked them all under oath if they had actually delivered the system they were contracted to build. And all four of them answered yes. I want to ask you, did the contractors deliver the system that you contracted them to build?

SEBELIUS: I don't think I can accurately answer that question. What we know is we've a system that doesn't function properly...

SCALISE: We definitely know that.

SEBELIUS: As we fix things, we'll know more about what is broken along the way. And I'll be able to...

SCALISE: So would someone in your office know -- somebody in your office oversaw this implementation and received the product. And they either said, this is the product we contracted and paid hundreds of millions of dollars to build or it wasn't.

Does somebody have the ability to get that information?

SEBELIUS: Well, I think that we can say that products tested individually, verified individually.

SCALISE: But clearly was an integrated system.

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: (OFF-MIKE) don't work well together.

SCALISE: Well, but, you know, I used to write programs for a living. I developed software products for a living.

If you're developing an integrated system, it's irrelevant if one isolated component works by itself. But when you plug it in together it doesn't work, that's a system that doesn't work.

One of the question I had and others had, somebody in your agency made a decision weeks -- literally weeks before the deployment -- to change the system. Instead of going from a browser ability where somebody just like on Kayak or just like on Amazon.com could go shop for products, look at prices before they purchase, which is how consumers are used to doing this. Y'all made the decision to change it around and gather all their information first before you could let them see prices.

Was that you who made that decision?

SEBELIUS: No, sir.

SCALISE: Was that Ms. Tavenner?

SEBELIUS: It was Ms. Tavenner and a team who looked at not imposing additional...

SCALISE: Did that team make the decision because once they knew once people actually saw the prices, and we're getting reports from all of our constituents of dramatically higher prices than what they were expecting.

Did you make the decision because you knew that when they saw the prices they might not want to buy the product so you wanted to gather their information first?

SEBELIUS: Sir, first I did not make the decision. I was informed about the decision.

We didn't...

SCALISE: Do you agree with the decision?

SEBELIUS: ... rolling off a number of features. And clearly they can see the products. No, there is no requirement to buy anything.

SCALISE: Look, I spent two hours trying to get into the system. I never once got to a point where I could see a price. I did get kicked out many times and got some of those blank screens other people got.

I do want to share stories with you from some of my constituents because I -- we started a page on our -- on Facebook and on Twitter. We are collecting what's called Share with Scalise. People are sending us stories. And we're getting lots of stories from my constituents.

I want to read you a few of them.

Randall (ph) from Mandeville (ph) said "My health care premium went up 30 percent to over $350 a month increase."

We had Michelle (ph) from Slidell (ph), "Our insurance premiums are going up $400 a month and our deductible has increased."

And then you have got Shawn (ph) from Covington (ph), who said, "My current plan through United Health Care is no longer being offered in 2014 due to Obamacare. In fact, I received a letter stating that the new health care law was indeed the reason for the removal of my current health care plan."

Madam Secretary, what you would tell Shawn (ph), who liked his plan and now has lost it? And he was promised by you and the president he'd be able to keep that plan.

What would you tell Shawn (ph) now that he has lost his plan?

SEBELIUS: I would tell Shawn (ph) to shop in the marketplace and out of the marketplace.

SCALISE: Do you really think that's acceptable answer to Shawn?

SEBELIUS: If Shawn (ph) -- again if United chose not to keep Shawn's (ph) plan in effect for Shawn (ph)...

SCALISE: Because of the law. This is the (inaudible).

SEBELIUS: Sir, the law said if you keep Shawn's (ph) plan in place, if he liked his plan, if you only...

SCALISE: But Shawn (ph) liked his plan...

SEBELIUS: ... to Shawn (ph), then the plan is still there.

SCALISE: You and I may disagree over who you work for. I work for Shawn (ph). You work for Shawn (ph), Madam Secretary. Shawn (ph) lost his plan that he liked. And there are thousands and millions of Shawns (ph) throughout this country that lost the plan they liked because some bureaucrat in Washington said we think your plan is not good enough even though you like it, even though you were promised can you keep it, you're now not able to keep that plan.

I think you deserve to give Shawn (ph) a better answer than you just have to go shop for something else even though you lost your plan.

UPTON: The gentleman's time -- the gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. McNerney?

MCNERNEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Madam Secretary for coming today.

I'm going to follow up on Mr. Doyle's line of questioning. One concern I have with the fallout from the website is that many users who tried to sign up and were discouraged because of problems will now be too discouraged to come back once the site is fixed.

So what do you plan to do to get those folks to come back?

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, we intend to invite them back formally by e-mail, by message. But we don't want to do that until we're confident that they will have a different experience.

So fixing the site is step one. And then inviting people back to the site to make it clear that when our timetable is fulfilled, they have four months to shop for affordable health coverage on a fully functioning site.

We know we're going to have to spend special time on young and healthy Americans who don't start out thinking they need insurance, aren't aware of the law, certainly don't want to use a failed or flawed site. So we're have to spend some particular attention on them.

MCNERNEY: Thank you.

Have the software specifications for the website and its related software elements, including the test specifications, has that changed since the initial rollout?

SEBELIUS: I know that there certainly are some changes because, since October 1st -- I'm sorry.

MCNERNEY: Yes, since the rollout, the specifications.

SEBELIUS: Well, we -- the specifications haven't changed. We are certainly fixing, as I say, speed and reliance is one of the issues we're taking a look at. That's the performance side.

But there also are some functionality sides that things do not work as they can, including the enrollment passed on to insurers. So we are fixing functionality. And I don't think that's a change in the specs. I think it is actually making the system work the way it should.

MCNERNEY: Well, are you -- or is the department doing a prioritization on the problems?

SEBELIUS: Yes.

MCNERNEY: Could you describe that a little bit?

SEBELIUS: Yes, as of last week when Jeff Zients joined us for this short-term project, we asked him to lead a sort of management team. We have pulled in all of our contractors as well as additional talent that they may have available.

We have talked to tech folks in and out of the private sector and insurance, some of their tech experts to get all eyes and ears, made a full assessment, developed a plan for fixes along the way, have a punch list for going after those fixes.

And we are doing a daily tech briefing and blog to tell people what we have found, what we have fixed, what's coming next, what the functionality is and we intend to do that until it's fully functional.

MCNERNEY: Well, thank you.

Madam Secretary, looking past the initial problems with the ACA rollout, do you think that the Affordable Care Act will be successful in bending the health care cost curve and reducing the fraction of our national economy that goes for health care?

SEBELIUS: Well, I think that we have already had some success. I think the goal is to continue to achieve that, a fully insured population arguably with preventative care, with an opportunity to see a primary care doctor and not go through the emergency room will in and of itself reduce costs.

Having people identified earlier who may have serious problems and managing those problems will reduce health costs. But I think the delivery system also needs some considerable help in paying for not a number of procedures, number of tests, number of prescriptions but paying for health outcomes.

MCNERNEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Mr. Latta?

LATTA: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And Madam Secretary, thanks very much for being with us today. Appreciate your testimony so far today.

What I'd like to do is I'll get these to you because there are so many we've received. These are questions that we've received from our constituents back home, specifically about what's going on with the website and for them.

And so what I'll do, I'd like to get those to you. But there is a lot of questions here and a lot of thoughts gone into a lot of these questions.

But if I could start with last week's testimony when our -- four of the contractors were here. And in one of the questions that I had posed to Ms. Campbell from CGI, in her testimony she had stated that they delivered the medicare.gov and also the federalreporting.gov.

And I'd asked at that time, were these sites more or less complicated than the site that we were talking about here today?

And she said, of course, the site today was more complicated.

And in the questioning and from her testimony -- and we've been hearing about this end-to-end testing that wasn't happening, that we had individuals out there saying that about two weeks had been done, but I had asked her about was there sufficient enough time when they did medicare.gov?

And the response that she gave me back was on medicare.gov, which was a less complicated site -- and she stated that we had sufficient time to test the system before it went live.

And I asked her in a follow-up then, what was that sufficient time?

And she said we had a number of months before the system went live at that time.

And then -- and I just want to make sure, because again, you know, sometimes things don't get reported accurately.

But in the "U.S. News and World Report" on October the 18th of this year -- and there is some questions going back and forth. And I just want to make sure that, you know, that you were quoted properly.

Said, "'After two weeks of review', the HHS secretary concluded, 'we didn't have enough testing specifically for high volumes for a very complicated project. The online insurance marketplace needed five years of construction and a year of testing,' she said. 'We had two years and almost no testing.'"

Is that correct?

SEBELIUS: I don't know the quote. I'd never suggested that we needed five years. I don't know where that is from.

(CROSSTALK)

LATTA: Well, that's one of the things we're going to check.

SEBELIUS: We clearly did not ever have five years. The law was signed in (inaudible) 2010.

LATTA: Well, let me -- and then last week you were -- when you were down in Texas you were being asked by a reporter about the system and the launch. And one of the parts of the question was that, at what point did you realize the system wasn't going to be working the way that you envisioned before the launch and why didn't we stop it before the launch?

LATTA: And, again, this is what was reported.

"We knew that if we had another six months we would probably test further. But I don't think anyone fully realized both the volume caused such problems but volumes also exposed some of the problems we had."

Now going back, though, to Ms. Campbell's statement that they tested more extensively on a system that was not as complicated, but HHS, CMS decided to go forward with only a very short period of testing. Do you think that was acceptable?

SEBELIUS: Well clearly looking back, it would have been ideal to do it differently. We had a product that frankly people have been waiting for decades to have access to affordable health care.

Medicare existed well before the website. Medicare is a program that started 50 year ago. The website was an additional feature for consumer ease and comfort. And so they were not launching Medicare. They were not delivering health benefits to seniors. They were putting together an additional way to enroll in Medicare.

I would suggest, sir, that we had deadlines in the law that people had benefits starting January 1. We wanted a extensive open enrollment period so that a lot of people who were not familiar with insurance, didn't know how to choose a doctor or choose a plan, had never been in this marketplace, or people who needed to understand fully what the law offered had ample time to do that.

So the date that I was, again, required to select for open enrollment, that's again part of the statute. How long would open enrollment be? We picked that data. All the contractors that began early in this process in the fall of 2010 when we issued -- I'm sorry, 2011 when we issued the initial contracts to CGI and QSSI knew the October 1 date. That was not changed. It wasn't added to.

As we got closer to the system, one of the reasons, again, that we pared down what needed to launch on October 1 was an attempt to minimize the risk to the system, to get people to their ability to see clearly what they were entitled to, what the plans were, and if those chose to, to enroll. Clearly the testing should have been longer, should have been more sufficient.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

LATTA: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Mr. Braley?

BRALEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Madam Secretary people who are watching this hearing might be under the assumption that there's some kind of political debate going on over the Affordable Care Act, but I think people in Iowa don't care anything about who's winning the political debate. They want these problems fixed and they want them fixed now. And I think that's the responsibility of everyone in this room to make sure that that happens.

I tried to go into the marketplace on October 7 and I encountered problems immediately dealing with the security code questions which required you to select dates. One of them was type a significant date in your life. Today is my birthday, so I put that in. I tried three different ways of entering that date and got a message each time, important, this is not a valid answer. Same thing for the third date entry.

And a lot of times when you registering online for anything and you have to put a date in, there will be a little prop there that tells you what the format is you're required to enter. Do you know, have we solved this problem in the security code area?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir. One of the initial issues was just getting people into the site and the ID proofing, which is a two-step process. One is that you give some preliminary information and you set up a password.

But the second to ensure that your personal data can't be hacked, can't be interfered with is the second step where some personalized questions which only can be verified by you are indeed part of that. Again, that was a -- an initial hold up in the system. We focused a lot of attention on that in the first several days.

It was fixed, only to then discover that there were system problems throughout the application. And that piece has been fixed, but I would suggest it also was a function of trying to make sure we had the highest security standards, that we were not cavalier about someone's personal information being able to be addressed and attached. And it -- it was a functionality that didn't perform properly but does now.

BRALEY: One of the things that keeps coming up in this hearing because you are from Kansas is references to "The Wizard of Oz." And people went to see the wizard because of the wonderful things that he did.

The Affordable Care Act is doing a lot of great things in Iowa. The Des Moines Register wrote that Iowans buying health insurance on the government's new online marketplace will face some of the lowest premiums in the country. It's increasing competition in our state. Iowa consumers are able to choose from 40 health plans in the marketplace.

You've mentioned the growth of health care spending is at the slowest rate in 50 years. Fifty thousand Iowa seniors have received prescription drug rebates. Bans on preexisting conditions are allowing people to get coverage and switch carriers, and now insurance premium increases are subject to review and can be rejected by the -- the people reviewing those plans.

But all of these good things don't mean anything unless we solve these problems. And what I need to know is how confident are you that the problems will be fixed by December 1?

SEBELIUS: Well again, Congressman, I have committed to that date because that is the assessment of both inside and outside experts have analyzed. And I think they kicked all the tires and looked at all the systems. I know that there's no confidence in that date until we deliver on the date. I'm well aware of that, and that's on me.

BRALEY: Since Americans were supposed to have six months to sign up, would you support ensuring they still have six months by extending the open enrollment period for two more months?

SEBELIUS: At this point, Congressman, they will have fully four months of fully functional all ways to sign up. And again, there are ultimate ways and the website right now that people are getting through.

The open enrollment period is extraordinarily long. It's about six times as long as a typical generous open enrollment period. And it's important for the insurance partners to know who is in their pool so again they can stay in the market next year and know who they're insuring.

So we think that the timetable will allow people four months' time to fully use the website. They can use it right now. They can use the call center. They can go to navigators. They can enroll.

UPTON: Gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Harper?

HARPER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Madam Secretary, for being here today. I'm sure there are other things you'd rather be doing, but we welcome the opportunity to have this conversation.

I'm going to ask a clerk to bring you a document for you to look at so I can ask you a couple of questions. If you can go to page eight on that, I have highlighted an item there. But this is a copy of a CGI slideshow from October 11 discussing technical issues that must be addressed within the website.

And on page eight of what I've handed you, CGI recommended that CGI and CMS have a review board to agree on which issues can technically be solved and which should politically be solved. Was such a review board convened?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I cannot tell you. I've never seen this document and I'm not aware of this recommendation.

HARPER: But CGI is responsible for the website, correct?

SEBELIUS: CGI is responsible for the application.

HARPER: For the application. Does it surprise you that in the slideshow that they gave October 11 they acknowledged political reasons for (inaudible)?

SEBELIUS: Sir, again, I've never seen this document. I have no idea what that means. Did you ask CGI when they came last week?

HARPER: Can you find out for us if such a review board was done and if any decisions were made on political reasons or any other reasons and find that out for us?

SEBELIUS: Sir, that question needs to go to CGI, but I can -- I can ask them to report to you.

HARPER: Well, if you would do that..

SEBELIUS: This is their document, if I understand it. This is not our document.

HARPER: Yes. Would you turn to page nine of that document please? And it states challenges on page nine in this presentation by CGI. And it says under challenges, unable to determine at this time whether low enrollment counts are attributable to system issues or due to users choosing not to select or enroll in a plan.

So those are two completely different issues obviously. If it is a system issue, that's something you have confidence at some point will be resolved. Correct?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

HARPER: And if it's a user selection issue, that's an entirely different story, is it not?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

HARPER: OK. Now when you used the phrase earlier about a punch list, that's -- that's like having somebody move into a house. Someone's buying a new house and they go through and they've been told this house is going to be ready for you to move in on October 1. They load up the van, they come in, and they get in and it's not finished. Part of the plumbing's not right. The wiring's wrong and -- and they go in.

This creates the situation where, you know, we -- health care shouldn't be a zero-sum game. I mean, we want to be fair to everyone. We want to -- we want to help people who are vulnerable. But at the same time, we shouldn't have to hurt folks.

HARPER: We've got people in my district, in my state who are getting notices of cancellation. They're being told of higher premiums that they're having. And these are great concerns that we have. And how do we work through that?

And I want to say I appreciate you accepting responsibility for these initial rollout failures that we've had. But who is ultimately responsible? It is the president, correct?

SEBELIUS: For the website?

HARPER: The president is ultimately responsible for the rollout, ultimately.

SEBELIUS: No, sir. We are responsible for the rollout.

HARPER: But who do you answer to?

SEBELIUS: I answer to the president.

HARPER: All right. So is the president not ultimately responsible like a company CEO would be?

SEBELIUS: Sir, he's the president of the United States. I have given him regular reports and those -- I am responsible for the implementation of the Affordable Care Act. That's what he asked me to do. That's what I'll continue to do.

HARPER: So you're saying the president is not responsible for HHS?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I didn't say that.

HARPER: OK, so the president ultimately is responsible. While I think it's great that you're a team player and taking responsibility, it is the president's ultimate responsibility, correct?

SEBELIUS: You clearly -- whatever. Yes, he is the president. He is responsible for government programs.

HARPER: My time expired.

UPTON: The gentleman's time expired.

Mr. Lujan.

LUJAN: Mr. Chairman, thank you very much. Before I begin, I'd like to ask unanimous consent to submit into the record some articles from New Mexico publications, first entitled "Small Business: Owner Health Exchange Will Save Me $1,000 A Month."

UPTON: Without objection.

LUJAN: I see my time did begin there. So I'll try to get through this, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, I was intrigued by a line of questioning by Congressman Green asking about the individual marketplace. How volatile was the individual marketplace before the Affordable Care Act became law?

SEBELIUS: I would say it wasn't a mark marketplace at all. It was unprotected, unregulated, and people were really on their own.

LUJAN: Madam Secretary, the Kaiser Family Foundation reports have over 50 percent churn out of individuals that have coverage and individual market churn out of coverage every year. They either lose coverage, they're priced out or drop it.

Is that consistent with what you're aware of?

SEBELIUS: That's an accurate snapshot. About a third of the people are in for about six months. And over half are in for a year or less.

LUJAN: So individuals that were in the individual marketplace before the passage of the Affordable Care Act did not have the same protections as those in group coverage?

SEBELIUS: That's true.

LUJAN: And would those individuals in the individual marketplace sometimes have higher co-pays?

SEBELIUS: Higher co-pays, unlimited out of pocket costs for often coverage that was medically underwritten or excluded whatever medical condition they had in the first place.

LUJAN: So these were typically one-year contracts. If they used the plan because they got sick nor a car descent or a victim of domestic violence, sometimes they would be thrown off the plans or their rates would go up?

SEBELIUS: Yes.

LUJAN: I think that's important to note, Madam Secretary. And I'm intrigued as well that my understanding is that last month HHS conducted an analysis that found that nearly six out of uninsured Americans getting coverage through the marketplace will pay $100 a month. Is that correct?

SEBELIUS: They'll have a plan available for less than $100 if that is their choice. Yes.

LUJAN: And that number would be even higher -- would be better if more states chose the option of using federal funds to expand Medicaid to cover the low income population?

SEBELIUS: Definitely. That's just a marketplace snapshot. Those are people that will be in the marketplace.

LUJAN: Madam Secretary, I don't think I heard anyone from the other side of the aisle today -- my Republican colleagues, ask you how can Congress work with you and support you in fixing this website and fixing this problem?

I hope that we all agree we want this website fixed.

I would yield to anyone that would disagree.

Seeing no one accepting that. I'm glad to hear that we agree with this.

Now Madam Secretary, what can Congress do to work with you to fix this website?

SEBELIUS: Well, I'm not sure that there is hands on work that you can do. Maybe we have some technical expertise, but I would say getting accurate information to constituents is helpful.

Letting people know that they can check out the facts in the law. That they may be entitled to some financial support.

That cancellation of policies means that the policy that they had may not exist, but they have a lot of choices of new policies and a law that now says they must be insured in a new policy.

That they don't have to be insured by their company at a higher price.

LUJAN: I appreciate that, Madam Secretary.

Going back to the individual marketplace, Madam Secretary, did this Congress in previous years before the Affordable Care Act make it illegal for health insurance companies to raise rates on someone after they submitted a claim for going to the hospital or becoming sick or getting rid of preexisting conditions?

SEBELIUS: No, sir.

LUJAN: Madam secretary, one last note here.

It seems that we've received some horrible news that there are bad actors already taking place of fraudulent web sites that imitate the health care exchange or misleading seniors into disclosing their personal information.

I've signed on to a letter to you led by my colleague Representative Raul Ruiz out of California to request that you prioritize fraud prevention efforts.

What has the administration done to prevent the fraudulent acts and protect personal information?

SEBELIUS: I can tell you, Congressman, the president felt very strongly that, that need to be part of our outreach effort, which is it why the attorney general and I convened representatives of state attorneys general, insurance commissioners, the U.S. attorneys and the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission -- which has jurisdiction -- to make sure that we first got out ahead of some of this developing consumer outreach.

No one should ever give personal health information, because personal health information is not needed for the policies any longer. That's a red flag. We want to make sure that people turn over potential fraudulent acts. We have put training in place for navigators. We have our law enforcement...

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

I would just note that we -- with the indulgence of the secretary, we're hoping that we can have all members ask some questions, but we also know that with four minutes we're going to have a little trouble.

So I'm going to ask unanimous consent that we try to limit our questions and answers to no more than two minutes.

And I talked to Mr. Waxman.

Is that okay?

Because otherwise we will -- there will be a lot of folks who will not be able to ask a question at all.

(UNKNOWN): Three of us.

SEBELIUS: And Mr. Chairman, I would submit that if the questions get submitted we would be happy to provide timely answers also.

UPTON: OK, so can I do that?

So with that we'll try two minutes.

Mr. Lance?

LANCE: I guess I won the Lottery on the two minutes, Madam Secretary.

(LAUGHTER)

UPTON: Time has expired. OK.

(LAUGHTER)

LANCE: 20 seconds, Mr. Chairman.

On the website, Madam Secretary, the contractors testified last week that they needed more than two weeks for end to end testing. Why in your opinion was there not more than two weeks?

SEBELIUS: Again, we have the products, the insurance policies themselves by companies were loaded into the system. So we could test up until then but it wasn't until September -- mid-September that that was done. Again, the contractors said we would have loved more testing time, but we think we're ready to go ahead.

LANCE: I believe that will ultimately be a dispute between CMS and HHS and the contractors and if there is anything question do regarding that because, obviously that, didn't work. And I had thought given this as the signature issue with the president that the website would be ready.

Number two, in my judgment the president's statements were overstatement overstatements. The four Pinnochios is an indication of that. There's a report in the New Jersey newspaper this is morning that 800,000 people in New Jersey who purchased their policies in individual or small employer markets will be affected by this.

Mr. Walden, in a previous question, mentioned the fact that in an individual market you would be able to keep your policy grandfathered. Yet regulations issued by HHS say that grandfathered status would not be a continued for so much as a $5 change in a co-pay.

Is that accurate?

Do you believe that that is a significant change?

SEBELIUS: Sir, we gave, I think in, the grandfather regulations a guide for how pricing could change, medical inflation and I think it was in most cases plus 15 percent.

There were some individual consumer outfacing issues that were more rigid than that, but I would say that in terms of having companies being able to collect a profit margin, that was certainly built into the grandfather status.

LANCE: I think that's too little a change, respectfully.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Tonko?

TONKO: Thank you, Mr. Chair.

TONKO: And welcome, Honorable Secretary. Thank you for fielding our questions and for responding when you were extended the courtesy to offer a response.

As a strong supporter of the Affordable Care Act, I'm frustrated and I think it's fair to say the American people are frustrated as well. And I heard you here many times this morning say you're frustrated.

I think, by and large, people want this law to work. When I talk to folks back home in the capital region of New York that I represent, even people who opposed the law initially aren't rooting for the failure of the Affordable Care Act. Instead, they want Congress to come together to fix these problems so that we can move on to real issues that matter like creating jobs and growing the economy.

My home state of New York, which also experienced Web site problems at the outset, has now completed enrollment determinations on over 150,000 New Yorkers, with more than 31,000 having already signed up for quality low-cost health insurance.

Given that many states have had success in overcoming these initial Web site issues, has HHS looked at what these state Web sites are doing as it searches for solutions to fix Healthcare.gov?

SEBELIUS: Absolutely. And we shared a lot of the information going in. I think that the hub feature that we have in our Web site that all states are using, including the state of New York, is fully functional. And that's good news for New York and California and others who are running their own state Web sites.

But we are learning from them. We've shared information with them. And we are eager for all the help and assistance moving forward.

TONKO: Thank you. Similarly, many states made the illogical choice of rejecting Medicaid expansion contained in the ACA that would help some of their poorest citizens get access to the health care situation.

This is despite the fact that Medicaid expansion is almost entirely financed by federal dollars. Can you comment broadly on HHS's plan in the future to encourage more states to run their own marketplaces and expand Medicaid so that the law can function as designed?

SEBELIUS: Well, absolutely. Most recently last week the state of Ohio did move into the Medicaid market. And we now have 30 governors, I think 27 states have fully completed the process, another three are in the process.

Republicans and Democrats, who -- some of whom sued us about the constitutionality of the act who are now deciding that for the citizens of their state they want to be part of the expanded Medicaid.

And we will continue to have those conversations. It's not just about the marketplace. It's also about Medicaid.

TONKO: Thank you very much.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

Dr. Cassidy?

CASSIDY: You said that only if -- an individual policy is only canceled if it changes significantly. But to be clear, after May 2010 if co-insurance went up by any amount, even by a dollar, according to your regulations, that would not qualify as a grandfathered clause. Just to add that out there for the record. I gather even by a dollar.

That said, I get a letter from someone in my district, Adrienne (ph). She says that -- oh, she lost her coverage. She lost her coverage because spousal coverage is gone. She has gone on the exchange. She doesn't qualify for a subsidy, but that her premium and out-of-pocket costs under any plan is $10,000 a year.

She feels -- she writes this. She feels betrayed by her government. Now she has to sit there asking herself, is this fair? If you were she, do you think that this would be fair?

SEBELIUS: Dr. Cassidy, I want to start by the amount that you gave is not accurate. I was told $5, not $1.

CASSIDY: Yes, that's for the co-pay, not for the co-insurance. For the co-insurance, it's any amount. But I have limited time. Do you think that it's fair -- if you were she, if you were Adrienne, do you think is fair? Loses her spousal coverage, now it's 10k, no subsidies?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I don't have any idea what she's looking at. I can tell you that, again, based on what we've seen in the market and what we've seen in the plans, people will be getting full insurance for the first time at...

(CROSSTALK)

CASSIDY: Well, again, this is what she reports. Do you think it's fair -- if what she reports is true, do you think it's fair?

SEBELIUS: I can't answer fair or not fair. I don't know what she was paying or what she was paying for.

CASSIDY: That's OK. Let's move on.

SEBELIUS: Did she have full insurance?

CASSIDY: Richard writes that his daughter received a note that his premium is going up because she's being lumped with older, costlier patients. Now it's possible that the only people that sign up will be those who are more costly. Does HHS have plans on what to do if only those who are more costly sign up and premiums rise for everybody?

SEBELIUS: I think, sir, that's what we're trying to do to make sure that...

(CROSSTALK)

CASSIDY: But if only the costly sign up, do you have plans? If you accept that...

SEBELIUS: That's the importance of the individual mandate that you've just outlined. Getting rid of pre-existing conditions, making sure that people can come in...

CASSIDY: But if only the most costly sign up, do you have backup plans?

SEBELIUS: We will encourage others to sign up. It's why there is a penalty in place and why...

CASSIDY: Is this to assume that there are no backup plans? I don't mean to be rude, but...

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Yarmuth.

YARMUTH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, nice to see you. I come to this hearing with a little bit different perspective. Kentucky is doing a great job with our exchange. As of this morning we had 350,000 people who have explored the Web site, 59,000 have started applications, 31,000 are now fully enrolled in new coverage, and 5,000 just in the last week.

And I think very importantly, more than 400 businesses have begun applying for their employees as well. So, yes, the idea that somehow this is going to be bad for businesses is not borne out in Kentucky.

Would it be safe to say that if 36 states had done what Kentucky and New York and California have done instead of 14 that the rollout would have been much smoother and the Web site would have been much easier to construct?

SEBELIUS: Well, I don't think there's any question that the -- you know, in January of 2013 we knew how many states were not running their own Web site, in I think mid-February we learned about partnerships. So it was not until that point that we learned that 36 states would actually be coming through the Web site.

Having said that, we should have anticipated, we should have planned better. We should have tested better. I don't think that's any excuse, but we clearly are running a very different vehicle for enrollment than we thought we were going to run in March of 2010.

YARMUTH: Right. On the subject of cancellation of policies, isn't it true that, first of all, the federal government can't require insurance companies to sell insurance?

SEBELIUS: That they can't...

YARMUTH: The federal government can't require insurance companies to sell insurance?

SEBELIUS: Yes, that's true.

YARMUTH: And in fact, insurance companies all over the country are making very difficult decisions now about where they want to participate and where they don't. And in some markets they're actually trying to get out of the market, canceling people because they want to play in other markets and so forth.

They're all making the decisions now...

SEBELIUS: Well, and we know we have more insurers, 25 percent more insurers in the individual market than we did prior to the law being passed.

YARMUTH: Right. So there a lot of dynamics going on here that are not necessarily an indication that the president misled anybody. They're business decisions being made all over now.

SEBELIUS: Well, in cancellation of policies, again, that one- year contract notice is a routine in the individual market. It has been in place for years. And for a lot of people, their policies now -- they are being canceled because they're being notified you can no longer be medically underwritten.

We can't charge you more because you're a woman. We won't ever have the kind of limitation on what your policy can pay out or charge you exorbitant out of pocket rates. Those policies will cease to be offered in the marketplace.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Guthrie?

GUTHRIE: Thank you, Madam Secretary, for being here. And last week Mr. Lau from Serco was here. I know the president has talked about the alternatives to the Web site as phone-calling or using a paper application.

And what he said, and I think you've said it with the phone, they take the paper applications but they enter them into the same Web portal. So I know you get around the issue of getting on and getting logged off.

But also -- but there's still issues with data within the Web portal. As you said, you can't even get reliable data who is even signed up.

So he also said because of the surge in paper applications, it's like six to eight weeks to process. So if November 30th is when this will be ready, that they can use, and even if you do it now, eight weeks you're getting close to January 1st, and somebody does lose their insurance so they're signing up for this, and they get to January 1st, even though you have a March 31st open enrollment, what happens to these? Is there a contingency plan for these people to continue their insurance?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I think that we have improvements every day on the speed of the site. Serco was giving you early snapshots of difficulty of accessing the site. I think that's greatly improved.

GUTHRIE: Well, they said just processing the paper, actually.

SEBELIUS: Well, I understand. But it is the site for -- they put the application into the site and get a determination. That's part of what the process is. So the site is part of the portal all the way through. This is an integrated insurance vehicle. And so that will improve.

And we -- again, with four months of continuous service, which is far longer than most people had, some of these cancellation numbers, Mr. Garrity (ph), again, pointed this out from Florida Blue Cross, but it's true of everyone else, these are not January 1st numbers. They are year-long numbers.

So over the course of 2014 when an individual's policy is due to expire, that individual...

(CROSSTALK)

GUTHRIE: ... but somebody could expire January 1st and not be able to get coverage if the Web site -- and the vendor said they needed months to test. They would have liked to have months and months to test. That's what they said.

So if we're going to get to November -- even if it works November 30th...

SEBELIUS: Well, I would say we're testing as we go. There is beta testing going on right now. That's why we are fixing and how we can identify things. People are getting through every day and we now know a lot more than we...

(CROSSTALK)

GUTHRIE: ... but the paper process, if it does take even four weeks, then it's November 30th and people's cancel on January 1st, there needs to be a contingency for that person.

SEBELIUS: Well, again, typical insurance is two to four weeks of signup. They will have two full months of signup.

UPTON: Gentleman's time has expired.

Ms. Schakowsky?

SCHAKOWSKY: Thank you, Madam Secretary, for bringing to millions of Americans access to affordable, comprehensive health care coverage that's going to be there when they need it.

I want to thank you especially as a woman. Women can no longer -- being a woman can no longer be considered being a preexisting condition. Women can no longer be charged more than a man for the same coverage. Women have access to comprehensive benefits like prescription drugs and free preventive screenings and free contraceptive coverage and maternity care, which is often left out of coverage. And the days of complicated pregnancy or diabetes or domestic violence being a preexisting condition, those days are over.

You know, I want to say to my colleagues after a three-and-a-half year campaign to repeal, to discredit, to even shut down the government over Obamacare, I want to say, get over it.

We all agree that there are problems but these are problems that I see being fixed. And so I want to ask one -- oh, and I want to say that what we did under Medicare Part D can be an example of how we can work together.

And in fact, Chairman Upton and I both sent a letter asking for more money for community based groups to help implement the program and make it work. We can work together.

So if you could just briefly say how are the navigators -- how important are they in making this system work for the American people?

SEBELIUS: Well, what we know, Congresswoman, is that a lot of people are not web savvy and are not frustrated by the website because they don't have a computer. They don't want to use a computer, they don't trust a computer. They need a live human being to ask questions, get questions answered, talk about the plan, talk about insurance.

So the navigators play a hugely important role. We have about 2,500 trained navigators on the ground right now. We have thousands more community assisters who are trained and ready to go, about 45,000 agents and brokers have gone through specific Affordable Care Act training.

But those individuals, working with their clients, customers and in the case of navigators and community assisters, just the public at large, they are not paid by a company. They are not collecting a fee. They just want to help people get coverage; they are hugely important.

UPTON: Gentlelady's time -- Mr. Olson.

OLSON: I thank the chair.

And welcome, Madam Secretary.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you.

OLSON: I would like to open with a quote from an American icon -- I'll hold up a poster. It says, "If the user is having a problem, it's our problem."

I'm glad to hear you raised this philosophy during your testimony today, ma'am.

Obamacare was signed into law 1,256 days ago. And since then, there's been user problem after user problem after user problem.

Regarding healthcare.gov, your deputy administrator for consumer information, Gary Cohen, testified one month ago, where we are sitting, that -- and this I quote, "CMS has worked hard to test the infrastructure that will allow Americans to enroll in coverage confidently and simply and securely," end quote.

Yet according to "Forbes" and "The Wall Street Journal," you told them that you needed five years of construction and one year of testing. The program has crashed and burned at least three times and the user is still having problems.

(Inaudible) up here, ma'am?

It's been down the whole time you've been testifying. The system is down at this moment. My question, ma'am, is very simple.

When did you know these changes were going down? A month, a day, a quarter?

And did you tell the president what you knew?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I was informed that we were ready to launch on October 1st. The contractors, who we had as our private partners told us and told this committee that they had never suggested the delay, and that is accurate. Our CMS team felt we were ready to go.

I told the president that we were ready to go.

Clearly I was wrong. We were wrong. I -- we knew that in any big, new, complicated system, there would be problems; no one ever imagined the volume of issues and problems that we've had. And we must fix it.

OLSON: Yes, ma'am. But credible journalists said you knew you needed six years to get this program...

SEBELIUS: Sir, I -- that quote has been repeated. I can guarantee you I would have never stated that because the law was passed in March of 2010. I chose the open enrollment date. I don't know where that quote comes from, but that is not from me.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

Mr. Barrow?

BARROW: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thanks for attending today, Madam Secretary. I suspect that deep down most people on this committee support the concept of reforming insurance market so that more people have access to better insurance coverage. We have disagreements about the means used to get to those ends which is ultimately why I voted against the Affordable Care Act.

It seems that every day we're hearing of something new going wrong. I'm concerned that these short-term enrollment problems could become long-term insurance market problems. My constituents already losing confidence the federal government's ability to pull this thing off and I think the only way to begin to restore their trust is to delay the individual mandate penalties until we're sure the system is going to work. It's not fair to penalize consumers when their non-compliance is not their fault. We also need to take the time to make sure additional fits and starts won't cause larger problems. Right now I'm less concerned about who's to blame and more concerned about what went wrong and how to fix it and how we're going to ensure it doesn't happen again.

Nearly all of our constituents want and need health insurance. It would be a huge mistake if we're so blinded by our love or our hatred for Obamacare that we miss the opportunities to address its flaws.

Now to the subject of technical problems becoming market problems, can problems of folks getting into the system snowball into risk pool problems where those who choose not to enroll can actually affect the costs of those who do choose to enroll?

SEBELIUS: Certainly a risk pool needs a balanced market. So you need people who are older and sicker to be balanced with people who are younger and healthier, that's how a pool works.

BARROW: At what point are we going to see a problem having the risk pool if the tech problems cause -- affect the folks who are entering?

What are we going to look for? What are we going to use to decide something needs to be done?

SEBELIUS: Well, again, sir, we will be monitoring during the six months of open enrollment as will our insurance partners who is coming into the pool; that's why we want to give this committee and others reliable, informed data about not only who it is but what the demographics are and where they live. That's part of our...

BARROW: If things aren't better by the end of this next month, at what point are we going to start thinking about further delays in posing penalties?

SEBELIUS: Well, again, I think that having a defined open enrollment period is one of the ways that you then make an assessment if you have a pool that works or not. You cannot have an unlimited open enrollment period with any insurance company because that really doesn't work.

BARROW: Thank you.

UPTON: Mr. McKinley.

MCKINLEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Last week -- last week the CGI representative at Campbell said that she had met her contract obligations and met specifications and she said the only problem she had was with pace. But the pace wasn't part of the specification.

Do you -- and we asked her, what you were -- you would testify to, did -- she said you would testify that she did complete her contract in accordance with the specifications.

Would you?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I don't think until the product is working the way it's designed to work that anybody has finished their job. And that's really my interest.

MCKINLEY: I'm so sorry, with time, you know, they've shortened our time with it.

So, if she hasn't met -- she hasn't met their specifications but yet we're still using her, so is the American taxpayer still paying the money to fix the problems that she didn't do -- her company didn't do in the first...

SEBELIUS: None of our contractors have been paid the amount...

MCKINLEY: Will she be paid for this work into the future as we go to correct this problem?

SEBELIUS: We will make that determination as the work goes forward. I would tell you sir that as we learn what needs to be fixed, how long it takes, we'll know more about...

(CROSSTALK)

MCKINLEY: I'm very sorry about the timeframe, but cut it down.

Who owns the software now, that now that we've -- this has been developed with taxpayer money to develop the software to do this...

SEBELIUS: It is owned by the Centers for Medicaid and Medicare Services.

MCKINLEY: So it's all owned by us? OK.

Will they be able to use it by a license with -- for other clients?

SEBELIUS: Not to my knowledge. I think it is...

MCKINLEY: Maybe (inaudible)...

SEBELIUS: ... specifically designed for the marketplace with these products in mind.

MCKINLEY: Then last questions are trying to...

SEBELIUS: And the clients are the American public.

MCKINLEY: ... that under IV and V, and she testified that she thought that was something we should have done. Under HHS, you recommend or the HHS recommends that for software development, that they should have an independent verification and validation program.

But it wasn't used in this case.

Can you share with us in the time that's gone why we didn't use IV and V on something as crucial...

SEBELIUS: Again, I don't think that's accurate, sir. At every point along the way there is independent testing.

MCKINLEY: Independent?

SEBELIUS: Yes and outside...

MCKINLEY: You recommended verification and validation not someone within your staff?

SEBELIUS: Pardon me? There is a level of company self-attested testing. There is a level of CMS testing and then there is an independent test on each piece of the contracting.

(CROSSTALK)

MCKINLEY: (OFF-MIKE) acknowledged that it wasn't done independently, and that's what the...

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Gentleman's time...

MCKINLEY: It needs to be done independently, people who do not have...

UPTON: ... has expired.

SEBELIUS: No, it -- I'll get you the information, but there are three levels of testing, one of them is independent for every piece of this contracting, yes.

UPTON: Ms. Castor.

CASTOR: Good morning.

When open enrollment began a few weeks ago the people back home in Florida who are helping neighbors sort through the new options for coverage, the navigators, were taken aback by how grateful people are to have new pathway to the doctor's office and the care they need.

Affordable options.

The -- they are no longer being discriminated against because they had cancer, and diabetes or asthma. They are very grateful. They said -- they said to me directly, it's like they found water in the desert.

Right now they are surprisingly -- they said it's taking time, because people want to sort through all of these options before they finally sign up at the end of the 26-week enrollment period. So we must fix the marketplace. We must to meet their expectations and we have high expectations for you and the administration.

But I think it's important to point out the Affordable Care Act is more than just a website. It -- despite all the obstruction by Republicans in my home state of Florida, nationally, the -- even going so far as to shut down the government, millions of Americans are already benefiting and there are benefits that are not tied to healthcare.gov.

Some Madam Secretary, let's clarify what's working despite healthcare.gov.

Is it correct to say many of the improvements that the ACA makes to employer coverage and Medicare were the vast majority of Americans receive their coverage are not dependent on healthcare.gov.

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

CASTOR: And -- so the delays and problems with healthcare.gov do not affect the millions of individuals thanks to the ACA who no longer have to worry about lifetime monetary caps on their coverage that previously sent them to bankruptcy?

SEBELIUS: That's absolutely true. And I think the quote that the president was quoted recently saying, "If you have health care, you can -- you don't have to sign up for the new marketplace," was referring to the large portion -- the 95 percent of insured Americans who plans are solid and stay in place and move forward.

CASTOR: And I understand the frustration with the website. What I don't know why people are not similarly outraged by the lack of Medicaid coverage in many of our states.

Do you find that hypocritical?

(LAUGHTER)

SEBELIUS: Well, I think it's very troubling that millions of low income working Americans will still have no affordable option if states don't take advantage of the expansion program leaving states bearing the cost of uncompensated care, families bearing the cost of parents who can't take care of their kids, workers not able to go to work and people still accessing care through emergency room doors, the most expensive, least effective kind of care they could get.

UPTON: Gentlelady's time has expired.

Mr. Gardner?

GARDNER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you, Secretary Sebelius, for being here. Here's my letter. This is the letter my family got canceling our insurance. We chose to have our own private policy back in Colorado so we could be in the same boat as everyone of my constituents. And yet my insurance policy has been canceled. The White House website says if you like your health plan you have, you can keep it.

Did I hear it wrong?

SEBELIUS: Again, sir, I don't know how long you've had your policy...

GARDNER: Why aren't you losing your insurance?

SEBELIUS: Pardon me?

GARDNER: Why aren't you losing your health insurance?

SEBELIUS: Because I'm part of the federal employees...

GARDNER: Why aren't you in the exchange? You're in charge of this law, correct, why aren't you in the exchange?

SEBELIUS: Because I'm part of the federal employee health benefit plan.

GARDNER: Why aren't you in the -- why won't you go into the exchange? You're a part of this law. You're literally in charge of this law. Should you be any different than all of the other Americans out there losing their health insurance?

SEBELIUS: I'm part of the 95 percent with affordable available health care coverage.

GARDNER: You're part of a plan that most Americans aren't (sic) available to them. Why will you not agree...

SEBELIUS: I'm not eligible for the exchange, because I have coverage in...

GARDNER: You can decide to drop your coverage of your employer. You have the choice to decide not to choose...

SEBELIUS: That the not true, sir.

GARDNER: I chose not to go...

SEBELIUS: Members of Congress are now part of the exchange thanks to an amendment that was added by Congress, but I'm not eligible.

GARDNER: Madam Secretary, with all due respect...

SEBELIUS: If I have affordable coverage in my workplace, I'm not eligible to go into the marketplace, that's part of the law.

GARDNER: Madam Secretary, I would encourage you to be just like the American people and enter the exchange and agree to find a way...

(APPLAUSE)

SEBELIUS: It's illegal.

GARDNER: .. and I would like to show you an advertisement that's going on in Colorado right now.

This is an advertisement that a board member of the Colorado exchange has put forward, do you agree with this kind of advertising for Obamacare?

SEBELIUS: I can't see it. And again...

GARDNER: It's a college student doing a keg stand.

SEBELIUS: If the Colorado exchange did that...

GARDNER: Do you approve of this kind of advertising?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: ... they are a state based marketplace.

GARDNER: Do you approve of this kind of advertising?

SEBELIUS: I don't see it. I don't know what it is, and I did not approve it. This is a state based marketplace...

GARDNER: That's a pretty big font. That's a pretty big picture of a keg and you can't see it?

SEBELIUS: Do I approve of it? I've...

GARDNER: You have the ability to opt out, by the way, as a federal employee. You could take the insurance. So I just...

SEBELIUS: If I have available employer based coverage...

GARDNER: I would also like to submit a waiver for my district from Obamacare and hope you consider waiving Obamacare for the Fourth Congressional District.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

(UNKNOWN): Does your policy cover -- never mind.

(LAUGHTER)

UPTON: Mr. Matheson?

MATHESON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And, Madam Secretary, thanks for your time.

I just want to ask on the issue of the fixes to healthcare.gov, we've had a lot of conversation about that today and we've talked about confidence levels for being ready by a certain time. But, I think one question that a lot of us have is, can you define what the magnitude of the problem is? Is there a scale or metric by which we can understand how bad this is today, and how we're going to get to where we go to have it fixed?

SEBELIUS: Well, again, sir, I've been informed that the problems are in -- the reports I've seen are really in two areas.

They are in the performance area, which is speed and reliability. It's too slow and doesn't have reliable transfers and in functionality, there are parts of the system that don't make accurate transfers.

So we have done an extensive assessment. They are prioritized, as I indicated earlier. One of the priorities is the enrollment features, which pass individual information to the companies where they want to enroll. That is not reliable at this point. The companies are not getting accurate data. So it's an example of the kind of thing we know we need to fix.

MATHESON: And is there a way to -- if you set up metrics figure out if we're making progress in terms of fixing those issues with speed and performance and functionality.

SEBELIUS: Again, with the team and Jeff Zients at the head of it, reporting to Marilyn, there are definitely a comprehensive set of issues going forward that will be measured and accelerated.

MATHESON: Do you have target dates along the way if you want to meet the November 30th time -- assume it's functional of what you want -- do you have target or metrics along the way to make sure you're on the path?

SEBELIUS: My understanding is, yes, there are sort of groups of targets that fixes that can be loaded together. It isn't one at a time. So they don't take days, but they are try being to determine with a specific path, one of the charges that QSSI has, really looking at the umbrella of what needs to be fixed, prioritizing them, figuring out what destabilizes if something else is fixed, how they can be grouped together. And that report will be in later next week.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

Mr. Pompeo?

POMPEO: Great, thank you.

Thank you for coming, Secretary Sebelius.

I would like to talk about Kansas a little bit today.

Much like with some of my colleagues have made references to the "Wizard of Oz", I don't think anybody not from Kansas should be able to do Oz allegories. But, my story -- the way I think about it, is those folks worked awful hard to go down the yellow brick road. At the end of the day, when they got there and pulled back the curtain, they found there was nothing they didn't already have.

And as we pull back the curtain on the Affordable Care Act, I think people are finding it's not exactly what they're gonna have worked so hard to find their way too as well.

I want to talk about two stories. There's this commitment, if you like your plan you can keep it. I have a letter I'll submit for the record, from Mr. Breeto (ph) in Kansas. You might know him. I saw him the other night in Benton.

He got the following letter from Blue Cross Blue Shield that says, "Because your current plan does not offer the benefits standard specified you'll be discontinued on December 31st," and this says good news. And then there's a group of folks, Pizza Hut -- you know the company from Kansas, franchisees founded there -- lots of folks have now taken employees, families who are working there, and they've gone from having full-time jobs to part-time jobs. So they aren't able to keep the health care plan they had either and the one they wanted.

POMPEO: What do you tell -- why -- why were the plans that these folks had good enough when you were the insurance commissioner in Kansas and when you were -- Kansas as governor, but those plans today aren't good enough for those hard-working Kansas families?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I would tell you, in the roles I had the honor of serving of in Kansas, I worked every day to try and eliminate some of the discriminatory features of the insurance industry that finally, with the Affordable Care Act, are gone. My successor and elected insurance Republican commissioner Sandy Praeger and I worked on a whole series of plans to expand coverage.

So I did work on these issues. We were not able to necessarily...

(CROSSTALK)

POMPEO: So you -- you -- to use your words, you say these were -- I think you said "lousy" plans. And Ms. Tavenner said "not true insurance." Do you think that the plans that were offered when you were the insurance commissioner weren't true insurance?

SEBELIUS: In the individual market, the insurance commissioner in Kansas and virtually every place in the country does not have regulatory authority...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: ... over the plan. There's a lot...

(CROSSTALK)

POMPEO: ... a yes-or-no question: Were they true insurance plans when you were the insurance commissioner?

SEBELIUS: A lot of them are not true insurance plans, no.

POMPEO: Thank you. I yield back.

UPTON: Gentleman from Vermont, Mr. Welch.

WELCH: Thank you.

I'm gonna try to just summarize quickly what I've been hearing. Number one, the website must be fixed. You've been very forthright, and you're gonna fix it.

Number two, I'm hearing a tone change. We've had a real battle about health care. We had a battle in this Congress. It was passed. The president signed it. The Supreme Court affirmed it -- a really brutal battle. There was an election where the American people affirmed it. And then the last-gasp effort was the shutdown and the threat of debt default.

But what I'm hearing today is that there are problems and people want to fix 'em because all of us represent people who are gonna win or lose depending on how effectively this is rolled out.

Third, there's some significant question about existing insurance policies, what the president said and so on. But let's acknowledge something: A lot of insurance companies were ripping off innocent American people by promising them insurance until they got sick, and then it got canceled because they, quote, "had a pre-existing condition," that wasn't, quote, "disclosed." That's gotta end.

The challenge for us going forward is to make health care affordable.

So Madam Secretary, my question is, is there any indication that there's been a slowing of premium increases as a result of the Affordable Care Act? Because unless we can keep those premium increases down -- they can't rise faster than the rate of inflation, wages and profits -- all of us are gonna lose.

SEBELIUS: Well, I would say, the trends in the private market over the last three and a half years are that cost increases have slowed down, are rising at a lower rate than the decades before. And in fact, in this individual market, the old individual market, the typical increase was 16 percent year in and year out rate increase. And often that came with additional medical underwriting. So it gives a sense of how the costs were.

We know that Medicare costs are down. We know that Medicaid costs actually had a decrease per capita last year, not an increase per capita, and underlying health care costs are down.

These rates in the new marketplace have come in about 16 percent lower on average than was projected -- not by us but by the Congressional Budget Office.

And we know that in many of these markets, they're much more competitive. I believe in market competitiveness. That actually drives down rates. The states where the most companies are participating have the lowest rates. And new companies have come in significantly below the old monopoly companies that often dominated this individual marketplace.

So we're on a pathway. Are we there? No. But you're absolutely right, affordable coverage, at the end of the day, for everybody is the goal.

WELCH: OK. I yield back.

Thank you, Madam Secretary.

UPTON: Madam Secretary, I'm trying to make sure that you're out of here by 12:30 before we start the second round of questions.

(LAUGHTER)

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Mr. Kinzinger?

SEBELIUS: That was a joke, right?

(LAUGHTER)

KINZINGER: I see -- I see sheer panic.

Madam Secretary, thank you for being here.

You stated earlier to Mr. Harper that you give the president regular updates on the marketplace. The president stated that he knew nothing about the status and functionality of the marketplace. How often, and what were the subjects of those updates?

SEBELIUS: Well, I think there were a series of regular meetings with the president, with some of our federal partners, with offices of the White House from the OMB to others on a monthly basis giving reports on policy and where we were going. None of those, I would say, involved (ph) detailed operational discussions. That wasn't the level. It was, are we coming together, do we have companies...

KINZINGER: Sure.

SEBELIUS: ... do we have plans.

KINZINGER: And I understand that. I mean, obviously, when it comes to the president of the United States, certain level of details you have to see at kind of a 10,000 foot, 20,000 foot overview. But in terms of the actual functionality, whether it's the website or the marketplace, he was legitimately caught off guard on October...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Well, I assured him, and -- that we were ready to go. Everyone knew with a big plan that there were likely to be some problems. No one...

KINZINGER: OK.

SEBELIUS: ... anticipated this level of problem (ph).

KINZINGER: And just second -- a quick question. Where is HHS getting the money to pay for these fixes? Is it coming from other HHS accounts? Have you used your transfer authority to move money from non-ACA programs to pay for the cost of implementing the president's health care program? And if so, from which programs have you drawn money to help with the fix that's not ACA-related?

SEBELIUS: Well, as you know, Congressman, it's been two years since we've had a budget at HHS. And we also have not had at the president's requested implementation budget authorized by the Congress. Each of those years we have used not only resources internally but I do have legal transfer authority that I've used and a non-recurring expense fund. We will get you all the details of that...

(CROSSTALK)

KINZINGER: Great. Thank you. So the answer is yes, though, there is some non-ACA money being transferred and used for the implementation of...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: There is money that is specifically designed for either outreach and education, so the health centers have hired education and outreach people as part of their outreach for health personnel. I would say it's -- it's definitely a related cause to get expanded health care.

KINZINGER: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Mr. Sarbanes?

SARBANES: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Madam Secretary, for being here.

My understanding is that a lot of the -- the companies, insurers that have been offering plans in the individual market, the ones who are sending out these notices, are actually repositioning themselves in the health insurance exchange to offer alternative plans. Is that correct?

SEBELIUS: Yes.

SARBANES: And in addition to -- to those insurers who've been in the individual market (inaudible) have a lot of other companies and insurers providing plans in the health insurance market?

SEBELIUS: That is true.

SARBANES: So the way I look at this is -- you know, I went to buy Oriole tickets awhile back when the season was still under way, and I was standing in line. And I got up to the ticket window and they closed the window. But I didn't have to go home because they opened another window a few feet away.

So essentially what's happening is people are coming up on the renewal period. They're getting up to the window of the individual market. They're being told, well, that window's closed but if you go right down the line here there's another window that's open. And by the way, when you get there, you'll get better coverage potentially at reduced premiums. And if you go down to window 3 there's some subsidies that may also be available to you.

So this notion that people are being turned away from an affordable product that provides good, quality care is preposterous. And in fact they're being steered to a place where they can get good, quality coverage, in many instances much better than the coverage that they had before, at an affordable rate that is supported by the subsidies that can be available to many, many people. This is -- this is what's so promising about the Affordable Care Act.

And so I think it's important for people to understand that that window's not being shut. They're just being steered someplace else where they can get a good opportunity.

SEBELIUS: And I think the first option for those companies is to say, 'We'd like to keep you here, and here are the plans we're offering.' But to be fair, customers will now have an opportunity to look across a landscape, which they couldn't before. They will have entry into those other windows, which many of them didn't have before with a pre-existing condition.

And as you say, about 50 percent of this market will have financial help in purchasing health insurance, which none of them had before.

UPTON: Gentleman's time expired.

Mr. Griffith?

GRIFFITH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Earlier in your testimony here today you said a couple times, "plans we enjoy but then," as you noticed with Mr. Gardner's eloquent testimony, that we're not going to be in the same plan that you're in after January 1.

I was one of those who thought it was a good idea as a part of a proposal that was floating around the halls here in Congress that the president and Cabinet secretaries ought to also be in the marketplace and not have a special federal plan that -- that you will have after January 1, but we will not. The president, while that was being discussed, issued a veto threat.

Did you discuss the veto threat with the president before he made it? And have you discussed it with him since then? Yes or no on the first?

SEBELIUS: No, sir.

GRIFFITH: No.

And then I would have to ask you, relating back to the contractors involved in this, CGI told us that the Spanish Web site was ready to go, that they thought everything was ready, just as they did with the regular site. And, obviously, that didn't prove out. But that they were told not to implement it.

Likewise, the shop-and-browse section was ready to go.

Do you think that they were misleading this committee when they made those comments?

SEBELIUS: I think what they believed is that that product independent of the entire operational site was ready and tested. What -- a determination was made -- I was involved with the Spanish Web site and the Medicaid transfers to say, let's minimize the risk for the whole site, let's load a week later.

GRIFFITH: But that raises the next question up, because one of the -- of the other contractors, QSSI, I believe it was, indicated to us that -- that part of the problem was that, once you took away the ability to browse, everybody had to go through the business of setting up an account, and you stopped -- or CMS stopped one of the browsing options as well, and that that actually contributed to the logjam and contributed to the problems.

So, isn't it -- is he correct on that, that not allowing people just to look without having to sign up, wouldn't that have made it easier for the American people?

SEBELIUS: In hindsight, I think that probably would have been advantageous, I can tell you that the reason the decision was made going forward was to minimize risk, that didn't work so well.

But adding additional features that didn't involve people actually wanting to get to what they would independently pay and what they would qualify for and what the plans were, seemed to be things that could be added down the road. It was wrong.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Bilirakis?

BILIRAKIS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate it very much,

Thank you, Madam Secretary, for testifying today.

Madam Secretary, over the weekend, the New York Times wrote the following, "Project managers at the Department of Health and Human Services assured the White House that any remaining problems could be worked out once the Web site went live. But other senior officials predicted serious trouble and advised delaying the rollout."

Can you confirm if this is true? Did any senior department official predict serious problems? And did any senior department officials advise delaying the rollout of the exchanges or parts of the exchanges on October 1st? Could you...

SEBELIUS: I can tell you that no senior official reporting to me ever advised me that we should delay. You heard from the contractors on the 24th that none of them advised a delay. We have testing that did not advise a delay. So not -- not to my knowledge.

BILIRAKIS: Did they indicate to you that there were serious problems?

SEBELIUS: They indicated to me that we would always have risks, because this system is brand-new and no one has operated a system like this before to any degree.

So, we always knew that there would be the possibility that some things would go wrong. No one indicated that this could possibly go this wrong.

BILIRAKIS: Can you name some of these officials that gave you the advice, that there were serious problems?

SEBELIUS: Again, I -- we had series of meetings with teams from CMS. I was always advised that there is always a risk with a new product and a new site, but never suggested that we delay the launch of October 1st, nor did our contracting partners ever suggest that to us.

BILIRAKIS: Thank you, Madam Secretary.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Appreciate it. I yield back.

UPTON: Mr. Johnson?

JOHNSON: Madam Secretary, thank you for being here with us today. CMS was the integrator of the Web site prior to and leading up to the 1 October rollout...

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

JOHNSON: Correct?

You've testified you've now hired an outside company to serve as the integrator...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: One of the contractors has taken on an additional role...

JOHNSON: Who is that company?

SEBELIUS: QSSI.

JOHNSON: QSSI.

SEBELIUS: Who built the hub.

JOHNSON: OK.

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

JOHNSON: This is the same company that told our committee last week that they were not only the developer of the hub and the pipeline, but also an independent tester of the system.

SEBELIUS: Yes.

JOHNSON: You've acknowledged in your testimony today that inadequate testing played a significant role in this failed launch, so aren't you concerned that QSSI has lost its ability to be an objective independent arbitrator in addressing the problems that plague the system now? Because they're part of the tester, part of the developer, part of the problem.

SEBELIUS: No, I haven't lost my -- my confidence in them. I think the testing that they did is validating the pieces of the equipment. What we've said since the launch is that we did not do adequate end-to-end testing.

JOHNSON: OK.

SEBELIUS: That was not the QSSI responsibility.

JOHNSON: All right. And in this new role as integrator, are you going to be paying QSSI more than they were to be paid under their original contract? I -- I would expect with this expanded role they're going to get paid more, right?

SEBELIUS: That discussion is under way in terms of what the role will entail, what the outlines are, yes, sir.

JOHNSON: OK. Well, hard-working American taxpayers have already paid for this implementation once. Do you think it's fair to ask taxpayers to pay more so that QSSI can now attempt to do something that Administrator Tavenner and her CMS team were unable to do right the first time?

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, I think the American taxpayers expect us to get the site up and running. As I told you earlier...

JOHNSON: Oh, I'm certain that they did. They expected it the first time.

SEBELIUS: I understand, and so did I. We have not expended the funds that have been encumbered for the contracts. We have not -- and we will monitor every dime we spend from here on in, and re-audit things that are going forward.

JOHNSON: Well, with that, Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

UPTON: The gentleman yields back.

Mr. Long?

LONG: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you, Secretary, for being here today and giving your testimony.

Earlier today, you said that "I'm responsible for the implementation of the Affordable Care Act." I've heard you referred to, and maybe yourself, as the point person for the rollout, the architect of implementing Affordable Care Act. So you are kind of the president's point person, are you not, for this rollout?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

LONG: I -- earlier, you were asked, and there's a lot of things striking about the rollout of this and about the Affordable Care Act altogether. But the thing that's most striking to me is that when we have the point person for the rollout here, and you're not going in to the exchange.

Now, I've heard you say that, and you got some advice from the folks behind you, but I'm asking you today: Can you tell the American public, if your advisers behind you, that if they happen to have given you some wrong information, if it is possible for you to go into the exchange like all these millions of Americans that are going with the exchanges, will you commit to forego your government insurance plan that you're on now and join us in the pool? Come on in. The water's fine. All the congressmen, all of our staff have to go into the exchanges.

We have to go into the D.C. exchanges. And I will say that I tried to get on the website. I was successful during the hearing earlier, and I got to the D.C. exchange, which is where I have to buy from, I got part way through. And then when it got to the point to enter my Social Security number, I could not bring myself to do that, from what I've heard from people like John McAfee and folks about the security.

Will you tell, if your advisers are wrong, and it is possible for you -- I'm not saying it is -- but if it is, if it's possible for you to forego your government program you have now? Will you tell the American public that, "Yes, I will go into the exchanges next year like everyone else"?

SEBELIUS: Sir, the way the law is written...

LONG: It's a yes or no -- I'm -- let's say that you're wrong on that. Yes or no, if -- if you're wrong, will you? Yes or no?

SEBELIUS: But I don't want to give misinformation to the American public...

LONG: You what?

SEBELIUS: ... who may be -- I don't want to give misinformation. If you have affordable coverage...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: I want you to go home and research it. If -- if you're wrong...

SEBELIUS: ... if you have affordable coverage...

LONG: ... will you go into the exchanges?

SEBELIUS: I -- if I'm...

LONG: If you can, will you? That's a yes or no. If you can, will you?

SEBELIUS: I will take a look at it. I don't have any idea...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: That's not an answer. That's not a yes or no.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

LONG: You're the architect of the whole program and you won't go into it with the rest of the American public.

SEBELIUS: I did not say that, sir. I think it's illegal for me to...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: If it's not illegal. If it's legal, will you go in?

(CROSSTALK)

WAXMAN: Mr. Chairman? Mr. Chairman?

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: Come on in, the water's fine.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

WAXMAN: I have a unanimous consent request. I'd like to -- Madam Secretary, I'd like you to answer for the record. If you were able to do what the gentleman just suggested or follow the recommendation of Cory Gardner, our colleague from Colorado, and went into the bought -- to buy an individual policy, would you be able to find one that would protect you from cheap shots? Or do you think that has to be mandated for coverage?

(LAUGHTER)

I'll leave the record open for your response.

UPTON: Yeah, we'll wait for that response to come back.

SEBELIUS: I would gladly join the exchange if I didn't have affordable coverage in my workplace. I would gladly join it. And the D.C. market is an independent state-based market, even though D.C. is not a state. We do not run the D.C. market in the federal marketplace.

UPTON: The gentlelady from North Carolina, Ms. Ellmers?

ELLMERS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I have a couple of questions. Thank you for being with us today, Madam Secretary.

I'd like to go to the issue that has been raised by my colleagues on the left here about accurate information. Number one, I've heard the issue of Medicare Part D brought up many, many times. Although my colleagues all voted no against it initially, now they're extolling the virtues of Medicare Part D.

Is Medicare Part D a mandate or is it voluntary?

SEBELIUS: It is voluntary.

ELLMERS: It is a voluntary program.

SEBELIUS: Yes.

ELLMERS: That's the first accurate -- piece of accurate information I would like to get.

You know, we're asking or we're actually forcing millions of Americans to go to find a health care premium in some way, whether it's to go to the exchange or whether they are to be insured.

ELLMERS: Many of my constituents are reaching out to me, those with individual policies, and they are saying to me that my -- my rates are going up 400 percent; my rates are going up 127 percent. These are my constituents.

Now, you know, we're talking about open enrollment, but it's forcing the issue, is it not, that if an American does not have health care coverage, they are essentially breaking the law. Is that not correct?

SEBELIUS: If someone can afford coverage and has that option and chooses not to buy coverage, they will pay a fee on their (inaudible) next year's tax.

(CROSSTALK)

ELLMERS: And it is a law, so therefore they are breaking the law.

(CROSSTALK)

ELLMERS: OK. You also brought up the issue when you were in Kansas, that you fought against discriminatory -- discriminatory issues. Now, I, you know, as far as the essential health benefits, correct me if I'm wrong, do men not have to buy maternity coverage?

SEBELIUS: Policies will cover maternity coverage for the young and healthy.

ELLMERS: Including men.

SEBELIUS: Under 30-year-olds will have a choice also of a catastrophic plan which has no maternity coverage.

ELLMERS: The catastrophic, but the men are required to purchase maternity...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Well, an insurance policy has a series of benefits whether you use them or not. And one of the benefits will be maternity coverage, mental health coverage...

(CROSSTALK)

ELLMERS: And that is why the health care premiums are increasing because we're forcing them to buy things that they will never need.

Thank you, Madam Chairman.

SEBELIUS: The individual policies cover families. Men often do need maternity coverage for their spouses and for their families. Yes.

ELLMERS: Single male, age 32, does not need maternity coverage. To the best of your knowledge...

(CROSSTALK)

ELLMERS: ... has a man ever delivered a baby?

UPTON: The gentlelady's time has expired.

(LAUGHTER)

The gentlelady, Ms. Cathy McMorris Rodgers?

MCMORRIS RODGERS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And Madam Secretary, you know, although we were told repeatedly that if you liked your health insurance plan, you'd be able to keep it. We're now being told by the government that they have determined many existing plans to be lousy, sub-par.

In reality, this law is becoming quickly less about helping Americans purchase affordable coverage and more about compelling millions of Americans into a struggling Medicaid program.

In my home state of Washington, 90 percent of enrollees will be in Medicaid; 16,000 of them coming into a program that they were already eligible for; Colorado, 89 percent; Kentucky, two-thirds; Maryland, 97 percent. And this is -- these are states that are already struggling with their budgets, wondering how they're going to cover Medicaid, which is, as we all know, for the most vulnerable population.

So isn't it true that in states like Washington, they're going to have new, unexpected costs associated with a dramatic influx into Medicaid?

SEBELIUS: Well, Congresswoman, the Medicaid expansion provision of the Affordable Care Act is...

MCMORRIS RODGERS: Could you -- are states going to face new costs...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Federal government pays 100 percent of the costs of newly insured for the first three years, and gradually reduces...

(CROSSTALK)

MCMORRIS RODGERS: These are existing -- these were people that were already eligible. And we know that two out of three doctors don't accept new Medicaid patients. We know that current provider rates are going to drop at the end of 2014. So isn't it true that existing Medicare -- Medicaid enrollees are going to further compete for scarce resources in these states?

SEBELIUS: If the citizens of Washington who are signing up were eligible for Medicaid, they certainly will be entitled to enroll in Medicaid now. The newly insured will be fully paid for. The doctors have additional...

(CROSSTALK)

MCMORRIS RODGERS: I'm concerned that the most vulnerable in this country are going to lack access to the care that they think they're going to receive. And I know time is short...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Well, I think that's absolutely true. And in states that are choosing not to expand Medicaid, it's particularly dire. So I would love to work with you on that...

(CROSSTALK)

MCMORRIS: It's existing Medicaid. Finally, I just wanted to inform the secretary, you told us several hours ago when the hearing started, that the website was down. If you look at the screen several hours later, healthcare.gov is still down. You promised the system would be ready on October 1st. You're clearly wrong.

So before I leave you today, I would just impress upon you this is more than a broken website. This is a broken law. Millions of Americans are getting notices their plans are being canceled.

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: The gentlelady's time is expired.

I just -- I would do a couple of things here. First, I'm going to ask unanimous consent that the written opening statements for any member on the committee be introduced into the record. And without objection, the documents will be there.

I also would ask unanimous consent to put the document binder and other documents presented to the secretary during questioning into the record. Without objection, so ordered.

Let me just say in conclusion, we do look forward to having you back in December to get an update on where we are. And we'll work with your schedule to find a right time and date early that -- that week.

I want you to know we're going to want real numbers. You'll have them by then. Is that right, in terms of the signup? You'll have them in the next couple of weeks.

SEBELIUS: That's correct. We'll have them by mid-November.

UPTON: We look forward to getting those done.

We appreciate -- we really do appreciate your time this morning to take questions. I apologize to all the members who we had to shorten the time, but those things happen when we have this much interest. And we look forward to continuing to get an update and look for your continued work.

WAXMAN: Mr. Chairman?

UPTON: Yes?

WAXMAN: From our side of the aisle, we want to work with you. And I would hope on the other side of the aisle, they would take that same approach. Let's do something constructive, not just negative attacks against a bill that I think is going to be a God-send for millions of Americans.

Thank you for being here.

SEBELIUS: Thank you.

UPTON: Thank you.

The hearing is adjourned.

TEXT:

UPTON: Good morning.

The Energy and Commerce Committee welcomes the president's point person on health care, Secretary Sebelius, as part of our continuing oversight of the health care law.

And we look forward to a thoughtful conversation on a number of issues including transparency and fairness. Over the months leading up to October 1 launch, the secretary and her colleagues at HHS repeatedly looked us in the eye and testified that everything was on track. And despite the numerous red flags and lack of testing, they assured us that all systems were a go.

But something happened along the way. Either those officials did not know how bad the situation was, or they did not disclose it.

And, sadly, here we are now, five weeks into enrollment and the news seems to get worse by the day. Healthcare.gov was down last night at 5:00 p.m. It was also down on Monday, and it crashed last weekend.

And even this morning when we attempted to view the site before the hearing, we were hit with an error message.

But this is more than just a Web site problem. That was supposed to be the easy part, remember? Americans were assured that their experience would be similar to other online transactions, like purchasing a flight or ordering a pizza, and that their sensitive personal information would always be secure.

But, after more than three years to prepare, malfunctions have become the norm, and the administration has pivoted from saying they're on track to setting a new target date of November 30th.

And for those few Americans who have successfully applied, will the Web site glitches become provider glitches come January 1st?

Americans are scared and frustrated, and this situation should rise above politics. Many folks at home watching us today have spent hours or even days trying to sign up. They continue to take time away from work or loved ones, but have made little progress.

And soon they may worry about being on the wrong side of their government, facing potential penalties.

I recently spoke to a woman from Buchanan (ph), Michigan, who was excited to sign up, but has since become very disillusioned after spending hours on the phone and Web site with little success.

There are also millions of Americans coast to coast who no doubt believe that the president's repeated promises that if they liked their plan that they would be able to keep it, no matter what.

They are now receiving termination notices. And for those who lose their coverage, they, like -- they may be losing their faith in their government.

Today's hearing is about fairness for the American people who are losing their coverage or seeing their premiums skyrocket as high as 400 percent.

This hearing is also about transparency. While the administration continues to boast the number of Americans that have applied, they intentionally withhold precise enrollment numbers.

Why? These numbers are critical to fully understand the status and gauging the progress of implementation.

Lead contractor, CGI, testified only last week that they had the data, but needed the administration's permission to release it.

We asked the secretary on October 8th for those figures, but we still have not received a response. We hope to get one today. The American people deserve answers as well as the peace of mind that promises will be kept. The secretary has an opportunity today to embrace transparency and start restoring the public's faith in the administration and the government.

I yield to my colleague, ranking member of the committee, Mr. Waxman.

WAXMAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I'm pleased Secretary Sebelius is here today. She's here to discuss the Affordable Care Act. Just like with Medicare Part D, the launch of the new Web site has not gone well. But, just like Medicare Part D, the early glitches in this rollout will soon be forgotten.

A lot of the discussion today will focus on that Web site. This is an important issue, and I want to learn what the secretary can tell us about the problems being experienced and how they will be fixed.

But we should keep this issue in perspective. The Affordable Care Act is working. It has been improving the health security of millions of Americans for the past three years.

Because of the Affordable Care Act, more than 7 million people on Medicare have saved more than $8 billion on their prescription drugs. More than 100 million Americans have access to free preventive coverage and no longer face lifetime limits on their coverage. Over 10 million Americans have received rebates from insurance companies.

And, finally, this January, the worst abuses of insurance industry will be halted. Never again will a family be denied coverage because their child has a chronic health condition. Never again will individuals see their premiums shoot up because they got sick or faced an unexpected medical expense. Never again will a woman have to pay twice as much as a man for the same insurance.

That is why allowing insurers to continue offering deficient plans next year is such a bad policy. The law says that all plans except those that were grandfathered in 2010 must meet the new consumer protection standards.

If we don't enforce this policy, insurance companies can continue offering flimsy coverage that disappears when people actually need it, and no one should want that.

It is understandable that there will be a focus today on what isn't working, but we must also remember what is working. The health insurance plans that are being offered in the exchanges are good plans. Their premiums are much lower than expected. Sixty percent of the uninsured individuals shopping in the new marketplaces will be able to get coverage for less than $100 per month. Half of the young adults will be able to get coverage for less than $50 per month.

And since Congress adopted the Affordable Care Act, health care costs across the whole economy have grown at their lowest level in decades.

The success of the Affordable Care Act is due to the efforts of many people, but one individual more than any other is responsible for all the good that has been accomplished, and that is our witness today, Secretary Sebelius.

WAXMAN: So I would urge my colleagues to stop hyperventilating. The problems with healthcare.gov are unfortunate and we should investigate them, but they will be fixed. And then every American will have -- finally have access to affordable health insurance.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Thank you.

Before we swear in Secretary Sebelius, I want to clarify Energy and Commerce Committee practice for the swearing in of witnesses.

The committee typically has two types of hearings, oversight hearings and hearings that focus on legislation and policy.

Secretary Sebelius, for example, has testified previously before our committee to discuss issues related to the HHS budget or other policy matters. As is the case with all policy witnesses, Secretary Sebelius was not required to take an oath prior to testifying.

Today's hearing is different. It is an oversight hearing. It is a long standing committee practice to swear in all witnesses at oversight hearings whether they be private citizens or cabinet secretaries.

WAXMAN: Mr. Chairman, I thank you for your comments. And I just want to join you in simply explaining that it -- swearing in of the witness before an oversight committee hearing has always been under oath.

That is a standard procedure in this committee when we're conducting an oversight hearing, so it may seem strange to have the secretary of Health and Human Services have to be sworn in, but all witnesses in an oversight hearing are sworn in and that is our procedure.

UPTON: Thank you.

So I would now like to introduce our witness for today's hearing. The Honorable Kathleen Sebelius is the secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services. She was appointed to this position in April of 2009 and was sworn in as the 21st secretary on April 28th, 2009.

So I will now swear you in if you would rise.

As Ranking Waxman and I just discussed, the committee is holding an investigative hearing and when doing so have had the practice of taking testimony under oath.

Do you have any objection to testifying under oath?

SEBELIUS: (Inaudible).

UPTON: And the chair now advises you that you are -- see -- I would now read you -- do you swear that the testimony you are about to give is the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth?

SEBELIUS: (Inaudible).

UPTON: You are now under oath and subject to penalties set forth in Title 18, Section 1001 of the U.S. Code. You may now give a five- minute summary of your written statement.

Welcome again and thank you for being here.

You got to use that mike. You don't know how many people want to hear you this morning.

(LAUGHTER)

SEBELIUS: Thank you, Chairman Upton, Ranking Member Waxman, members of the committee.

I left my position as governor of Kansas 41/2 years ago for the opportunity to continue work I've been doing for most of my over 35 years of public service, to expand the opportunities for all Americans regardless of geography or gender or income to have affordable health coverage.

During my years as the state legislator, as an elected insurance commissioner, as head of the National Association of Insurance Commissioners and as a two-term governor and now as HHS secretary, I have worked on that effort that I care deeply about.

There are still millions of Americans who are uninsured as well as underinsured, people who have some coverage at some price for some illness but have no real protection from financial ruin and no real confidence they'll be able to take care of themselves and their families if they have an accident or an illness. And for them a new day has finally come.

In these early weeks, access to healthcare.gov has been a miserably frustrating experience for way too many Americans including many who have waited years, in some cases their entire lives for the security of health insurance. I am as frustrated and angry as anyone with the flawed launch of healthcare.gov.

So let me say directly to these Americans, you deserve better. I apologize. I'm accountable to you for fixing these problems. And I'm committed to earning your confidence back by fixing the site. We're working day and night and will continue until it's fixed.

We've recently added new management talent, additional technical expertise and a new general contractor to identify, prioritize and manage fixes across the system in two broad categories: performance, which deals with speed and reliability and function, which deals with bugs and problems in the system.

Our extensive assessment has determined that healthcare.gov is fixable. And I want to just outline a couple of the improvements we've made to date.

We now have more users successfully creating accounts. We can process up to 17,000 account registrations per hour or nearly five per second.

Instead of some of the users seeing a blank screen at the end of the application process, they can now see whether they're eligible for financial assistance and make more informed decisions.

Because we've improved performance, customers can now shop for plans quickly; filtering plans takes seconds and not minutes. Users are getting fewer errors and time-out messages as they move through the application process and the system has been strengthened with double the size of servers, software that's better optimized and a high-capacity physical database which replaces a virtual system.

The chairman referred to outages this weekend and again yesterday. And I would suggest to the committee that if you read the statement of Verizon who hosts the cloud service, it is the Verizon server that failed, not healthcare.gov, and it affected not only HHS but other customers.

We still have a lot of work to do. We have a plan in place to address key outstanding issues. It includes fixing bugs in software that prevented it from working the way it's supposed to and refreshing the user experience so folks can navigate the site without encountering error messages, time out and slow response times.

And by the end of November, we're committed that the vast majority of users will be able to review their options, shop for plans and enroll in coverage without the problems way too many have being experiencing.

But consumers are using the site every day and continue to do so. And problems are being solved. But we know that we don't have a fully functioning system that consumers need and deserve. We are still at the beginning of a six-month open enrollment which extends through the end of March and there's plenty of time to sign up.

And just to put it in perspective, the average open enrollment for an insurance plan is two to four weeks. The new marketplace has a 26-week open enrollment and those who enroll by December 15th will be able to access their benefits on day one.

Even with the unacceptable problems with healthcare.gov, which we are committed to fixing, the Affordable Care Act by any fair measure is working for millions of Americans who are benefiting from new health security, young adults, Americans living with pre-existing health conditions, seniors on Medicare.

Eighty-five percent of Americans who already have health coverage are protected with new rights and benefits.

The 15 percent of our neighbors and friends who are uninsured have affordable new options in a competitive market and cost growth for health care is lower than it's been in years. Millions of Americans are clearly eager to learn about their options and to finally achieve health security made possible by the Affordable Care Act.

And my commitment is to deliver on that promise.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Well, thank you very much.

Yes, if you -- the mike got pulled a little bit from you.

Yes, let's start this clock. Can you fix that? (Inaudible).

I appreciate you being here this morning and we've worked with our leadership to see that we don't have votes on the House floor this morning so we won't be interrupted.

I appreciate your time for sure and in an effort to allow every member to ask a question, we're going to be reducing the time for questions to be just four minutes, so hopefully we can get through all the members that are here. And I'm going to be pretty fast with the gavel, let me just say.

So we have got plenty of questions. So let's try and get through them.

(Inaudible).

You know, I think everyone in America remembers the president's words. If you like your health care plan, you can keep it, period. Under the Affordable Care Act insurance policies that were in effect on March 23rd, 2010, when the law was enacted, would be grandfathered.

Then a few months later, despite the president's word, HHS helped promulgate a new reg that in your own review showed that it effectively could deny perhaps as many as more than 50 percent, maybe even higher, of those holding individual policies the right to renew their own insurance plan.

UPTON: And I would guess that there are a lot of us on this panel today that are hearing from angry and confused constituents who are now being forced to go onto an inept website, whether they like it or not, to shop for a new replacement policy. They're finding premiums often more than 100 percent what they were paying before, some even as high as 400 percent, as I've heard from, and rising deductibles as well.

So when was the president specifically informed of the regulation change? And if so, was it pointed out that this totally undermines his biggest selling point? And I would note, that on the screen, in a statement that he made more than three years after the regulation change was promulgated, the President said again, "So the first thing you need to know is this. If you already have health care, you don't have to do anything." So he's been on the same page from the very start, yet the regulations changed months after the bill was enacted that are now causing perhaps millions of Americans to be denied the ability to renew their individual coverage.

Why was that change made, and did the President know it?

SEBELIUS: Well Mr. Chairman, there was no change. The regulation involving grandfathered plans, which applied to both the employer market and the individual market indicated that if a plan that was in effect in March of 2010 stayed in effect without unduly burdening the consumer with reducing benefits and adding on huge costs, that plan would stay in effect and never have to comply with any of the regulations of the Affordable Care Act. That's what the grandfather clause said. The individual market which affects about 12 million Americans, about 5 percent of the market, people move in and out, they often have coverage for less than a year. A third of them have coverage for about six months, and if a plan was in place of March of 2010 and again, did not impose additional burdens on the consumer, they still have it. It's grandfathered in.

UPTON: But why not let the consumer decide whether they want to renew it or not? Why was -- why were regulations promulgated in the summer of 2010 that then undermined the ability for those folks to re- sign up, which is one of the reasons for the large number of cancellation notes?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: And there were no regulations changed We outlined the grandfather policy so people could keep their own plan. We then began to implement the other features of the Affordable Care Act, so if someone is buying a brand new policy in the individual market today, or last week, they will have consumer protections for the first time. Many people in the under -- individual market are medically underwritten. That will be illegal. Many women are charged 50 percent more than men. That will be illegal. You cannot, again, eliminate someone because of a pre-existing health condition. You cannot dump someone out or lock someone out, so those provisions. But if again, a plan is in place, and was in place at the time that the President signed the bill and the consumer wants to keep the plan, those individuals are grandfathered in and that's happening across the country in the individual market.

UPTON: We're learning in fact that folks who did have a plan who liked it in fact are being told that it's canceled in the -- in the last -- my time is expired. Let me yield to the Ranking Member, Mr. Waxman for four minutes.

WAXMAN: Thank you Mr. Chairman. I have to smile at your line of questioning because everybody expected this hearing was about the website. That's all we've been hearing about is the website. But that's not the only complaint we've been hearing about since the Affordable Care Act was adopted. We were told by our Republican friends that millions of jobs would be lost and in fact, there have been a gain of 7 million jobs. They said that they -- the -- the cost for health care would skyrocket, and in fact, the opposite is true. They said there would be a massive shift to part-time jobs, and the evidence doesn't support that. They said tens of millions will lose their insurance, but in fact, everybody in this country has got to have access to health insurance because they won't be discriminated against. They said that it would explode the deficit, and yet all the reputable organizations like the Congressional Budget Office have told us that it's going to save us $100 billion over 10 years, so we've had a litany of objections for the Republicans about the Affordable Care Act which have driven them to such a frenzy they even closed the government.

So now we have you before the committee. And you're being asked, I suppose later you'll be asked about the website. But let me pursue this question about individuals who have gotten notices, that they're going to have their individual insurance policies canceled. They'll be able to get another plan, won't they?

SEBELIUS: Actually, it's the law that they must get another plan. Continuous coverage is part of the law.

WAXMAN: So the ...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: That wasn't the case in the past.

WAXMAN: So the Affordable Care Act said we're going to end the worst abuses of insurance companies. We're going to create consumer protections in the marketplace that they will be able to buy a policy even if they've been sick in the past. That women won't be charged more than me. That we're not going to let insurance companies deny coverage because of pre-existing conditions, and we're not going to let them put these lifetime caps. And there'll be an essential benefit package, so you're not just buying some things and not having other things covered. You're going to have the minimum that everybody should have, prescription drugs, mental health coverage, doctors and hospitals. Are these important consumer protections?

SEBELIUS: Well I would say, Mr. Waxman, they're very important. As a former insurance commissioner, I can tell you that the individual market in Kansas and anywhere in the country has never had consumer protections. People are on their own. They could be locked out, priced out, dumped out, and that happens each and every day. So this will finally provide the kind of protections that we all enjoy in our health care plans, as part of a group, as part of a plan that has pre-negotiated benefits, we enjoy that kind of health security, and individuals in the buying insurance on their own, farm families, young adults have never had that kind of health security.

WAXMAN: Well now they're going to have this health security, and most of the plans, as I understand it, that -- that they're no longer going to be able to keep, don't meet all the standards of the law.

SEBELIUS: Again, I think you may have heard Pat Geraghty from Florida Blues who was on some of the Sunday shows and he talks about the fact that the Florida plans want to keep their customers. They have new plans to offer, they feel that a lot of people, and these are Mr. Geraghty's words, "will have a much better plan at a similar or lower cost. Fifty percent of these 11 to 12 million people qualify for a subsidy, quality for financial help purchasing insurance for the first time ever."

WAXMAN: The bottom line is that people with good coverage like Medicare, Medicaid, employer coverage, can keep that. People with grandfathered plans in the individual market will be able to keep it. But if an insurance company sold you a new modified health insurance policy after the date of the enactment that does not meet the law's standards, then those people will be able to go into the exchange and buy a real solid health insurance plan that won't discriminate against them or anybody else. I think that's a good result. I'm pleased with it, and I think most people will be as well.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired. The Chair would recognize the Vice Chair of the committee, Ms. Blackburn.

BLACKBURN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Madam Secretary, during -- before, during and after the law was passed, the President kept saying, "if you like your health care plan, you can keep it," so is he keeping his promise?

SEBELIUS: Yes, he is.

BLACKBURN: OK. What do you say to the 300,000 people in Florida you just mentioned, or to the 28,000 in Tennessee that cannot get health insurance? Their plans are terminated. Is he keeping his promise to them?

SEBELIUS: Well first of all, Congresswoman, they can get health insurance. They must be offered new plans, new options either inside the marketplace, or if they don't qualify for a financial subsidy, they can shop in or out of the marketplace.

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: But would you say to ...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: They absolutely will have new coverage.

BLACKBURN: What would you say to NBC news who says, "Millions are going to lose their coverage?"

SEBELIUS: Well, in all deference to the press corps, many of whom are here today, I think it's -- it's important to be accurate about what is going on, and I would defer, again, to the President of the (inaudible) plan.

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: Reclaiming ...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: (inaudible) ongoing coverage, they will be offered new plans.

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: Madam Secretary, let me tell you something.

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Fifty percent of them in the market right now will -- will qualify for ...

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: What do you say to Mark and Lucinda in my district who had a plan, they liked it, it was affordable, but it is being terminated and now they do not have health insurance?

SEBELIUS: Insurance companies cancel individual policies year in and year out. They're a one-year contract with individuals. They are not lifetime plans, they are not an employer plan. Your constituents will have lots of options.

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: Let me -- let me move -- let me move on. It's what they wanted, and I will remind you, some people like to drive a Ford, not a Ferrari, and some people like to drink out of a red Solo cup and not a crystal stem. Your taking away their choice. Let's put the screen shot up. I want to go to the cost of the website and talk about the website. This is what is happening right now with this website. We've had somebody in the back trying to sign on. It is down. It is not working. Last week I asked for the cost from each of the contractors that were with us last week. So can you give me a ballpark on what you have spent on this website that does not work, that individuals cannot get to? What is your cost estimate?

SEBELIUS: So far, Congresswoman, we have spent about $118 million on the website itself, and about $56 million has been expended on other IT to support the web.

BLACKBURN: OK. Would you submit a detailed accounting of exactly what has been spent? And when do you expect constituents to stop getting these kind of error messages?

SEBELIUS: Again, I was with the -- I talked to the president of Verizon over the weekend on two occasions. Verizon hosts the cloud, which is not part of the website. It is a host for a number of websites. The Verizon system was taken down Saturday night into Sunday. It was down almost all day Sunday. They had an additional problem that they notified us about yesterday and it continues on. So I'd be happy to talk to the president of Verizon and get him to give you...

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: OK, let me -- let me come back to that, because I want to get to this issue of exactly who is in charge of this project. Because you're now blaming it on the contractors and saying it's Verizon's fault.

So let me ask you this: Did you ever look at outsourcing the role of the system integrator -- and obviously you did not from the contractors that we had last week -- you all -- they had several different people, whether it was you or Gary Cohen or Michelle Snyder or Henry Chao, that they thought were in charge. So who is responsible for overseeing this project? Is it you or your designee?

SEBELIUS: Let me be clear, I'm not pointing fingers at Verizon. I'm trying to explain the way the site operates. We are -- we own the site. The site has had serious problems. I...

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: Who is in charge, Madam Secretary?

SEBELIUS: The person now in charge as an integrator is QSSI, one of our...

BLACKBURN: Who was in charge as it was being built?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: ... CMS was in charge up...

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: At that team, who is the individual...

SEBELIUS: Michelle Snyder is...

BLACKBURN: Michelle Snyder is the one responsible for this debacle?

SEBELIUS: Well, excuse me, Congresswoman. Michelle Snyder is not responsible for the debacle. Hold me accountable for the debacle. I'm responsible.

BLACKBURN: Thank you. I yield back.

UPTON: Chair would recognize Mr. Dingell from the great state of Michigan.

DINGELL: Thank you for your courtesy.

I have a few questions I'll be asking you on behalf of Congresswoman Shea-Porter, but I'll do that by writing. I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to revise and extend my remarks.

UPTON: Without objection.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, I would like to begin by thanking you; welcoming the secretary to a room in which her distinguished father, former governor of Ohio, served for so many years.

I begin my questions by quoting from an expert for whom I have enormous respect. He said as follows: "As I mentioned earlier, the new benefits and its implementation are hardly perfect. Rather than trying to scare and confuse seniors, I would hope that we could work together as we go through the implementation phase to find out what is wrong with the program, and if we can make some changes to fix it.

"Let us do it, and let us do it in a bipartisan fashion. It is too big a program and is too important to too many people to do that. But having said that, it does appear that it is working. Let us admit it, you know, and not keep beating a dead horse."

My beloved friend, Mr. Barton -- who I think gave us the beginning of our efforts today.

Madam Secretary, I've seen reports that consumers receiving plan cancellation notices from their insurance companies saying that plans are no longer available. Does the ACA require insurance companies to discontinue the plans that people had when the law was passed, yes or no?

SEBELIUS: Not when the law was passed if the plans have not changed, no, sir.

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: That's the grandfather clause.

DINGELL: Now, that's because the plans existed prior to the passage of the law are grandfathered in, as you have said?

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

DINGELL: So if an insurance company is no longer offering a certain plan, that's because that insurance company made a decision to change their policies, and that caused them to take away the grandfather status from their insurance purchasers, is that right?

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

DINGELL: Now, Madam Secretary, I want you to submit for the record a statement of what it is we can do about insurance companies that run around canceling the policies of their people. And I don't have time to get -- get the answer, but I want to get a very clear statement from you as to what you can do so we can take some skin off some folks that have it coming.

(LAUGHTER)

Now, Madam Secretary, it's my understanding that these decisions of a business character are most common in the individual insurance market, and that much turnover already exists and existed prior to the enactment of the legislation.

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

DINGELL: Is that correct?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: Is it correct that 35 percent to 67 percent (ph) of the enrollees in the individual market leave their plan after one year for different reasons?

SEBELIUS: A third are in about less than six months in the individual market and over 50 percent are in for less than a year, yes, sir.

DINGELL: Now, in the cancellation letters, which move around from the insurance companies, some insurance companies are suggesting an alternative plan at a higher price. Do they have the right to do that?

SEBELIUS: Well, they have a right to do that, sir, but consumers have a right to shop anywhere to compare plans and they have choices now that they've never had before -- and some financial assistance...

DINGELL: And they have no right...

SEBELIUS: ... coming their way for about 50 percent of those people.

DINGELL: ... to enforce that demand on the insurance company?

SEBELIUS: Oh, absolutely not. No one is rolled over into a plan. And in fact, individuals for the first time ever will have the ability to compare plans, to shop, and to make a choice inside or outside the marketplace.

DINGELL: Looks to me like the insurance companies are trying to inflict on their -- on their customers the view that this is their right and that this is the only option available to them, is that correct?

SEBELIUS: Well, I -- I think that insurance companies would like to keep their customers. Having said that, customers for the first time have a lot of choices, because they can't be locked out...

(CROSSTALK)

DINGELL: But the insurance companies have no right to enforce that view on the customer?

SEBELIUS: There is no rule that says you have to stay with your company or you have to be rolled over...

(CROSSTALK)

DINGELL: And you don't...

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

(CROSSTALK)

DINGELL: ... when they come forward and tell you that you've got to buy a particular policy, is that right?

SEBELIUS: Absolutely.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

Chair would recognize the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Barton.

BARTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Before I ask my questions, we have a former member of the committee on the Democrat side from the great state of Kansas in the audience, Mr. Slattery. And we are -- we're glad to have you.

And Madam Secretary, we're glad to have you too.

SEBELIUS: Thank you, sir.

BARTON: There is a famous movie called the "Wizard of Oz," and in the "Wizard of Oz" there is a great line. Dorothy at some point in the movie turns to her little dog Toto and says, "Toto, we're not in Kansas anymore."

Well, Madam Secretary, while you're from Kansas, we're not in Kansas anymore. Some might say that we are actually in the "Wizard of Oz" land given the parallel universes we appear to be habitating.

Mr. Waxman and most of those on the Democrat side think things are great. You apparently, although you did apologize and you have said it's a debacle, you also seem to think that the Affordable Care Act is great. Well, myself and others have a different view. Ultimately the American people will decide.

Now, last week when the contractors were here, I focused my attention on the apparent lack of privacy in the website. If we'll put up the first slide that I had last week -- if we can.

This -- this is what's public, Madam Secretary. And it's -- it's basically a disclaimer that says that any unauthorized attempt to upload information or change information on the website is prohibited. It really doesn't say anything about privacy. But you do have to accept that in order to go forward with the application.

The next slide shows what's not public. And this is in the source code. We tried to determine this morning if it was still in the source code, but it's (ph) been pointed out, the website's down.

This is much more what I would say -- frightening to me. It says, "You have no reasonable expectation of privacy regarding any communication or data transiting or stored (ph) on the information system. At any time and for any lawful government purpose, the government may monitor, intercept, search and seize any communication or data transiting or stored (ph) on the information system. Any communication or data transiting or stored (ph) on this information system may be disclosed or used for any lawful government purpose."

Cheryl Campbell of CGI Federal said she was aware of it, but said that it wasn't her responsibility to put that in the source code. Were you a aware of it? And was it your responsibility to put this in the source code?

SEBELIUS: Mr. Barton, I did not put things in the source code. I can tell you, it's my understanding that that is boiler plate language that should not have been in this particular contract, because there are -- the highest security standards are in place, and people have every right to expect privacy.

BARTON: All right.

Now, the last time we could check, this was still there. You are given almost unlimited authority under the Affordable Care Act to administer it. Will you commit to the committee and to the American people that, one, you do want to protect their privacy and, two, you will take this out, fix it, make sure that it -- it doesn't have bearing on people that try to apply through the website?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir. And we have had those discussions with CGI, and it is under way. I do absolutely commit to protecting the privacy of the American public, and we have asked them to remove that statement. It is there in error. It needs to be taken down, and we should be held accountable for protecting privacy...

(CROSSTALK)

BARTON: Well, thank you, Madam Secretary. I -- I sincerely appreciate that, and I'm sure the American people do too.

My last question -- or it's really a comment. I've introduced H.R. 3348, which says, let's make this system voluntary for the first year since we're having so many problems and let the American people decide. What that means is, if people choose not to participate they will not be charged the penalty for non-participation. Would you support such a reasonable approach to this while we work out the problems in the system?

SEBELIUS: No, sir.

BARTON: OK. Well, that's an honest answer.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

BARTON: Thank you, Madam...

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Chair would recognize the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. Pallone.

PALLONE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I know we're not in Kansas, but I do believe increasingly we're in Oz because of what I see here.

(LAUGHTER)

So this "Wizard of Oz" comment by my colleague from Texas I think is particularly apropos, given what we hear (ph) on the other side of the aisle. I don't know how you keep your cool, Madam Secretary, you know, with this continuous effort on the part of the GOP to sabotage the ACA, to scare people and bring up red herrings. And I think that this privacy issue is another red herring. And I'm gonna ask you a question about that.

But before that, I just wanted to say, this whole idea that's being brought up today that somehow, you know, policies are being canceled and people don't have alternatives is just another red herring. You know, what I think my colleagues on the other side forget is that this is not socialized medicine. This is in fact private insurance in a competitive market.

And if I'm an insurance company and all of a sudden everyone else is selling a better policy with better benefits at a lower price, I can't continue to sell a lousy skeletal policy that doesn't provide benefits and cost more because I'll be out of the market. And so that's what's happening here. Insurance companies are canceling lousy policies with high prices because they can't compete. And that's what's gonna happen when you have a private insurance market, which is what we have here. We don't have a government-controlled system. We have private markets.

So I just wanted to make that point.

But I have to drill down on what Mr. Barton said here. You know, before reform, the individual insurance market was dysfunctional, premiums would shoot up if people got sick, their coverage could be canceled if they had a pre-existing condition, and they did not have secure, quality coverage.

Now, I've heard my Republican colleagues say that patient health information will be at risk in this application process, and this is flat out false. In fact, the ACA makes a giant leap forward for protecting health insurance by taking it completely out of the insurance application process by banning discrimination based on pre- existing conditions.

Mr. Barton, again, is, you know, raising this red herring just like the cancellation of insurance by talking about privacy. But Madam Secretary, prior to the ACA when people applied for insurance coverage, did insurers make them provide a long, detailed, invasive medical history, but now because the law bans discrimination based on pre-existing conditions, individuals will not have to provide this information in their applications?

So regardless of this clause, please comment on the privacy issue and why it's irrelevant.

SEBELIUS: Well, Mr. Pallone, in the past, any individual American who was in an employer-based coverage, in government coverage like the ones we enjoy in Medicare, in Medicaid, the V.A., a whole variety of plans, that's about 95 percent of insured Americans had no medical underwriting, had group protections, had consumer protections.

The people who were outside that consumer-protected space were individuals buying their own coverage in an individual market. Medical underwriting demanding health records and often going through extensive doctor interviews and getting health records was a standard for that market. Pricing could vary widely depending on gender, depending on health condition. People could be denied coverage and were frequently. That's the market that is currently being reformed with consumer protections.

If a person had a policy in place in March of 2010 like that policy and the insurance company made no changes to disadvantage the consumer, those policies are in place, you keep your plan, you like it, and that goes on.

For the people who, though, had a medically underwritten policy, were paying more than their neighbor because they happened to be female, could not get their health condition for a fixed hip written into their insurance plan, they will have a new day in a very competitive market; 25 percent of the insurers are brand new to the market and they are offering competitive plans.

PALLONE: Mr. Chairman, could I just ask that this document...

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Sure. Put it into the record without objection.

PALLONE: Thank you.

UPTON: Chair would recognize Mr. Hall.

HALL: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, I think Congresswoman Blackburn asked you about the federal government and how much they'd spent today and they're spending some money as we speak, aren't they?

It's down right now, isn't it?

Is that -- are you had -- you projected ongoing problems?

SEBELIUS: I'm sorry, sir. I'm having a hard time...

HALL: OK.

SEBELIUS: ... hearing.

What was the...

HALL: She asked you how much it had spent today and I'm asking what you expect to pay in addition to that on the repairs that the website is going to require and they're requiring them as we speak here.

So those are things you projected; you knew they would happen and they will happen. But you surely looked ahead and you have some estimate of what is going to happen.

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

HALL: And going to cost.

SEBELIUS: For our two major contractors who are USSI, a subsidiary of United and for CGI, there are obligated amounts. For CGI, who is in charge of the entire application, there has been $197 million obligated and that is to last through March of 2014.

And as I said before about $104 million has been expended in that obligated amount.

HALL: I'm going to try to be here on 2014 to be sure that your testimony is correct, OK?

(LAUGHTER)

I'm just joking with you.

(LAUGHTER)

SEBELIUS: OK.

HALL: And if -- were you born in Kansas, Meade (ph) -- Kansas?

SEBELIUS: I was not. I was born in Cincinnati, Ohio. I married a Kansan and went to Kansas.

HALL: All right. I was in the third grade there. And I thought I saw you on a tricycle there one day.

(LAUGHTER)

SEBELIUS: Well, it was an illusion.

HALL: Let me ask you a question, have you ever rejected a financial bill from one of the contractors?

Have you ever?

SEBELIUS: Have I ever...

HALL: Rejected a financial bill from one of them?

SEBELIUS: Sir, again, I -- our...

HALL: Well, I guess you can say yes or no.

SEBELIUS: ... our accounting office does a routine audit and review of every bill that comes in before they do it. I do not personally. I want to be very accurate about -- I don't personally pay contracts, negotiate contracts. By law and by precedent that's really illegal for someone who isn't a warranted contract officer to engage in the debate or discussion around federal contracts.

HALL: How much has the administration spent on the exchanges in total?

Not just healthcare.gov but all of the exchanges?

SEBELIUS: Sir...

HALL: How difficult is that figure to give me or if you can't give it to me...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I would like to get it to you in writing very quickly.

HALL: Madam Secretary, I'd like to talk -- I don't know how much time I have got left but I would like to talk about a couple of businesses in my district who are struggling with how to move forward. One is a manufacturing and one is in the pet boarding and training business. One has 85 employees and the other has 56.

Here's some quotes from some of their recent letters: "The situation we're in is we would have to pay $170,000 in penalties under Obamacare. This is another example of the government picking the winners and losers. We're the losers. There is no way I can be competitive if I have to raise my prices to cover $170,000. Here are my options: do not pay the penalty, raise my prices and go out of business. Eighty-five people lose their jobs, lay off 35 employees who don't have to pay the penalty and move more production to this country, reduce 35 jobs."

And here's a quote from the other: "Since they are high labor low margin, business cannot afford to pay for insurance for our employees we're faced with either closing our business perhaps through bankruptcy, though there are heavy financial obligations that would continue whether we operate or not.

"Fire enough employees to get under 50 employees limits and close some of our business. Even if we close the location we cannot escape many expenses such as rental agreements."

What am I supposed to tell these people?

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, I think that in the employer market, about 95 percent of all American businesses are exempt from any kind of requirement to cover employer -- employee insurance, and they are outside the law. They continue to be outside the law, but they will have some new options for those who want to cover their employees and some new tax credit possibilities.

For large employers, about 96 percent of them already cover their employees. And as you know, the penalty that your constituents referred to is not a penalty that is imposed in 2014. It is being discussed with businesses about what kind of information is exchanged and it will take place in 2015.

UPTON: The gentleman's time...

HALL: He's going to use the gavel on me if you don't hurry.

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

HALL: I yield back my time.

UPTON: At which time the Chair would recognize the gentlelady from California, Ms. Eshoo.

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Welcome, Madam Secretary. You're a distinguished woman, you have distinguished yourself and your state, the offices that you've held, and now working for the American people and I salute you for it. I -- I want to really congratulate my Republican pals for being absolutely 1000 percent consistent. You love what's wrong with the website, and you detest what's working in the Affordable Care Act. And I think that that is on full display here. But let's get back to the website, because that's what the hearing is about.

It's my understanding that November 31st (sic) is a -- is a hard date for having everything up and running. Do you have -- now, HHS did testify in September that they were 100 percent confident that the site would be launched and fully functional on time on October 1st. That didn't work. Do you have full confidence in this new hard date?

SEBELIUS: Congresswoman, I can tell you that the assessment that we have made is that it will take until the end of November for an optimally functioning website. I know that the only way I can restore confidence that we get it right is to get it right, so I -- I -- I have confidence, but I know that it -- it isn't fair to ask the American public to take our word for it. I've got to fix this problem, and we are underway doing just that.

ESHOO: But are you confident that -- I think I said November 31st, which is, which does not exist, but November 30th. You have confidence in November 30th?

SEBELIUS: I do.

ESHOO: Is there any penalty to QSSI or CGI for not delivering on what they promised?

SEBELIUS: Well, I think the, as you can see, we have a -- obligated funds for a contract. We certainly have not expended all those funds, and we expect not only the CMS team, but our contractor partners to fulfill their obligations and have to be...

(CROSSTALK)

ESHOO: But if they fail to fulfill their obligations. I don't know what's in the contract. Is there a penalty?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Well, I understand, but, there isn't a built-in penalty, but I can tell you that paying for work that isn't complete is not something that we will do. QSSI, as you know, has taken on a new role as integrator of the hub that they built and have in operation is -- is working extremely well, not only for the federal exchanges, but all the state-based markets are using the hub, and that's why we had confidence in their ability to actually take this next role on and coordinate the activities moving forward, which have to be driven with a very clear set of outcomes, very accountable timelines and deadlines, and they will be helping to manage that process.

ESHOO: On the issue of security, there was a security breach that arose recently, that I read about at any rate. And what I think is very important here, because the issue of privacy has been raised, and I think that that has been answered. Very importantly, there isn't any health information in these systems. But there is financial information, so my question to you is, has a security wall been built, and are you confident that it is there and that it will actually secure the financial information that applicants have to disclose?

SEBELIUS: Yes, ma'am, I -- I would tell you that there was not a breach, there was a blog by a sort of skilled hacker that if a certain series of incidents occurred, you could possibly get in and obtain somebody's personally identifiable...

(CROSSTALK)

ESHOO: But isn't that telling? Isn't that telling?

SEBELIUS: And we immediately corrected that problem, so there wasn't a -- it was a theoretical problem that was immediately fixed. I would tell you we are storing the minimum amount of data, because we think that's very important. The hub is not a data collector. It is actually using data centers at the IRS, at Homeland Security, at Social Security to verify information, but it stores none of that data, so we don't want to be...

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Gentlelady's time has expired. The Chair would recognize Mr. Shimkus.

SHIMKUS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Welcome, Madam Secretary. Madam Secretary, before I start my questions, the Washington Post gave the administration, the President, yourself, four Pinocchios on this whole debate of if you like the insurance you have, you can keep it. Would you recommend to the President that he stop using that term? Wouldn't it be helpful in this debate?

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, I think he used the term at the time that the law was passed, and he continues to say...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: And as of September 26th, also, so...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: That's why we wrote...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: So the answer is you don't buy -- you don't believe that the Washington Post, and therefore...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I haven't read the Washington Post, but thank you.

SHIMKUS: Well, we'll hand this down to you so you can see it. Have you ever shopped -- I know you have, but this is for a -- at a grocery store with a coupon? Ever used a coupon?

SEBELIUS: Yes.

SHIMKUS: So, the coupon gives you the terms and conditions of when you go to the checkout to -- to get whatever's off the price of the goods. When you all added the "See Plans Now" option, you in essence gave the searcher in essence a coupon based upon what they're seeing there. And the desire was, let people know what the price is. However, as the -- the news reported, and I followed up in last week's hearing, was that if you are under 50 years old, you get quoted the price of someone who's 27. If you're older than 50, if you're older than 50, could be 64, you get quoted a price of someone who's 50 -- 50 years old. Isn't that misleading?

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, the "Learn" side of the website, which has been up since actually late...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: So that's truthful, then. If you quote a price...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: It is clearly a hypothetical situation...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: Oh, are you -- do you -- wait...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: That for now people that...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: OK, on the "See Plans Now" option, are you saying this is a hypothetical? That's not what it says on the site. It says, "This is the price, when you put in your age," and if your age is 49, it quotes you as if you're 27.

SEBELIUS: Sir, the only way someone can get an accurate information about their price is to get their individual eligibility (inaudible)...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: Let me ask you another -- when did you decide to use this, the low 50 at 27, and above 50 at 50 years old. When did you make that decision?

SEBELIUS: That was decided by the team as...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: By who? Who made the -- the...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I withhold (ph) that information.

SHIMKUS: The problem with the whole debate is y'all won't tell us who made the decisions.

SEBELIUS: Well, I can tell you I did not design the site.

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: So who?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I will get...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: Well, who made the decision on the 27-year-old quote for someone who's 50?

SEBELIUS: I just said I will get you that information.

SHIMKUS: Thank -- thank you. Let me go to, because it's misleading and the White House insists it didn't mislead the public, and (inaudible) we find after you did. But let me -- let me finish on this debate. Another transparency issue. If someone, a constituent of mine or someone in this country has strongly held pro-life views...

(CROSSTALK)

(UNKNOWN): Oh, here we go.

SHIMKUS: Can you commit to us to make sure that the federal exchanges that offer that is clearly identified and so people can understand if they're going to buy a policy that has abortion coverage or not? Because right now, you cannot make that determination.

SEBELIUS: Sir, I -- I don't know. I -- I know exactly the -- the issue you're talking about. I will check and make sure that that is truly identifiable.

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: Here's -- here's -- OK, thank you. Well, here's -- here's our request. Can you provide for the committee the list of insurers in the federal exchange who do not offer, as part of their package, abortion coverage?

SEBELIUS: I think we can do that, sir.

SHIMKUS: Well, you should be able to do it, so...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I just said...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: No, you said "If we can do it."

SEBELIUS: No, I think we can do that is what I said.

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: I think, or I know we can do it?

SEBELIUS: I -- sir, I -- I can't tell you what I don't know firmly right now. I know that is the plan, I will get that information to you.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

The chair would recognize Mr. Engel from New York.

ENGEL: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, I appreciate your coming here today to answer questions about the Affordable Health Care Act (sic).

You know, my Republican colleagues' actions here remind me of a story I read when I was a little boy, and that's the story of Chicken Little, who ran around yelling, "The sky is falling. The sky is falling." But unlike Chicken Little, my Republican colleagues are actually rooting for the sky to fall.

Republicans are holding this hearing today under the auspices of an investigative hearing, as if they want to get to the bottom of what went wrong with the website in order to help fix it. But I don't think, Madam Secretary, there's one person in this room who is naive enough to actually think that the Republicans want to see this law work. They voted over 40 times to repeal the law, they shutdown the government and threatened to force a default in order to stop it. They're rooting for failure.

Madam Secretary, can you tell us what would be the impact on Americans' health insurance if Republicans had been successful in their efforts to de-fund or repeal the Affordable Care Act?

SEBELIUS: Well, I think that the estimates at the Congressional Budget Office is that would have increased the deficit by about $110 billion in the first decade and close to a trillion dollars in the second decade.

We know that we have 42 million or 43 million Americans without health insurance at all, some of them Medicaid eligible and some in the -- over the Medicaid eligibility. Thirty governors so far, Republicans and Democrats, have declared their support for moving ahead with Medicaid expansion, but absent that, the Affordable Care Act, those folks would be without any kind of health security.

And in the private market, what we know is it takes a real toll.

But I'd say the biggest issue is not just the financial toll, not the community toll, not the country toll -- which is significant. I have a good friend who runs the cancer center at the University of Kansas. I was with him and cancer researchers recently, and he said that if you get a cancer diagnosis, you are 60 percent more likely to live five years and beyond if you have insurance than if you don't. I think that's a pretty powerful statement for why we need affordable health care for all of our citizens.

ENGEL: Well, thank you. The -- the Republicans have not been able to de-fund or repeal it, but they have denied requested funding. They've raised specious arguments about death panels and socialized medicine, and they've worked to intimidate groups that could help the implementation effort. There's been a spreading of misinformation about the cost of coverage -- we hear some of that today -- and to actively dissuade the uninsured from seeking coverage.

So Madam Secretary, how are these tactics -- impacted your ability to implement the Affordable Care Act?

SEBELIUS: Well, I don't think there's any question that a lot of people need a lot of information. I think it's one of the reasons we had millions visit the site -- try to visit the site. It's why I am so frustrated and disappointed that the site is not fully functional, and why I'm so committed to getting it functional, because clearly there is a demand. We need to get information to people about the law.

This is the law. This is not any longer a debate. It was a law passed by both houses of Congress, signed by the president of the United States, upheld by the Supreme Court. The president was re-elected. It is the law. And people have benefits and rights under that law, and we've got to get that information so they can make good choices for themselves and their families.

ENGEL: Well, thank you.

It is the law, and, frankly, I find it disconcerting that my Republican colleagues have done nothing but root for this law to fail for the last three and a half years. And now there's a big show here of being upset at problems with the website...

(CROSSTALK)

ENGEL: ... keeping people from signing up for coverage fast enough.

So I would just say to my colleagues on the other side of the aisle, you're really on the wrong side of history here. The website will be fixed and millions of Americans will be able to get quality, affordable health insurance coverage through the Affordable Care Act.

And again, I thank you for being here today, Madam -- Madam.

UPTON: Mr. Pitts, chairman of the Health Committee.

PITTS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Welcome, Madam Secretary.

Have you personally tried to register or enroll on the website?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I created an early light account so I would see the prompts that were coming to people who were interested. I did work my way to the application feature fairly early on. But, frankly, I -- I have affordable health care, so I...

(CROSSTALK)

PITTS: No, I just wanted to know if you've been through the process that millions of Americans are having to go through.

Madam Secretary, the -- the initial website crashes appear to be largely a result of the decision to prevent browsing of the plans. CGI Federal testified at our hearing last week that they had designed the website to allow users to browse and compare plans before having to create an account.

Ms. Campbell told us that two weeks prior to the October 1st launch, they were told to turn off the browsing feature. Were you aware in September that this decision was made?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I wasn't aware of that particular decision that was made by the CMS team. I was aware that we were paring back some features to not put additional risk on the website, which is ironic at this point.

PITTS: And who made that decision? Who made that decision?

SEBELIUS: Administrator Tavenner made that decision.

PITTS: And do you know why that was made?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir, because we were anxious to get the website up and running and functional -- which we clearly have failed to do to date -- although I would suggest the website has never crashed. It is functional, but at a very slow speed and very low reliability, and has continued to function.

Having said that, they pared down some of the features, feeling that it would be better to load them in later. One was the shop and browse feature. Another was the Spanish version of the website and the Medicaid transfers. All three of those issues were paired down in September...

PITTS: Thank you.

SEBELIUS: ... to not load the system.

PITTS: Thank you.

Last week, CGI Federal and QSSI testified that CMS was responsible for end-to-end testing and that they believe that months of testing would have been preferable to two weeks.

Do you believe that two weeks was enough time to complete testing of the entire system?

SEBELIUS: Clearly, not.

PITTS: And when were you made aware of the result of the test, including the one where the system collapsed with only a few hundred users?

SEBELIUS: Leading up to the October 1st date, we had regular meetings with not only a team at CMS but administrators involved. I was made aware that we were testing, and as we found problems we were fixing those problems. And I think there is a CGI report at mid- August identifying some problems. And between August and October that became the punch list for CGI to fix those problems. That's why you test.

PITTS: Now, in The Washington Post on October 21st there was an article that said about a month before the exchange opened a testing group of 10 insurers urged agency officials not to launch the site because it was riddled with problems. Were you aware in September that insurers recommended a delay in the launch of the exchange?

SEBELIUS: I was not aware that they recommended delay. I know everyone was concerned that there were risks and there were likely to be problems with a brand new integrated insurance system. I don't think anyone ever estimated the degree to which we've had problems in the system, and, certainly, the contracting partners did not.

PITTS: And did HHS respond to the insurers' recommendation to delay the launch?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I can't -- I wasn't in the meeting. I don't know...

PITTS: Can you find out and...

SEBELIUS: ... what occurred at the meeting, and I don't know who they talked to.

PITTS: ... answer that question for us?

SEBELIUS: Sure, I will get back to you.

PITTS: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Mr. Green?

GREEN: Thank you, Mr. Chair.

Madam Secretary, thank you for taking time to be here today.

I represent parts of east and north Houston, Harris County, and our district has one of the highest uninsured rates in the country. Even worse, we have one of the highest rates of people who have jobs but don't receive their insurance through their employer.

It's for this reason that I believe Houston would be a good place for you to come and spend -- spread the word about the tremendous benefits of the Affordable Care Act. However, we learned (inaudible) your office that you're unable to attend because of scheduling conflicts. And I -- hopefully, we can have agreement that some time in the future you'll come to the fourth largest city that probably has the highest number of uninsured in a metropolitan area. And, of course, we're in the state of Texas that has the number of highest uninsured in the country.

The -- it's important to me and our constituents to get it right, and that's why I share your and the president's disappointment the website's not working as planned.

November 30th is not soon enough. Many of my constituents have been waiting for years to be able to purchase health insurance, and we owe it to them to get the marketplaces up and running.

The contractors have not served our country well and should fix it or not be paid.

Now we're hearing about the cancellation letters being sent by insurance companies (inaudible) customers notifying them that their plans are no longer offered. Are these Americans losing their health care coverage because of the Affordable Care Act, or is it because these plans were changed after the enactment of the act?

SEBELIUS: I would say it's the latter, sir. If a plan was in place since the enactment of the act, no one would have received a cancellation...

(CROSSTALK)

GREEN: So if somebody in America had an insurance plan before the act and -- the president was correct: If you have -- if you like what you have, you could keep it.

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

GREEN: The plans were changed, and so now they have to comply with the new law.

SEBELIUS: They can either choose to be grandfathered and keep the same plan, which meant the same benefits and -- and actually the regulation allows insurance companies to charge medical inflation plus a trend line so they didn't have to charge the same price. They could increase it; they could increase co-pays. They could increase co- insurance. What they couldn't do is cancel benefits that the policy holder relied on. They couldn't disadvantage the policy holder. But if that plan is in effect, absolutely, it is still in effect.

GREEN: OK, but some of these millions of letters we're hearing about are probably because their plans changed?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Absolutely. And again, in the individual market, plans change every year. Insurers design new products...

GREEN: And that's -- even in the small business market that happens. So these plans are not allowed now, because they're completely inadequate. They don't offer the minimum essential benefits, is that correct?

SEBELIUS: That is correct.

GREEN: OK. And having been a state legislator -- and I know as governor in Kansas -- I assume every state has some type of minimum mandated benefits that they have for their health insurance plans.

SEBELIUS: They do, but it applies, again, sir, in the past usually to the group markets, where 90 percent of covered Americans get their policies. This market has always been the wild west.

(CROSSTALK)

GREEN: OK. The Americans who received those letters from their companies about cancellations, they're eligible to purchase plans on the exchange?

SEBELIUS: Or out of the exchange. Individuals who don't -- aren't interested in some kind of financial help can go outside the exchange, inside the exchange. Their insurer can offer them plans. They have choices they've never had before.

GREEN: And because of the benefits of the Affordable Care Act, 80 percent of their premium dollar will come back to them?

SEBELIUS: That's correct. That's...

(CROSSTALK)

GREEN: OK. And that's not true -- and I don't -- I know it's not true in Texas, but I don't know what -- any states that have that 80 percent requirement.

SEBELIUS: Well, no state had it, I would suggest, in that kind of broad base prior to the Affordable Care Act, so it's...

(CROSSTALK)

GREEN: Let me give you an example of one of the plans I found out doing case work a few years ago. A large company provided $25,000 maximum benefit for their employees in the year. Most employees didn't know about it, and -- until this one constituent found out that she had cancer. And the bill ended up being $300,000. And so that's some of those plans that are not being allowed to be sold now, is that correct?

SEBELIUS: Well, not only will (ph) the plan have a limit on out- of-pocket costs per year, it will have a limit on a lifetime out-of- pocket costs and it will have -- it will take away the notion that you would run out of your coverage in the middle of a treatment, which a lot of plans do.

GREEN: I know I'm out of my time, but it's like buying a car...

(CROSSTALK)

GREEN: ... look good, but if it doesn't have a motor, it's no good to have that car.

(CROSSTALK)

GREEN: So that's why the Affordable Care Act has...

SEBELIUS: Save a lot of gas, but it doesn't get you...

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Gentleman's time has expired.

Gentleman from Oregon, Mr. Walden.

WALDEN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Governor -- Secretary, we're delighted to have you before the committee. You and I both know how important this issue is to all Americans that we get it right.

So I hope you can appreciate, we're trying to understand what we missed along the way. And -- and one of the things that bothered me was the letter that was sent from your agency to the GAO back in -- June 6th. And I'll read in part, it said, "We're in the final stages of finalizing and testing the I.T. infrastructure that will support the application enrollment process. HHS is extremely confident that on October 1, the marketplace will open on schedule and millions of Americans will have access to affordable, quality health insurance."

I'm just an average guy from a small town in Oregon, but when I read that, it tells me you believed everything was good to go, the testing was in place, and we should have full confidence everything would work. Correct?

SEBELIUS: That's the letter I signed, yes, sir.

WALDEN: Actually, it was signed by your assistant.

SEBELIUS: Or whoever -- yes, yes.

WALDEN: But the same point.

And so I went into this believing in your response -- your agency's response to GAO, things were ready to go, we should have full confidence, because when somebody uses the word "extremely confident," tells me you're extremely confident.

Second piece, then when we had the testimony from the witnesses last week, I asked them about the end-to-end testing and what the industry standard would be, and they said it really should have been months, especially for a project of this magnitude. And yet we heard it was only two weeks.

Now in August, GCI told CMS in their report...

SEBELIUS: CGI.

WALDEN: I'm sorry, CGI, thank you.

That on August 9th that there was not enough time in the schedule to conduct adequate performance testing. Did that make its way all the way to you? And do you think there was adequate time?

SEBELIUS: Sir, clearly, as I've said before, we did not adequately do end-to-end testing. The products were not locked and loaded into the system until the third week in September. Each of the component parts...

WALDEN: Right...

SEBELIUS: ... was tested, validated...

WALDEN: ... they told us that.

SEBELIUS: ... independently validated end-to-end (ph).

WALDEN: I'm sorry.

All those worked, though, right? They told us last week that their individual modules were tested and met specification. Do you concur with that analysis based on what you know?

SEBELIUS: I do concur with the testing that was done, yes.

WALDEN: OK, so it really was the end-to-end -- which is why some of us thought we should delay until it could be done right to avoid this very collapse that now is upon us. And I realize not everybody agreed to (ph) that.

The second piece here gets back to The Washington Post, which I realize you haven't had -- and I understand -- a chance to read this morning, but the four Pinocchios about the president repeatedly saying, 'If you have a plan, you'll keep your plan.' We all heard that to mean, 'I've got a plan with a company. I'll continue to have it even if they make minor changes,' when in fact your own rules as written said, no, that's really isn't what's going to happen. If minor changes are made that means the plan changed; that means you don't get it.

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, that isn't true. They (ph) -- rules did not say what you just suggested, and I think the estimate, given that there would be turnover in the market, was really an outside projection. It wasn't our rules. It's -- it was a snapshot of what happens in the market; that plans change so dramatically...

WALDEN: Sure, every year.

SEBELIUS: ... over time that the estimate was -- they wouldn't be -- not because of our rules, but because of insurance companies' business decisions.

(CROSSTALK)

WALDEN: Well, but you set up what (ph) those market rules looked like they had to comply with, correct?

SEBELIUS: Only if they chose not to grandfather the policy. That's...

WALDEN: But that meant they couldn't make any change (ph)...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Any grandfathered policy stayed in place, still would be in place.

WALDEN: Right, but if they made...

SEBELIUS: ... none of these rules apply.

WALDEN: But if they made any change...

SEBELIUS: No, they could make changes in pricing. They could make changes in benefits. They couldn't dramatically disadvantage the consumer, but they could have trend lines. They -- they had a wide corridor to make sure that -- that a similar plan -- so if a consumer liked the plan, the plan, if it stayed...

(CROSSTALK)

WALDEN: So here's what the practical implication -- I've got letters from constituents all over my district who have gotten letters from their insurers who say because of Obamacare, they're no longer going to be in the individual market, or at least with that plan in the individual market. And the result is this person from Cove, Oregon, said, "I was paying $600 a month for a $3,000 deductible. Now it costs me $800 a month for a $5,000 deductible."

I've got others here, I'll put in the record.

A woman whose job -- she had 40 hours, now down to 29. Neither has health insurance, nor enough income to live on her own because of the way this law is getting implemented.

I realize my time's (ph) expired.

UPTON: Gentlelady from Colorado, Ms. DeGette.

DEGETTE: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you, Secretary, for being with us today.

I want to follow up on a couple of those questions that Mr. Walden was asking you about CGI. As you know, Chairman Issa last night released this document, monthly project status report from CGI last night, and it looks to me as sort of a technical document that has a punch list of outstanding open issues.

And some of them do highlight items that upon first read seem to be alarming. For example, one of the entries said, "Due to the compressed schedule there's not enough time built in to allow for adequate performance testing." And this certainly, in retrospect, sounds bad. But the date of the document that Chairman Issa released is September 6th, and then on September 10th, four days later, CGI came into this committee and testified under oath, quote, "CGI Federal is confident it will develop -- deliver the functionality that CMS has directed."

And -- and we're -- we're trying to figure out, or at least I'm trying to figure out, how CGI is now coming in and saying, you know, 'We warned everybody that this wasn't gonna be ready,' when they came in and directly told me that they would be ready to launch on October 1st.

So it kind of raises a question, how these statements can be reconciled. One explanation is that CGI was lying to this committee. I think that's unlikely. Another is that CGI thought that the items flagged in the report were like a punch list that could be addressed.

So here's my question to you, Madam Secretary: Was CGI telling your department the same thing that they told the committee on September 10th, that the company was confident that its programs would be ready?

SEBELIUS: Congresswoman, all of the contractors testified here in September and again, I think, last week before this committee. And the testimony was fairly similar, that they were ready to go in September. They were asked in -- last week if they had suggested that we should delay the launch date. Each of them said, no. I think the chairman...

(CROSSTALK)

DEGETTE: So they never asked you to delay the launch date?

SEBELIUS: They did not. And, frankly, I -- I think it is not valuable at this point...

DEGETTE: Right.

SEBELIUS: ... to do a lot of pointing blame, fixing the blame. What I want to do is fix the problem.

DEGETTE: And so do I...

SEBELIUS: I think we need the whole team to move ahead, and we will report back regularly.

DEGETTE: Right, but we're relying on these contractors to fix this. And so that goes to my last question, which is Mr. Zients has now come in and he says the site is going to be functional for the vast majority of users by the end of November. Is that right?

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

DEGETTE: And given what CGI told us and the other vendors, do you believe that that is correct? Do you believe it will be pretty much ready to go by the end of November?

SEBELIUS: I do. And I think that we are making improvements each and every day. It is easier to use now than it was two weeks. It is way from where we need it to be.

DEGETTE: So it's not like it's all going to be fine by the end of November. It's beginning to improve already. Is that your testimony?

SEBELIUS: It is a continuous process, as websites are. Patches are made, fixes are made on an ongoing basis. And as we find issues like Congresswoman Eshoo talked about, we are fixing them in real time.

DEGETTE: And you're going to guarantee yes or no that people will have privacy when they go on this site?

SEBELIUS: Absolutely.

DEGETTE: Now I just want to say one last thing. I was on the Washington Journal where callers call in this morning, and I had a man, Max, call in. And he said he got one of those letters from the insurance companies that his insurance was canceled. So what he did is he went on to the website and he -- under the federal exchange and he found a better plan, and now he's going to sign up. So I would hope that that's what everybody would be able to do. And I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Mr. Terry?

TERRY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I'm pleased to hear that the website will be fully operational by the end of November. And would be able to -- would you come back to our committee so we can see if that's actually accomplished and how it was accomplished?

SEBELIUS: I will make every effort to do that.

TERRY: OK. You were governor and state insurance commissioner in Kansas, and I reached out to our state insurance commissioner and governor and found out that they have absolutely no data about Nebraskans who have either tried to enroll or enrolled.

As you know, Nebraska is one of the states that opted not to do their own exchange and rely on the federal exchange. So it's interesting to me that neither our insurance commissioner nor the governor's office had any data about Nebraskans and this -- this -- and enrolling in these plans.

I also asked our insurance commissioner if any of the navigators, if they knew who the navigators were and whether they had to apply to be certified or licensed in essence like an insurance agent would be. And they told me they have no clue who's been authorized by HHS to be a navigator and work with people in Nebraska.

So this is concerning to me, so I'm going to ask you a few questions along this line. First of all, do you have data on how many people in general in the United States have tried to enroll in a plan through this website?

SEBELIUS: No, sir. We do not have any reliable data around enrollment, which is why we haven't given it to date.

TERRY: Or have any data on how many people have tried to enroll but because of the problems have not been able to accomplish that?

SEBELIUS: No, sir. I can tell you I met with insurers last week. And one of the priority fixes is the so-called 834s, the document that sends an individual's name to a company and verifies it. That is one of the systems that is not working.

TERRY: I appreciate that. And the contractors I asked specifically about the information of how many people have tried to enroll and enrolled, and they say they do have those numbers but can't tell us that because of a contract with HHS saying that they -- they're gagged on that information.

SEBELIUS: I would suggest that the numbers are not reliable according to (inaudible).

TERRY: Well, I'll tell you what. My question is going to be though will you on the record right now authorize them to give us those numbers and let us determine whether those are reliable?

SEBELIUS: No, sir. I want to give you reliable, confirmed data from every state and from the federal marketplace. We have said that we will do that on a monthly basis. By the middle of the month you will have that data, but I don't want to turn over anything that is not confirmed and reliable, and that's what we'll do.

TERRY: Well, but that data out there exists and you will not let us (inaudible)

SEBELIUS: Sir, I would -- I would tell you right now it is not reliable data. According to the insurance companies who are eager to have customers, they are not getting reliable data all the way through the system (inaudible) real problems that we have.

TERRY: The number of people that have clicked on and tried to get or enrolled, I'm not asking about what they enrolled in or whether they came in and said they were 65 and were quoted something that they were 27 years old. That should be a pretty reliable number just on the surface. So would you...

SEBELIUS: The system isn't functioning, so we are not getting that reliable data. Insurers who I met with said that that is the case. We know that there's 700,000 applications that have been (inaudible).

TERRY: The reliability of that data certainly flies in the face of the testimony from the contractors. All right. I yield back.

UPTON: Ms. Capps?

CAPPS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Secretary Sebelius, for your presence here today and your testimony. While I too am frustrated with the flawed rollout of healthcare.gov, I do appreciate your longstanding commitment to improving the health care options for all Americans and fixing this website quickly.

I think it's important to note that in my home state of California and other states as well, the new exchange marketplace, we call it Covered California, is working. And rates -- constituents are finding that rates are as much as 29 percent less than those that they found on the marketplace last year.

I'm thankful my constituents now have this option. And as I look around to implementation nationwide, it seems clear to me that political decisions in individual states have really made the difference for consumers.

The governors and legislators -- state legislators that embrace this law are delivering for their communities, but those elected who are trying to ignore the opportunities presented and continue to throw up road blocks both here in Congress and in state legislatures should not now seem surprised that there are significant bumps along the way.

This seems to me to be completely disingenuous. Having embraced the law since open enrollment began October 1, Californians have started nearly 180,000 applications with more beginning every day.

I know my time is limited, but I want to have a second to mention a conversation I had just last night with a (inaudible) town hall to my district on the central coast of California. One of the first callers I heard from was a mother from Santa Barbara. Her name's Meryl, and she wanted to tell me the story of her son.

Her son is 28 years old and he had been paying $425 a month for his insurance before the Affordable Care Act. She was happy to report that he has already applied through Covered California and has found a policy that works better for him. It has all the essential health benefits covered, which his former policy did not, and now will only cost him $109 a month.

This is significant savings for Meryl's son, and this is a story that's being repeated at least in California often. So there are millions of residents in many states who have now set up their own websites and marketplaces. In those states, tens of thousands of people are now as we speak signing up for coverage. And this is demonstrating that the Affordable Care Act is working.

In New York and Washington, over 30,000 people have enrolled. In Oregon, over 50,000 people have been enrolled. Kentucky, 31,000 people have been enrolled. We could go on and on. The success of the state exchanges, which is where this is meant to be implemented, shows how badly this law is wanted and needed, how much it will be of help to so many people who want quality, affordable health care.

So my three quick questions to you are this, Madam Speaker (ph). What is your assessment of how this first month have been gone -- has gone in the states that are running their own marketplaces, which this Congress intended that the Affordable Care Act work?

SEBELIUS: Well everything we hear from the state-based markets is that they are doing well. They have not submitted data yet. We, again, are working with them around a monthly schedule so that they will confirm Medicaid data and enrollment data. And we'll see the real numbers at the end of the month and make sure that the -- they're available to the public.

But everything we hear is that they see the same demand, they are eager to enroll folks and that that is going smoothly.

CAPPS: And what do you think this success shows about the demand and the interest for affordable health insurance on the part of constituents?

SEBELIUS: Well I don't think there's any question that in spite of a series of road blocks and blockades and a lot of misinformation driven by about a $400 million marketing campaign last year, Americans are eager to see what their benefits may be under the law, what their opportunities are, how to get health security for themselves and their families, and we want to make sure that they see those benefits.

The website is one of the ways to do that. The call center, on the ground enrollment, personal outreach, are a variety of ways, and I would tell your colleague, Mr. Congressman, I'd be happy to get you the list of the Nebraska folks who are on the ground. It's available easily. It's public record, so I'd be happy to send it to you, so you could share it with your insurance commissioner and governor.

UPTON: The gentlelady's time has expired.

Gentleman from the great state of Michigan, Mr. Rogers.

ROGERS: Thank you.

Thank you, Madam Secretary, for being here. Short time, get through some questions here, if I can.

Is it your testimony that the -- that there -- every night to try to increase the functionality of the system you're hot swapping codes?

So my understanding is that between 2:00 and 4:00, write new code, put it into the system, yes or no?

SEBELIUS: Clearly, I am not hot swapping code. There is a technical team...

(CROSSTALK)

ROGERS: No, no. You are in charge of the operation that hot swaps code on functionality. Is that -- you're trying to improve the functionality, yes?

So that happens every night, yes?

SEBELIUS: No, I don't think it does happen every night. It happens periodically during the hours of 1:00 and 5:00, but it is not a nightly feature.

ROGERS: Great.

Has each piece of that code that's been introduced in the system been security tested?

SEBELIUS: That's my understanding, yes, sir. And the testing...

ROGERS: Each piece of that code has been tested? Yes or no?

SEBELIUS: I don't know, but I can tell you that security...

ROGERS: That's a much safer answer, trust me.

SEBELIUS: ... is an ongoing operation that as code is loaded, you need to retest over and over and over again. So whether it's pretested, I can't tell you.

ROGERS: All right. You need to test the code.

Have any end-to-end security tests been conducted since healthcare.gov went live on October 1st, yes or no?

SEBELIUS: My understanding is, there's continuous testing as the -- our temporary authority to operate calls for.

ROGERS: Yes or no, has an end-to-end security test on healthcare.gov went live, yes or no?

SEBELIUS: I will find out exactly what testing they are doing. I know they are doing simultaneous testing as new code is loaded.

ROGERS: Are there any end-to-end security tests run after every new piece of code is put -- I'm not talking about testing the code now, I'm talking about an end-to-end security test.

SEBELIUS: I can tell you how...

ROGERS: Covers the cost of the boundaries...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: ... I can get you that information.

ROGERS: I can tell you they are not, and I'd be interested to hear why not.

Tab -- if you go to tab two quickly in your book, I'm going to read three things...

SEBELIUS: What book, sir?

ROGERS: You have a tab there. If you go to tab two -- right there.

Well, while you're looking, I'll read. It's dated September 27th, and it is to Marilyn Tavenner. Let me just -- a couple of pieces here.

"There are inherent security risks with not having all code tested in a single environment. Finally, the system requires rapid development and release of hot fixes and patches so it is not always available or stable during the duration of the testing."

Secondly, "The security contractor has not been able to test all of the security controls in one complete version of the system."

And if you look in the first part, which is most troubling at all, it says, "Due to system readiness issues, the security control assessment was only partly completed. This constitutes a risk that must be accepted before the marketplace day one operations."

And so let me tell you what you did.

You allowed the system to go forward with no encryption on back- up systems. They had no encryption on certain boundary crossings. You accepted a risk on behalf of every user of this computer that put their personal financial information at risk because you did not even have the most basic end-to-end test on security of this system.

Amazon would never do this. ProFlowers would never do this. Kayak would never do this.

This is completely an unacceptable level of security. And here's the scary part, we found out after the contractors last week that an end-to-end test hadn't been conducted on security, not functionality, because if it's not functioning, you know it's not secure.

Your ongoing hot patches without end-to-end tests: the private contractors told us it would take a very thorough two months just for an integrated end-to-end security test, that I'll tell you has not happened to date.

Why? Because you're constantly adding new code every night to protect the functionality of the system. You have exposed millions of Americans because you all, according to your memo, believed it was an acceptable risk.

Don't you think you had the obligation to tell the American people that we're going to put you in this system, but beware, your information is likely to be vulnerable?

Would you commit today, Secretary, to shut down the system and do an end-to-end security test so that these Americans can have their information...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: No, sir. If you read the memo...

ROGERS: Oh, I have read it.

SEBELIUS: ... say that weekly testing of our berta (ph) devices, including interface testing, daily, weekly scans are going on. This is a temporary authority...

ROGERS: (Inaudible), that's not what the memo says, number one, and number two, the contractors will tell you...

(CROSSTALK)

(UNKNOWN): Mr. Chairman, point of order. I think the witness ought to be allowed to answer what was a speech by the colleague, because he's raised a lot of issues.

UPTON: If the gentlelady will quickly answer.

ROGERS: (Inaudible) here today, that's...

UPTON: Does the secretary wish to respond briefly?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I would just say this document is a document signed by Administrator Tavenner, which discusses mitigation strategies for security that are ongoing and upgraded and a authorization to operate on a permanent basis will not be signed until these mitigation strategies are satisfied. It is under way right now, but daily and weekly monitoring and testing is under way.

ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, there are people using this system today and she's just admitted again the system isn't secure nor has (inaudible).

UPTON: The gentleman...

(UNKNOWN): Mr. Chairman, she didn't admit that. You said it, but she didn't say it.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

Mr. Doyle.

DOYLE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, welcome.

Those of us who fought for this law, who voted for this law, have a vested interest in its success, and the concerns that you here expressed on this side of the panel are real, because we want to see Americans get health care.

I think it's somewhat disingenuous for my colleagues on the other side of the podium here to have this faux anger and this faux concern over a bill that they absolutely want to fail and have rooted for its failure and have voted over 40-some times to repeal this bill, never putting an alternative plan on the floor for the American people, but just to simply say they want to make sure this plan doesn't succeed.

And I think the real fear is, that the plan will succeed and the American people will learn of the real benefits of this plan, not the propaganda campaign that's gone on by the Republicans for the last three years.

Madam Secretary, I think one of the keys to success of this plan is that we get young people to enroll in this plan. And I have some questions about some enrollment concerns that I have.

Now I understand that you've said approximately 700,000 people have applied for coverage via the healthcare.gov and the state exchanges, is that -- is that...?

SEBELIUS: They've completed an application.

DOYLE: Right. Which is different from enrollment.

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

DOYLE: So my question is, are you expecting -- I know you don't have exact numbers yet, but are you expecting a large number or a small month number of enrollments during the first month?

What is your thoughts on that?

SEBELIUS: Well, our projections prior to launch were always that there would be a very small number at the beginning. We watch the Massachusetts trend, which started slowly and built. I think there's no question that given our flawed launch of healthcare.gov, it will be a very small number.

DOYLE: Yes, I mean, in the Massachusetts plan, I think the first month it was 123 people signed up, less than 1 percent of the overall first-year enrollment in that first month. And we saw the same kind of numbers in Medicare Part D the first month of open enrollment back in 2006.

Madam Secretary, young Americans are the most likely age group to be uninsured, and a lot of us are concerned because of the problems that we've been having with the website, that a lot of these young folks may not come back on; you know, they have very short attention spans.

I've got four kids that all work on the Internet, and if they can't get something in five minutes, they are on to something else.

What do we do, and what plans are in place by your department to encourage young people to go back and revisit that site and to make sure that we're getting young people looking at that site and accessing it?

SEBELIUS: Well, step number one is fix the site, because we don't want people to be invited back and then have a bad experience a second time around. I think that's absolutely right. The site is particularly important to tech-savvy younger generation folks who we need to enroll.

I think that we have -- so fixing the site is step one.

And step number two is getting information to folks that the law even exists. A lot of young people haven't followed this dialogue for the last three and a half years.

(CROSSTALK)

DOYLE: Yes, I think we need a real marketing campaign, and we really need to reach out to young people, especially at the end of November when you say this site is going to be working a lot better, to make sure they are checking that site out.

SEBELIUS: You bet.

DOYLE: One of my four kids is self-employed. He's 33 years old, paying about $140 a month for a Blue Cross plan. He's eligible for a subsidy. We browsed that site. He's gonna able to get coverage for about half of what he's paying right now, and that's good news for us, because I think my wife is paying his premium, so I think we're going to save the money.

But I think it's important we had to prod him to go on that site and enroll, and I think for a lot of young people, they are not going to do it unless it's easy, so it's important we get that fixed. Thank you.

SEBELIUS: I agree.

UPTON: Dr. Murphy, chairman of the oversight subcommittee.

MURPHY: Thank you, Madam Secretary, and welcome.

You had mentioned that the people who did the technology on the website made a number of mistakes, you mentioned Verizon. When we had them before our committee last week, they said it wasn't their fault they were told within HHS there was some problems there.

SEBELIUS: Sir, Verizon wasn't involved in the website (inaudible)...

(CROSSTALK)

MURPHY: Right, with the data, I understand, I'm sorry.

But they had a role, CGI had a role, other companies, et cetera. I'm just curious in this process, what decisions did you make that affected this for better or worse in terms of the data, the ease, or problems with the implement and being able to track how many people are actually enrolled?

SEBELIUS: My decisions (sic) specifically to design the website, I was not involved. I am prohibited to choose contractors. We go by the federal procurement, and I got regular reports on exactly what was done...

MURPHY: What about the part with regard to getting data in terms of how many people are even enrolled or trying to enroll, did you have any decisions in that process?

SEBELIUS: The application process, at this point, does not work end to end very well.

MURPHY: Right, I understand it doesn't work, that's obvious.

SEBELIUS: We do not have reliable data about the end of...

MURPHY: I'm just trying to find out, if you had asked them, to say look, I'm in charge of this, I'm going to want a regular report, how many people have tried to enroll, how many people have enrolled, have you -- did you ask that question?

SEBELIUS: We have prioritized for our contractors that specific fix, and believe me, the insurance companies are eager for us to get reliable data to make sure their data matches ours, and that is not there yet.

MURPHY: I'm just trying to -- I appreciate that. I'm trying to find out if you told them that was part of the plan and what they're doing.

Let me -- real quick, I'm hearing -- we're hearing from thousands of people who have had their policies canceled. In fact, I heard from one insurer in Pittsburgh that just canceled 30,000 individual policies.

Now, they said they expect 50,000 to 30,000 to enroll in the exchange plans. Just so you know, to date, so far, the number of people who have signed up for their plan is 10, 10.

Now I'm concerned a lot of these individuals and families aren't going to be able to make it by January 1, so I'm wondering, do you know how many families will not have been able to keep their insurance by January 1, do you have any matrix (sic) to help you understand what that is going to be?

SEBELIUS: Sir, by law that has been in place at the state level, insurance companies must give their customers a 90-day notice about a policy change or a plan cancellation.

MURPHY: I'm just wondering if you have a mechanism whereby you will know if something built in this system...

SEBELIUS: Will I know if your constituents signed up for an individual plan, no.

MURPHY: People across America.

And do we know how many policies will be canceled? I mean, is it 1,000, 10,000, 1 million, 5 million, do we know?

SEBELIUS: We know that in the individual market, a number of the plans having sold are not grandfathered and are not currently meeting the law. Those notices have gone out. We know there are about 12 million people in the individual market. A number of them have grandfathered plans. A number of them have plans which meet the essential health benefits. So I can try to...

MURPHY: Let me put a face on that.

Person named Paul wrote to me, and says, "I'm supposedly one of the families this act is supposed to help, but it's, in fact, is hurting more, and would make it harder for my family to live. We'll have less money for food and other essential items. I have a wife and four children to take care of."

Another person wrote, "I received -- I had a 2013 plan which if you include the premiums, and out of pocket total liability was $5,300. For 2014, the same program liability is $9,000.

Single mom writes, "I want to convey, I'm one of the millions of people who's having their health insurance canceled, because it does not meet the standards of Obamacare. I liked my insurance. I especially liked the price. And now I'm being forced to sign up for something that will be way more expensive. As a single mom who is self employed, I'm worried about how I'm going to pay my bills."

I hope you have a mechanism to track who these people are. She's not eligible for other subsidies, but the costs are going to be driving her down.

SEBELIUS: Well sir, again, I would suggest there is no requirement that any of those consumers sign up for a plan suggested by their company at a higher price. They have now options...

MURPHY: But if a plan changes...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: (OFF-MIKE) health underwriting, without preexisting conditions, with some guarantees around...

MURPHY: She's searching around and she can't find a plan she could afford.

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: (OFF-MIKE) they never had before.

MURPHY: She can't find a plan she can afford.

UPTON: Gentleman's time expired.

Gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. Butterfield.

BUTTERFIELD: Mr. Chairman, before my time begins, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

UPTON: Yes, go ahead.

BUTTERFIELD: Mr. Chairman, I'm always sensitive to committee decorum and I want to ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to display the Democratic Twitter handle.

UPTON: Go ahead.

BUTTERFIELD: Hear no objection, thank you.

Secretary Sebelius, thank you so very much for coming today. I would like to ask you about the document that my Republican colleagues have just released.

This document is an authority to operate memorandum to operate the federally facilitated marketplace for six months and implement a security mitigation plan.

This document, as I understand it, describes security testing for healthcare.gov. It says that security testing of the marketplace was ongoing since its inception, and into September of this year. In fact, it says that, quote, "Throughout the three rounds of security control assessment testing, all of the security controls have been tested on different versions of the system." that's good news.

But the bad news is, that it goes on to say that, because of system readiness, a complete security assessment of all the security controls in one complete version of the system were not tested.

This document indicates that CMS postponed a final security assessment screening, but in its place, CMS did put in place a number of mitigation measures, and it concluded that these measures would mitigate any security risk.

Question, are you familiar with this document?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

BUTTERFIELD: Is it correct that this document recommends implementing a dedicated security team to monitor, track, and ensure the mitigation plan activities are completed?

SEBELIUS: Yes, it does.

BUTTERFIELD: Now is it correct that this document recommends monitoring and performing weekly testing on all berta (ph) devices, including Internet-facing web servers?

SEBELIUS: More than recommended, it's underway.

BUTTERFIELD: Is it correct this document recommends conducting daily and weekly scans?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

BUTTERFIELD: Does this document recommend conducting a full SEA test on the marketplace in a stable environment?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

BUTTERFIELD: Is it correct that this document recommends migrating the marketplace to CMS's virtual data center environment in the first quarter of next year?

SEBELIUS: Yes, it does.

BUTTERFIELD: My understanding is that an independent security expert, the MITRE Corporation, is performing security testing on the code that powers the website on an ongoing basis, is that correct?

SEBELIUS: That is correct, and MITRE did an assessment of the system, gave us a preliminary report, they are in the process of posting their final report. That did not raise flags about going ahead, and the mitigation strategy was put in place to make sure that we had a temporary authority to operate in place while the mitigation was going on, and then a permanent authority to operate will be signed.

BUTTERFIELD: Finally, do you have confidence in these and other measures you are taking to protect the security of Americans' personal information?

SEBELIUS: I do, sir.

BUTTERFIELD: Thank you.

This is the third time you've said it during the hearing, and we believe you. Thank you.

What you're telling us is that these remedial actions and the ongoing security testing from MITRE are protecting the security of the website. That's a message that it's important for the public to hear.

My Republican colleagues do not want this website to work.

I am convinced of that.

They want to block the ACA at all costs and even shut down the government to stop the law. For the last four years, they have taken every glitch, every simple glitch, and hiccup in the law and tried to exaggerate its significance, and that's happening today and it's so disappointing.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

UPTON: Dr. Burgess.

BURGESS: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I may make a unanimous consent request also?

UPTON: Yes, go ahead.

BURGESS: I would like to request unanimous consent my opening statement, which we were not allowed to be given could be made part of the record to this hearing.

UPTON: No -- no -- without objection.

BURGESS: And further, I do have a number of questions, many have come from constituents, I would also like to submit those as questions for the record...

UPTON: Without objection.

BURGESS: ... and ask the secretary for her attention to those so we can get answers, because they are, after all, important questions.

OK, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

It just came to my attention that on CNN -- the -- CNN's website, that the site was hacked just last week, and I will be happy to make this available to you. I don't think...

SEBELIUS: The CNN website?

BURGESS: The -- CNN ran a story that the healthcare.gov website was hacked last week. And again, I will get this to you and would appreciate your response to that.

Mr. Terry had asked a question about -- he wanted to get the information about the number of people who'd signed up. You said you wouldn't provide that because it wasn't accurate.

Would you provide us with the number of people who have been able to enroll on the telephone? The president gave an 800-number during his speech. Could we get a number of people who've enrolled on the telephone?

SEBELIUS: No, sir, we do not have reliable enrollment data. We will have that to you by the middle of November as we committed to. We are collecting state data, we are collection telephone data, we are collecting paper data, we are collecting website data. We want it to be reliable and accountable and that's what you'll have to...

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: OK. Reclaiming my time. Telephone data doesn't seem like it would be that difficult to compile since the number is likely quite low.

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: The telephone goes through the system.

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: You have, or the president designated, I call him a glitch czar, Jeffrey Zients. Your familiar with his appointment to the -- to oversee...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I asked him to serve in this capacity, yes.

BURGESS: OK. Many of us on the Subcommittee of Oversight and Investigations in Energy and Commerce were not as comforted as you by that selection because if you'll recall, Mr. Zients' history with this subcommittee is not great. He was involved with Solyndra, we asked him to come and talk to us about Solyndra in 2011. He refused, requiring a subpoena to be issued by this -- by this subcommittee. Will you commit to making Mr. Zients available to our subcommittee for our questions?

SEBELIUS: Congressman, you are welcome to ask Mr. Zients to come before the committee. He is volunteering his services to us for a period of time. He has been appointed by the President to start in January as the head of the National Economic Council. He was the Deputy Director at OMB for Management and Performance. I am thrilled that he is willing to take on this assignment and help us drive the management, but...

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: Again, his -- his appearance here will be important. Now a lot of people are asking if the president's words leading up to this law, if they matter, and the statement in the Washington Post today edited the President's statement, saying, "If you like your health care plan, you'll be able to keep your health care plan if we deem it adequate," but that seems like a more operational statement, and especially if you go back just a few years into the Federal Register, and I'm quoting here from the Federal Register from July 23rd of 2010, just a few months after the law was signed. The -- the rule, or the interim rule for dealing with the grandfathering written in the Federal Record, "because newly-purchased individual policies are not grandfathered, the department expects that a large population of individual policies will not be grandfathered, covering up to and perhaps exceeding 10 million people."

I hope the president was apprised of that before he made these statements, because clearly his statement wasn't operational.

SEBELIUS: Again, that's an insurance company choice, and that was a snapshot of what the market looks like.

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: Your...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: The President made it clear, and our policy was to put a grandfather clause in both employer-based coverage and in individual coverage.

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: Right, but in the Federal Register, those were the comments that were recorded. Now, I do have to...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: No, this isn't a government takeover of anything. These are private insurance plans making private decisions.

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: I do have to ask you this. I do have to ask you this. You serve at the pleasure of the President, we're all aware of that. But we have had many of your employees here in front of this committee, and you do have to ask yourself, are these being purposely misleading, or are they really not that smart? So I'm going to ask you this morning, for the sake of the future of health care in this country, will you please ask for the resignation of Gary Cohen, because he's repeatedly come to this committee and misled us.

SEBELIUS: I will not, sir.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

(UNKNOWN): Mr. Chairman, point of personal privilege. I just think the record ought to be clear about Jeffrey Zients. He was invited with less than a week's notice to come before this committee. He couldn't make it that day, he asked for some other day, he went to OMB and had nothing to do with the Solyndra contract, and he did come before us and talk about it, but his sole role was to represent OMB and I don't think he ought to have any -- there ought to be any disparagement of Jeffrey Zients. He's a very well-regarded public servant.

UPTON: The gentleman says the statement will stand. Ms. Matsui?

MATSUI: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Welcome, Madam Secretary. Now we all agree the website problems must be resolved. It's this country invented and developed the Internet and the concept of the websites, so there are high expectations. The fact that the hired private contractors could not build a ready website nearly three years is inexcusable, and after it's fixed, I hope the administration will hold those at fault accountable. But we can't lose sight of the big picture, that when this is all said and done, every American will have affordable quality health insurance and health care.

This is the goal, I believe, of all Democrats and Republicans. The ACA's working in California, and it's working in my district in Sacramento, and I just want to tell you about a letter I got from a constituent. "Dear Congresswoman Matsui, as a self-employed contract employee, I've had individually-purchased health insurance for 11 years now. Insurance has gone up every year, sometimes more than once, insurance that wouldn't let me add my daughter when my ex- husband stopped his insurance policy that covered them both, insurance that I have underused for fear they would drop me, insurance that has just dropped me anyway because they decided they would no longer offer individual plans. This could have happened to me at any time. I'm so grateful that the Affordable Care Act provisions make it possible to get health insurance beginning in January for me and my daughter. As all this is happening, I have finished graduate school and started my own business. Slowly but surely things are happening and I expect to be hiring my first employees in the next six months. The provisions of the ACA are helping me in this too. I can clearly see what it will cost me to provide health benefits for my future employees, understand these costs, and build my business plan accordingly." And that is just one of the letters I have received.

Now, I've also heard from my colleagues on the other side of the aisle complain again and again about how health care reform is increasing health care costs. But the empirical evidence shows something quite different. The recent trends in Medicare spending growth are really quite remarkable. Medicare spending growth is at historically low levels, growing by less than one-half of 1 percent in fiscal year 2012, following slow growth in 2010 and 2011. The same is true on the private side of health care. Personal consumption expenditures on health care, everything from health insurance to drugs to hospital care, rose by just over 1 percent in the past year. This is the slowest increase in nearly 50 years.

Madam Secretary, what does this data tell us about what has happened to health care costs since the ACA became law?

SEBELIUS: Well Congresswoman, you're absolutely right. In the last three and a half years since the President signed the Affordable Care Act, we have seen a great slowdown in the extraordinary cost increases year in and year out for health care in the Medicare plan, in the Medicaid plan, in private insurance, and in underlying health care costs, which affect every American. Some of that has to do with some of the features that are currently in place around different care delivery and different payment systems that we are helping to drive, given the tools that we have with the Affordable Care Act, more quality outcomes, trying to prevent hospital readmissions, looking at hospital-acquired infections, medical homes that prevent people in the first place or help them stay healthy in their own homes and in their own places.

MATSUI: So it's true that the private insurance costs are growing at the slowest rate in decades also, is that true?

SEBELIUS: That is true.

MATSUI: So am I also correct that the ACA Act (sic) premiums are coming in even lower than projected by experts like the CBO?

SEBELIUS: Well, they're about, on an average, about 16 percent lower than was estimated, that those premiums would be, and that's the premium, not accounting for the number of uninsured or underinsured Americans who will then qualify for financial help. Since they don't have employer coverage, they get some help from the taxpayers paying for that coverage.

MATSUI: Thank you, Madam Secretary.

UPTON: Dr. Gingrey?

GINGREY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Madam Secretary, when you spoke at the Democratic National Convention in Charlotte last September, one of the first statements you made about the Affordable Care Act was, quote, "but for us Democrats, Obamacare is a badge of honor, because no matter who you are, what stage of life you're in, this law is a good thing. First, if you already have insurance you like, you can keep it," and I end the quote. I'd call this a red herring that misled voters, intentional or not. Now perhaps had you known that millions would lose their coverage, families would face financial disaster, as one constituent recently told me, or that the exchange rollout would be plagued by a multitude, multiple delays we've seen, you would not consider such a badge of honor.

GINGREY: The fact is, your words and those of the President as he campaigned last year, that "if you already have insurance you like, you can keep it," seemed to be directly refuted by the millions of cancellation notices already sent to Americans just in the past few weeks. Whether your statement was inaccurate, or as Mr. Hoyer said yesterday, "not precise enough," it does strike me that millions of individuals who, by listening to speeches like yours, voted, believing one thing, now find themselves without coverage and are now scrambling to find coverage in a marketplace that offers more expensive plans with fewer options.

In response to my constituents' calls for help, I created a portal on my website -- no patches or fixes needed -- that allows those who have experienced problems to reach out and tell me about their personal experiences.

In just the last few days, my office has received dozens of complaints regarding increases in their monthly premiums. I received one such notice from a mother in her early 50s who just received a notice that not only will her insurance premiums double, but she will also have to switch insurance -- insurers to keep her doctors due to the effect of the Affordable Care Act.

Can you imagine receiving notices like this? I can tell you that, just in my district, the 11th of Georgia, many more are experiencing this situation. Madam Secretary, this is akin to telling seniors that in a few weeks they're Medicare coverage will be dropped, or their premiums would double.

Now, I know that neither you nor the administration would ever advocate for such a policy. Yet, here you are subjecting those currently in the individual market to such government intervention. And I would hope that you would agree with me in recognizing that these increases are a heavy hardship on my constituents -- on all of our constituents, Republican or Democrat.

Now I'll get to my questions. You know the health care law included a hardship exemption from the individual mandate. Yet, the administration has failed to finalize the application form for the hardship exemption three and one-half years after we passed this law. As of today, can an individual apply for a hardship exemption from the individual mandate on healthcare.gov, yes or no?

SEBELIUS: I don't know.

GINGREY: I do: It's no.

On October 15th, Politico reported that if the online system for getting into Obamacare coverage is rickety, the system for getting out of the mandate doesn't even exist yet. HHS says, it will take another month at least for the administration to finalize the forms for the hardship exemption from the individual mandate.

Why has it taken three and one-half years to finalize a simple application form for an exemption from the individual mandate?

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, as you know, the individual mandate is not in place until next year. We have made it very clear that if somebody is Medicaid eligible in a state that doesn't choose...

(CROSSTALK)

GINGREY: My last question and my last second.

An estimated 16 million people in the individual market have or will receive cancellation notices stating their health insurance coverage does not meet minimum coverage requirements of the Affordable Care Act.

The bill specifically grants you, Madam Secretary, the power to determine the criteria for a hardship exemption. Will you provide all of these individuals a hardship exemption since the Affordable Care Act is taking away their plan? Will do you that?

SEBELIUS: No, sir. And I think those numbers are far from accurate: 95 percent of Americans who have health insurance will be in a continuous plan -- Medicare, Medicaid, employer-based, V.A. -- 95 percent.

Five percent who are in the individual market, a portion of those 5 percent -- a portion of them, about 12 million people -- a fraction of those 12 million will have a plan that doesn't meet the criteria and has not been grandfathered in.

They are indeed receiving notices. Many of those individuals -- half of them -- will be eligible for financial help getting a new plan and they have many more choices in the marketplace. So we will not have a blanket exemption.

GINGREY: Sounds like a hardship to me, Madam Secretary.

UPTON: The gentleman's time expired.

Ms. Christensen.

CHRISTENSEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you Madam Secretary for being here and thank you for all that you and your staff at HHS has done in implementing the Affordable Care Act to insure that it would provide the many benefits to children, to women, to Medicare beneficiaries and to ensure security to those who already have insurance as well as lower costs.

Of course, the biggest complaint has been about the application and the enrollment website, but we have heard over and over from you that those are being addressed.

But you would recall and I know my colleagues would recall that Congressman Rush and I have always been concerned about those who do not have Internet access, those who are uncomfortable using the Internet and would not use it.

So I just wanted to just remind everyone that there are other avenues for enrolling either by telephone or by paper, either alone or with the help of a certified, you know, application assistant.

But my question goes to one of the rumors that has been circulating. There many rumors about how the Affordable Care Act has affected part-time workers. And some of my colleagues on the other side claim that the companies are moving workers to part-time jobs, because of the health care reform law and that low wage workers are being detrimentally affected.

And I understand why these claims are being made as just another part of the on going effort to undermine the law. Would you take a few minutes and just set the record straight on the part-time issue?

SEBELIUS: Certainly.

Ninety-five percent of businesses in this country are small businesses; under 50 full-time employees. And there is no responsibility that any of those employers have to provide health coverage for their employees.

On the other hand, there are now tax credits available for some of the smaller employers who want to offer coverage to actually come into the marketplace.

For the other businesses, the businesses hiring 50 or more, there is a standard that says an employee is considered full-time if he or she works 30 hours a week. And that really came from a market snapshot with help from the small business administration of where employee benefits were in the private market based on hours of work.

What was a part-time or a full-time employee?

What we know about the economic data is the high point of part- time workers was in 2008 and 2009 at the height of the last recession. It has been decreasing each and every year. There is no data to support the fact that there is an up tick based on the impending Affordable Care Act. I'm sure that there may be some individual employers making some business decisions about how many workers they want full-time and how many part-time. But I can tell you there is no economic data or employment data that supports the notion that this is an effect of the law.

CHRISTENSEN: True, and in fact, it's my understanding, that part-time workers are at the lowest percentage of workers in many, many years right now.

SEBELIUS: Well, and for the first time, as you know Congresswoman, part-time workers will have options for affordable health care. They never had that before. They've never had options in the marketplace. They never had some health purchasing coverage for themselves and their families.

Their full-time colleagues have, but they have not. So they will have options.

CHRISTENSEN: And just to be clear, I had another really long question, but the last part of it -- it would be fair to say that the every point along the way you expected this website to work based on everything that you have been told by the contractors up until that point.

SEBELIUS: I expected it to work and I desperately want to get it working. I....

CHRISTENSEN: More than anyone else, I am sure.

SEBELIUS: ... can't tell you how frustrated I am, and we are committed to fixing it. The only thing that I think builds back the confidence of the public is fixing it.

CHRISTENSEN: Thank you.

UPTON: Gentlelady's time expired.

Mr. Scalise.

SCALISE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman for holding the hearing and thank you, Secretary Sebelius, for being with us.

Last week when the contractors built the system were here, I asked them all under oath if they had actually delivered the system they were contracted to build. And all four of them answered yes. I want to ask you, did the contractors deliver the system that you contracted them to build?

SEBELIUS: I don't think I can accurately answer that question. What we know is we've a system that doesn't function properly...

SCALISE: We definitely know that.

SEBELIUS: As we fix things, we'll know more about what is broken along the way. And I'll be able to...

SCALISE: So would someone in your office know -- somebody in your office oversaw this implementation and received the product. And they either said, this is the product we contracted and paid hundreds of millions of dollars to build or it wasn't.

Does somebody have the ability to get that information?

SEBELIUS: Well, I think that we can say that products tested individually, verified individually.

SCALISE: But clearly was an integrated system.

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: (OFF-MIKE) don't work well together.

SCALISE: Well, but, you know, I used to write programs for a living. I developed software products for a living.

If you're developing an integrated system, it's irrelevant if one isolated component works by itself. But when you plug it in together it doesn't work, that's a system that doesn't work.

One of the question I had and others had, somebody in your agency made a decision weeks -- literally weeks before the deployment -- to change the system. Instead of going from a browser ability where somebody just like on Kayak or just like on Amazon.com could go shop for products, look at prices before they purchase, which is how consumers are used to doing this. Y'all made the decision to change it around and gather all their information first before you could let them see prices.

Was that you who made that decision?

SEBELIUS: No, sir.

SCALISE: Was that Ms. Tavenner?

SEBELIUS: It was Ms. Tavenner and a team who looked at not imposing additional...

SCALISE: Did that team make the decision because once they knew once people actually saw the prices, and we're getting reports from all of our constituents of dramatically higher prices than what they were expecting.

Did you make the decision because you knew that when they saw the prices they might not want to buy the product so you wanted to gather their information first?

SEBELIUS: Sir, first I did not make the decision. I was informed about the decision.

We didn't...

SCALISE: Do you agree with the decision?

SEBELIUS: ... rolling off a number of features. And clearly they can see the products. No, there is no requirement to buy anything.

SCALISE: Look, I spent two hours trying to get into the system. I never once got to a point where I could see a price. I did get kicked out many times and got some of those blank screens other people got.

I do want to share stories with you from some of my constituents because I -- we started a page on our -- on Facebook and on Twitter. We are collecting what's called Share with Scalise. People are sending us stories. And we're getting lots of stories from my constituents.

I want to read you a few of them.

Randall (ph) from Mandeville (ph) said "My health care premium went up 30 percent to over $350 a month increase."

We had Michelle (ph) from Slidell (ph), "Our insurance premiums are going up $400 a month and our deductible has increased."

And then you have got Shawn (ph) from Covington (ph), who said, "My current plan through United Health Care is no longer being offered in 2014 due to Obamacare. In fact, I received a letter stating that the new health care law was indeed the reason for the removal of my current health care plan."

Madam Secretary, what you would tell Shawn (ph), who liked his plan and now has lost it? And he was promised by you and the president he'd be able to keep that plan.

What would you tell Shawn (ph) now that he has lost his plan?

SEBELIUS: I would tell Shawn (ph) to shop in the marketplace and out of the marketplace.

SCALISE: Do you really think that's acceptable answer to Shawn?

SEBELIUS: If Shawn (ph) -- again if United chose not to keep Shawn's (ph) plan in effect for Shawn (ph)...

SCALISE: Because of the law. This is the (inaudible).

SEBELIUS: Sir, the law said if you keep Shawn's (ph) plan in place, if he liked his plan, if you only...

SCALISE: But Shawn (ph) liked his plan...

SEBELIUS: ... to Shawn (ph), then the plan is still there.

SCALISE: You and I may disagree over who you work for. I work for Shawn (ph). You work for Shawn (ph), Madam Secretary. Shawn (ph) lost his plan that he liked. And there are thousands and millions of Shawns (ph) throughout this country that lost the plan they liked because some bureaucrat in Washington said we think your plan is not good enough even though you like it, even though you were promised can you keep it, you're now not able to keep that plan.

I think you deserve to give Shawn (ph) a better answer than you just have to go shop for something else even though you lost your plan.

UPTON: The gentleman's time -- the gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. McNerney?

MCNERNEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Madam Secretary for coming today.

I'm going to follow up on Mr. Doyle's line of questioning. One concern I have with the fallout from the website is that many users who tried to sign up and were discouraged because of problems will now be too discouraged to come back once the site is fixed.

So what do you plan to do to get those folks to come back?

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, we intend to invite them back formally by e-mail, by message. But we don't want to do that until we're confident that they will have a different experience.

So fixing the site is step one. And then inviting people back to the site to make it clear that when our timetable is fulfilled, they have four months to shop for affordable health coverage on a fully functioning site.

We know we're going to have to spend special time on young and healthy Americans who don't start out thinking they need insurance, aren't aware of the law, certainly don't want to use a failed or flawed site. So we're have to spend some particular attention on them.

MCNERNEY: Thank you.

Have the software specifications for the website and its related software elements, including the test specifications, has that changed since the initial rollout?

SEBELIUS: I know that there certainly are some changes because, since October 1st -- I'm sorry.

MCNERNEY: Yes, since the rollout, the specifications.

SEBELIUS: Well, we -- the specifications haven't changed. We are certainly fixing, as I say, speed and reliance is one of the issues we're taking a look at. That's the performance side.

But there also are some functionality sides that things do not work as they can, including the enrollment passed on to insurers. So we are fixing functionality. And I don't think that's a change in the specs. I think it is actually making the system work the way it should.

MCNERNEY: Well, are you -- or is the department doing a prioritization on the problems?

SEBELIUS: Yes.

MCNERNEY: Could you describe that a little bit?

SEBELIUS: Yes, as of last week when Jeff Zients joined us for this short-term project, we asked him to lead a sort of management team. We have pulled in all of our contractors as well as additional talent that they may have available.

We have talked to tech folks in and out of the private sector and insurance, some of their tech experts to get all eyes and ears, made a full assessment, developed a plan for fixes along the way, have a punch list for going after those fixes.

And we are doing a daily tech briefing and blog to tell people what we have found, what we have fixed, what's coming next, what the functionality is and we intend to do that until it's fully functional.

MCNERNEY: Well, thank you.

Madam Secretary, looking past the initial problems with the ACA rollout, do you think that the Affordable Care Act will be successful in bending the health care cost curve and reducing the fraction of our national economy that goes for health care?

SEBELIUS: Well, I think that we have already had some success. I think the goal is to continue to achieve that, a fully insured population arguably with preventative care, with an opportunity to see a primary care doctor and not go through the emergency room will in and of itself reduce costs.

Having people identified earlier who may have serious problems and managing those problems will reduce health costs. But I think the delivery system also needs some considerable help in paying for not a number of procedures, number of tests, number of prescriptions but paying for health outcomes.

MCNERNEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Mr. Latta?

LATTA: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And Madam Secretary, thanks very much for being with us today. Appreciate your testimony so far today.

What I'd like to do is I'll get these to you because there are so many we've received. These are questions that we've received from our constituents back home, specifically about what's going on with the website and for them.

And so what I'll do, I'd like to get those to you. But there is a lot of questions here and a lot of thoughts gone into a lot of these questions.

But if I could start with last week's testimony when our -- four of the contractors were here. And in one of the questions that I had posed to Ms. Campbell from CGI, in her testimony she had stated that they delivered the medicare.gov and also the federalreporting.gov.

And I'd asked at that time, were these sites more or less complicated than the site that we were talking about here today?

And she said, of course, the site today was more complicated.

And in the questioning and from her testimony -- and we've been hearing about this end-to-end testing that wasn't happening, that we had individuals out there saying that about two weeks had been done, but I had asked her about was there sufficient enough time when they did medicare.gov?

And the response that she gave me back was on medicare.gov, which was a less complicated site -- and she stated that we had sufficient time to test the system before it went live.

And I asked her in a follow-up then, what was that sufficient time?

And she said we had a number of months before the system went live at that time.

And then -- and I just want to make sure, because again, you know, sometimes things don't get reported accurately.

But in the "U.S. News and World Report" on October the 18th of this year -- and there is some questions going back and forth. And I just want to make sure that, you know, that you were quoted properly.

Said, "'After two weeks of review', the HHS secretary concluded, 'we didn't have enough testing specifically for high volumes for a very complicated project. The online insurance marketplace needed five years of construction and a year of testing,' she said. 'We had two years and almost no testing.'"

Is that correct?

SEBELIUS: I don't know the quote. I'd never suggested that we needed five years. I don't know where that is from.

(CROSSTALK)

LATTA: Well, that's one of the things we're going to check.

SEBELIUS: We clearly did not ever have five years. The law was signed in (inaudible) 2010.

LATTA: Well, let me -- and then last week you were -- when you were down in Texas you were being asked by a reporter about the system and the launch. And one of the parts of the question was that, at what point did you realize the system wasn't going to be working the way that you envisioned before the launch and why didn't we stop it before the launch?

LATTA: And, again, this is what was reported.

"We knew that if we had another six months we would probably test further. But I don't think anyone fully realized both the volume caused such problems but volumes also exposed some of the problems we had."

Now going back, though, to Ms. Campbell's statement that they tested more extensively on a system that was not as complicated, but HHS, CMS decided to go forward with only a very short period of testing. Do you think that was acceptable?

SEBELIUS: Well clearly looking back, it would have been ideal to do it differently. We had a product that frankly people have been waiting for decades to have access to affordable health care.

Medicare existed well before the website. Medicare is a program that started 50 year ago. The website was an additional feature for consumer ease and comfort. And so they were not launching Medicare. They were not delivering health benefits to seniors. They were putting together an additional way to enroll in Medicare.

I would suggest, sir, that we had deadlines in the law that people had benefits starting January 1. We wanted a extensive open enrollment period so that a lot of people who were not familiar with insurance, didn't know how to choose a doctor or choose a plan, had never been in this marketplace, or people who needed to understand fully what the law offered had ample time to do that.

So the date that I was, again, required to select for open enrollment, that's again part of the statute. How long would open enrollment be? We picked that data. All the contractors that began early in this process in the fall of 2010 when we issued -- I'm sorry, 2011 when we issued the initial contracts to CGI and QSSI knew the October 1 date. That was not changed. It wasn't added to.

As we got closer to the system, one of the reasons, again, that we pared down what needed to launch on October 1 was an attempt to minimize the risk to the system, to get people to their ability to see clearly what they were entitled to, what the plans were, and if those chose to, to enroll. Clearly the testing should have been longer, should have been more sufficient.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

LATTA: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Mr. Braley?

BRALEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Madam Secretary people who are watching this hearing might be under the assumption that there's some kind of political debate going on over the Affordable Care Act, but I think people in Iowa don't care anything about who's winning the political debate. They want these problems fixed and they want them fixed now. And I think that's the responsibility of everyone in this room to make sure that that happens.

I tried to go into the marketplace on October 7 and I encountered problems immediately dealing with the security code questions which required you to select dates. One of them was type a significant date in your life. Today is my birthday, so I put that in. I tried three different ways of entering that date and got a message each time, important, this is not a valid answer. Same thing for the third date entry.

And a lot of times when you registering online for anything and you have to put a date in, there will be a little prop there that tells you what the format is you're required to enter. Do you know, have we solved this problem in the security code area?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir. One of the initial issues was just getting people into the site and the ID proofing, which is a two-step process. One is that you give some preliminary information and you set up a password.

But the second to ensure that your personal data can't be hacked, can't be interfered with is the second step where some personalized questions which only can be verified by you are indeed part of that. Again, that was a -- an initial hold up in the system. We focused a lot of attention on that in the first several days.

It was fixed, only to then discover that there were system problems throughout the application. And that piece has been fixed, but I would suggest it also was a function of trying to make sure we had the highest security standards, that we were not cavalier about someone's personal information being able to be addressed and attached. And it -- it was a functionality that didn't perform properly but does now.

BRALEY: One of the things that keeps coming up in this hearing because you are from Kansas is references to "The Wizard of Oz." And people went to see the wizard because of the wonderful things that he did.

The Affordable Care Act is doing a lot of great things in Iowa. The Des Moines Register wrote that Iowans buying health insurance on the government's new online marketplace will face some of the lowest premiums in the country. It's increasing competition in our state. Iowa consumers are able to choose from 40 health plans in the marketplace.

You've mentioned the growth of health care spending is at the slowest rate in 50 years. Fifty thousand Iowa seniors have received prescription drug rebates. Bans on preexisting conditions are allowing people to get coverage and switch carriers, and now insurance premium increases are subject to review and can be rejected by the -- the people reviewing those plans.

But all of these good things don't mean anything unless we solve these problems. And what I need to know is how confident are you that the problems will be fixed by December 1?

SEBELIUS: Well again, Congressman, I have committed to that date because that is the assessment of both inside and outside experts have analyzed. And I think they kicked all the tires and looked at all the systems. I know that there's no confidence in that date until we deliver on the date. I'm well aware of that, and that's on me.

BRALEY: Since Americans were supposed to have six months to sign up, would you support ensuring they still have six months by extending the open enrollment period for two more months?

SEBELIUS: At this point, Congressman, they will have fully four months of fully functional all ways to sign up. And again, there are ultimate ways and the website right now that people are getting through.

The open enrollment period is extraordinarily long. It's about six times as long as a typical generous open enrollment period. And it's important for the insurance partners to know who is in their pool so again they can stay in the market next year and know who they're insuring.

So we think that the timetable will allow people four months' time to fully use the website. They can use it right now. They can use the call center. They can go to navigators. They can enroll.

UPTON: Gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Harper?

HARPER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Madam Secretary, for being here today. I'm sure there are other things you'd rather be doing, but we welcome the opportunity to have this conversation.

I'm going to ask a clerk to bring you a document for you to look at so I can ask you a couple of questions. If you can go to page eight on that, I have highlighted an item there. But this is a copy of a CGI slideshow from October 11 discussing technical issues that must be addressed within the website.

And on page eight of what I've handed you, CGI recommended that CGI and CMS have a review board to agree on which issues can technically be solved and which should politically be solved. Was such a review board convened?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I cannot tell you. I've never seen this document and I'm not aware of this recommendation.

HARPER: But CGI is responsible for the website, correct?

SEBELIUS: CGI is responsible for the application.

HARPER: For the application. Does it surprise you that in the slideshow that they gave October 11 they acknowledged political reasons for (inaudible)?

SEBELIUS: Sir, again, I've never seen this document. I have no idea what that means. Did you ask CGI when they came last week?

HARPER: Can you find out for us if such a review board was done and if any decisions were made on political reasons or any other reasons and find that out for us?

SEBELIUS: Sir, that question needs to go to CGI, but I can -- I can ask them to report to you.

HARPER: Well, if you would do that..

SEBELIUS: This is their document, if I understand it. This is not our document.

HARPER: Yes. Would you turn to page nine of that document please? And it states challenges on page nine in this presentation by CGI. And it says under challenges, unable to determine at this time whether low enrollment counts are attributable to system issues or due to users choosing not to select or enroll in a plan.

So those are two completely different issues obviously. If it is a system issue, that's something you have confidence at some point will be resolved. Correct?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

HARPER: And if it's a user selection issue, that's an entirely different story, is it not?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

HARPER: OK. Now when you used the phrase earlier about a punch list, that's -- that's like having somebody move into a house. Someone's buying a new house and they go through and they've been told this house is going to be ready for you to move in on October 1. They load up the van, they come in, and they get in and it's not finished. Part of the plumbing's not right. The wiring's wrong and -- and they go in.

This creates the situation where, you know, we -- health care shouldn't be a zero-sum game. I mean, we want to be fair to everyone. We want to -- we want to help people who are vulnerable. But at the same time, we shouldn't have to hurt folks.

HARPER: We've got people in my district, in my state who are getting notices of cancellation. They're being told of higher premiums that they're having. And these are great concerns that we have. And how do we work through that?

And I want to say I appreciate you accepting responsibility for these initial rollout failures that we've had. But who is ultimately responsible? It is the president, correct?

SEBELIUS: For the website?

HARPER: The president is ultimately responsible for the rollout, ultimately.

SEBELIUS: No, sir. We are responsible for the rollout.

HARPER: But who do you answer to?

SEBELIUS: I answer to the president.

HARPER: All right. So is the president not ultimately responsible like a company CEO would be?

SEBELIUS: Sir, he's the president of the United States. I have given him regular reports and those -- I am responsible for the implementation of the Affordable Care Act. That's what he asked me to do. That's what I'll continue to do.

HARPER: So you're saying the president is not responsible for HHS?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I didn't say that.

HARPER: OK, so the president ultimately is responsible. While I think it's great that you're a team player and taking responsibility, it is the president's ultimate responsibility, correct?

SEBELIUS: You clearly -- whatever. Yes, he is the president. He is responsible for government programs.

HARPER: My time expired.

UPTON: The gentleman's time expired.

Mr. Lujan.

LUJAN: Mr. Chairman, thank you very much. Before I begin, I'd like to ask unanimous consent to submit into the record some articles from New Mexico publications, first entitled "Small Business: Owner Health Exchange Will Save Me $1,000 A Month."

UPTON: Without objection.

LUJAN: I see my time did begin there. So I'll try to get through this, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, I was intrigued by a line of questioning by Congressman Green asking about the individual marketplace. How volatile was the individual marketplace before the Affordable Care Act became law?

SEBELIUS: I would say it wasn't a mark marketplace at all. It was unprotected, unregulated, and people were really on their own.

LUJAN: Madam Secretary, the Kaiser Family Foundation reports have over 50 percent churn out of individuals that have coverage and individual market churn out of coverage every year. They either lose coverage, they're priced out or drop it.

Is that consistent with what you're aware of?

SEBELIUS: That's an accurate snapshot. About a third of the people are in for about six months. And over half are in for a year or less.

LUJAN: So individuals that were in the individual marketplace before the passage of the Affordable Care Act did not have the same protections as those in group coverage?

SEBELIUS: That's true.

LUJAN: And would those individuals in the individual marketplace sometimes have higher co-pays?

SEBELIUS: Higher co-pays, unlimited out of pocket costs for often coverage that was medically underwritten or excluded whatever medical condition they had in the first place.

LUJAN: So these were typically one-year contracts. If they used the plan because they got sick nor a car descent or a victim of domestic violence, sometimes they would be thrown off the plans or their rates would go up?

SEBELIUS: Yes.

LUJAN: I think that's important to note, Madam Secretary. And I'm intrigued as well that my understanding is that last month HHS conducted an analysis that found that nearly six out of uninsured Americans getting coverage through the marketplace will pay $100 a month. Is that correct?

SEBELIUS: They'll have a plan available for less than $100 if that is their choice. Yes.

LUJAN: And that number would be even higher -- would be better if more states chose the option of using federal funds to expand Medicaid to cover the low income population?

SEBELIUS: Definitely. That's just a marketplace snapshot. Those are people that will be in the marketplace.

LUJAN: Madam Secretary, I don't think I heard anyone from the other side of the aisle today -- my Republican colleagues, ask you how can Congress work with you and support you in fixing this website and fixing this problem?

I hope that we all agree we want this website fixed.

I would yield to anyone that would disagree.

Seeing no one accepting that. I'm glad to hear that we agree with this.

Now Madam Secretary, what can Congress do to work with you to fix this website?

SEBELIUS: Well, I'm not sure that there is hands on work that you can do. Maybe we have some technical expertise, but I would say getting accurate information to constituents is helpful.

Letting people know that they can check out the facts in the law. That they may be entitled to some financial support.

That cancellation of policies means that the policy that they had may not exist, but they have a lot of choices of new policies and a law that now says they must be insured in a new policy.

That they don't have to be insured by their company at a higher price.

LUJAN: I appreciate that, Madam Secretary.

Going back to the individual marketplace, Madam Secretary, did this Congress in previous years before the Affordable Care Act make it illegal for health insurance companies to raise rates on someone after they submitted a claim for going to the hospital or becoming sick or getting rid of preexisting conditions?

SEBELIUS: No, sir.

LUJAN: Madam secretary, one last note here.

It seems that we've received some horrible news that there are bad actors already taking place of fraudulent web sites that imitate the health care exchange or misleading seniors into disclosing their personal information.

I've signed on to a letter to you led by my colleague Representative Raul Ruiz out of California to request that you prioritize fraud prevention efforts.

What has the administration done to prevent the fraudulent acts and protect personal information?

SEBELIUS: I can tell you, Congressman, the president felt very strongly that, that need to be part of our outreach effort, which is it why the attorney general and I convened representatives of state attorneys general, insurance commissioners, the U.S. attorneys and the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission -- which has jurisdiction -- to make sure that we first got out ahead of some of this developing consumer outreach.

No one should ever give personal health information, because personal health information is not needed for the policies any longer. That's a red flag. We want to make sure that people turn over potential fraudulent acts. We have put training in place for navigators. We have our law enforcement...

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

I would just note that we -- with the indulgence of the secretary, we're hoping that we can have all members ask some questions, but we also know that with four minutes we're going to have a little trouble.

So I'm going to ask unanimous consent that we try to limit our questions and answers to no more than two minutes.

And I talked to Mr. Waxman.

Is that okay?

Because otherwise we will -- there will be a lot of folks who will not be able to ask a question at all.

(UNKNOWN): Three of us.

SEBELIUS: And Mr. Chairman, I would submit that if the questions get submitted we would be happy to provide timely answers also.

UPTON: OK, so can I do that?

So with that we'll try two minutes.

Mr. Lance?

LANCE: I guess I won the Lottery on the two minutes, Madam Secretary.

(LAUGHTER)

UPTON: Time has expired. OK.

(LAUGHTER)

LANCE: 20 seconds, Mr. Chairman.

On the website, Madam Secretary, the contractors testified last week that they needed more than two weeks for end to end testing. Why in your opinion was there not more than two weeks?

SEBELIUS: Again, we have the products, the insurance policies themselves by companies were loaded into the system. So we could test up until then but it wasn't until September -- mid-September that that was done. Again, the contractors said we would have loved more testing time, but we think we're ready to go ahead.

LANCE: I believe that will ultimately be a dispute between CMS and HHS and the contractors and if there is anything question do regarding that because, obviously that, didn't work. And I had thought given this as the signature issue with the president that the website would be ready.

Number two, in my judgment the president's statements were overstatement overstatements. The four Pinnochios is an indication of that. There's a report in the New Jersey newspaper this is morning that 800,000 people in New Jersey who purchased their policies in individual or small employer markets will be affected by this.

Mr. Walden, in a previous question, mentioned the fact that in an individual market you would be able to keep your policy grandfathered. Yet regulations issued by HHS say that grandfathered status would not be a continued for so much as a $5 change in a co-pay.

Is that accurate?

Do you believe that that is a significant change?

SEBELIUS: Sir, we gave, I think in, the grandfather regulations a guide for how pricing could change, medical inflation and I think it was in most cases plus 15 percent.

There were some individual consumer outfacing issues that were more rigid than that, but I would say that in terms of having companies being able to collect a profit margin, that was certainly built into the grandfather status.

LANCE: I think that's too little a change, respectfully.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Tonko?

TONKO: Thank you, Mr. Chair.

TONKO: And welcome, Honorable Secretary. Thank you for fielding our questions and for responding when you were extended the courtesy to offer a response.

As a strong supporter of the Affordable Care Act, I'm frustrated and I think it's fair to say the American people are frustrated as well. And I heard you here many times this morning say you're frustrated.

I think, by and large, people want this law to work. When I talk to folks back home in the capital region of New York that I represent, even people who opposed the law initially aren't rooting for the failure of the Affordable Care Act. Instead, they want Congress to come together to fix these problems so that we can move on to real issues that matter like creating jobs and growing the economy.

My home state of New York, which also experienced Web site problems at the outset, has now completed enrollment determinations on over 150,000 New Yorkers, with more than 31,000 having already signed up for quality low-cost health insurance.

Given that many states have had success in overcoming these initial Web site issues, has HHS looked at what these state Web sites are doing as it searches for solutions to fix Healthcare.gov?

SEBELIUS: Absolutely. And we shared a lot of the information going in. I think that the hub feature that we have in our Web site that all states are using, including the state of New York, is fully functional. And that's good news for New York and California and others who are running their own state Web sites.

But we are learning from them. We've shared information with them. And we are eager for all the help and assistance moving forward.

TONKO: Thank you. Similarly, many states made the illogical choice of rejecting Medicaid expansion contained in the ACA that would help some of their poorest citizens get access to the health care situation.

This is despite the fact that Medicaid expansion is almost entirely financed by federal dollars. Can you comment broadly on HHS's plan in the future to encourage more states to run their own marketplaces and expand Medicaid so that the law can function as designed?

SEBELIUS: Well, absolutely. Most recently last week the state of Ohio did move into the Medicaid market. And we now have 30 governors, I think 27 states have fully completed the process, another three are in the process.

Republicans and Democrats, who -- some of whom sued us about the constitutionality of the act who are now deciding that for the citizens of their state they want to be part of the expanded Medicaid.

And we will continue to have those conversations. It's not just about the marketplace. It's also about Medicaid.

TONKO: Thank you very much.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

Dr. Cassidy?

CASSIDY: You said that only if -- an individual policy is only canceled if it changes significantly. But to be clear, after May 2010 if co-insurance went up by any amount, even by a dollar, according to your regulations, that would not qualify as a grandfathered clause. Just to add that out there for the record. I gather even by a dollar.

That said, I get a letter from someone in my district, Adrienne (ph). She says that -- oh, she lost her coverage. She lost her coverage because spousal coverage is gone. She has gone on the exchange. She doesn't qualify for a subsidy, but that her premium and out-of-pocket costs under any plan is $10,000 a year.

She feels -- she writes this. She feels betrayed by her government. Now she has to sit there asking herself, is this fair? If you were she, do you think that this would be fair?

SEBELIUS: Dr. Cassidy, I want to start by the amount that you gave is not accurate. I was told $5, not $1.

CASSIDY: Yes, that's for the co-pay, not for the co-insurance. For the co-insurance, it's any amount. But I have limited time. Do you think that it's fair -- if you were she, if you were Adrienne, do you think is fair? Loses her spousal coverage, now it's 10k, no subsidies?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I don't have any idea what she's looking at. I can tell you that, again, based on what we've seen in the market and what we've seen in the plans, people will be getting full insurance for the first time at...

(CROSSTALK)

CASSIDY: Well, again, this is what she reports. Do you think it's fair -- if what she reports is true, do you think it's fair?

SEBELIUS: I can't answer fair or not fair. I don't know what she was paying or what she was paying for.

CASSIDY: That's OK. Let's move on.

SEBELIUS: Did she have full insurance?

CASSIDY: Richard writes that his daughter received a note that his premium is going up because she's being lumped with older, costlier patients. Now it's possible that the only people that sign up will be those who are more costly. Does HHS have plans on what to do if only those who are more costly sign up and premiums rise for everybody?

SEBELIUS: I think, sir, that's what we're trying to do to make sure that...

(CROSSTALK)

CASSIDY: But if only the costly sign up, do you have plans? If you accept that...

SEBELIUS: That's the importance of the individual mandate that you've just outlined. Getting rid of pre-existing conditions, making sure that people can come in...

CASSIDY: But if only the most costly sign up, do you have backup plans?

SEBELIUS: We will encourage others to sign up. It's why there is a penalty in place and why...

CASSIDY: Is this to assume that there are no backup plans? I don't mean to be rude, but...

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Yarmuth.

YARMUTH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, nice to see you. I come to this hearing with a little bit different perspective. Kentucky is doing a great job with our exchange. As of this morning we had 350,000 people who have explored the Web site, 59,000 have started applications, 31,000 are now fully enrolled in new coverage, and 5,000 just in the last week.

And I think very importantly, more than 400 businesses have begun applying for their employees as well. So, yes, the idea that somehow this is going to be bad for businesses is not borne out in Kentucky.

Would it be safe to say that if 36 states had done what Kentucky and New York and California have done instead of 14 that the rollout would have been much smoother and the Web site would have been much easier to construct?

SEBELIUS: Well, I don't think there's any question that the -- you know, in January of 2013 we knew how many states were not running their own Web site, in I think mid-February we learned about partnerships. So it was not until that point that we learned that 36 states would actually be coming through the Web site.

Having said that, we should have anticipated, we should have planned better. We should have tested better. I don't think that's any excuse, but we clearly are running a very different vehicle for enrollment than we thought we were going to run in March of 2010.

YARMUTH: Right. On the subject of cancellation of policies, isn't it true that, first of all, the federal government can't require insurance companies to sell insurance?

SEBELIUS: That they can't...

YARMUTH: The federal government can't require insurance companies to sell insurance?

SEBELIUS: Yes, that's true.

YARMUTH: And in fact, insurance companies all over the country are making very difficult decisions now about where they want to participate and where they don't. And in some markets they're actually trying to get out of the market, canceling people because they want to play in other markets and so forth.

They're all making the decisions now...

SEBELIUS: Well, and we know we have more insurers, 25 percent more insurers in the individual market than we did prior to the law being passed.

YARMUTH: Right. So there a lot of dynamics going on here that are not necessarily an indication that the president misled anybody. They're business decisions being made all over now.

SEBELIUS: Well, in cancellation of policies, again, that one- year contract notice is a routine in the individual market. It has been in place for years. And for a lot of people, their policies now -- they are being canceled because they're being notified you can no longer be medically underwritten.

We can't charge you more because you're a woman. We won't ever have the kind of limitation on what your policy can pay out or charge you exorbitant out of pocket rates. Those policies will cease to be offered in the marketplace.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Guthrie?

GUTHRIE: Thank you, Madam Secretary, for being here. And last week Mr. Lau from Serco was here. I know the president has talked about the alternatives to the Web site as phone-calling or using a paper application.

And what he said, and I think you've said it with the phone, they take the paper applications but they enter them into the same Web portal. So I know you get around the issue of getting on and getting logged off.

But also -- but there's still issues with data within the Web portal. As you said, you can't even get reliable data who is even signed up.

So he also said because of the surge in paper applications, it's like six to eight weeks to process. So if November 30th is when this will be ready, that they can use, and even if you do it now, eight weeks you're getting close to January 1st, and somebody does lose their insurance so they're signing up for this, and they get to January 1st, even though you have a March 31st open enrollment, what happens to these? Is there a contingency plan for these people to continue their insurance?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I think that we have improvements every day on the speed of the site. Serco was giving you early snapshots of difficulty of accessing the site. I think that's greatly improved.

GUTHRIE: Well, they said just processing the paper, actually.

SEBELIUS: Well, I understand. But it is the site for -- they put the application into the site and get a determination. That's part of what the process is. So the site is part of the portal all the way through. This is an integrated insurance vehicle. And so that will improve.

And we -- again, with four months of continuous service, which is far longer than most people had, some of these cancellation numbers, Mr. Garrity (ph), again, pointed this out from Florida Blue Cross, but it's true of everyone else, these are not January 1st numbers. They are year-long numbers.

So over the course of 2014 when an individual's policy is due to expire, that individual...

(CROSSTALK)

GUTHRIE: ... but somebody could expire January 1st and not be able to get coverage if the Web site -- and the vendor said they needed months to test. They would have liked to have months and months to test. That's what they said.

So if we're going to get to November -- even if it works November 30th...

SEBELIUS: Well, I would say we're testing as we go. There is beta testing going on right now. That's why we are fixing and how we can identify things. People are getting through every day and we now know a lot more than we...

(CROSSTALK)

GUTHRIE: ... but the paper process, if it does take even four weeks, then it's November 30th and people's cancel on January 1st, there needs to be a contingency for that person.

SEBELIUS: Well, again, typical insurance is two to four weeks of signup. They will have two full months of signup.

UPTON: Gentleman's time has expired.

Ms. Schakowsky?

SCHAKOWSKY: Thank you, Madam Secretary, for bringing to millions of Americans access to affordable, comprehensive health care coverage that's going to be there when they need it.

I want to thank you especially as a woman. Women can no longer -- being a woman can no longer be considered being a preexisting condition. Women can no longer be charged more than a man for the same coverage. Women have access to comprehensive benefits like prescription drugs and free preventive screenings and free contraceptive coverage and maternity care, which is often left out of coverage. And the days of complicated pregnancy or diabetes or domestic violence being a preexisting condition, those days are over.

You know, I want to say to my colleagues after a three-and-a-half year campaign to repeal, to discredit, to even shut down the government over Obamacare, I want to say, get over it.

We all agree that there are problems but these are problems that I see being fixed. And so I want to ask one -- oh, and I want to say that what we did under Medicare Part D can be an example of how we can work together.

And in fact, Chairman Upton and I both sent a letter asking for more money for community based groups to help implement the program and make it work. We can work together.

So if you could just briefly say how are the navigators -- how important are they in making this system work for the American people?

SEBELIUS: Well, what we know, Congresswoman, is that a lot of people are not web savvy and are not frustrated by the website because they don't have a computer. They don't want to use a computer, they don't trust a computer. They need a live human being to ask questions, get questions answered, talk about the plan, talk about insurance.

So the navigators play a hugely important role. We have about 2,500 trained navigators on the ground right now. We have thousands more community assisters who are trained and ready to go, about 45,000 agents and brokers have gone through specific Affordable Care Act training.

But those individuals, working with their clients, customers and in the case of navigators and community assisters, just the public at large, they are not paid by a company. They are not collecting a fee. They just want to help people get coverage; they are hugely important.

UPTON: Gentlelady's time -- Mr. Olson.

OLSON: I thank the chair.

And welcome, Madam Secretary.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you.

OLSON: I would like to open with a quote from an American icon -- I'll hold up a poster. It says, "If the user is having a problem, it's our problem."

I'm glad to hear you raised this philosophy during your testimony today, ma'am.

Obamacare was signed into law 1,256 days ago. And since then, there's been user problem after user problem after user problem.

Regarding healthcare.gov, your deputy administrator for consumer information, Gary Cohen, testified one month ago, where we are sitting, that -- and this I quote, "CMS has worked hard to test the infrastructure that will allow Americans to enroll in coverage confidently and simply and securely," end quote.

Yet according to "Forbes" and "The Wall Street Journal," you told them that you needed five years of construction and one year of testing. The program has crashed and burned at least three times and the user is still having problems.

(Inaudible) up here, ma'am?

It's been down the whole time you've been testifying. The system is down at this moment. My question, ma'am, is very simple.

When did you know these changes were going down? A month, a day, a quarter?

And did you tell the president what you knew?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I was informed that we were ready to launch on October 1st. The contractors, who we had as our private partners told us and told this committee that they had never suggested the delay, and that is accurate. Our CMS team felt we were ready to go.

I told the president that we were ready to go.

Clearly I was wrong. We were wrong. I -- we knew that in any big, new, complicated system, there would be problems; no one ever imagined the volume of issues and problems that we've had. And we must fix it.

OLSON: Yes, ma'am. But credible journalists said you knew you needed six years to get this program...

SEBELIUS: Sir, I -- that quote has been repeated. I can guarantee you I would have never stated that because the law was passed in March of 2010. I chose the open enrollment date. I don't know where that quote comes from, but that is not from me.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

Mr. Barrow?

BARROW: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thanks for attending today, Madam Secretary. I suspect that deep down most people on this committee support the concept of reforming insurance market so that more people have access to better insurance coverage. We have disagreements about the means used to get to those ends which is ultimately why I voted against the Affordable Care Act.

It seems that every day we're hearing of something new going wrong. I'm concerned that these short-term enrollment problems could become long-term insurance market problems. My constituents already losing confidence the federal government's ability to pull this thing off and I think the only way to begin to restore their trust is to delay the individual mandate penalties until we're sure the system is going to work. It's not fair to penalize consumers when their non-compliance is not their fault. We also need to take the time to make sure additional fits and starts won't cause larger problems. Right now I'm less concerned about who's to blame and more concerned about what went wrong and how to fix it and how we're going to ensure it doesn't happen again.

Nearly all of our constituents want and need health insurance. It would be a huge mistake if we're so blinded by our love or our hatred for Obamacare that we miss the opportunities to address its flaws.

Now to the subject of technical problems becoming market problems, can problems of folks getting into the system snowball into risk pool problems where those who choose not to enroll can actually affect the costs of those who do choose to enroll?

SEBELIUS: Certainly a risk pool needs a balanced market. So you need people who are older and sicker to be balanced with people who are younger and healthier, that's how a pool works.

BARROW: At what point are we going to see a problem having the risk pool if the tech problems cause -- affect the folks who are entering?

What are we going to look for? What are we going to use to decide something needs to be done?

SEBELIUS: Well, again, sir, we will be monitoring during the six months of open enrollment as will our insurance partners who is coming into the pool; that's why we want to give this committee and others reliable, informed data about not only who it is but what the demographics are and where they live. That's part of our...

BARROW: If things aren't better by the end of this next month, at what point are we going to start thinking about further delays in posing penalties?

SEBELIUS: Well, again, I think that having a defined open enrollment period is one of the ways that you then make an assessment if you have a pool that works or not. You cannot have an unlimited open enrollment period with any insurance company because that really doesn't work.

BARROW: Thank you.

UPTON: Mr. McKinley.

MCKINLEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Last week -- last week the CGI representative at Campbell said that she had met her contract obligations and met specifications and she said the only problem she had was with pace. But the pace wasn't part of the specification.

Do you -- and we asked her, what you were -- you would testify to, did -- she said you would testify that she did complete her contract in accordance with the specifications.

Would you?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I don't think until the product is working the way it's designed to work that anybody has finished their job. And that's really my interest.

MCKINLEY: I'm so sorry, with time, you know, they've shortened our time with it.

So, if she hasn't met -- she hasn't met their specifications but yet we're still using her, so is the American taxpayer still paying the money to fix the problems that she didn't do -- her company didn't do in the first...

SEBELIUS: None of our contractors have been paid the amount...

MCKINLEY: Will she be paid for this work into the future as we go to correct this problem?

SEBELIUS: We will make that determination as the work goes forward. I would tell you sir that as we learn what needs to be fixed, how long it takes, we'll know more about...

(CROSSTALK)

MCKINLEY: I'm very sorry about the timeframe, but cut it down.

Who owns the software now, that now that we've -- this has been developed with taxpayer money to develop the software to do this...

SEBELIUS: It is owned by the Centers for Medicaid and Medicare Services.

MCKINLEY: So it's all owned by us? OK.

Will they be able to use it by a license with -- for other clients?

SEBELIUS: Not to my knowledge. I think it is...

MCKINLEY: Maybe (inaudible)...

SEBELIUS: ... specifically designed for the marketplace with these products in mind.

MCKINLEY: Then last questions are trying to...

SEBELIUS: And the clients are the American public.

MCKINLEY: ... that under IV and V, and she testified that she thought that was something we should have done. Under HHS, you recommend or the HHS recommends that for software development, that they should have an independent verification and validation program.

But it wasn't used in this case.

Can you share with us in the time that's gone why we didn't use IV and V on something as crucial...

SEBELIUS: Again, I don't think that's accurate, sir. At every point along the way there is independent testing.

MCKINLEY: Independent?

SEBELIUS: Yes and outside...

MCKINLEY: You recommended verification and validation not someone within your staff?

SEBELIUS: Pardon me? There is a level of company self-attested testing. There is a level of CMS testing and then there is an independent test on each piece of the contracting.

(CROSSTALK)

MCKINLEY: (OFF-MIKE) acknowledged that it wasn't done independently, and that's what the...

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Gentleman's time...

MCKINLEY: It needs to be done independently, people who do not have...

UPTON: ... has expired.

SEBELIUS: No, it -- I'll get you the information, but there are three levels of testing, one of them is independent for every piece of this contracting, yes.

UPTON: Ms. Castor.

CASTOR: Good morning.

When open enrollment began a few weeks ago the people back home in Florida who are helping neighbors sort through the new options for coverage, the navigators, were taken aback by how grateful people are to have new pathway to the doctor's office and the care they need.

Affordable options.

The -- they are no longer being discriminated against because they had cancer, and diabetes or asthma. They are very grateful. They said -- they said to me directly, it's like they found water in the desert.

Right now they are surprisingly -- they said it's taking time, because people want to sort through all of these options before they finally sign up at the end of the 26-week enrollment period. So we must fix the marketplace. We must to meet their expectations and we have high expectations for you and the administration.

But I think it's important to point out the Affordable Care Act is more than just a website. It -- despite all the obstruction by Republicans in my home state of Florida, nationally, the -- even going so far as to shut down the government, millions of Americans are already benefiting and there are benefits that are not tied to healthcare.gov.

Some Madam Secretary, let's clarify what's working despite healthcare.gov.

Is it correct to say many of the improvements that the ACA makes to employer coverage and Medicare were the vast majority of Americans receive their coverage are not dependent on healthcare.gov.

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

CASTOR: And -- so the delays and problems with healthcare.gov do not affect the millions of individuals thanks to the ACA who no longer have to worry about lifetime monetary caps on their coverage that previously sent them to bankruptcy?

SEBELIUS: That's absolutely true. And I think the quote that the president was quoted recently saying, "If you have health care, you can -- you don't have to sign up for the new marketplace," was referring to the large portion -- the 95 percent of insured Americans who plans are solid and stay in place and move forward.

CASTOR: And I understand the frustration with the website. What I don't know why people are not similarly outraged by the lack of Medicaid coverage in many of our states.

Do you find that hypocritical?

(LAUGHTER)

SEBELIUS: Well, I think it's very troubling that millions of low income working Americans will still have no affordable option if states don't take advantage of the expansion program leaving states bearing the cost of uncompensated care, families bearing the cost of parents who can't take care of their kids, workers not able to go to work and people still accessing care through emergency room doors, the most expensive, least effective kind of care they could get.

UPTON: Gentlelady's time has expired.

Mr. Gardner?

GARDNER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you, Secretary Sebelius, for being here. Here's my letter. This is the letter my family got canceling our insurance. We chose to have our own private policy back in Colorado so we could be in the same boat as everyone of my constituents. And yet my insurance policy has been canceled. The White House website says if you like your health plan you have, you can keep it.

Did I hear it wrong?

SEBELIUS: Again, sir, I don't know how long you've had your policy...

GARDNER: Why aren't you losing your insurance?

SEBELIUS: Pardon me?

GARDNER: Why aren't you losing your health insurance?

SEBELIUS: Because I'm part of the federal employees...

GARDNER: Why aren't you in the exchange? You're in charge of this law, correct, why aren't you in the exchange?

SEBELIUS: Because I'm part of the federal employee health benefit plan.

GARDNER: Why aren't you in the -- why won't you go into the exchange? You're a part of this law. You're literally in charge of this law. Should you be any different than all of the other Americans out there losing their health insurance?

SEBELIUS: I'm part of the 95 percent with affordable available health care coverage.

GARDNER: You're part of a plan that most Americans aren't (sic) available to them. Why will you not agree...

SEBELIUS: I'm not eligible for the exchange, because I have coverage in...

GARDNER: You can decide to drop your coverage of your employer. You have the choice to decide not to choose...

SEBELIUS: That the not true, sir.

GARDNER: I chose not to go...

SEBELIUS: Members of Congress are now part of the exchange thanks to an amendment that was added by Congress, but I'm not eligible.

GARDNER: Madam Secretary, with all due respect...

SEBELIUS: If I have affordable coverage in my workplace, I'm not eligible to go into the marketplace, that's part of the law.

GARDNER: Madam Secretary, I would encourage you to be just like the American people and enter the exchange and agree to find a way...

(APPLAUSE)

SEBELIUS: It's illegal.

GARDNER: .. and I would like to show you an advertisement that's going on in Colorado right now.

This is an advertisement that a board member of the Colorado exchange has put forward, do you agree with this kind of advertising for Obamacare?

SEBELIUS: I can't see it. And again...

GARDNER: It's a college student doing a keg stand.

SEBELIUS: If the Colorado exchange did that...

GARDNER: Do you approve of this kind of advertising?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: ... they are a state based marketplace.

GARDNER: Do you approve of this kind of advertising?

SEBELIUS: I don't see it. I don't know what it is, and I did not approve it. This is a state based marketplace...

GARDNER: That's a pretty big font. That's a pretty big picture of a keg and you can't see it?

SEBELIUS: Do I approve of it? I've...

GARDNER: You have the ability to opt out, by the way, as a federal employee. You could take the insurance. So I just...

SEBELIUS: If I have available employer based coverage...

GARDNER: I would also like to submit a waiver for my district from Obamacare and hope you consider waiving Obamacare for the Fourth Congressional District.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

(UNKNOWN): Does your policy cover -- never mind.

(LAUGHTER)

UPTON: Mr. Matheson?

MATHESON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And, Madam Secretary, thanks for your time.

I just want to ask on the issue of the fixes to healthcare.gov, we've had a lot of conversation about that today and we've talked about confidence levels for being ready by a certain time. But, I think one question that a lot of us have is, can you define what the magnitude of the problem is? Is there a scale or metric by which we can understand how bad this is today, and how we're going to get to where we go to have it fixed?

SEBELIUS: Well, again, sir, I've been informed that the problems are in -- the reports I've seen are really in two areas.

They are in the performance area, which is speed and reliability. It's too slow and doesn't have reliable transfers and in functionality, there are parts of the system that don't make accurate transfers.

So we have done an extensive assessment. They are prioritized, as I indicated earlier. One of the priorities is the enrollment features, which pass individual information to the companies where they want to enroll. That is not reliable at this point. The companies are not getting accurate data. So it's an example of the kind of thing we know we need to fix.

MATHESON: And is there a way to -- if you set up metrics figure out if we're making progress in terms of fixing those issues with speed and performance and functionality.

SEBELIUS: Again, with the team and Jeff Zients at the head of it, reporting to Marilyn, there are definitely a comprehensive set of issues going forward that will be measured and accelerated.

MATHESON: Do you have target dates along the way if you want to meet the November 30th time -- assume it's functional of what you want -- do you have target or metrics along the way to make sure you're on the path?

SEBELIUS: My understanding is, yes, there are sort of groups of targets that fixes that can be loaded together. It isn't one at a time. So they don't take days, but they are try being to determine with a specific path, one of the charges that QSSI has, really looking at the umbrella of what needs to be fixed, prioritizing them, figuring out what destabilizes if something else is fixed, how they can be grouped together. And that report will be in later next week.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

Mr. Pompeo?

POMPEO: Great, thank you.

Thank you for coming, Secretary Sebelius.

I would like to talk about Kansas a little bit today.

Much like with some of my colleagues have made references to the "Wizard of Oz", I don't think anybody not from Kansas should be able to do Oz allegories. But, my story -- the way I think about it, is those folks worked awful hard to go down the yellow brick road. At the end of the day, when they got there and pulled back the curtain, they found there was nothing they didn't already have.

And as we pull back the curtain on the Affordable Care Act, I think people are finding it's not exactly what they're gonna have worked so hard to find their way too as well.

I want to talk about two stories. There's this commitment, if you like your plan you can keep it. I have a letter I'll submit for the record, from Mr. Breeto (ph) in Kansas. You might know him. I saw him the other night in Benton.

He got the following letter from Blue Cross Blue Shield that says, "Because your current plan does not offer the benefits standard specified you'll be discontinued on December 31st," and this says good news. And then there's a group of folks, Pizza Hut -- you know the company from Kansas, franchisees founded there -- lots of folks have now taken employees, families who are working there, and they've gone from having full-time jobs to part-time jobs. So they aren't able to keep the health care plan they had either and the one they wanted.

POMPEO: What do you tell -- why -- why were the plans that these folks had good enough when you were the insurance commissioner in Kansas and when you were -- Kansas as governor, but those plans today aren't good enough for those hard-working Kansas families?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I would tell you, in the roles I had the honor of serving of in Kansas, I worked every day to try and eliminate some of the discriminatory features of the insurance industry that finally, with the Affordable Care Act, are gone. My successor and elected insurance Republican commissioner Sandy Praeger and I worked on a whole series of plans to expand coverage.

So I did work on these issues. We were not able to necessarily...

(CROSSTALK)

POMPEO: So you -- you -- to use your words, you say these were -- I think you said "lousy" plans. And Ms. Tavenner said "not true insurance." Do you think that the plans that were offered when you were the insurance commissioner weren't true insurance?

SEBELIUS: In the individual market, the insurance commissioner in Kansas and virtually every place in the country does not have regulatory authority...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: ... over the plan. There's a lot...

(CROSSTALK)

POMPEO: ... a yes-or-no question: Were they true insurance plans when you were the insurance commissioner?

SEBELIUS: A lot of them are not true insurance plans, no.

POMPEO: Thank you. I yield back.

UPTON: Gentleman from Vermont, Mr. Welch.

WELCH: Thank you.

I'm gonna try to just summarize quickly what I've been hearing. Number one, the website must be fixed. You've been very forthright, and you're gonna fix it.

Number two, I'm hearing a tone change. We've had a real battle about health care. We had a battle in this Congress. It was passed. The president signed it. The Supreme Court affirmed it -- a really brutal battle. There was an election where the American people affirmed it. And then the last-gasp effort was the shutdown and the threat of debt default.

But what I'm hearing today is that there are problems and people want to fix 'em because all of us represent people who are gonna win or lose depending on how effectively this is rolled out.

Third, there's some significant question about existing insurance policies, what the president said and so on. But let's acknowledge something: A lot of insurance companies were ripping off innocent American people by promising them insurance until they got sick, and then it got canceled because they, quote, "had a pre-existing condition," that wasn't, quote, "disclosed." That's gotta end.

The challenge for us going forward is to make health care affordable.

So Madam Secretary, my question is, is there any indication that there's been a slowing of premium increases as a result of the Affordable Care Act? Because unless we can keep those premium increases down -- they can't rise faster than the rate of inflation, wages and profits -- all of us are gonna lose.

SEBELIUS: Well, I would say, the trends in the private market over the last three and a half years are that cost increases have slowed down, are rising at a lower rate than the decades before. And in fact, in this individual market, the old individual market, the typical increase was 16 percent year in and year out rate increase. And often that came with additional medical underwriting. So it gives a sense of how the costs were.

We know that Medicare costs are down. We know that Medicaid costs actually had a decrease per capita last year, not an increase per capita, and underlying health care costs are down.

These rates in the new marketplace have come in about 16 percent lower on average than was projected -- not by us but by the Congressional Budget Office.

And we know that in many of these markets, they're much more competitive. I believe in market competitiveness. That actually drives down rates. The states where the most companies are participating have the lowest rates. And new companies have come in significantly below the old monopoly companies that often dominated this individual marketplace.

So we're on a pathway. Are we there? No. But you're absolutely right, affordable coverage, at the end of the day, for everybody is the goal.

WELCH: OK. I yield back.

Thank you, Madam Secretary.

UPTON: Madam Secretary, I'm trying to make sure that you're out of here by 12:30 before we start the second round of questions.

(LAUGHTER)

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Mr. Kinzinger?

SEBELIUS: That was a joke, right?

(LAUGHTER)

KINZINGER: I see -- I see sheer panic.

Madam Secretary, thank you for being here.

You stated earlier to Mr. Harper that you give the president regular updates on the marketplace. The president stated that he knew nothing about the status and functionality of the marketplace. How often, and what were the subjects of those updates?

SEBELIUS: Well, I think there were a series of regular meetings with the president, with some of our federal partners, with offices of the White House from the OMB to others on a monthly basis giving reports on policy and where we were going. None of those, I would say, involved (ph) detailed operational discussions. That wasn't the level. It was, are we coming together, do we have companies...

KINZINGER: Sure.

SEBELIUS: ... do we have plans.

KINZINGER: And I understand that. I mean, obviously, when it comes to the president of the United States, certain level of details you have to see at kind of a 10,000 foot, 20,000 foot overview. But in terms of the actual functionality, whether it's the website or the marketplace, he was legitimately caught off guard on October...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Well, I assured him, and -- that we were ready to go. Everyone knew with a big plan that there were likely to be some problems. No one...

KINZINGER: OK.

SEBELIUS: ... anticipated this level of problem (ph).

KINZINGER: And just second -- a quick question. Where is HHS getting the money to pay for these fixes? Is it coming from other HHS accounts? Have you used your transfer authority to move money from non-ACA programs to pay for the cost of implementing the president's health care program? And if so, from which programs have you drawn money to help with the fix that's not ACA-related?

SEBELIUS: Well, as you know, Congressman, it's been two years since we've had a budget at HHS. And we also have not had at the president's requested implementation budget authorized by the Congress. Each of those years we have used not only resources internally but I do have legal transfer authority that I've used and a non-recurring expense fund. We will get you all the details of that...

(CROSSTALK)

KINZINGER: Great. Thank you. So the answer is yes, though, there is some non-ACA money being transferred and used for the implementation of...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: There is money that is specifically designed for either outreach and education, so the health centers have hired education and outreach people as part of their outreach for health personnel. I would say it's -- it's definitely a related cause to get expanded health care.

KINZINGER: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Mr. Sarbanes?

SARBANES: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Madam Secretary, for being here.

My understanding is that a lot of the -- the companies, insurers that have been offering plans in the individual market, the ones who are sending out these notices, are actually repositioning themselves in the health insurance exchange to offer alternative plans. Is that correct?

SEBELIUS: Yes.

SARBANES: And in addition to -- to those insurers who've been in the individual market (inaudible) have a lot of other companies and insurers providing plans in the health insurance market?

SEBELIUS: That is true.

SARBANES: So the way I look at this is -- you know, I went to buy Oriole tickets awhile back when the season was still under way, and I was standing in line. And I got up to the ticket window and they closed the window. But I didn't have to go home because they opened another window a few feet away.

So essentially what's happening is people are coming up on the renewal period. They're getting up to the window of the individual market. They're being told, well, that window's closed but if you go right down the line here there's another window that's open. And by the way, when you get there, you'll get better coverage potentially at reduced premiums. And if you go down to window 3 there's some subsidies that may also be available to you.

So this notion that people are being turned away from an affordable product that provides good, quality care is preposterous. And in fact they're being steered to a place where they can get good, quality coverage, in many instances much better than the coverage that they had before, at an affordable rate that is supported by the subsidies that can be available to many, many people. This is -- this is what's so promising about the Affordable Care Act.

And so I think it's important for people to understand that that window's not being shut. They're just being steered someplace else where they can get a good opportunity.

SEBELIUS: And I think the first option for those companies is to say, 'We'd like to keep you here, and here are the plans we're offering.' But to be fair, customers will now have an opportunity to look across a landscape, which they couldn't before. They will have entry into those other windows, which many of them didn't have before with a pre-existing condition.

And as you say, about 50 percent of this market will have financial help in purchasing health insurance, which none of them had before.

UPTON: Gentleman's time expired.

Mr. Griffith?

GRIFFITH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Earlier in your testimony here today you said a couple times, "plans we enjoy but then," as you noticed with Mr. Gardner's eloquent testimony, that we're not going to be in the same plan that you're in after January 1.

I was one of those who thought it was a good idea as a part of a proposal that was floating around the halls here in Congress that the president and Cabinet secretaries ought to also be in the marketplace and not have a special federal plan that -- that you will have after January 1, but we will not. The president, while that was being discussed, issued a veto threat.

Did you discuss the veto threat with the president before he made it? And have you discussed it with him since then? Yes or no on the first?

SEBELIUS: No, sir.

GRIFFITH: No.

And then I would have to ask you, relating back to the contractors involved in this, CGI told us that the Spanish Web site was ready to go, that they thought everything was ready, just as they did with the regular site. And, obviously, that didn't prove out. But that they were told not to implement it.

Likewise, the shop-and-browse section was ready to go.

Do you think that they were misleading this committee when they made those comments?

SEBELIUS: I think what they believed is that that product independent of the entire operational site was ready and tested. What -- a determination was made -- I was involved with the Spanish Web site and the Medicaid transfers to say, let's minimize the risk for the whole site, let's load a week later.

GRIFFITH: But that raises the next question up, because one of the -- of the other contractors, QSSI, I believe it was, indicated to us that -- that part of the problem was that, once you took away the ability to browse, everybody had to go through the business of setting up an account, and you stopped -- or CMS stopped one of the browsing options as well, and that that actually contributed to the logjam and contributed to the problems.

So, isn't it -- is he correct on that, that not allowing people just to look without having to sign up, wouldn't that have made it easier for the American people?

SEBELIUS: In hindsight, I think that probably would have been advantageous, I can tell you that the reason the decision was made going forward was to minimize risk, that didn't work so well.

But adding additional features that didn't involve people actually wanting to get to what they would independently pay and what they would qualify for and what the plans were, seemed to be things that could be added down the road. It was wrong.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Bilirakis?

BILIRAKIS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate it very much,

Thank you, Madam Secretary, for testifying today.

Madam Secretary, over the weekend, the New York Times wrote the following, "Project managers at the Department of Health and Human Services assured the White House that any remaining problems could be worked out once the Web site went live. But other senior officials predicted serious trouble and advised delaying the rollout."

Can you confirm if this is true? Did any senior department official predict serious problems? And did any senior department officials advise delaying the rollout of the exchanges or parts of the exchanges on October 1st? Could you...

SEBELIUS: I can tell you that no senior official reporting to me ever advised me that we should delay. You heard from the contractors on the 24th that none of them advised a delay. We have testing that did not advise a delay. So not -- not to my knowledge.

BILIRAKIS: Did they indicate to you that there were serious problems?

SEBELIUS: They indicated to me that we would always have risks, because this system is brand-new and no one has operated a system like this before to any degree.

So, we always knew that there would be the possibility that some things would go wrong. No one indicated that this could possibly go this wrong.

BILIRAKIS: Can you name some of these officials that gave you the advice, that there were serious problems?

SEBELIUS: Again, I -- we had series of meetings with teams from CMS. I was always advised that there is always a risk with a new product and a new site, but never suggested that we delay the launch of October 1st, nor did our contracting partners ever suggest that to us.

BILIRAKIS: Thank you, Madam Secretary.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Appreciate it. I yield back.

UPTON: Mr. Johnson?

JOHNSON: Madam Secretary, thank you for being here with us today. CMS was the integrator of the Web site prior to and leading up to the 1 October rollout...

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

JOHNSON: Correct?

You've testified you've now hired an outside company to serve as the integrator...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: One of the contractors has taken on an additional role...

JOHNSON: Who is that company?

SEBELIUS: QSSI.

JOHNSON: QSSI.

SEBELIUS: Who built the hub.

JOHNSON: OK.

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

JOHNSON: This is the same company that told our committee last week that they were not only the developer of the hub and the pipeline, but also an independent tester of the system.

SEBELIUS: Yes.

JOHNSON: You've acknowledged in your testimony today that inadequate testing played a significant role in this failed launch, so aren't you concerned that QSSI has lost its ability to be an objective independent arbitrator in addressing the problems that plague the system now? Because they're part of the tester, part of the developer, part of the problem.

SEBELIUS: No, I haven't lost my -- my confidence in them. I think the testing that they did is validating the pieces of the equipment. What we've said since the launch is that we did not do adequate end-to-end testing.

JOHNSON: OK.

SEBELIUS: That was not the QSSI responsibility.

JOHNSON: All right. And in this new role as integrator, are you going to be paying QSSI more than they were to be paid under their original contract? I -- I would expect with this expanded role they're going to get paid more, right?

SEBELIUS: That discussion is under way in terms of what the role will entail, what the outlines are, yes, sir.

JOHNSON: OK. Well, hard-working American taxpayers have already paid for this implementation once. Do you think it's fair to ask taxpayers to pay more so that QSSI can now attempt to do something that Administrator Tavenner and her CMS team were unable to do right the first time?

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, I think the American taxpayers expect us to get the site up and running. As I told you earlier...

JOHNSON: Oh, I'm certain that they did. They expected it the first time.

SEBELIUS: I understand, and so did I. We have not expended the funds that have been encumbered for the contracts. We have not -- and we will monitor every dime we spend from here on in, and re-audit things that are going forward.

JOHNSON: Well, with that, Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

UPTON: The gentleman yields back.

Mr. Long?

LONG: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you, Secretary, for being here today and giving your testimony.

Earlier today, you said that "I'm responsible for the implementation of the Affordable Care Act." I've heard you referred to, and maybe yourself, as the point person for the rollout, the architect of implementing Affordable Care Act. So you are kind of the president's point person, are you not, for this rollout?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

LONG: I -- earlier, you were asked, and there's a lot of things striking about the rollout of this and about the Affordable Care Act altogether. But the thing that's most striking to me is that when we have the point person for the rollout here, and you're not going in to the exchange.

Now, I've heard you say that, and you got some advice from the folks behind you, but I'm asking you today: Can you tell the American public, if your advisers behind you, that if they happen to have given you some wrong information, if it is possible for you to go into the exchange like all these millions of Americans that are going with the exchanges, will you commit to forego your government insurance plan that you're on now and join us in the pool? Come on in. The water's fine. All the congressmen, all of our staff have to go into the exchanges.

We have to go into the D.C. exchanges. And I will say that I tried to get on the website. I was successful during the hearing earlier, and I got to the D.C. exchange, which is where I have to buy from, I got part way through. And then when it got to the point to enter my Social Security number, I could not bring myself to do that, from what I've heard from people like John McAfee and folks about the security.

Will you tell, if your advisers are wrong, and it is possible for you -- I'm not saying it is -- but if it is, if it's possible for you to forego your government program you have now? Will you tell the American public that, "Yes, I will go into the exchanges next year like everyone else"?

SEBELIUS: Sir, the way the law is written...

LONG: It's a yes or no -- I'm -- let's say that you're wrong on that. Yes or no, if -- if you're wrong, will you? Yes or no?

SEBELIUS: But I don't want to give misinformation to the American public...

LONG: You what?

SEBELIUS: ... who may be -- I don't want to give misinformation. If you have affordable coverage...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: I want you to go home and research it. If -- if you're wrong...

SEBELIUS: ... if you have affordable coverage...

LONG: ... will you go into the exchanges?

SEBELIUS: I -- if I'm...

LONG: If you can, will you? That's a yes or no. If you can, will you?

SEBELIUS: I will take a look at it. I don't have any idea...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: That's not an answer. That's not a yes or no.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

LONG: You're the architect of the whole program and you won't go into it with the rest of the American public.

SEBELIUS: I did not say that, sir. I think it's illegal for me to...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: If it's not illegal. If it's legal, will you go in?

(CROSSTALK)

WAXMAN: Mr. Chairman? Mr. Chairman?

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: Come on in, the water's fine.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

WAXMAN: I have a unanimous consent request. I'd like to -- Madam Secretary, I'd like you to answer for the record. If you were able to do what the gentleman just suggested or follow the recommendation of Cory Gardner, our colleague from Colorado, and went into the bought -- to buy an individual policy, would you be able to find one that would protect you from cheap shots? Or do you think that has to be mandated for coverage?

(LAUGHTER)

I'll leave the record open for your response.

UPTON: Yeah, we'll wait for that response to come back.

SEBELIUS: I would gladly join the exchange if I didn't have affordable coverage in my workplace. I would gladly join it. And the D.C. market is an independent state-based market, even though D.C. is not a state. We do not run the D.C. market in the federal marketplace.

UPTON: The gentlelady from North Carolina, Ms. Ellmers?

ELLMERS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I have a couple of questions. Thank you for being with us today, Madam Secretary.

I'd like to go to the issue that has been raised by my colleagues on the left here about accurate information. Number one, I've heard the issue of Medicare Part D brought up many, many times. Although my colleagues all voted no against it initially, now they're extolling the virtues of Medicare Part D.

Is Medicare Part D a mandate or is it voluntary?

SEBELIUS: It is voluntary.

ELLMERS: It is a voluntary program.

SEBELIUS: Yes.

ELLMERS: That's the first accurate -- piece of accurate information I would like to get.

You know, we're asking or we're actually forcing millions of Americans to go to find a health care premium in some way, whether it's to go to the exchange or whether they are to be insured.

ELLMERS: Many of my constituents are reaching out to me, those with individual policies, and they are saying to me that my -- my rates are going up 400 percent; my rates are going up 127 percent. These are my constituents.

Now, you know, we're talking about open enrollment, but it's forcing the issue, is it not, that if an American does not have health care coverage, they are essentially breaking the law. Is that not correct?

SEBELIUS: If someone can afford coverage and has that option and chooses not to buy coverage, they will pay a fee on their (inaudible) next year's tax.

(CROSSTALK)

ELLMERS: And it is a law, so therefore they are breaking the law.

(CROSSTALK)

ELLMERS: OK. You also brought up the issue when you were in Kansas, that you fought against discriminatory -- discriminatory issues. Now, I, you know, as far as the essential health benefits, correct me if I'm wrong, do men not have to buy maternity coverage?

SEBELIUS: Policies will cover maternity coverage for the young and healthy.

ELLMERS: Including men.

SEBELIUS: Under 30-year-olds will have a choice also of a catastrophic plan which has no maternity coverage.

ELLMERS: The catastrophic, but the men are required to purchase maternity...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Well, an insurance policy has a series of benefits whether you use them or not. And one of the benefits will be maternity coverage, mental health coverage...

(CROSSTALK)

ELLMERS: And that is why the health care premiums are increasing because we're forcing them to buy things that they will never need.

Thank you, Madam Chairman.

SEBELIUS: The individual policies cover families. Men often do need maternity coverage for their spouses and for their families. Yes.

ELLMERS: Single male, age 32, does not need maternity coverage. To the best of your knowledge...

(CROSSTALK)

ELLMERS: ... has a man ever delivered a baby?

UPTON: The gentlelady's time has expired.

(LAUGHTER)

The gentlelady, Ms. Cathy McMorris Rodgers?

MCMORRIS RODGERS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And Madam Secretary, you know, although we were told repeatedly that if you liked your health insurance plan, you'd be able to keep it. We're now being told by the government that they have determined many existing plans to be lousy, sub-par.

In reality, this law is becoming quickly less about helping Americans purchase affordable coverage and more about compelling millions of Americans into a struggling Medicaid program.

In my home state of Washington, 90 percent of enrollees will be in Medicaid; 16,000 of them coming into a program that they were already eligible for; Colorado, 89 percent; Kentucky, two-thirds; Maryland, 97 percent. And this is -- these are states that are already struggling with their budgets, wondering how they're going to cover Medicaid, which is, as we all know, for the most vulnerable population.

So isn't it true that in states like Washington, they're going to have new, unexpected costs associated with a dramatic influx into Medicaid?

SEBELIUS: Well, Congresswoman, the Medicaid expansion provision of the Affordable Care Act is...

MCMORRIS RODGERS: Could you -- are states going to face new costs...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Federal government pays 100 percent of the costs of newly insured for the first three years, and gradually reduces...

(CROSSTALK)

MCMORRIS RODGERS: These are existing -- these were people that were already eligible. And we know that two out of three doctors don't accept new Medicaid patients. We know that current provider rates are going to drop at the end of 2014. So isn't it true that existing Medicare -- Medicaid enrollees are going to further compete for scarce resources in these states?

SEBELIUS: If the citizens of Washington who are signing up were eligible for Medicaid, they certainly will be entitled to enroll in Medicaid now. The newly insured will be fully paid for. The doctors have additional...

(CROSSTALK)

MCMORRIS RODGERS: I'm concerned that the most vulnerable in this country are going to lack access to the care that they think they're going to receive. And I know time is short...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Well, I think that's absolutely true. And in states that are choosing not to expand Medicaid, it's particularly dire. So I would love to work with you on that...

(CROSSTALK)

MCMORRIS: It's existing Medicaid. Finally, I just wanted to inform the secretary, you told us several hours ago when the hearing started, that the website was down. If you look at the screen several hours later, healthcare.gov is still down. You promised the system would be ready on October 1st. You're clearly wrong.

So before I leave you today, I would just impress upon you this is more than a broken website. This is a broken law. Millions of Americans are getting notices their plans are being canceled.

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: The gentlelady's time is expired.

I just -- I would do a couple of things here. First, I'm going to ask unanimous consent that the written opening statements for any member on the committee be introduced into the record. And without objection, the documents will be there.

I also would ask unanimous consent to put the document binder and other documents presented to the secretary during questioning into the record. Without objection, so ordered.

Let me just say in conclusion, we do look forward to having you back in December to get an update on where we are. And we'll work with your schedule to find a right time and date early that -- that week.

I want you to know we're going to want real numbers. You'll have them by then. Is that right, in terms of the signup? You'll have them in the next couple of weeks.

SEBELIUS: That's correct. We'll have them by mid-November.

UPTON: We look forward to getting those done.

We appreciate -- we really do appreciate your time this morning to take questions. I apologize to all the members who we had to shorten the time, but those things happen when we have this much interest. And we look forward to continuing to get an update and look for your continued work.

WAXMAN: Mr. Chairman?

UPTON: Yes?

WAXMAN: From our side of the aisle, we want to work with you. And I would hope on the other side of the aisle, they would take that same approach. Let's do something constructive, not just negative attacks against a bill that I think is going to be a God-send for millions of Americans.

Thank you for being here.

SEBELIUS: Thank you.

UPTON: Thank you.

The hearing is adjourned.

Lujan questions HHS secretary -- Video extra

SECTION: TODAY'S NEWS

LENGTH: 886 words

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District and a member of the Energy and Commerce Committee participated in a hearing today in which Health and Human Services Secretary Kathleen Sebelius testified on the Affordable Care Act. Below is a transcript of Luján's exchange with the Secretary, in which they discussed important consumer protections under the law and their commitment to preventing and combating fraud.

Luján: Madam Secretary, I was intrigued by a line of questioning by Congressman [Gene] Green asking questions about the individual marketplace. How volatile was the individual marketplace before the Affordable Care Act became law?

Sebelius: I would say it wasn't a marketplace at all. It was unprotected, unregulated, and people were really on their own.

Luján: Madam Secretary, the Kaiser Family Foundation reports that over 50 percent churn - out of individuals that have coverage in the individual market - churn out of coverage every year. They lose coverage, they are priced out, or drop it. Is that consistent with what you are aware of?

Sebelius: That is an accurate snapshot. About a third of the people are in for about 6 months and over half are in for a year or less.

Luján: So individuals that were in the individual marketplace before the passage of the Affordable Care Act did not have the same protections as those that were in group coverage?

Sebelius: That's true.

Luján: And would those individuals in the individual marketplace sometimes have higher copays?

Sebelius: Higher copays, unlimited out-of-pocket costs for often coverage that was medically underwritten or excluded whatever medical condition they had in the first place.

Luján: So these were typically one-year contracts. If they use the plan because they got sick or in a car accident or a victim of domestic violence, sometimes they would be thrown off their plan or their rates would go up?

Sebelius: Yes.

Luján: I think that's important to note, Madam Secretary. And I'm intrigued, as well, that my understanding is last month HHS conducted an analysis that found that nearly 6 out of 10 uninsured Americans getting coverage through the marketplace will pay less than $100 per month. Is that correct?

Sebelius: They will have a plan available for less than $100 if that's their choice, yes.

Luján: And that number would be even higher - would be better - if more states chose the option of using federal funds to expand Medicaid to cover their low-income population?

Sebelius: Very definitely. That's just a marketplace snapshot. Those are people who will be in the marketplace.

Luján: Madam Secretary, I don't think that I've heard anyone from the other side of the aisle today, my Republican colleagues, ask you, "How can Congress work with you and support you in fixing this website and fixing this problem." I hope that we all agree we want this website fixed. I would yield to anyone that would disagree. Seeing no one accepting that, I am glad to hear that we agree with this. Now Madam Secretary, what can Congress do to work with you to fix this website?

Sebelius: Well, I'm not sure that there is hands-on work that you can do; maybe we have some technical expertise. But I would say getting accurate information to constituents is helpful, letting people know that they can check out the facts in the law, that they may be entitled to some financial support, that cancelation of policies means that the policy they had may not exist but they have a lot of choices of new policies and a law that now says they must be insured in a new policy - that they don't have to be insured by their company at a higher price.

Luján: I appreciate that Madam Secretary. Going back to the individual marketplace, Madam Secretary, did this Congress in previous years before the Affordable Care Act make it illegal for health insurance companies to raise rates on someone after they submitted a claim for going to the hospital or becoming sick or getting rid of pre-existing conditions.

Sebelius: No sir.

Luján: Madam Secretary, one last note here. It seems that we've received some horrible news that there are bad actors already taking place - fraudulent websites that imitate the health care exchange or misleading seniors into disclosing their personal information. I've signed onto a letter to you, led by my colleague Representative Raul Ruiz out of California, to request that you prioritize fraud prevention efforts. What has the administration done to prevent these fraudulent acts and protect personal information?

Sebelius: I can tell you, Congressman, that the President felt very strongly that that needed to be part of our outreach effort, which is why the Attorney General and I convened representatives of state Attorneys General, Insurance Commissioners, the U.S. Attorneys, and the Justice Department, and the Federal Trade Commission - which has jurisdiction - to make sure that we first got out ahead some of this, developing consumer outreach. No one should ever give personal health information because personal health information is not needed for these policies any longer. That is as red flag. We want to make sure that people turn over potential fraudulent acts. We have put training in place for navigators. We have our law enforcement folks doing outreach.

WITNESSES: , KATHLEEN SEBELIUS, SECRETARY OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES

[*] UPTON: Good morning.

The Energy and Commerce Committee welcomes the president's point person on health care, , Secretary Sebelius, as part of our continuing oversight of the health care law.

And we look forward to a thoughtful conversation on a number of issues including transparency and fairness. Over the months leading up to October 1 launch, the secretary and her colleagues at HHS repeatedly looked us in the eye and testified that everything was on track. And despite the numerous red flags and lack of testing, they assured us that all systems were a go.

But something happened along the way. Either those officials did not know how bad the situation was, or they did not disclose it.

And, sadly, here we are now, five weeks into enrollment and the news seems to get worse by the day. Healthcare.gov was down last night at 5:00 p.m. It was also down on Monday, and it crashed last weekend.

And even this morning when we attempted to view the site before the hearing, we were hit with an error message.

But this is more than just a Web site problem. That was supposed to be the easy part, remember? Americans were assured that their experience would be similar to other online transactions, like purchasing a flight or ordering a pizza, and that their sensitive personal information would always be secure.

But, after more than three years to prepare, malfunctions have become the norm, and the administration has pivoted from saying they're on track to setting a new target date of November 30th.

And for those few Americans who have successfully applied, will the Web site glitches become provider glitches come January 1st?

Americans are scared and frustrated, and this situation should rise above politics. Many folks at home watching us today have spent hours or even days trying to sign up. They continue to take time away from work or loved ones, but have made little progress.

And soon they may worry about being on the wrong side of their government, facing potential penalties.

I recently spoke to a woman from Buchanan (ph), Michigan, who was excited to sign up, but has since become very disillusioned after spending hours on the phone and Web site with little success.

There are also millions of Americans coast to coast who no doubt believe that the president's repeated promises that if they liked their plan that they would be able to keep it, no matter what.

They are now receiving termination notices. And for those who lose their coverage, they, like -- they may be losing their faith in their government. Today's hearing is about fairness for the American people who are losing their coverage or seeing their premiums skyrocket as high as 400 percent.

This hearing is also about transparency. While the administration continues to boast the number of Americans that have applied, they intentionally withhold precise enrollment numbers.

Why? These numbers are critical to fully understand the status and gauging the progress of implementation.

Lead contractor, CGI, testified only last week that they had the data, but needed the administration's permission to release it.

We asked the secretary on October 8th for those figures, but we still have not received a response. We hope to get one today. The American people deserve answers as well as the peace of mind that promises will be kept. The secretary has an opportunity today to embrace transparency and start restoring the public's faith in the administration and the government.

I yield to my colleague, ranking member of the committee, Mr. Waxman.

WAXMAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I'm pleased , Secretary Sebelius is here today. She's here to discuss the Affordable Care Act. Just like with Medicare Part D, the launch of the new Web site has not gone well. But, just like Medicare Part D, the early glitches in this rollout will soon be forgotten.

A lot of the discussion today will focus on that Web site. This is an important issue, and I want to learn what the secretary can tell us about the problems being experienced and how they will be fixed.

But we should keep this issue in perspective. The Affordable Care Act is working. It has been improving the health security of millions of Americans for the past three years.

Because of the Affordable Care Act, more than 7 million people on Medicare have saved more than $8 billion on their prescription drugs. More than 100 million Americans have access to free preventive coverage and no longer face lifetime limits on their coverage. Over 10 million Americans have received rebates from insurance companies.

And, finally, this January, the worst abuses of insurance industry will be halted. Never again will a family be denied coverage because their child has a chronic health condition. Never again will individuals see their premiums shoot up because they got sick or faced an unexpected medical expense. Never again will a woman have to pay twice as much as a man for the same insurance.

That is why allowing insurers to continue offering deficient plans next year is such a bad policy. The law says that all plans except those that were grandfathered in 2010 must meet the new consumer protection standards. If we don't enforce this policy, insurance companies can continue offering flimsy coverage that disappears when people actually need it, and no one should want that.

It is understandable that there will be a focus today on what isn't working, but we must also remember what is working. The health insurance plans that are being offered in the exchanges are good plans. Their premiums are much lower than expected. Sixty percent of the uninsured individuals shopping in the new marketplaces will be able to get coverage for less than $100 per month. Half of the young adults will be able to get coverage for less than $50 per month.

And since Congress adopted the Affordable Care Act, health care costs across the whole economy have grown at their lowest level in decades.

The success of the Affordable Care Act is due to the efforts of many people, but one individual more than any other is responsible for all the good that has been accomplished, and that is our witness today, , Secretary Sebelius.

WAXMAN: So I would urge my colleagues to stop hyperventilating. The problems with healthcare.gov are unfortunate and we should investigate them, but they will be fixed. And then every American will have -- finally have access to affordable health insurance.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Thank you.

Before we swear in , Secretary Sebelius, I want to clarify Energy and Commerce Committee practice for the swearing in of witnesses.

The committee typically has two types of hearings, oversight hearings and hearings that focus on legislation and policy.

Secretary Sebelius, for example, has testified previously before our committee to discuss issues related to the HHS budget or other policy matters. As is the case with all policy witnesses, , Secretary Sebelius was not required to take an oath prior to testifying.

Today's hearing is different. It is an oversight hearing. It is a long standing committee practice to swear in all witnesses at oversight hearings whether they be private citizens or cabinet secretaries.

WAXMAN: Mr. Chairman, I thank you for your comments. And I just want to join you in simply explaining that it -- swearing in of the witness before an oversight committee hearing has always been under oath.

That is a standard procedure in this committee when we're conducting an oversight hearing, so it may seem strange to have the secretary of Health and Human Services have to be sworn in, but all witnesses in an oversight hearing are sworn in and that is our procedure.

UPTON: Thank you.

So I would now like to introduce our witness for today's hearing. The Honorable , Kathleen Sebelius is the secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services. She was appointed to this position in April of 2009 and was sworn in as the 21st secretary on April 28th, 2009.

So I will now swear you in if you would rise. As Ranking Waxman and I just discussed, the committee is holding an investigative hearing and when doing so have had the practice of taking testimony under oath.

Do you have any objection to testifying under oath?

SEBELIUS: (Inaudible).

UPTON: And the chair now advises you that you are -- see -- I would now read you -- do you swear that the testimony you are about to give is the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth?

SEBELIUS: (Inaudible).

UPTON: You are now under oath and subject to penalties set forth in Title 18, Section 1001 of the U.S. Code. You may now give a five- minute summary of your written statement.

Welcome again and thank you for being here.

You got to use that mike. You don't know how many people want to hear you this morning.

(LAUGHTER)

SEBELIUS: Thank you, Chairman Upton, Ranking Member Waxman, members of the committee.

I left my position as governor of Kansas 41/2 years ago for the opportunity to continue work I've been doing for most of my over 35 years of public service, to expand the opportunities for all Americans regardless of geography or gender or income to have affordable health coverage.

During my years as the state legislator, as an elected insurance commissioner, as head of the National Association of Insurance Commissioners and as a two-term governor and now as HHS secretary, I have worked on that effort that I care deeply about.

There are still millions of Americans who are uninsured as well as underinsured, people who have some coverage at some price for some illness but have no real protection from financial ruin and no real confidence they'll be able to take care of themselves and their families if they have an accident or an illness. And for them a new day has finally come.

In these early weeks, access to healthcare.gov has been a miserably frustrating experience for way too many Americans including many who have waited years, in some cases their entire lives for the security of health insurance. I am as frustrated and angry as anyone with the flawed launch of healthcare.gov.

So let me say directly to these Americans, you deserve better. I apologize. I'm accountable to you for fixing these problems. And I'm committed to earning your confidence back by fixing the site. We're working day and night and will continue until it's fixed. We've recently added new management talent, additional technical expertise and a new general contractor to identify, prioritize and manage fixes across the system in two broad categories: performance, which deals with speed and reliability and function, which deals with bugs and problems in the system.

Our extensive assessment has determined that healthcare.gov is fixable. And I want to just outline a couple of the improvements we've made to date.

We now have more users successfully creating accounts. We can process up to 17,000 account registrations per hour or nearly five per second.

Instead of some of the users seeing a blank screen at the end of the application process, they can now see whether they're eligible for financial assistance and make more informed decisions.

Because we've improved performance, customers can now shop for plans quickly; filtering plans takes seconds and not minutes. Users are getting fewer errors and time-out messages as they move through the application process and the system has been strengthened with double the size of servers, software that's better optimized and a high-capacity physical database which replaces a virtual system.

The chairman referred to outages this weekend and again yesterday. And I would suggest to the committee that if you read the statement of Verizon who hosts the cloud service, it is the Verizon server that failed, not healthcare.gov, and it affected not only HHS but other customers.

We still have a lot of work to do. We have a plan in place to address key outstanding issues. It includes fixing bugs in software that prevented it from working the way it's supposed to and refreshing the user experience so folks can navigate the site without encountering error messages, time out and slow response times.

And by the end of November, we're committed that the vast majority of users will be able to review their options, shop for plans and enroll in coverage without the problems way too many have being experiencing.

But consumers are using the site every day and continue to do so. And problems are being solved. But we know that we don't have a fully functioning system that consumers need and deserve. We are still at the beginning of a six-month open enrollment which extends through the end of March and there's plenty of time to sign up.

And just to put it in perspective, the average open enrollment for an insurance plan is two to four weeks. The new marketplace has a 26-week open enrollment and those who enroll by December 15th will be able to access their benefits on day one.

Even with the unacceptable problems with healthcare.gov, which we are committed to fixing, the Affordable Care Act by any fair measure is working for millions of Americans who are benefiting from new health security, young adults, Americans living with pre-existing health conditions, seniors on Medicare.

Eighty-five percent of Americans who already have health coverage are protected with new rights and benefits.

The 15 percent of our neighbors and friends who are uninsured have affordable new options in a competitive market and cost growth for health care is lower than it's been in years. Millions of Americans are clearly eager to learn about their options and to finally achieve health security made possible by the Affordable Care Act.

And my commitment is to deliver on that promise.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Well, thank you very much.

Yes, if you -- the mike got pulled a little bit from you.

Yes, let's start this clock. Can you fix that? (Inaudible).

I appreciate you being here this morning and we've worked with our leadership to see that we don't have votes on the House floor this morning so we won't be interrupted.

I appreciate your time for sure and in an effort to allow every member to ask a question, we're going to be reducing the time for questions to be just four minutes, so hopefully we can get through all the members that are here. And I'm going to be pretty fast with the gavel, let me just say.

So we have got plenty of questions. So let's try and get through them.

(Inaudible).

You know, I think everyone in America remembers the president's words. If you like your health care plan, you can keep it, period. Under the Affordable Care Act insurance policies that were in effect on March 23rd, 2010, when the law was enacted, would be grandfathered.

Then a few months later, despite the president's word, HHS helped promulgate a new reg that in your own review showed that it effectively could deny perhaps as many as more than 50 percent, maybe even higher, of those holding individual policies the right to renew their own insurance plan.

UPTON: And I would guess that there are a lot of us on this panel today that are hearing from angry and confused constituents who are now being forced to go onto an inept website, whether they like it or not, to shop for a new replacement policy. They're finding premiums often more than 100 percent what they were paying before, some even as high as 400 percent, as I've heard from, and rising deductibles as well.

So when was the president specifically informed of the regulation change? And if so, was it pointed out that this totally undermines his biggest selling point? And I would note, that on the screen, in a statement that he made more than three years after the regulation change was promulgated, the President said again, "So the first thing you need to know is this. If you already have health care, you don't have to do anything." So he's been on the same page from the very start, yet the regulations changed months after the bill was enacted that are now causing perhaps millions of Americans to be denied the ability to renew their individual coverage.

Why was that change made, and did the President know it?

SEBELIUS: Well Mr. Chairman, there was no change. The regulation involving grandfathered plans, which applied to both the employer market and the individual market indicated that if a plan that was in effect in March of 2010 stayed in effect without unduly burdening the consumer with reducing benefits and adding on huge costs, that plan would stay in effect and never have to comply with any of the regulations of the Affordable Care Act. That's what the grandfather clause said. The individual market which affects about 12 million Americans, about 5 percent of the market, people move in and out, they often have coverage for less than a year. A third of them have coverage for about six months, and if a plan was in place of March of 2010 and again, did not impose additional burdens on the consumer, they still have it. It's grandfathered in.

UPTON: But why not let the consumer decide whether they want to renew it or not? Why was -- why were regulations promulgated in the summer of 2010 that then undermined the ability for those folks to re- sign up, which is one of the reasons for the large number of cancellation notes?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: And there were no regulations changed We outlined the grandfather policy so people could keep their own plan. We then began to implement the other features of the Affordable Care Act, so if someone is buying a brand new policy in the individual market today, or last week, they will have consumer protections for the first time. Many people in the under -- individual market are medically underwritten. That will be illegal. Many women are charged 50 percent more than men. That will be illegal. You cannot, again, eliminate someone because of a pre-existing health condition. You cannot dump someone out or lock someone out, so those provisions. But if again, a plan is in place, and was in place at the time that the President signed the bill and the consumer wants to keep the plan, those individuals are grandfathered in and that's happening across the country in the individual market.

UPTON: We're learning in fact that folks who did have a plan who liked it in fact are being told that it's canceled in the -- in the last -- my time is expired. Let me yield to the Ranking Member, Mr. Waxman for four minutes.

WAXMAN: Thank you Mr. Chairman. I have to smile at your line of questioning because everybody expected this hearing was about the website. That's all we've been hearing about is the website. But that's not the only complaint we've been hearing about since the Affordable Care Act was adopted. We were told by our Republican friends that millions of jobs would be lost and in fact, there have been a gain of 7 million jobs. They said that they -- the -- the cost for health care would skyrocket, and in fact, the opposite is true. They said there would be a massive shift to part-time jobs, and the evidence doesn't support that. They said tens of millions will lose their insurance, but in fact, everybody in this country has got to have access to health insurance because they won't be discriminated against. They said that it would explode the deficit, and yet all the reputable organizations like the Congressional Budget Office have told us that it's going to save us $100 billion over 10 years, so we've had a litany of objections for the Republicans about the Affordable Care Act which have driven them to such a frenzy they even closed the government.

So now we have you before the committee. And you're being asked, I suppose later you'll be asked about the website. But let me pursue this question about individuals who have gotten notices, that they're going to have their individual insurance policies canceled. They'll be able to get another plan, won't they?

SEBELIUS: Actually, it's the law that they must get another plan. Continuous coverage is part of the law.

WAXMAN: So the ...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: That wasn't the case in the past.

WAXMAN: So the Affordable Care Act said we're going to end the worst abuses of insurance companies. We're going to create consumer protections in the marketplace that they will be able to buy a policy even if they've been sick in the past. That women won't be charged more than me. That we're not going to let insurance companies deny coverage because of pre-existing conditions, and we're not going to let them put these lifetime caps. And there'll be an essential benefit package, so you're not just buying some things and not having other things covered. You're going to have the minimum that everybody should have, prescription drugs, mental health coverage, doctors and hospitals. Are these important consumer protections?

SEBELIUS: Well I would say, Mr. Waxman, they're very important. As a former insurance commissioner, I can tell you that the individual market in Kansas and anywhere in the country has never had consumer protections. People are on their own. They could be locked out, priced out, dumped out, and that happens each and every day. So this will finally provide the kind of protections that we all enjoy in our health care plans, as part of a group, as part of a plan that has pre-negotiated benefits, we enjoy that kind of health security, and individuals in the buying insurance on their own, farm families, young adults have never had that kind of health security.

WAXMAN: Well now they're going to have this health security, and most of the plans, as I understand it, that -- that they're no longer going to be able to keep, don't meet all the standards of the law.

SEBELIUS: Again, I think you may have heard Pat Geraghty from Florida Blues who was on some of the Sunday shows and he talks about the fact that the Florida plans want to keep their customers. They have new plans to offer, they feel that a lot of people, and these are Mr. Geraghty's words, "will have a much better plan at a similar or lower cost. Fifty percent of these 11 to 12 million people qualify for a subsidy, quality for financial help purchasing insurance for the first time ever."

WAXMAN: The bottom line is that people with good coverage like Medicare, Medicaid, employer coverage, can keep that. People with grandfathered plans in the individual market will be able to keep it. But if an insurance company sold you a new modified health insurance policy after the date of the enactment that does not meet the law's standards, then those people will be able to go into the exchange and buy a real solid health insurance plan that won't discriminate against them or anybody else. I think that's a good result. I'm pleased with it, and I think most people will be as well.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired. The Chair would recognize the Vice Chair of the committee, Ms. Blackburn.

BLACKBURN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Madam Secretary, during -- before, during and after the law was passed, the President kept saying, "if you like your health care plan, you can keep it," so is he keeping his promise?

SEBELIUS: Yes, he is.

BLACKBURN: OK. What do you say to the 300,000 people in Florida you just mentioned, or to the 28,000 in Tennessee that cannot get health insurance? Their plans are terminated. Is he keeping his promise to them?

SEBELIUS: Well first of all, Congresswoman, they can get health insurance. They must be offered new plans, new options either inside the marketplace, or if they don't qualify for a financial subsidy, they can shop in or out of the marketplace.

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: But would you say to ...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: They absolutely will have new coverage.

BLACKBURN: What would you say to NBC news who says, "Millions are going to lose their coverage?"

SEBELIUS: Well, in all deference to the press corps, many of whom are here today, I think it's -- it's important to be accurate about what is going on, and I would defer, again, to the President of the (inaudible) plan.

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: Reclaiming ...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: (inaudible) ongoing coverage, they will be offered new plans.

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: Madam Secretary, let me tell you something.

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Fifty percent of them in the market right now will -- will qualify for ...

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: What do you say to Mark and Lucinda in my district who had a plan, they liked it, it was affordable, but it is being terminated and now they do not have health insurance?

SEBELIUS: Insurance companies cancel individual policies year in and year out. They're a one-year contract with individuals. They are not lifetime plans, they are not an employer plan. Your constituents will have lots of options.

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: Let me -- let me move -- let me move on. It's what they wanted, and I will remind you, some people like to drive a Ford, not a Ferrari, and some people like to drink out of a red Solo cup and not a crystal stem. Your taking away their choice. Let's put the screen shot up. I want to go to the cost of the website and talk about the website. This is what is happening right now with this website. We've had somebody in the back trying to sign on. It is down. It is not working. Last week I asked for the cost from each of the contractors that were with us last week. So can you give me a ballpark on what you have spent on this website that does not work, that individuals cannot get to? What is your cost estimate?

SEBELIUS: So far, Congresswoman, we have spent about $118 million on the website itself, and about $56 million has been expended on other IT to support the web.

BLACKBURN: OK. Would you submit a detailed accounting of exactly what has been spent? And when do you expect constituents to stop getting these kind of error messages?

SEBELIUS: Again, I was with the -- I talked to the president of Verizon over the weekend on two occasions. Verizon hosts the cloud, which is not part of the website. It is a host for a number of websites. The Verizon system was taken down Saturday night into Sunday. It was down almost all day Sunday. They had an additional problem that they notified us about yesterday and it continues on. So I'd be happy to talk to the president of Verizon and get him to give you...

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: OK, let me -- let me come back to that, because I want to get to this issue of exactly who is in charge of this project. Because you're now blaming it on the contractors and saying it's Verizon's fault.

So let me ask you this: Did you ever look at outsourcing the role of the system integrator -- and obviously you did not from the contractors that we had last week -- you all -- they had several different people, whether it was you or Gary Cohen or Michelle Snyder or Henry Chao, that they thought were in charge. So who is responsible for overseeing this project? Is it you or your designee?

SEBELIUS: Let me be clear, I'm not pointing fingers at Verizon. I'm trying to explain the way the site operates. We are -- we own the site. The site has had serious problems. I...

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: Who is in charge, Madam Secretary?

SEBELIUS: The person now in charge as an integrator is QSSI, one of our...

BLACKBURN: Who was in charge as it was being built?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: ... CMS was in charge up...

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: At that team, who is the individual...

SEBELIUS: Michelle Snyder is...

BLACKBURN: Michelle Snyder is the one responsible for this debacle?

SEBELIUS: Well, excuse me, Congresswoman. Michelle Snyder is not responsible for the debacle. Hold me accountable for the debacle. I'm responsible.

BLACKBURN: Thank you. I yield back.

UPTON: Chair would recognize Mr. Dingell from the great state of Michigan.

DINGELL: Thank you for your courtesy.

I have a few questions I'll be asking you on behalf of Congresswoman Shea-Porter, but I'll do that by writing. I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to revise and extend my remarks.

UPTON: Without objection.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, I would like to begin by thanking you; welcoming the secretary to a room in which her distinguished father, former governor of Ohio, served for so many years.

I begin my questions by quoting from an expert for whom I have enormous respect. He said as follows: "As I mentioned earlier, the new benefits and its implementation are hardly perfect. Rather than trying to scare and confuse seniors, I would hope that we could work together as we go through the implementation phase to find out what is wrong with the program, and if we can make some changes to fix it.

"Let us do it, and let us do it in a bipartisan fashion. It is too big a program and is too important to too many people to do that. But having said that, it does appear that it is working. Let us admit it, you know, and not keep beating a dead horse."

My beloved friend, Mr. Barton -- who I think gave us the beginning of our efforts today.

Madam Secretary, I've seen reports that consumers receiving plan cancellation notices from their insurance companies saying that plans are no longer available. Does the ACA require insurance companies to discontinue the plans that people had when the law was passed, yes or no?

SEBELIUS: Not when the law was passed if the plans have not changed, no, sir.

(CROSSTALK) SEBELIUS: That's the grandfather clause.

DINGELL: Now, that's because the plans existed prior to the passage of the law are grandfathered in, as you have said?

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

DINGELL: So if an insurance company is no longer offering a certain plan, that's because that insurance company made a decision to change their policies, and that caused them to take away the grandfather status from their insurance purchasers, is that right?

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

DINGELL: Now, Madam Secretary, I want you to submit for the record a statement of what it is we can do about insurance companies that run around canceling the policies of their people. And I don't have time to get -- get the answer, but I want to get a very clear statement from you as to what you can do so we can take some skin off some folks that have it coming.

(LAUGHTER)

Now, Madam Secretary, it's my understanding that these decisions of a business character are most common in the individual insurance market, and that much turnover already exists and existed prior to the enactment of the legislation.

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

DINGELL: Is that correct?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: Is it correct that 35 percent to 67 percent (ph) of the enrollees in the individual market leave their plan after one year for different reasons?

SEBELIUS: A third are in about less than six months in the individual market and over 50 percent are in for less than a year, yes, sir.

DINGELL: Now, in the cancellation letters, which move around from the insurance companies, some insurance companies are suggesting an alternative plan at a higher price. Do they have the right to do that?

SEBELIUS: Well, they have a right to do that, sir, but consumers have a right to shop anywhere to compare plans and they have choices now that they've never had before -- and some financial assistance...

DINGELL: And they have no right...

SEBELIUS: ... coming their way for about 50 percent of those people.

DINGELL: ... to enforce that demand on the insurance company?

SEBELIUS: Oh, absolutely not. No one is rolled over into a plan. And in fact, individuals for the first time ever will have the ability to compare plans, to shop, and to make a choice inside or outside the marketplace.

DINGELL: Looks to me like the insurance companies are trying to inflict on their -- on their customers the view that this is their right and that this is the only option available to them, is that correct?

SEBELIUS: Well, I -- I think that insurance companies would like to keep their customers. Having said that, customers for the first time have a lot of choices, because they can't be locked out...

(CROSSTALK)

DINGELL: But the insurance companies have no right to enforce that view on the customer?

SEBELIUS: There is no rule that says you have to stay with your company or you have to be rolled over...

(CROSSTALK)

DINGELL: And you don't...

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

(CROSSTALK)

DINGELL: ... when they come forward and tell you that you've got to buy a particular policy, is that right?

SEBELIUS: Absolutely.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

Chair would recognize the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Barton.

BARTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Before I ask my questions, we have a former member of the committee on the Democrat side from the great state of Kansas in the audience, Mr. Slattery. And we are -- we're glad to have you.

And Madam Secretary, we're glad to have you too.

SEBELIUS: Thank you, sir.

BARTON: There is a famous movie called the "Wizard of Oz," and in the "Wizard of Oz" there is a great line. Dorothy at some point in the movie turns to her little dog Toto and says, "Toto, we're not in Kansas anymore."

Well, Madam Secretary, while you're from Kansas, we're not in Kansas anymore. Some might say that we are actually in the "Wizard of Oz" land given the parallel universes we appear to be habitating.

Mr. Waxman and most of those on the Democrat side think things are great. You apparently, although you did apologize and you have said it's a debacle, you also seem to think that the Affordable Care Act is great. Well, myself and others have a different view. Ultimately the American people will decide.

Now, last week when the contractors were here, I focused my attention on the apparent lack of privacy in the website. If we'll put up the first slide that I had last week -- if we can.

This -- this is what's public, Madam Secretary. And it's -- it's basically a disclaimer that says that any unauthorized attempt to upload information or change information on the website is prohibited. It really doesn't say anything about privacy. But you do have to accept that in order to go forward with the application.

The next slide shows what's not public. And this is in the source code. We tried to determine this morning if it was still in the source code, but it's (ph) been pointed out, the website's down.

This is much more what I would say -- frightening to me. It says, "You have no reasonable expectation of privacy regarding any communication or data transiting or stored (ph) on the information system. At any time and for any lawful government purpose, the government may monitor, intercept, search and seize any communication or data transiting or stored (ph) on the information system. Any communication or data transiting or stored (ph) on this information system may be disclosed or used for any lawful government purpose."

Cheryl Campbell of CGI Federal said she was aware of it, but said that it wasn't her responsibility to put that in the source code. Were you a aware of it? And was it your responsibility to put this in the source code?

SEBELIUS: Mr. Barton, I did not put things in the source code. I can tell you, it's my understanding that that is boiler plate language that should not have been in this particular contract, because there are -- the highest security standards are in place, and people have every right to expect privacy.

BARTON: All right.

Now, the last time we could check, this was still there. You are given almost unlimited authority under the Affordable Care Act to administer it. Will you commit to the committee and to the American people that, one, you do want to protect their privacy and, two, you will take this out, fix it, make sure that it -- it doesn't have bearing on people that try to apply through the website?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir. And we have had those discussions with CGI, and it is under way. I do absolutely commit to protecting the privacy of the American public, and we have asked them to remove that statement. It is there in error. It needs to be taken down, and we should be held accountable for protecting privacy...

(CROSSTALK)

BARTON: Well, thank you, Madam Secretary. I -- I sincerely appreciate that, and I'm sure the American people do too.

My last question -- or it's really a comment. I've introduced H.R. 3348, which says, let's make this system voluntary for the first year since we're having so many problems and let the American people decide. What that means is, if people choose not to participate they will not be charged the penalty for non-participation. Would you support such a reasonable approach to this while we work out the problems in the system?

SEBELIUS: No, sir.

BARTON: OK. Well, that's an honest answer.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

BARTON: Thank you, Madam...

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Chair would recognize the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. Pallone.

PALLONE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I know we're not in Kansas, but I do believe increasingly we're in Oz because of what I see here.

(LAUGHTER)

So this "Wizard of Oz" comment by my colleague from Texas I think is particularly apropos, given what we hear (ph) on the other side of the aisle. I don't know how you keep your cool, Madam Secretary, you know, with this continuous effort on the part of the GOP to sabotage the ACA, to scare people and bring up red herrings. And I think that this privacy issue is another red herring. And I'm gonna ask you a question about that.

But before that, I just wanted to say, this whole idea that's being brought up today that somehow, you know, policies are being canceled and people don't have alternatives is just another red herring. You know, what I think my colleagues on the other side forget is that this is not socialized medicine. This is in fact private insurance in a competitive market.

And if I'm an insurance company and all of a sudden everyone else is selling a better policy with better benefits at a lower price, I can't continue to sell a lousy skeletal policy that doesn't provide benefits and cost more because I'll be out of the market. And so that's what's happening here. Insurance companies are canceling lousy policies with high prices because they can't compete. And that's what's gonna happen when you have a private insurance market, which is what we have here. We don't have a government-controlled system. We have private markets.

So I just wanted to make that point.

But I have to drill down on what Mr. Barton said here. You know, before reform, the individual insurance market was dysfunctional, premiums would shoot up if people got sick, their coverage could be canceled if they had a pre-existing condition, and they did not have secure, quality coverage.

Now, I've heard my Republican colleagues say that patient health information will be at risk in this application process, and this is flat out false. In fact, the ACA makes a giant leap forward for protecting health insurance by taking it completely out of the insurance application process by banning discrimination based on pre- existing conditions.

Mr. Barton, again, is, you know, raising this red herring just like the cancellation of insurance by talking about privacy. But Madam Secretary, prior to the ACA when people applied for insurance coverage, did insurers make them provide a long, detailed, invasive medical history, but now because the law bans discrimination based on pre-existing conditions, individuals will not have to provide this information in their applications?

So regardless of this clause, please comment on the privacy issue and why it's irrelevant.

SEBELIUS: Well, Mr. Pallone, in the past, any individual American who was in an employer-based coverage, in government coverage like the ones we enjoy in Medicare, in Medicaid, the V.A., a whole variety of plans, that's about 95 percent of insured Americans had no medical underwriting, had group protections, had consumer protections.

The people who were outside that consumer-protected space were individuals buying their own coverage in an individual market. Medical underwriting demanding health records and often going through extensive doctor interviews and getting health records was a standard for that market. Pricing could vary widely depending on gender, depending on health condition. People could be denied coverage and were frequently. That's the market that is currently being reformed with consumer protections.

If a person had a policy in place in March of 2010 like that policy and the insurance company made no changes to disadvantage the consumer, those policies are in place, you keep your plan, you like it, and that goes on.

For the people who, though, had a medically underwritten policy, were paying more than their neighbor because they happened to be female, could not get their health condition for a fixed hip written into their insurance plan, they will have a new day in a very competitive market; 25 percent of the insurers are brand new to the market and they are offering competitive plans.

PALLONE: Mr. Chairman, could I just ask that this document...

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Sure. Put it into the record without objection.

PALLONE: Thank you.

UPTON: Chair would recognize Mr. Hall.

HALL: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, I think Congresswoman Blackburn asked you about the federal government and how much they'd spent today and they're spending some money as we speak, aren't they?

It's down right now, isn't it?

Is that -- are you had -- you projected ongoing problems?

SEBELIUS: I'm sorry, sir. I'm having a hard time...

HALL: OK.

SEBELIUS: ... hearing.

What was the...

HALL: She asked you how much it had spent today and I'm asking what you expect to pay in addition to that on the repairs that the website is going to require and they're requiring them as we speak here.

So those are things you projected; you knew they would happen and they will happen. But you surely looked ahead and you have some estimate of what is going to happen.

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

HALL: And going to cost.

SEBELIUS: For our two major contractors who are USSI, a subsidiary of United and for CGI, there are obligated amounts. For CGI, who is in charge of the entire application, there has been $197 million obligated and that is to last through March of 2014.

And as I said before about $104 million has been expended in that obligated amount.

HALL: I'm going to try to be here on 2014 to be sure that your testimony is correct, OK?

(LAUGHTER)

I'm just joking with you.

(LAUGHTER)

SEBELIUS: OK.

HALL: And if -- were you born in Kansas, Meade (ph) -- Kansas?

SEBELIUS: I was not. I was born in Cincinnati, Ohio. I married a Kansan and went to Kansas.

HALL: All right. I was in the third grade there. And I thought I saw you on a tricycle there one day.

(LAUGHTER)

SEBELIUS: Well, it was an illusion.

HALL: Let me ask you a question, have you ever rejected a financial bill from one of the contractors?

Have you ever?

SEBELIUS: Have I ever...

HALL: Rejected a financial bill from one of them?

SEBELIUS: Sir, again, I -- our...

HALL: Well, I guess you can say yes or no.

SEBELIUS: ... our accounting office does a routine audit and review of every bill that comes in before they do it. I do not personally. I want to be very accurate about -- I don't personally pay contracts, negotiate contracts. By law and by precedent that's really illegal for someone who isn't a warranted contract officer to engage in the debate or discussion around federal contracts.

HALL: How much has the administration spent on the exchanges in total?

Not just healthcare.gov but all of the exchanges?

SEBELIUS: Sir...

HALL: How difficult is that figure to give me or if you can't give it to me...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I would like to get it to you in writing very quickly.

HALL: Madam Secretary, I'd like to talk -- I don't know how much time I have got left but I would like to talk about a couple of businesses in my district who are struggling with how to move forward. One is a manufacturing and one is in the pet boarding and training business. One has 85 employees and the other has 56.

Here's some quotes from some of their recent letters: "The situation we're in is we would have to pay $170,000 in penalties under Obamacare. This is another example of the government picking the winners and losers. We're the losers. There is no way I can be competitive if I have to raise my prices to cover $170,000. Here are my options: do not pay the penalty, raise my prices and go out of business. Eighty-five people lose their jobs, lay off 35 employees who don't have to pay the penalty and move more production to this country, reduce 35 jobs."

And here's a quote from the other: "Since they are high labor low margin, business cannot afford to pay for insurance for our employees we're faced with either closing our business perhaps through bankruptcy, though there are heavy financial obligations that would continue whether we operate or not.

"Fire enough employees to get under 50 employees limits and close some of our business. Even if we close the location we cannot escape many expenses such as rental agreements."

What am I supposed to tell these people?

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, I think that in the employer market, about 95 percent of all American businesses are exempt from any kind of requirement to cover employer -- employee insurance, and they are outside the law. They continue to be outside the law, but they will have some new options for those who want to cover their employees and some new tax credit possibilities.

For large employers, about 96 percent of them already cover their employees. And as you know, the penalty that your constituents referred to is not a penalty that is imposed in 2014. It is being discussed with businesses about what kind of information is exchanged and it will take place in 2015.

UPTON: The gentleman's time...

HALL: He's going to use the gavel on me if you don't hurry.

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

HALL: I yield back my time.

UPTON: At which time the Chair would recognize the gentlelady from California, Ms. Eshoo.

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Welcome, Madam Secretary. You're a distinguished woman, you have distinguished yourself and your state, the offices that you've held, and now working for the American people and I salute you for it. I -- I want to really congratulate my Republican pals for being absolutely 1000 percent consistent. You love what's wrong with the website, and you detest what's working in the Affordable Care Act. And I think that that is on full display here. But let's get back to the website, because that's what the hearing is about.

It's my understanding that November 31st (sic) is a -- is a hard date for having everything up and running. Do you have -- now, HHS did testify in September that they were 100 percent confident that the site would be launched and fully functional on time on October 1st. That didn't work. Do you have full confidence in this new hard date?

SEBELIUS: Congresswoman, I can tell you that the assessment that we have made is that it will take until the end of November for an optimally functioning website. I know that the only way I can restore confidence that we get it right is to get it right, so I -- I -- I have confidence, but I know that it -- it isn't fair to ask the American public to take our word for it. I've got to fix this problem, and we are underway doing just that.

ESHOO: But are you confident that -- I think I said November 31st, which is, which does not exist, but November 30th. You have confidence in November 30th?

SEBELIUS: I do.

ESHOO: Is there any penalty to QSSI or CGI for not delivering on what they promised?

SEBELIUS: Well, I think the, as you can see, we have a -- obligated funds for a contract. We certainly have not expended all those funds, and we expect not only the CMS team, but our contractor partners to fulfill their obligations and have to be...

(CROSSTALK)

ESHOO: But if they fail to fulfill their obligations. I don't know what's in the contract. Is there a penalty?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Well, I understand, but, there isn't a built-in penalty, but I can tell you that paying for work that isn't complete is not something that we will do. QSSI, as you know, has taken on a new role as integrator of the hub that they built and have in operation is -- is working extremely well, not only for the federal exchanges, but all the state-based markets are using the hub, and that's why we had confidence in their ability to actually take this next role on and coordinate the activities moving forward, which have to be driven with a very clear set of outcomes, very accountable timelines and deadlines, and they will be helping to manage that process.

ESHOO: On the issue of security, there was a security breach that arose recently, that I read about at any rate. And what I think is very important here, because the issue of privacy has been raised, and I think that that has been answered. Very importantly, there isn't any health information in these systems. But there is financial information, so my question to you is, has a security wall been built, and are you confident that it is there and that it will actually secure the financial information that applicants have to disclose?

SEBELIUS: Yes, ma'am, I -- I would tell you that there was not a breach, there was a blog by a sort of skilled hacker that if a certain series of incidents occurred, you could possibly get in and obtain somebody's personally identifiable...

(CROSSTALK)

ESHOO: But isn't that telling? Isn't that telling?

SEBELIUS: And we immediately corrected that problem, so there wasn't a -- it was a theoretical problem that was immediately fixed. I would tell you we are storing the minimum amount of data, because we think that's very important. The hub is not a data collector. It is actually using data centers at the IRS, at Homeland Security, at Social Security to verify information, but it stores none of that data, so we don't want to be...

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Gentlelady's time has expired. The Chair would recognize Mr. Shimkus.

SHIMKUS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Welcome, Madam Secretary. Madam Secretary, before I start my questions, the Washington Post gave the administration, the President, yourself, four Pinocchios on this whole debate of if you like the insurance you have, you can keep it. Would you recommend to the President that he stop using that term? Wouldn't it be helpful in this debate?

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, I think he used the term at the time that the law was passed, and he continues to say...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: And as of September 26th, also, so...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: That's why we wrote...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: So the answer is you don't buy -- you don't believe that the Washington Post, and therefore...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I haven't read the Washington Post, but thank you.

SHIMKUS: Well, we'll hand this down to you so you can see it. Have you ever shopped -- I know you have, but this is for a -- at a grocery store with a coupon? Ever used a coupon?

SEBELIUS: Yes.

SHIMKUS: So, the coupon gives you the terms and conditions of when you go to the checkout to -- to get whatever's off the price of the goods. When you all added the "See Plans Now" option, you in essence gave the searcher in essence a coupon based upon what they're seeing there. And the desire was, let people know what the price is. However, as the -- the news reported, and I followed up in last week's hearing, was that if you are under 50 years old, you get quoted the price of someone who's 27. If you're older than 50, if you're older than 50, could be 64, you get quoted a price of someone who's 50 -- 50 years old. Isn't that misleading?

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, the "Learn" side of the website, which has been up since actually late...
(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: So that's truthful, then. If you quote a price...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: It is clearly a hypothetical situation...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: Oh, are you -- do you -- wait...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: That for now people that...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: OK, on the "See Plans Now" option, are you saying this is a hypothetical? That's not what it says on the site. It says, "This is the price, when you put in your age," and if your age is 49, it quotes you as if you're 27.

SEBELIUS: Sir, the only way someone can get an accurate information about their price is to get their individual eligibility (inaudible)...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: Let me ask you another -- when did you decide to use this, the low 50 at 27, and above 50 at 50 years old. When did you make that decision?

SEBELIUS: That was decided by the team as...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: By who? Who made the -- the...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I withhold (ph) that information.

SHIMKUS: The problem with the whole debate is y'all won't tell us who made the decisions.

SEBELIUS: Well, I can tell you I did not design the site.

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: So who?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I will get...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: Well, who made the decision on the 27-year-old quote for someone who's 50?

SEBELIUS: I just said I will get you that information.

SHIMKUS: Thank -- thank you. Let me go to, because it's misleading and the White House insists it didn't mislead the public, and (inaudible) we find after you did. But let me -- let me finish on this debate. Another transparency issue. If someone, a constituent of mine or someone in this country has strongly held pro-life views...

(CROSSTALK)

(UNKNOWN): Oh, here we go.

SHIMKUS: Can you commit to us to make sure that the federal exchanges that offer that is clearly identified and so people can understand if they're going to buy a policy that has abortion coverage or not? Because right now, you cannot make that determination.

SEBELIUS: Sir, I -- I don't know. I -- I know exactly the -- the issue you're talking about. I will check and make sure that that is truly identifiable.

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: Here's -- here's -- OK, thank you. Well, here's -- here's our request. Can you provide for the committee the list of insurers in the federal exchange who do not offer, as part of their package, abortion coverage?

SEBELIUS: I think we can do that, sir.

SHIMKUS: Well, you should be able to do it, so...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I just said...

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: No, you said "If we can do it."

SEBELIUS: No, I think we can do that is what I said.

(CROSSTALK)

SHIMKUS: I think, or I know we can do it?

SEBELIUS: I -- sir, I -- I can't tell you what I don't know firmly right now. I know that is the plan, I will get that information to you.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

The chair would recognize Mr. Engel from New York.

ENGEL: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, I appreciate your coming here today to answer questions about the Affordable Health Care Act (sic).

You know, my Republican colleagues' actions here remind me of a story I read when I was a little boy, and that's the story of Chicken Little, who ran around yelling, "The sky is falling. The sky is falling." But unlike Chicken Little, my Republican colleagues are actually rooting for the sky to fall.

Republicans are holding this hearing today under the auspices of an investigative hearing, as if they want to get to the bottom of what went wrong with the website in order to help fix it. But I don't think, Madam Secretary, there's one person in this room who is naive enough to actually think that the Republicans want to see this law work. They voted over 40 times to repeal the law, they shutdown the government and threatened to force a default in order to stop it. They're rooting for failure.

Madam Secretary, can you tell us what would be the impact on Americans' health insurance if Republicans had been successful in their efforts to de-fund or repeal the Affordable Care Act?

SEBELIUS: Well, I think that the estimates at the Congressional Budget Office is that would have increased the deficit by about $110 billion in the first decade and close to a trillion dollars in the second decade.

We know that we have 42 million or 43 million Americans without health insurance at all, some of them Medicaid eligible and some in the -- over the Medicaid eligibility. Thirty governors so far, Republicans and Democrats, have declared their support for moving ahead with Medicaid expansion, but absent that, the Affordable Care Act, those folks would be without any kind of health security.

And in the private market, what we know is it takes a real toll.

But I'd say the biggest issue is not just the financial toll, not the community toll, not the country toll -- which is significant. I have a good friend who runs the cancer center at the University of Kansas. I was with him and cancer researchers recently, and he said that if you get a cancer diagnosis, you are 60 percent more likely to live five years and beyond if you have insurance than if you don't. I think that's a pretty powerful statement for why we need affordable health care for all of our citizens.

ENGEL: Well, thank you. The -- the Republicans have not been able to de-fund or repeal it, but they have denied requested funding. They've raised specious arguments about death panels and socialized medicine, and they've worked to intimidate groups that could help the implementation effort. There's been a spreading of misinformation about the cost of coverage -- we hear some of that today -- and to actively dissuade the uninsured from seeking coverage.

So Madam Secretary, how are these tactics -- impacted your ability to implement the Affordable Care Act?

SEBELIUS: Well, I don't think there's any question that a lot of people need a lot of information. I think it's one of the reasons we had millions visit the site -- try to visit the site. It's why I am so frustrated and disappointed that the site is not fully functional, and why I'm so committed to getting it functional, because clearly there is a demand. We need to get information to people about the law.

This is the law. This is not any longer a debate. It was a law passed by both houses of Congress, signed by the president of the United States, upheld by the Supreme Court. The president was re-elected. It is the law. And people have benefits and rights under that law, and we've got to get that information so they can make good choices for themselves and their families.

ENGEL: Well, thank you.

It is the law, and, frankly, I find it disconcerting that my Republican colleagues have done nothing but root for this law to fail for the last three and a half years. And now there's a big show here of being upset at problems with the website...

(CROSSTALK)

ENGEL: ... keeping people from signing up for coverage fast enough.

So I would just say to my colleagues on the other side of the aisle, you're really on the wrong side of history here. The website will be fixed and millions of Americans will be able to get quality, affordable health insurance coverage through the Affordable Care Act.

And again, I thank you for being here today, Madam -- Madam.

UPTON: Mr. Pitts, chairman of the Health Committee.

PITTS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Welcome, Madam Secretary.

Have you personally tried to register or enroll on the website? SEBELIUS: Sir, I created an early light account so I would see the prompts that were coming to people who were interested. I did work my way to the application feature fairly early on. But, frankly, I -- I have affordable health care, so I...

(CROSSTALK)

PITTS: No, I just wanted to know if you've been through the process that millions of Americans are having to go through.

Madam Secretary, the -- the initial website crashes appear to be largely a result of the decision to prevent browsing of the plans. CGI Federal testified at our hearing last week that they had designed the website to allow users to browse and compare plans before having to create an account.

Ms. Campbell told us that two weeks prior to the October 1st launch, they were told to turn off the browsing feature. Were you aware in September that this decision was made?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I wasn't aware of that particular decision that was made by the CMS team. I was aware that we were paring back some features to not put additional risk on the website, which is ironic at this point.

PITTS: And who made that decision? Who made that decision?

SEBELIUS: Administrator Tavenner made that decision.

PITTS: And do you know why that was made?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir, because we were anxious to get the website up and running and functional -- which we clearly have failed to do to date -- although I would suggest the website has never crashed. It is functional, but at a very slow speed and very low reliability, and has continued to function.

Having said that, they pared down some of the features, feeling that it would be better to load them in later. One was the shop and browse feature. Another was the Spanish version of the website and the Medicaid transfers. All three of those issues were paired down in September...

PITTS: Thank you.

SEBELIUS: ... to not load the system.

PITTS: Thank you.

Last week, CGI Federal and QSSI testified that CMS was responsible for end-to-end testing and that they believe that months of testing would have been preferable to two weeks.

Do you believe that two weeks was enough time to complete testing of the entire system?

SEBELIUS: Clearly, not.

PITTS: And when were you made aware of the result of the test, including the one where the system collapsed with only a few hundred users?

SEBELIUS: Leading up to the October 1st date, we had regular meetings with not only a team at CMS but administrators involved. I was made aware that we were testing, and as we found problems we were fixing those problems. And I think there is a CGI report at mid- August identifying some problems. And between August and October that became the punch list for CGI to fix those problems. That's why you test.

PITTS: Now, in The Washington Post on October 21st there was an article that said about a month before the exchange opened a testing group of 10 insurers urged agency officials not to launch the site because it was riddled with problems. Were you aware in September that insurers recommended a delay in the launch of the exchange?

SEBELIUS: I was not aware that they recommended delay. I know everyone was concerned that there were risks and there were likely to be problems with a brand new integrated insurance system. I don't think anyone ever estimated the degree to which we've had problems in the system, and, certainly, the contracting partners did not.

PITTS: And did HHS respond to the insurers' recommendation to delay the launch?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I can't -- I wasn't in the meeting. I don't know...

PITTS: Can you find out and...

SEBELIUS: ... what occurred at the meeting, and I don't know who they talked to.

PITTS: ... answer that question for us?

SEBELIUS: Sure, I will get back to you.

PITTS: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Mr. Green?

GREEN: Thank you, Mr. Chair.

Madam Secretary, thank you for taking time to be here today.

I represent parts of east and north Houston, Harris County, and our district has one of the highest uninsured rates in the country. Even worse, we have one of the highest rates of people who have jobs but don't receive their insurance through their employer.

It's for this reason that I believe Houston would be a good place for you to come and spend -- spread the word about the tremendous benefits of the Affordable Care Act. However, we learned (inaudible) your office that you're unable to attend because of scheduling conflicts. And I -- hopefully, we can have agreement that some time in the future you'll come to the fourth largest city that probably has the highest number of uninsured in a metropolitan area. And, of course, we're in the state of Texas that has the number of highest uninsured in the country.

The -- it's important to me and our constituents to get it right, and that's why I share your and the president's disappointment the website's not working as planned.

November 30th is not soon enough. Many of my constituents have been waiting for years to be able to purchase health insurance, and we owe it to them to get the marketplaces up and running.

The contractors have not served our country well and should fix it or not be paid.

Now we're hearing about the cancellation letters being sent by insurance companies (inaudible) customers notifying them that their plans are no longer offered. Are these Americans losing their health care coverage because of the Affordable Care Act, or is it because these plans were changed after the enactment of the act?

SEBELIUS: I would say it's the latter, sir. If a plan was in place since the enactment of the act, no one would have received a cancellation...

(CROSSTALK)

GREEN: So if somebody in America had an insurance plan before the act and -- the president was correct: If you have -- if you like what you have, you could keep it.

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

GREEN: The plans were changed, and so now they have to comply with the new law.

SEBELIUS: They can either choose to be grandfathered and keep the same plan, which meant the same benefits and -- and actually the regulation allows insurance companies to charge medical inflation plus a trend line so they didn't have to charge the same price. They could increase it; they could increase co-pays. They could increase co- insurance. What they couldn't do is cancel benefits that the policy holder relied on. They couldn't disadvantage the policy holder. But if that plan is in effect, absolutely, it is still in effect.

GREEN: OK, but some of these millions of letters we're hearing about are probably because their plans changed?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Absolutely. And again, in the individual market, plans change every year. Insurers design new products...

GREEN: And that's -- even in the small business market that happens. So these plans are not allowed now, because they're completely inadequate. They don't offer the minimum essential benefits, is that correct?

SEBELIUS: That is correct.

GREEN: OK. And having been a state legislator -- and I know as governor in Kansas -- I assume every state has some type of minimum mandated benefits that they have for their health insurance plans.

SEBELIUS: They do, but it applies, again, sir, in the past usually to the group markets, where 90 percent of covered Americans get their policies. This market has always been the wild west.

(CROSSTALK)

GREEN: OK. The Americans who received those letters from their companies about cancellations, they're eligible to purchase plans on the exchange?

SEBELIUS: Or out of the exchange. Individuals who don't -- aren't interested in some kind of financial help can go outside the exchange, inside the exchange. Their insurer can offer them plans. They have choices they've never had before.

GREEN: And because of the benefits of the Affordable Care Act, 80 percent of their premium dollar will come back to them?

SEBELIUS: That's correct. That's...

(CROSSTALK)

GREEN: OK. And that's not true -- and I don't -- I know it's not true in Texas, but I don't know what -- any states that have that 80 percent requirement.

SEBELIUS: Well, no state had it, I would suggest, in that kind of broad base prior to the Affordable Care Act, so it's...

(CROSSTALK)

GREEN: Let me give you an example of one of the plans I found out doing case work a few years ago. A large company provided $25,000 maximum benefit for their employees in the year. Most employees didn't know about it, and -- until this one constituent found out that she had cancer. And the bill ended up being $300,000. And so that's some of those plans that are not being allowed to be sold now, is that correct?

SEBELIUS: Well, not only will (ph) the plan have a limit on out- of-pocket costs per year, it will have a limit on a lifetime out-of- pocket costs and it will have -- it will take away the notion that you would run out of your coverage in the middle of a treatment, which a lot of plans do.

GREEN: I know I'm out of my time, but it's like buying a car...

(CROSSTALK)

GREEN: ... look good, but if it doesn't have a motor, it's no good to have that car.

(CROSSTALK)

GREEN: So that's why the Affordable Care Act has...

SEBELIUS: Save a lot of gas, but it doesn't get you...

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Gentleman's time has expired.

Gentleman from Oregon, Mr. Walden.

WALDEN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Governor -- Secretary, we're delighted to have you before the committee. You and I both know how important this issue is to all Americans that we get it right. So I hope you can appreciate, we're trying to understand what we missed along the way. And -- and one of the things that bothered me was the letter that was sent from your agency to the GAO back in -- June 6th. And I'll read in part, it said, "We're in the final stages of finalizing and testing the I.T. infrastructure that will support the application enrollment process. HHS is extremely confident that on October 1, the marketplace will open on schedule and millions of Americans will have access to affordable, quality health insurance."

I'm just an average guy from a small town in Oregon, but when I read that, it tells me you believed everything was good to go, the testing was in place, and we should have full confidence everything would work. Correct?

SEBELIUS: That's the letter I signed, yes, sir.

WALDEN: Actually, it was signed by your assistant.

SEBELIUS: Or whoever -- yes, yes.

WALDEN: But the same point.

And so I went into this believing in your response -- your agency's response to GAO, things were ready to go, we should have full confidence, because when somebody uses the word "extremely confident," tells me you're extremely confident.

Second piece, then when we had the testimony from the witnesses last week, I asked them about the end-to-end testing and what the industry standard would be, and they said it really should have been months, especially for a project of this magnitude. And yet we heard it was only two weeks.

Now in August, GCI told CMS in their report...

SEBELIUS: CGI.

WALDEN: I'm sorry, CGI, thank you.

That on August 9th that there was not enough time in the schedule to conduct adequate performance testing. Did that make its way all the way to you? And do you think there was adequate time?

SEBELIUS: Sir, clearly, as I've said before, we did not adequately do end-to-end testing. The products were not locked and loaded into the system until the third week in September. Each of the component parts...

WALDEN: Right...

SEBELIUS: ... was tested, validated...

WALDEN: ... they told us that.

SEBELIUS: ... independently validated end-to-end (ph).

WALDEN: I'm sorry.

All those worked, though, right? They told us last week that their individual modules were tested and met specification. Do you concur with that analysis based on what you know?

SEBELIUS: I do concur with the testing that was done, yes.

WALDEN: OK, so it really was the end-to-end -- which is why some of us thought we should delay until it could be done right to avoid this very collapse that now is upon us. And I realize not everybody agreed to (ph) that.

The second piece here gets back to The Washington Post, which I realize you haven't had -- and I understand -- a chance to read this morning, but the four Pinocchios about the president repeatedly saying, 'If you have a plan, you'll keep your plan.' We all heard that to mean, 'I've got a plan with a company. I'll continue to have it even if they make minor changes,' when in fact your own rules as written said, no, that's really isn't what's going to happen. If minor changes are made that means the plan changed; that means you don't get it.

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, that isn't true. They (ph) -- rules did not say what you just suggested, and I think the estimate, given that there would be turnover in the market, was really an outside projection. It wasn't our rules. It's -- it was a snapshot of what happens in the market; that plans change so dramatically...

WALDEN: Sure, every year.

SEBELIUS: ... over time that the estimate was -- they wouldn't be -- not because of our rules, but because of insurance companies' business decisions.

(CROSSTALK)

WALDEN: Well, but you set up what (ph) those market rules looked like they had to comply with, correct?

SEBELIUS: Only if they chose not to grandfather the policy. That's...

WALDEN: But that meant they couldn't make any change (ph)...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Any grandfathered policy stayed in place, still would be in place.

WALDEN: Right, but if they made...

SEBELIUS: ... none of these rules apply.

WALDEN: But if they made any change...

SEBELIUS: No, they could make changes in pricing. They could make changes in benefits. They couldn't dramatically disadvantage the consumer, but they could have trend lines. They -- they had a wide corridor to make sure that -- that a similar plan -- so if a consumer liked the plan, the plan, if it stayed...

(CROSSTALK)

WALDEN: So here's what the practical implication -- I've got letters from constituents all over my district who have gotten letters from their insurers who say because of Obamacare, they're no longer going to be in the individual market, or at least with that plan in the individual market. And the result is this person from Cove, Oregon, said, "I was paying $600 a month for a $3,000 deductible. Now it costs me $800 a month for a $5,000 deductible."

I've got others here, I'll put in the record.

A woman whose job -- she had 40 hours, now down to 29. Neither has health insurance, nor enough income to live on her own because of the way this law is getting implemented.

I realize my time's (ph) expired.

UPTON: Gentlelady from Colorado, Ms. DeGette.

DEGETTE: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you, Secretary, for being with us today.

I want to follow up on a couple of those questions that Mr. Walden was asking you about CGI. As you know, Chairman Issa last night released this document, monthly project status report from CGI last night, and it looks to me as sort of a technical document that has a punch list of outstanding open issues.

And some of them do highlight items that upon first read seem to be alarming. For example, one of the entries said, "Due to the compressed schedule there's not enough time built in to allow for adequate performance testing." And this certainly, in retrospect, sounds bad. But the date of the document that Chairman Issa released is September 6th, and then on September 10th, four days later, CGI came into this committee and testified under oath, quote, "CGI Federal is confident it will develop -- deliver the functionality that CMS has directed."

And -- and we're -- we're trying to figure out, or at least I'm trying to figure out, how CGI is now coming in and saying, you know, 'We warned everybody that this wasn't gonna be ready,' when they came in and directly told me that they would be ready to launch on October 1st.

So it kind of raises a question, how these statements can be reconciled. One explanation is that CGI was lying to this committee. I think that's unlikely. Another is that CGI thought that the items flagged in the report were like a punch list that could be addressed.

So here's my question to you, Madam Secretary: Was CGI telling your department the same thing that they told the committee on September 10th, that the company was confident that its programs would be ready?

SEBELIUS: Congresswoman, all of the contractors testified here in September and again, I think, last week before this committee. And the testimony was fairly similar, that they were ready to go in September. They were asked in -- last week if they had suggested that we should delay the launch date. Each of them said, no. I think the chairman...

(CROSSTALK)

DEGETTE: So they never asked you to delay the launch date?

SEBELIUS: They did not. And, frankly, I -- I think it is not valuable at this point...

DEGETTE: Right.

SEBELIUS: ... to do a lot of pointing blame, fixing the blame. What I want to do is fix the problem.

DEGETTE: And so do I...

SEBELIUS: I think we need the whole team to move ahead, and we will report back regularly.

DEGETTE: Right, but we're relying on these contractors to fix this. And so that goes to my last question, which is Mr. Zients has now come in and he says the site is going to be functional for the vast majority of users by the end of November. Is that right?

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

DEGETTE: And given what CGI told us and the other vendors, do you believe that that is correct? Do you believe it will be pretty much ready to go by the end of November?

SEBELIUS: I do. And I think that we are making improvements each and every day. It is easier to use now than it was two weeks. It is way from where we need it to be.

DEGETTE: So it's not like it's all going to be fine by the end of November. It's beginning to improve already. Is that your testimony?

SEBELIUS: It is a continuous process, as websites are. Patches are made, fixes are made on an ongoing basis. And as we find issues like Congresswoman Eshoo talked about, we are fixing them in real time.

DEGETTE: And you're going to guarantee yes or no that people will have privacy when they go on this site?

SEBELIUS: Absolutely.

DEGETTE: Now I just want to say one last thing. I was on the Washington Journal where callers call in this morning, and I had a man, Max, call in. And he said he got one of those letters from the insurance companies that his insurance was canceled. So what he did is he went on to the website and he -- under the federal exchange and he found a better plan, and now he's going to sign up. So I would hope that that's what everybody would be able to do. And I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Mr. Terry?

TERRY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I'm pleased to hear that the website will be fully operational by the end of November. And would be able to -- would you come back to our committee so we can see if that's actually accomplished and how it was accomplished?

SEBELIUS: I will make every effort to do that.

TERRY: OK. You were governor and state insurance commissioner in Kansas, and I reached out to our state insurance commissioner and governor and found out that they have absolutely no data about Nebraskans who have either tried to enroll or enrolled.

As you know, Nebraska is one of the states that opted not to do their own exchange and rely on the federal exchange. So it's interesting to me that neither our insurance commissioner nor the governor's office had any data about Nebraskans and this -- this -- and enrolling in these plans.

I also asked our insurance commissioner if any of the navigators, if they knew who the navigators were and whether they had to apply to be certified or licensed in essence like an insurance agent would be. And they told me they have no clue who's been authorized by HHS to be a navigator and work with people in Nebraska.

So this is concerning to me, so I'm going to ask you a few questions along this line. First of all, do you have data on how many people in general in the United States have tried to enroll in a plan through this website?

SEBELIUS: No, sir. We do not have any reliable data around enrollment, which is why we haven't given it to date.

TERRY: Or have any data on how many people have tried to enroll but because of the problems have not been able to accomplish that?

SEBELIUS: No, sir. I can tell you I met with insurers last week. And one of the priority fixes is the so-called 834s, the document that sends an individual's name to a company and verifies it. That is one of the systems that is not working.

TERRY: I appreciate that. And the contractors I asked specifically about the information of how many people have tried to enroll and enrolled, and they say they do have those numbers but can't tell us that because of a contract with HHS saying that they -- they're gagged on that information.

SEBELIUS: I would suggest that the numbers are not reliable according to (inaudible).

TERRY: Well, I'll tell you what. My question is going to be though will you on the record right now authorize them to give us those numbers and let us determine whether those are reliable?

SEBELIUS: No, sir. I want to give you reliable, confirmed data from every state and from the federal marketplace. We have said that we will do that on a monthly basis. By the middle of the month you will have that data, but I don't want to turn over anything that is not confirmed and reliable, and that's what we'll do.

TERRY: Well, but that data out there exists and you will not let us (inaudible)

SEBELIUS: Sir, I would -- I would tell you right now it is not reliable data. According to the insurance companies who are eager to have customers, they are not getting reliable data all the way through the system (inaudible) real problems that we have.

TERRY: The number of people that have clicked on and tried to get or enrolled, I'm not asking about what they enrolled in or whether they came in and said they were 65 and were quoted something that they were 27 years old. That should be a pretty reliable number just on the surface. So would you...

SEBELIUS: The system isn't functioning, so we are not getting that reliable data. Insurers who I met with said that that is the case. We know that there's 700,000 applications that have been (inaudible).

TERRY: The reliability of that data certainly flies in the face of the testimony from the contractors. All right. I yield back.

UPTON: Ms. Capps?

CAPPS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, , Secretary Sebelius, for your presence here today and your testimony. While I too am frustrated with the flawed rollout of healthcare.gov, I do appreciate your longstanding commitment to improving the health care options for all Americans and fixing this website quickly.

I think it's important to note that in my home state of California and other states as well, the new exchange marketplace, we call it Covered California, is working. And rates -- constituents are finding that rates are as much as 29 percent less than those that they found on the marketplace last year.

I'm thankful my constituents now have this option. And as I look around to implementation nationwide, it seems clear to me that political decisions in individual states have really made the difference for consumers.

The governors and legislators -- state legislators that embrace this law are delivering for their communities, but those elected who are trying to ignore the opportunities presented and continue to throw up road blocks both here in Congress and in state legislatures should not now seem surprised that there are significant bumps along the way.

This seems to me to be completely disingenuous. Having embraced the law since open enrollment began October 1, Californians have started nearly 180,000 applications with more beginning every day.

I know my time is limited, but I want to have a second to mention a conversation I had just last night with a (inaudible) town hall to my district on the central coast of California. One of the first callers I heard from was a mother from Santa Barbara. Her name's Meryl, and she wanted to tell me the story of her son.

Her son is 28 years old and he had been paying $425 a month for his insurance before the Affordable Care Act. She was happy to report that he has already applied through Covered California and has found a policy that works better for him. It has all the essential health benefits covered, which his former policy did not, and now will only cost him $109 a month.

This is significant savings for Meryl's son, and this is a story that's being repeated at least in California often. So there are millions of residents in many states who have now set up their own websites and marketplaces. In those states, tens of thousands of people are now as we speak signing up for coverage. And this is demonstrating that the Affordable Care Act is working.

In New York and Washington, over 30,000 people have enrolled. In Oregon, over 50,000 people have been enrolled. Kentucky, 31,000 people have been enrolled. We could go on and on. The success of the state exchanges, which is where this is meant to be implemented, shows how badly this law is wanted and needed, how much it will be of help to so many people who want quality, affordable health care.

So my three quick questions to you are this, Madam Speaker (ph). What is your assessment of how this first month have been gone -- has gone in the states that are running their own marketplaces, which this Congress intended that the Affordable Care Act work?

SEBELIUS: Well everything we hear from the state-based markets is that they are doing well. They have not submitted data yet. We, again, are working with them around a monthly schedule so that they will confirm Medicaid data and enrollment data. And we'll see the real numbers at the end of the month and make sure that the -- they're available to the public.

But everything we hear is that they see the same demand, they are eager to enroll folks and that that is going smoothly.

CAPPS: And what do you think this success shows about the demand and the interest for affordable health insurance on the part of constituents?

SEBELIUS: Well I don't think there's any question that in spite of a series of road blocks and blockades and a lot of misinformation driven by about a $400 million marketing campaign last year, Americans are eager to see what their benefits may be under the law, what their opportunities are, how to get health security for themselves and their families, and we want to make sure that they see those benefits.

The website is one of the ways to do that. The call center, on the ground enrollment, personal outreach, are a variety of ways, and I would tell your colleague, Mr. Congressman, I'd be happy to get you the list of the Nebraska folks who are on the ground. It's available easily. It's public record, so I'd be happy to send it to you, so you could share it with your insurance commissioner and governor.

UPTON: The gentlelady's time has expired.

Gentleman from the great state of Michigan, Mr. Rogers.

ROGERS: Thank you.

Thank you, Madam Secretary, for being here. Short time, get through some questions here, if I can.

Is it your testimony that the -- that there -- every night to try to increase the functionality of the system you're hot swapping codes?

So my understanding is that between 2:00 and 4:00, write new code, put it into the system, yes or no?

SEBELIUS: Clearly, I am not hot swapping code. There is a technical team...

(CROSSTALK)

ROGERS: No, no. You are in charge of the operation that hot swaps code on functionality. Is that -- you're trying to improve the functionality, yes?

So that happens every night, yes?

SEBELIUS: No, I don't think it does happen every night. It happens periodically during the hours of 1:00 and 5:00, but it is not a nightly feature.

ROGERS: Great.

Has each piece of that code that's been introduced in the system been security tested?

SEBELIUS: That's my understanding, yes, sir. And the testing...

ROGERS: Each piece of that code has been tested? Yes or no?

SEBELIUS: I don't know, but I can tell you that security...

ROGERS: That's a much safer answer, trust me.

SEBELIUS: ... is an ongoing operation that as code is loaded, you need to retest over and over and over again. So whether it's pretested, I can't tell you.

ROGERS: All right. You need to test the code.

Have any end-to-end security tests been conducted since healthcare.gov went live on October 1st, yes or no?

SEBELIUS: My understanding is, there's continuous testing as the -- our temporary authority to operate calls for.

ROGERS: Yes or no, has an end-to-end security test on healthcare.gov went live, yes or no?

SEBELIUS: I will find out exactly what testing they are doing. I know they are doing simultaneous testing as new code is loaded.

ROGERS: Are there any end-to-end security tests run after every new piece of code is put -- I'm not talking about testing the code now, I'm talking about an end-to-end security test.

SEBELIUS: I can tell you how...

ROGERS: Covers the cost of the boundaries...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: ... I can get you that information.

ROGERS: I can tell you they are not, and I'd be interested to hear why not.

Tab -- if you go to tab two quickly in your book, I'm going to read three things...

SEBELIUS: What book, sir?

ROGERS: You have a tab there. If you go to tab two -- right there.

Well, while you're looking, I'll read. It's dated September 27th, and it is to Marilyn Tavenner. Let me just -- a couple of pieces here.

"There are inherent security risks with not having all code tested in a single environment. Finally, the system requires rapid development and release of hot fixes and patches so it is not always available or stable during the duration of the testing."

Secondly, "The security contractor has not been able to test all of the security controls in one complete version of the system."

And if you look in the first part, which is most troubling at all, it says, "Due to system readiness issues, the security control assessment was only partly completed. This constitutes a risk that must be accepted before the marketplace day one operations."

And so let me tell you what you did.

You allowed the system to go forward with no encryption on back- up systems. They had no encryption on certain boundary crossings. You accepted a risk on behalf of every user of this computer that put their personal financial information at risk because you did not even have the most basic end-to-end test on security of this system.

Amazon would never do this. ProFlowers would never do this. Kayak would never do this.

This is completely an unacceptable level of security. And here's the scary part, we found out after the contractors last week that an end-to-end test hadn't been conducted on security, not functionality, because if it's not functioning, you know it's not secure.

Your ongoing hot patches without end-to-end tests: the private contractors told us it would take a very thorough two months just for an integrated end-to-end security test, that I'll tell you has not happened to date.

Why? Because you're constantly adding new code every night to protect the functionality of the system. You have exposed millions of Americans because you all, according to your memo, believed it was an acceptable risk.

Don't you think you had the obligation to tell the American people that we're going to put you in this system, but beware, your information is likely to be vulnerable?

Would you commit today, Secretary, to shut down the system and do an end-to-end security test so that these Americans can have their information...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: No, sir. If you read the memo...

ROGERS: Oh, I have read it.

SEBELIUS: ... say that weekly testing of our berta (ph) devices, including interface testing, daily, weekly scans are going on. This is a temporary authority...

ROGERS: (Inaudible), that's not what the memo says, number one, and number two, the contractors will tell you...

(CROSSTALK)

(UNKNOWN): Mr. Chairman, point of order. I think the witness ought to be allowed to answer what was a speech by the colleague, because he's raised a lot of issues.

UPTON: If the gentlelady will quickly answer.

ROGERS: (Inaudible) here today, that's...

UPTON: Does the secretary wish to respond briefly?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I would just say this document is a document signed by Administrator Tavenner, which discusses mitigation strategies for security that are ongoing and upgraded and a authorization to operate on a permanent basis will not be signed until these mitigation strategies are satisfied. It is under way right now, but daily and weekly monitoring and testing is under way.

ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, there are people using this system today and she's just admitted again the system isn't secure nor has (inaudible).

UPTON: The gentleman...

(UNKNOWN): Mr. Chairman, she didn't admit that. You said it, but she didn't say it.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

Mr. Doyle.

DOYLE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, welcome.

Those of us who fought for this law, who voted for this law, have a vested interest in its success, and the concerns that you here expressed on this side of the panel are real, because we want to see Americans get health care.

I think it's somewhat disingenuous for my colleagues on the other side of the podium here to have this faux anger and this faux concern over a bill that they absolutely want to fail and have rooted for its failure and have voted over 40-some times to repeal this bill, never putting an alternative plan on the floor for the American people, but just to simply say they want to make sure this plan doesn't succeed.

And I think the real fear is, that the plan will succeed and the American people will learn of the real benefits of this plan, not the propaganda campaign that's gone on by the Republicans for the last three years.

Madam Secretary, I think one of the keys to success of this plan is that we get young people to enroll in this plan. And I have some questions about some enrollment concerns that I have. Now I understand that you've said approximately 700,000 people have applied for coverage via the healthcare.gov and the state exchanges, is that -- is that...?

SEBELIUS: They've completed an application.

DOYLE: Right. Which is different from enrollment.

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

DOYLE: So my question is, are you expecting -- I know you don't have exact numbers yet, but are you expecting a large number or a small month number of enrollments during the first month?

What is your thoughts on that?

SEBELIUS: Well, our projections prior to launch were always that there would be a very small number at the beginning. We watch the Massachusetts trend, which started slowly and built. I think there's no question that given our flawed launch of healthcare.gov, it will be a very small number.

DOYLE: Yes, I mean, in the Massachusetts plan, I think the first month it was 123 people signed up, less than 1 percent of the overall first-year enrollment in that first month. And we saw the same kind of numbers in Medicare Part D the first month of open enrollment back in 2006.

Madam Secretary, young Americans are the most likely age group to be uninsured, and a lot of us are concerned because of the problems that we've been having with the website, that a lot of these young folks may not come back on; you know, they have very short attention spans.

I've got four kids that all work on the Internet, and if they can't get something in five minutes, they are on to something else.

What do we do, and what plans are in place by your department to encourage young people to go back and revisit that site and to make sure that we're getting young people looking at that site and accessing it?

SEBELIUS: Well, step number one is fix the site, because we don't want people to be invited back and then have a bad experience a second time around. I think that's absolutely right. The site is particularly important to tech-savvy younger generation folks who we need to enroll.

I think that we have -- so fixing the site is step one.

And step number two is getting information to folks that the law even exists. A lot of young people haven't followed this dialogue for the last three and a half years.

(CROSSTALK) DOYLE: Yes, I think we need a real marketing campaign, and we really need to reach out to young people, especially at the end of November when you say this site is going to be working a lot better, to make sure they are checking that site out.

SEBELIUS: You bet.

DOYLE: One of my four kids is self-employed. He's 33 years old, paying about $140 a month for a Blue Cross plan. He's eligible for a subsidy. We browsed that site. He's gonna able to get coverage for about half of what he's paying right now, and that's good news for us, because I think my wife is paying his premium, so I think we're going to save the money.

But I think it's important we had to prod him to go on that site and enroll, and I think for a lot of young people, they are not going to do it unless it's easy, so it's important we get that fixed. Thank you.

SEBELIUS: I agree.

UPTON: Dr. Murphy, chairman of the oversight subcommittee.

MURPHY: Thank you, Madam Secretary, and welcome.

You had mentioned that the people who did the technology on the website made a number of mistakes, you mentioned Verizon. When we had them before our committee last week, they said it wasn't their fault they were told within HHS there was some problems there.

SEBELIUS: Sir, Verizon wasn't involved in the website (inaudible)...

(CROSSTALK)

MURPHY: Right, with the data, I understand, I'm sorry.

But they had a role, CGI had a role, other companies, et cetera. I'm just curious in this process, what decisions did you make that affected this for better or worse in terms of the data, the ease, or problems with the implement and being able to track how many people are actually enrolled?

SEBELIUS: My decisions (sic) specifically to design the website, I was not involved. I am prohibited to choose contractors. We go by the federal procurement, and I got regular reports on exactly what was done...

MURPHY: What about the part with regard to getting data in terms of how many people are even enrolled or trying to enroll, did you have any decisions in that process? SEBELIUS: The application process, at this point, does not work end to end very well.

MURPHY: Right, I understand it doesn't work, that's obvious.

SEBELIUS: We do not have reliable data about the end of...

MURPHY: I'm just trying to find out, if you had asked them, to say look, I'm in charge of this, I'm going to want a regular report, how many people have tried to enroll, how many people have enrolled, have you -- did you ask that question?

SEBELIUS: We have prioritized for our contractors that specific fix, and believe me, the insurance companies are eager for us to get reliable data to make sure their data matches ours, and that is not there yet.

MURPHY: I'm just trying to -- I appreciate that. I'm trying to find out if you told them that was part of the plan and what they're doing.

Let me -- real quick, I'm hearing -- we're hearing from thousands of people who have had their policies canceled. In fact, I heard from one insurer in Pittsburgh that just canceled 30,000 individual policies.

Now, they said they expect 50,000 to 30,000 to enroll in the exchange plans. Just so you know, to date, so far, the number of people who have signed up for their plan is 10, 10.

Now I'm concerned a lot of these individuals and families aren't going to be able to make it by January 1, so I'm wondering, do you know how many families will not have been able to keep their insurance by January 1, do you have any matrix (sic) to help you understand what that is going to be?

SEBELIUS: Sir, by law that has been in place at the state level, insurance companies must give their customers a 90-day notice about a policy change or a plan cancellation.

MURPHY: I'm just wondering if you have a mechanism whereby you will know if something built in this system...

SEBELIUS: Will I know if your constituents signed up for an individual plan, no.

MURPHY: People across America.

And do we know how many policies will be canceled? I mean, is it 1,000, 10,000, 1 million, 5 million, do we know?

SEBELIUS: We know that in the individual market, a number of the plans having sold are not grandfathered and are not currently meeting the law. Those notices have gone out. We know there are about 12 million people in the individual market. A number of them have grandfathered plans. A number of them have plans which meet the essential health benefits. So I can try to...

MURPHY: Let me put a face on that.

Person named Paul wrote to me, and says, "I'm supposedly one of the families this act is supposed to help, but it's, in fact, is hurting more, and would make it harder for my family to live. We'll have less money for food and other essential items. I have a wife and four children to take care of."

Another person wrote, "I received -- I had a 2013 plan which if you include the premiums, and out of pocket total liability was $5,300. For 2014, the same program liability is $9,000.

Single mom writes, "I want to convey, I'm one of the millions of people who's having their health insurance canceled, because it does not meet the standards of Obamacare. I liked my insurance. I especially liked the price. And now I'm being forced to sign up for something that will be way more expensive. As a single mom who is self employed, I'm worried about how I'm going to pay my bills."

I hope you have a mechanism to track who these people are. She's not eligible for other subsidies, but the costs are going to be driving her down.

SEBELIUS: Well sir, again, I would suggest there is no requirement that any of those consumers sign up for a plan suggested by their company at a higher price. They have now options...

MURPHY: But if a plan changes...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: (OFF-MIKE) health underwriting, without preexisting conditions, with some guarantees around...

MURPHY: She's searching around and she can't find a plan she could afford.

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: (OFF-MIKE) they never had before.

MURPHY: She can't find a plan she can afford.

UPTON: Gentleman's time expired.

Gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. Butterfield.

BUTTERFIELD: Mr. Chairman, before my time begins, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

UPTON: Yes, go ahead.

BUTTERFIELD: Mr. Chairman, I'm always sensitive to committee decorum and I want to ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to display the Democratic Twitter handle. UPTON: Go ahead.

BUTTERFIELD: Hear no objection, thank you.

Secretary Sebelius, thank you so very much for coming today. I would like to ask you about the document that my Republican colleagues have just released.

This document is an authority to operate memorandum to operate the federally facilitated marketplace for six months and implement a security mitigation plan.

This document, as I understand it, describes security testing for healthcare.gov. It says that security testing of the marketplace was ongoing since its inception, and into September of this year. In fact, it says that, quote, "Throughout the three rounds of security control assessment testing, all of the security controls have been tested on different versions of the system." that's good news.

But the bad news is, that it goes on to say that, because of system readiness, a complete security assessment of all the security controls in one complete version of the system were not tested.

This document indicates that CMS postponed a final security assessment screening, but in its place, CMS did put in place a number of mitigation measures, and it concluded that these measures would mitigate any security risk.

Question, are you familiar with this document?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

BUTTERFIELD: Is it correct that this document recommends implementing a dedicated security team to monitor, track, and ensure the mitigation plan activities are completed?

SEBELIUS: Yes, it does.

BUTTERFIELD: Now is it correct that this document recommends monitoring and performing weekly testing on all berta (ph) devices, including Internet-facing web servers?

SEBELIUS: More than recommended, it's underway.

BUTTERFIELD: Is it correct this document recommends conducting daily and weekly scans?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

BUTTERFIELD: Does this document recommend conducting a full SEA test on the marketplace in a stable environment?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

BUTTERFIELD: Is it correct that this document recommends migrating the marketplace to CMS's virtual data center environment in the first quarter of next year?

SEBELIUS: Yes, it does.

BUTTERFIELD: My understanding is that an independent security expert, the MITRE Corporation, is performing security testing on the code that powers the website on an ongoing basis, is that correct?

SEBELIUS: That is correct, and MITRE did an assessment of the system, gave us a preliminary report, they are in the process of posting their final report. That did not raise flags about going ahead, and the mitigation strategy was put in place to make sure that we had a temporary authority to operate in place while the mitigation was going on, and then a permanent authority to operate will be signed.

BUTTERFIELD: Finally, do you have confidence in these and other measures you are taking to protect the security of Americans' personal information?

SEBELIUS: I do, sir.

BUTTERFIELD: Thank you.

This is the third time you've said it during the hearing, and we believe you. Thank you.

What you're telling us is that these remedial actions and the ongoing security testing from MITRE are protecting the security of the website. That's a message that it's important for the public to hear.

My Republican colleagues do not want this website to work.

I am convinced of that.

They want to block the ACA at all costs and even shut down the government to stop the law. For the last four years, they have taken every glitch, every simple glitch, and hiccup in the law and tried to exaggerate its significance, and that's happening today and it's so disappointing.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

UPTON: Dr. Burgess.

BURGESS: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I may make a unanimous consent request also?

UPTON: Yes, go ahead.

BURGESS: I would like to request unanimous consent my opening statement, which we were not allowed to be given could be made part of the record to this hearing.

UPTON: No -- no -- without objection.

BURGESS: And further, I do have a number of questions, many have come from constituents, I would also like to submit those as questions for the record...

UPTON: Without objection.

BURGESS: ... and ask the secretary for her attention to those so we can get answers, because they are, after all, important questions.

OK, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

It just came to my attention that on CNN -- the -- CNN's website, that the site was hacked just last week, and I will be happy to make this available to you. I don't think...

SEBELIUS: The CNN website?

BURGESS: The -- CNN ran a story that the healthcare.gov website was hacked last week. And again, I will get this to you and would appreciate your response to that.

Mr. Terry had asked a question about -- he wanted to get the information about the number of people who'd signed up. You said you wouldn't provide that because it wasn't accurate.

Would you provide us with the number of people who have been able to enroll on the telephone? The president gave an 800-number during his speech. Could we get a number of people who've enrolled on the telephone?

SEBELIUS: No, sir, we do not have reliable enrollment data. We will have that to you by the middle of November as we committed to. We are collecting state data, we are collection telephone data, we are collecting paper data, we are collecting website data. We want it to be reliable and accountable and that's what you'll have to...

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: OK. Reclaiming my time. Telephone data doesn't seem like it would be that difficult to compile since the number is likely quite low.

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: The telephone goes through the system.

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: You have, or the president designated, I call him a glitch czar, Jeffrey Zients. Your familiar with his appointment to the -- to oversee...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: I asked him to serve in this capacity, yes.

BURGESS: OK. Many of us on the Subcommittee of Oversight and Investigations in Energy and Commerce were not as comforted as you by that selection because if you'll recall, Mr. Zients' history with this subcommittee is not great. He was involved with Solyndra, we asked him to come and talk to us about Solyndra in 2011. He refused, requiring a subpoena to be issued by this -- by this subcommittee. Will you commit to making Mr. Zients available to our subcommittee for our questions?

SEBELIUS: Congressman, you are welcome to ask Mr. Zients to come before the committee. He is volunteering his services to us for a period of time. He has been appointed by the President to start in January as the head of the National Economic Council. He was the Deputy Director at OMB for Management and Performance. I am thrilled that he is willing to take on this assignment and help us drive the management, but...

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: Again, his -- his appearance here will be important. Now a lot of people are asking if the president's words leading up to this law, if they matter, and the statement in the Washington Post today edited the President's statement, saying, "If you like your health care plan, you'll be able to keep your health care plan if we deem it adequate," but that seems like a more operational statement, and especially if you go back just a few years into the Federal Register, and I'm quoting here from the Federal Register from July 23rd of 2010, just a few months after the law was signed. The -- the rule, or the interim rule for dealing with the grandfathering written in the Federal Record, "because newly-purchased individual policies are not grandfathered, the department expects that a large population of individual policies will not be grandfathered, covering up to and perhaps exceeding 10 million people."

I hope the president was apprised of that before he made these statements, because clearly his statement wasn't operational.

SEBELIUS: Again, that's an insurance company choice, and that was a snapshot of what the market looks like.

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: Your...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: The President made it clear, and our policy was to put a grandfather clause in both employer-based coverage and in individual coverage.

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: Right, but in the Federal Register, those were the comments that were recorded. Now, I do have to...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: No, this isn't a government takeover of anything. These are private insurance plans making private decisions.

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: I do have to ask you this. I do have to ask you this. You serve at the pleasure of the President, we're all aware of that. But we have had many of your employees here in front of this committee, and you do have to ask yourself, are these being purposely misleading, or are they really not that smart? So I'm going to ask you this morning, for the sake of the future of health care in this country, will you please ask for the resignation of Gary Cohen, because he's repeatedly come to this committee and misled us.

SEBELIUS: I will not, sir.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

(UNKNOWN): Mr. Chairman, point of personal privilege. I just think the record ought to be clear about Jeffrey Zients. He was invited with less than a week's notice to come before this committee. He couldn't make it that day, he asked for some other day, he went to OMB and had nothing to do with the Solyndra contract, and he did come before us and talk about it, but his sole role was to represent OMB and I don't think he ought to have any -- there ought to be any disparagement of Jeffrey Zients. He's a very well-regarded public servant.

UPTON: The gentleman says the statement will stand. Ms. Matsui?

MATSUI: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Welcome, Madam Secretary. Now we all agree the website problems must be resolved. It's this country invented and developed the Internet and the concept of the websites, so there are high expectations. The fact that the hired private contractors could not build a ready website nearly three years is inexcusable, and after it's fixed, I hope the administration will hold those at fault accountable. But we can't lose sight of the big picture, that when this is all said and done, every American will have affordable quality health insurance and health care. This is the goal, I believe, of all Democrats and Republicans. The ACA's working in California, and it's working in my district in Sacramento, and I just want to tell you about a letter I got from a constituent. "Dear Congresswoman Matsui, as a self-employed contract employee, I've had individually-purchased health insurance for 11 years now. Insurance has gone up every year, sometimes more than once, insurance that wouldn't let me add my daughter when my ex- husband stopped his insurance policy that covered them both, insurance that I have underused for fear they would drop me, insurance that has just dropped me anyway because they decided they would no longer offer individual plans. This could have happened to me at any time. I'm so grateful that the Affordable Care Act provisions make it possible to get health insurance beginning in January for me and my daughter. As all this is happening, I have finished graduate school and started my own business. Slowly but surely things are happening and I expect to be hiring my first employees in the next six months. The provisions of the ACA are helping me in this too. I can clearly see what it will cost me to provide health benefits for my future employees, understand these costs, and build my business plan accordingly." And that is just one of the letters I have received.

Now, I've also heard from my colleagues on the other side of the aisle complain again and again about how health care reform is increasing health care costs. But the empirical evidence shows something quite different. The recent trends in Medicare spending growth are really quite remarkable. Medicare spending growth is at historically low levels, growing by less than one-half of 1 percent in fiscal year 2012, following slow growth in 2010 and 2011. The same is true on the private side of health care. Personal consumption expenditures on health care, everything from health insurance to drugs to hospital care, rose by just over 1 percent in the past year. This is the slowest increase in nearly 50 years.

Madam Secretary, what does this data tell us about what has happened to health care costs since the ACA became law?

SEBELIUS: Well Congresswoman, you're absolutely right. In the last three and a half years since the President signed the Affordable Care Act, we have seen a great slowdown in the extraordinary cost increases year in and year out for health care in the Medicare plan, in the Medicaid plan, in private insurance, and in underlying health care costs, which affect every American. Some of that has to do with some of the features that are currently in place around different care delivery and different payment systems that we are helping to drive, given the tools that we have with the Affordable Care Act, more quality outcomes, trying to prevent hospital readmissions, looking at hospital-acquired infections, medical homes that prevent people in the first place or help them stay healthy in their own homes and in their own places.

MATSUI: So it's true that the private insurance costs are growing at the slowest rate in decades also, is that true?

SEBELIUS: That is true.

MATSUI: So am I also correct that the ACA Act (sic) premiums are coming in even lower than projected by experts like the CBO?

SEBELIUS: Well, they're about, on an average, about 16 percent lower than was estimated, that those premiums would be, and that's the premium, not accounting for the number of uninsured or underinsured Americans who will then qualify for financial help. Since they don't have employer coverage, they get some help from the taxpayers paying for that coverage.

MATSUI: Thank you, Madam Secretary.

UPTON: Dr. Gingrey?

GINGREY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Madam Secretary, when you spoke at the Democratic National Convention in Charlotte last September, one of the first statements you made about the Affordable Care Act was, quote, "but for us Democrats, Obamacare is a badge of honor, because no matter who you are, what stage of life you're in, this law is a good thing. First, if you already have insurance you like, you can keep it," and I end the quote. I'd call this a red herring that misled voters, intentional or not. Now perhaps had you known that millions would lose their coverage, families would face financial disaster, as one constituent recently told me, or that the exchange rollout would be plagued by a multitude, multiple delays we've seen, you would not consider such a badge of honor.

GINGREY: The fact is, your words and those of the President as he campaigned last year, that "if you already have insurance you like, you can keep it," seemed to be directly refuted by the millions of cancellation notices already sent to Americans just in the past few weeks. Whether your statement was inaccurate, or as Mr. Hoyer said yesterday, "not precise enough," it does strike me that millions of individuals who, by listening to speeches like yours, voted, believing one thing, now find themselves without coverage and are now scrambling to find coverage in a marketplace that offers more expensive plans with fewer options.

In response to my constituents' calls for help, I created a portal on my website -- no patches or fixes needed -- that allows those who have experienced problems to reach out and tell me about their personal experiences.

In just the last few days, my office has received dozens of complaints regarding increases in their monthly premiums. I received one such notice from a mother in her early 50s who just received a notice that not only will her insurance premiums double, but she will also have to switch insurance -- insurers to keep her doctors due to the effect of the Affordable Care Act.

Can you imagine receiving notices like this? I can tell you that, just in my district, the 11th of Georgia, many more are experiencing this situation. Madam Secretary, this is akin to telling seniors that in a few weeks they're Medicare coverage will be dropped, or their premiums would double.

Now, I know that neither you nor the administration would ever advocate for such a policy. Yet, here you are subjecting those currently in the individual market to such government intervention. And I would hope that you would agree with me in recognizing that these increases are a heavy hardship on my constituents -- on all of our constituents, Republican or Democrat.

Now I'll get to my questions. You know the health care law included a hardship exemption from the individual mandate. Yet, the administration has failed to finalize the application form for the hardship exemption three and one-half years after we passed this law. As of today, can an individual apply for a hardship exemption from the individual mandate on healthcare.gov, yes or no?

SEBELIUS: I don't know.

GINGREY: I do: It's no. On October 15th, Politico reported that if the online system for getting into Obamacare coverage is rickety, the system for getting out of the mandate doesn't even exist yet. HHS says, it will take another month at least for the administration to finalize the forms for the hardship exemption from the individual mandate.

Why has it taken three and one-half years to finalize a simple application form for an exemption from the individual mandate?

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, as you know, the individual mandate is not in place until next year. We have made it very clear that if somebody is Medicaid eligible in a state that doesn't choose...

(CROSSTALK)

GINGREY: My last question and my last second.

An estimated 16 million people in the individual market have or will receive cancellation notices stating their health insurance coverage does not meet minimum coverage requirements of the Affordable Care Act.

The bill specifically grants you, Madam Secretary, the power to determine the criteria for a hardship exemption. Will you provide all of these individuals a hardship exemption since the Affordable Care Act is taking away their plan? Will do you that?

SEBELIUS: No, sir. And I think those numbers are far from accurate: 95 percent of Americans who have health insurance will be in a continuous plan -- Medicare, Medicaid, employer-based, V.A. -- 95 percent.

Five percent who are in the individual market, a portion of those 5 percent -- a portion of them, about 12 million people -- a fraction of those 12 million will have a plan that doesn't meet the criteria and has not been grandfathered in.

They are indeed receiving notices. Many of those individuals -- half of them -- will be eligible for financial help getting a new plan and they have many more choices in the marketplace. So we will not have a blanket exemption.

GINGREY: Sounds like a hardship to me, Madam Secretary.

UPTON: The gentleman's time expired.

Ms. Christensen.

CHRISTENSEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you Madam Secretary for being here and thank you for all that you and your staff at HHS has done in implementing the Affordable Care Act to insure that it would provide the many benefits to children, to women, to Medicare beneficiaries and to ensure security to those who already have insurance as well as lower costs. Of course, the biggest complaint has been about the application and the enrollment website, but we have heard over and over from you that those are being addressed.

But you would recall and I know my colleagues would recall that Congressman Rush and I have always been concerned about those who do not have Internet access, those who are uncomfortable using the Internet and would not use it.

So I just wanted to just remind everyone that there are other avenues for enrolling either by telephone or by paper, either alone or with the help of a certified, you know, application assistant.

But my question goes to one of the rumors that has been circulating. There many rumors about how the Affordable Care Act has affected part-time workers. And some of my colleagues on the other side claim that the companies are moving workers to part-time jobs, because of the health care reform law and that low wage workers are being detrimentally affected.

And I understand why these claims are being made as just another part of the on going effort to undermine the law. Would you take a few minutes and just set the record straight on the part-time issue?

SEBELIUS: Certainly.

Ninety-five percent of businesses in this country are small businesses; under 50 full-time employees. And there is no responsibility that any of those employers have to provide health coverage for their employees.

On the other hand, there are now tax credits available for some of the smaller employers who want to offer coverage to actually come into the marketplace.

For the other businesses, the businesses hiring 50 or more, there is a standard that says an employee is considered full-time if he or she works 30 hours a week. And that really came from a market snapshot with help from the small business administration of where employee benefits were in the private market based on hours of work.

What was a part-time or a full-time employee?

What we know about the economic data is the high point of part- time workers was in 2008 and 2009 at the height of the last recession. It has been decreasing each and every year. There is no data to support the fact that there is an up tick based on the impending Affordable Care Act. I'm sure that there may be some individual employers making some business decisions about how many workers they want full-time and how many part-time. But I can tell you there is no economic data or employment data that supports the notion that this is an effect of the law.

CHRISTENSEN: True, and in fact, it's my understanding, that part-time workers are at the lowest percentage of workers in many, many years right now. SEBELIUS: Well, and for the first time, as you know Congresswoman, part-time workers will have options for affordable health care. They never had that before. They've never had options in the marketplace. They never had some health purchasing coverage for themselves and their families.

Their full-time colleagues have, but they have not. So they will have options.

CHRISTENSEN: And just to be clear, I had another really long question, but the last part of it -- it would be fair to say that the every point along the way you expected this website to work based on everything that you have been told by the contractors up until that point.

SEBELIUS: I expected it to work and I desperately want to get it working. I....

CHRISTENSEN: More than anyone else, I am sure.

SEBELIUS: ... can't tell you how frustrated I am, and we are committed to fixing it. The only thing that I think builds back the confidence of the public is fixing it.

CHRISTENSEN: Thank you.

UPTON: Gentlelady's time expired.

Mr. Scalise.

SCALISE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman for holding the hearing and thank you, , Secretary Sebelius, for being with us.

Last week when the contractors built the system were here, I asked them all under oath if they had actually delivered the system they were contracted to build. And all four of them answered yes. I want to ask you, did the contractors deliver the system that you contracted them to build?

SEBELIUS: I don't think I can accurately answer that question. What we know is we've a system that doesn't function properly...

SCALISE: We definitely know that.

SEBELIUS: As we fix things, we'll know more about what is broken along the way. And I'll be able to...

SCALISE: So would someone in your office know -- somebody in your office oversaw this implementation and received the product. And they either said, this is the product we contracted and paid hundreds of millions of dollars to build or it wasn't.

Does somebody have the ability to get that information?

SEBELIUS: Well, I think that we can say that products tested individually, verified individually.
SCALISE: But clearly was an integrated system.

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: (OFF-MIKE) don't work well together.

SCALISE: Well, but, you know, I used to write programs for a living. I developed software products for a living.

If you're developing an integrated system, it's irrelevant if one isolated component works by itself. But when you plug it in together it doesn't work, that's a system that doesn't work.

One of the question I had and others had, somebody in your agency made a decision weeks -- literally weeks before the deployment -- to change the system. Instead of going from a browser ability where somebody just like on Kayak or just like on Amazon.com could go shop for products, look at prices before they purchase, which is how consumers are used to doing this. Y'all made the decision to change it around and gather all their information first before you could let them see prices.

Was that you who made that decision?

SEBELIUS: No, sir.

SCALISE: Was that Ms. Tavenner?

SEBELIUS: It was Ms. Tavenner and a team who looked at not imposing additional...

SCALISE: Did that team make the decision because once they knew once people actually saw the prices, and we're getting reports from all of our constituents of dramatically higher prices than what they were expecting.

Did you make the decision because you knew that when they saw the prices they might not want to buy the product so you wanted to gather their information first?

SEBELIUS: Sir, first I did not make the decision. I was informed about the decision.

We didn't...

SCALISE: Do you agree with the decision?

SEBELIUS: ... rolling off a number of features. And clearly they can see the products. No, there is no requirement to buy anything.

SCALISE: Look, I spent two hours trying to get into the system. I never once got to a point where I could see a price. I did get kicked out many times and got some of those blank screens other people got.

I do want to share stories with you from some of my constituents because I -- we started a page on our -- on Facebook and on Twitter. We are collecting what's called Share with Scalise. People are sending us stories. And we're getting lots of stories from my constituents.

I want to read you a few of them.

Randall (ph) from Mandeville (ph) said "My health care premium went up 30 percent to over $350 a month increase."

We had Michelle (ph) from Slidell (ph), "Our insurance premiums are going up $400 a month and our deductible has increased." And then you have got Shawn (ph) from Covington (ph), who said, "My current plan through United Health Care is no longer being offered in 2014 due to Obamacare. In fact, I received a letter stating that the new health care law was indeed the reason for the removal of my current health care plan."

Madam Secretary, what you would tell Shawn (ph), who liked his plan and now has lost it? And he was promised by you and the president he'd be able to keep that plan.

What would you tell Shawn (ph) now that he has lost his plan?

SEBELIUS: I would tell Shawn (ph) to shop in the marketplace and out of the marketplace.

SCALISE: Do you really think that's acceptable answer to Shawn?

SEBELIUS: If Shawn (ph) -- again if United chose not to keep Shawn's (ph) plan in effect for Shawn (ph)...

SCALISE: Because of the law. This is the (inaudible).

SEBELIUS: Sir, the law said if you keep Shawn's (ph) plan in place, if he liked his plan, if you only...

SCALISE: But Shawn (ph) liked his plan...

SEBELIUS: ... to Shawn (ph), then the plan is still there.

SCALISE: You and I may disagree over who you work for. I work for Shawn (ph). You work for Shawn (ph), Madam Secretary. Shawn (ph) lost his plan that he liked. And there are thousands and millions of Shawns (ph) throughout this country that lost the plan they liked because some bureaucrat in Washington said we think your plan is not good enough even though you like it, even though you were promised can you keep it, you're now not able to keep that plan.

I think you deserve to give Shawn (ph) a better answer than you just have to go shop for something else even though you lost your plan.

UPTON: The gentleman's time -- the gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. McNerney?

MCNERNEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Madam Secretary for coming today.

I'm going to follow up on Mr. Doyle's line of questioning. One concern I have with the fallout from the website is that many users who tried to sign up and were discouraged because of problems will now be too discouraged to come back once the site is fixed.

So what do you plan to do to get those folks to come back? SEBELIUS: Well, sir, we intend to invite them back formally by e-mail, by message. But we don't want to do that until we're confident that they will have a different experience.

So fixing the site is step one. And then inviting people back to the site to make it clear that when our timetable is fulfilled, they have four months to shop for affordable health coverage on a fully functioning site.

We know we're going to have to spend special time on young and healthy Americans who don't start out thinking they need insurance, aren't aware of the law, certainly don't want to use a failed or flawed site. So we're have to spend some particular attention on them.

MCNERNEY: Thank you.

Have the software specifications for the website and its related software elements, including the test specifications, has that changed since the initial rollout?

SEBELIUS: I know that there certainly are some changes because, since October 1st -- I'm sorry.

MCNERNEY: Yes, since the rollout, the specifications.

SEBELIUS: Well, we -- the specifications haven't changed. We are certainly fixing, as I say, speed and reliance is one of the issues we're taking a look at. That's the performance side.

But there also are some functionality sides that things do not work as they can, including the enrollment passed on to insurers. So we are fixing functionality. And I don't think that's a change in the specs. I think it is actually making the system work the way it should.

MCNERNEY: Well, are you -- or is the department doing a prioritization on the problems?

SEBELIUS: Yes.

MCNERNEY: Could you describe that a little bit?

SEBELIUS: Yes, as of last week when Jeff Zients joined us for this short-term project, we asked him to lead a sort of management team. We have pulled in all of our contractors as well as additional talent that they may have available.

We have talked to tech folks in and out of the private sector and insurance, some of their tech experts to get all eyes and ears, made a full assessment, developed a plan for fixes along the way, have a punch list for going after those fixes.

And we are doing a daily tech briefing and blog to tell people what we have found, what we have fixed, what's coming next, what the functionality is and we intend to do that until it's fully functional.
MCNERNEY: Well, thank you.

Madam Secretary, looking past the initial problems with the ACA rollout, do you think that the Affordable Care Act will be successful in bending the health care cost curve and reducing the fraction of our national economy that goes for health care?

SEBELIUS: Well, I think that we have already had some success. I think the goal is to continue to achieve that, a fully insured population arguably with preventative care, with an opportunity to see a primary care doctor and not go through the emergency room will in and of itself reduce costs.

Having people identified earlier who may have serious problems and managing those problems will reduce health costs. But I think the delivery system also needs some considerable help in paying for not a number of procedures, number of tests, number of prescriptions but paying for health outcomes.

MCNERNEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Mr. Latta?

LATTA: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And Madam Secretary, thanks very much for being with us today. Appreciate your testimony so far today.

What I'd like to do is I'll get these to you because there are so many we've received. These are questions that we've received from our constituents back home, specifically about what's going on with the website and for them.

And so what I'll do, I'd like to get those to you. But there is a lot of questions here and a lot of thoughts gone into a lot of these questions.

But if I could start with last week's testimony when our -- four of the contractors were here. And in one of the questions that I had posed to Ms. Campbell from CGI, in her testimony she had stated that they delivered the medicare.gov and also the federalreporting.gov.

And I'd asked at that time, were these sites more or less complicated than the site that we were talking about here today?

And she said, of course, the site today was more complicated.

And in the questioning and from her testimony -- and we've been hearing about this end-to-end testing that wasn't happening, that we had individuals out there saying that about two weeks had been done, but I had asked her about was there sufficient enough time when they did medicare.gov?

And the response that she gave me back was on medicare.gov, which was a less complicated site -- and she stated that we had sufficient time to test the system before it went live. And I asked her in a follow-up then, what was that sufficient time?

And she said we had a number of months before the system went live at that time.

And then -- and I just want to make sure, because again, you know, sometimes things don't get reported accurately.

But in the "U.S. News and World Report" on October the 18th of this year -- and there is some questions going back and forth. And I just want to make sure that, you know, that you were quoted properly.

Said, "'After two weeks of review', the HHS secretary concluded, 'we didn't have enough testing specifically for high volumes for a very complicated project. The online insurance marketplace needed five years of construction and a year of testing,' she said. 'We had two years and almost no testing.'"

Is that correct?

SEBELIUS: I don't know the quote. I'd never suggested that we needed five years. I don't know where that is from.

(CROSSTALK)

LATTA: Well, that's one of the things we're going to check.

SEBELIUS: We clearly did not ever have five years. The law was signed in (inaudible) 2010.

LATTA: Well, let me -- and then last week you were -- when you were down in Texas you were being asked by a reporter about the system and the launch. And one of the parts of the question was that, at what point did you realize the system wasn't going to be working the way that you envisioned before the launch and why didn't we stop it before the launch?

LATTA: And, again, this is what was reported.

"We knew that if we had another six months we would probably test further. But I don't think anyone fully realized both the volume caused such problems but volumes also exposed some of the problems we had."

Now going back, though, to Ms. Campbell's statement that they tested more extensively on a system that was not as complicated, but HHS, CMS decided to go forward with only a very short period of testing. Do you think that was acceptable?

SEBELIUS: Well clearly looking back, it would have been ideal to do it differently. We had a product that frankly people have been waiting for decades to have access to affordable health care.

Medicare existed well before the website. Medicare is a program that started 50 year ago. The website was an additional feature for consumer ease and comfort. And so they were not launching Medicare. They were not delivering health benefits to seniors. They were putting together an additional way to enroll in Medicare.

I would suggest, sir, that we had deadlines in the law that people had benefits starting January 1. We wanted a extensive open enrollment period so that a lot of people who were not familiar with insurance, didn't know how to choose a doctor or choose a plan, had never been in this marketplace, or people who needed to understand fully what the law offered had ample time to do that.

So the date that I was, again, required to select for open enrollment, that's again part of the statute. How long would open enrollment be? We picked that data. All the contractors that began early in this process in the fall of 2010 when we issued -- I'm sorry, 2011 when we issued the initial contracts to CGI and QSSI knew the October 1 date. That was not changed. It wasn't added to.

As we got closer to the system, one of the reasons, again, that we pared down what needed to launch on October 1 was an attempt to minimize the risk to the system, to get people to their ability to see clearly what they were entitled to, what the plans were, and if those chose to, to enroll. Clearly the testing should have been longer, should have been more sufficient.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

LATTA: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. UPTON: Mr. Braley?

BRALEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Madam Secretary people who are watching this hearing might be under the assumption that there's some kind of political debate going on over the Affordable Care Act, but I think people in Iowa don't care anything about who's winning the political debate. They want these problems fixed and they want them fixed now. And I think that's the responsibility of everyone in this room to make sure that that happens.

I tried to go into the marketplace on October 7 and I encountered problems immediately dealing with the security code questions which required you to select dates. One of them was type a significant date in your life. Today is my birthday, so I put that in. I tried three different ways of entering that date and got a message each time, important, this is not a valid answer. Same thing for the third date entry.

And a lot of times when you registering online for anything and you have to put a date in, there will be a little prop there that tells you what the format is you're required to enter. Do you know, have we solved this problem in the security code area?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir. One of the initial issues was just getting people into the site and the ID proofing, which is a two-step process. One is that you give some preliminary information and you set up a password.

But the second to ensure that your personal data can't be hacked, can't be interfered with is the second step where some personalized questions which only can be verified by you are indeed part of that. Again, that was a -- an initial hold up in the system. We focused a lot of attention on that in the first several days.

It was fixed, only to then discover that there were system problems throughout the application. And that piece has been fixed, but I would suggest it also was a function of trying to make sure we had the highest security standards, that we were not cavalier about someone's personal information being able to be addressed and attached. And it -- it was a functionality that didn't perform properly but does now.

BRALEY: One of the things that keeps coming up in this hearing because you are from Kansas is references to "The Wizard of Oz." And people went to see the wizard because of the wonderful things that he did.

The Affordable Care Act is doing a lot of great things in Iowa. The Des Moines Register wrote that Iowans buying health insurance on the government's new online marketplace will face some of the lowest premiums in the country. It's increasing competition in our state. Iowa consumers are able to choose from 40 health plans in the marketplace.

You've mentioned the growth of health care spending is at the slowest rate in 50 years. Fifty thousand Iowa seniors have received prescription drug rebates. Bans on preexisting conditions are allowing people to get coverage and switch carriers, and now insurance premium increases are subject to review and can be rejected by the -- the people reviewing those plans.

But all of these good things don't mean anything unless we solve these problems. And what I need to know is how confident are you that the problems will be fixed by December 1?

SEBELIUS: Well again, Congressman, I have committed to that date because that is the assessment of both inside and outside experts have analyzed. And I think they kicked all the tires and looked at all the systems. I know that there's no confidence in that date until we deliver on the date. I'm well aware of that, and that's on me.

BRALEY: Since Americans were supposed to have six months to sign up, would you support ensuring they still have six months by extending the open enrollment period for two more months?

SEBELIUS: At this point, Congressman, they will have fully four months of fully functional all ways to sign up. And again, there are ultimate ways and the website right now that people are getting through.

The open enrollment period is extraordinarily long. It's about six times as long as a typical generous open enrollment period. And it's important for the insurance partners to know who is in their pool so again they can stay in the market next year and know who they're insuring.

So we think that the timetable will allow people four months' time to fully use the website. They can use it right now. They can use the call center. They can go to navigators. They can enroll.

UPTON: Gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Harper?

HARPER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Madam Secretary, for being here today. I'm sure there are other things you'd rather be doing, but we welcome the opportunity to have this conversation.

I'm going to ask a clerk to bring you a document for you to look at so I can ask you a couple of questions. If you can go to page eight on that, I have highlighted an item there. But this is a copy of a CGI slideshow from October 11 discussing technical issues that must be addressed within the website.

And on page eight of what I've handed you, CGI recommended that CGI and CMS have a review board to agree on which issues can technically be solved and which should politically be solved. Was such a review board convened?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I cannot tell you. I've never seen this document and I'm not aware of this recommendation. HARPER: But CGI is responsible for the website, correct?

SEBELIUS: CGI is responsible for the application.

HARPER: For the application. Does it surprise you that in the slideshow that they gave October 11 they acknowledged political reasons for (inaudible)?

SEBELIUS: Sir, again, I've never seen this document. I have no idea what that means. Did you ask CGI when they came last week?

HARPER: Can you find out for us if such a review board was done and if any decisions were made on political reasons or any other reasons and find that out for us?

SEBELIUS: Sir, that question needs to go to CGI, but I can -- I can ask them to report to you.

HARPER: Well, if you would do that..

SEBELIUS: This is their document, if I understand it. This is not our document.

HARPER: Yes. Would you turn to page nine of that document please? And it states challenges on page nine in this presentation by CGI. And it says under challenges, unable to determine at this time whether low enrollment counts are attributable to system issues or due to users choosing not to select or enroll in a plan.

So those are two completely different issues obviously. If it is a system issue, that's something you have confidence at some point will be resolved. Correct?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

HARPER: And if it's a user selection issue, that's an entirely different story, is it not?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

HARPER: OK. Now when you used the phrase earlier about a punch list, that's -- that's like having somebody move into a house. Someone's buying a new house and they go through and they've been told this house is going to be ready for you to move in on October 1. They load up the van, they come in, and they get in and it's not finished. Part of the plumbing's not right. The wiring's wrong and -- and they go in.

This creates the situation where, you know, we -- health care shouldn't be a zero-sum game. I mean, we want to be fair to everyone. We want to -- we want to help people who are vulnerable. But at the same time, we shouldn't have to hurt folks.

HARPER: We've got people in my district, in my state who are getting notices of cancellation. They're being told of higher premiums that they're having. And these are great concerns that we have. And how do we work through that?

And I want to say I appreciate you accepting responsibility for these initial rollout failures that we've had. But who is ultimately responsible? It is the president, correct?

SEBELIUS: For the website?

HARPER: The president is ultimately responsible for the rollout, ultimately.

SEBELIUS: No, sir. We are responsible for the rollout.

HARPER: But who do you answer to?

SEBELIUS: I answer to the president.

HARPER: All right. So is the president not ultimately responsible like a company CEO would be?

SEBELIUS: Sir, he's the president of the United States. I have given him regular reports and those -- I am responsible for the implementation of the Affordable Care Act. That's what he asked me to do. That's what I'll continue to do.

HARPER: So you're saying the president is not responsible for HHS?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I didn't say that.

HARPER: OK, so the president ultimately is responsible. While I think it's great that you're a team player and taking responsibility, it is the president's ultimate responsibility, correct?

SEBELIUS: You clearly -- whatever. Yes, he is the president. He is responsible for government programs.

HARPER: My time expired.

UPTON: The gentleman's time expired.

Mr. Lujan. LUJAN: Mr. Chairman, thank you very much. Before I begin, I'd like to ask unanimous consent to submit into the record some articles from New Mexico publications, first entitled "Small Business: Owner Health Exchange Will Save Me $1,000 A Month."

UPTON: Without objection.

LUJAN: I see my time did begin there. So I'll try to get through this, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, I was intrigued by a line of questioning by Congressman Green asking about the individual marketplace. How volatile was the individual marketplace before the Affordable Care Act became law?

SEBELIUS: I would say it wasn't a mark marketplace at all. It was unprotected, unregulated, and people were really on their own.

LUJAN: Madam Secretary, the Kaiser Family Foundation reports have over 50 percent churn out of individuals that have coverage and individual market churn out of coverage every year. They either lose coverage, they're priced out or drop it.

Is that consistent with what you're aware of?

SEBELIUS: That's an accurate snapshot. About a third of the people are in for about six months. And over half are in for a year or less.

LUJAN: So individuals that were in the individual marketplace before the passage of the Affordable Care Act did not have the same protections as those in group coverage?

SEBELIUS: That's true.

LUJAN: And would those individuals in the individual marketplace sometimes have higher co-pays?

SEBELIUS: Higher co-pays, unlimited out of pocket costs for often coverage that was medically underwritten or excluded whatever medical condition they had in the first place.

LUJAN: So these were typically one-year contracts. If they used the plan because they got sick nor a car descent or a victim of domestic violence, sometimes they would be thrown off the plans or their rates would go up?

SEBELIUS: Yes.

LUJAN: I think that's important to note, Madam Secretary. And I'm intrigued as well that my understanding is that last month HHS conducted an analysis that found that nearly six out of uninsured Americans getting coverage through the marketplace will pay $100 a month. Is that correct?

SEBELIUS: They'll have a plan available for less than $100 if that is their choice. Yes.

LUJAN: And that number would be even higher -- would be better if more states chose the option of using federal funds to expand Medicaid to cover the low income population?

SEBELIUS: Definitely. That's just a marketplace snapshot. Those are people that will be in the marketplace.

LUJAN: Madam Secretary, I don't think I heard anyone from the other side of the aisle today -- my Republican colleagues, ask you how can Congress work with you and support you in fixing this website and fixing this problem?

I hope that we all agree we want this website fixed.

I would yield to anyone that would disagree.

Seeing no one accepting that. I'm glad to hear that we agree with this.

Now Madam Secretary, what can Congress do to work with you to fix this website?

SEBELIUS: Well, I'm not sure that there is hands on work that you can do. Maybe we have some technical expertise, but I would say getting accurate information to constituents is helpful.

Letting people know that they can check out the facts in the law. That they may be entitled to some financial support.

That cancellation of policies means that the policy that they had may not exist, but they have a lot of choices of new policies and a law that now says they must be insured in a new policy.

That they don't have to be insured by their company at a higher price.

LUJAN: I appreciate that, Madam Secretary.

Going back to the individual marketplace, Madam Secretary, did this Congress in previous years before the Affordable Care Act make it illegal for health insurance companies to raise rates on someone after they submitted a claim for going to the hospital or becoming sick or getting rid of preexisting conditions?

SEBELIUS: No, sir.

LUJAN: Madam secretary, one last note here.

It seems that we've received some horrible news that there are bad actors already taking place of fraudulent web sites that imitate the health care exchange or misleading seniors into disclosing their personal information.

I've signed on to a letter to you led by my colleague Representative Raul Ruiz out of California to request that you prioritize fraud prevention efforts.

What has the administration done to prevent the fraudulent acts and protect personal information?

SEBELIUS: I can tell you, Congressman, the president felt very strongly that, that need to be part of our outreach effort, which is it why the attorney general and I convened representatives of state attorneys general, insurance commissioners, the U.S. attorneys and the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission -- which has jurisdiction -- to make sure that we first got out ahead of some of this developing consumer outreach.

No one should ever give personal health information, because personal health information is not needed for the policies any longer. That's a red flag. We want to make sure that people turn over potential fraudulent acts. We have put training in place for navigators. We have our law enforcement...

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

I would just note that we -- with the indulgence of the secretary, we're hoping that we can have all members ask some questions, but we also know that with four minutes we're going to have a little trouble.

So I'm going to ask unanimous consent that we try to limit our questions and answers to no more than two minutes.

And I talked to Mr. Waxman.

Is that okay?

Because otherwise we will -- there will be a lot of folks who will not be able to ask a question at all.

(UNKNOWN): Three of us.

SEBELIUS: And Mr. Chairman, I would submit that if the questions get submitted we would be happy to provide timely answers also.

UPTON: OK, so can I do that?

So with that we'll try two minutes.

Mr. Lance?

LANCE: I guess I won the Lottery on the two minutes, Madam Secretary.

(LAUGHTER)

UPTON: Time has expired. OK.

(LAUGHTER)

LANCE: 20 seconds, Mr. Chairman. On the website, Madam Secretary, the contractors testified last week that they needed more than two weeks for end to end testing. Why in your opinion was there not more than two weeks?

SEBELIUS: Again, we have the products, the insurance policies themselves by companies were loaded into the system. So we could test up until then but it wasn't until September -- mid-September that that was done. Again, the contractors said we would have loved more testing time, but we think we're ready to go ahead.

LANCE: I believe that will ultimately be a dispute between CMS and HHS and the contractors and if there is anything question do regarding that because, obviously that, didn't work. And I had thought given this as the signature issue with the president that the website would be ready.

Number two, in my judgment the president's statements were overstatement overstatements. The four Pinnochios is an indication of that. There's a report in the New Jersey newspaper this is morning that 800,000 people in New Jersey who purchased their policies in individual or small employer markets will be affected by this.

Mr. Walden, in a previous question, mentioned the fact that in an individual market you would be able to keep your policy grandfathered. Yet regulations issued by HHS say that grandfathered status would not be a continued for so much as a $5 change in a co-pay.

Is that accurate?

Do you believe that that is a significant change?

SEBELIUS: Sir, we gave, I think in, the grandfather regulations a guide for how pricing could change, medical inflation and I think it was in most cases plus 15 percent.

There were some individual consumer outfacing issues that were more rigid than that, but I would say that in terms of having companies being able to collect a profit margin, that was certainly built into the grandfather status.

LANCE: I think that's too little a change, respectfully.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Tonko?

TONKO: Thank you, Mr. Chair.

TONKO: And welcome, Honorable Secretary. Thank you for fielding our questions and for responding when you were extended the courtesy to offer a response.

As a strong supporter of the Affordable Care Act, I'm frustrated and I think it's fair to say the American people are frustrated as well. And I heard you here many times this morning say you're frustrated.

I think, by and large, people want this law to work. When I talk to folks back home in the capital region of New York that I represent, even people who opposed the law initially aren't rooting for the failure of the Affordable Care Act. Instead, they want Congress to come together to fix these problems so that we can move on to real issues that matter like creating jobs and growing the economy.

My home state of New York, which also experienced Web site problems at the outset, has now completed enrollment determinations on over 150,000 New Yorkers, with more than 31,000 having already signed up for quality low-cost health insurance.

Given that many states have had success in overcoming these initial Web site issues, has HHS looked at what these state Web sites are doing as it searches for solutions to fix Healthcare.gov?

SEBELIUS: Absolutely. And we shared a lot of the information going in. I think that the hub feature that we have in our Web site that all states are using, including the state of New York, is fully functional. And that's good news for New York and California and others who are running their own state Web sites.

But we are learning from them. We've shared information with them. And we are eager for all the help and assistance moving forward.

TONKO: Thank you. Similarly, many states made the illogical choice of rejecting Medicaid expansion contained in the ACA that would help some of their poorest citizens get access to the health care situation.

This is despite the fact that Medicaid expansion is almost entirely financed by federal dollars. Can you comment broadly on HHS's plan in the future to encourage more states to run their own marketplaces and expand Medicaid so that the law can function as designed? SEBELIUS: Well, absolutely. Most recently last week the state of Ohio did move into the Medicaid market. And we now have 30 governors, I think 27 states have fully completed the process, another three are in the process.

Republicans and Democrats, who -- some of whom sued us about the constitutionality of the act who are now deciding that for the citizens of their state they want to be part of the expanded Medicaid.

And we will continue to have those conversations. It's not just about the marketplace. It's also about Medicaid.

TONKO: Thank you very much.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

Dr. Cassidy?

CASSIDY: You said that only if -- an individual policy is only canceled if it changes significantly. But to be clear, after May 2010 if co-insurance went up by any amount, even by a dollar, according to your regulations, that would not qualify as a grandfathered clause. Just to add that out there for the record. I gather even by a dollar.

That said, I get a letter from someone in my district, Adrienne (ph). She says that -- oh, she lost her coverage. She lost her coverage because spousal coverage is gone. She has gone on the exchange. She doesn't qualify for a subsidy, but that her premium and out-of-pocket costs under any plan is $10,000 a year.

She feels -- she writes this. She feels betrayed by her government. Now she has to sit there asking herself, is this fair? If you were she, do you think that this would be fair?

SEBELIUS: Dr. Cassidy, I want to start by the amount that you gave is not accurate. I was told $5, not $1.

CASSIDY: Yes, that's for the co-pay, not for the co-insurance. For the co-insurance, it's any amount. But I have limited time. Do you think that it's fair -- if you were she, if you were Adrienne, do you think is fair? Loses her spousal coverage, now it's 10k, no subsidies?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I don't have any idea what she's looking at. I can tell you that, again, based on what we've seen in the market and what we've seen in the plans, people will be getting full insurance for the first time at...

(CROSSTALK)

CASSIDY: Well, again, this is what she reports. Do you think it's fair -- if what she reports is true, do you think it's fair?

SEBELIUS: I can't answer fair or not fair. I don't know what she was paying or what she was paying for.

CASSIDY: That's OK. Let's move on.

SEBELIUS: Did she have full insurance?

CASSIDY: Richard writes that his daughter received a note that his premium is going up because she's being lumped with older, costlier patients. Now it's possible that the only people that sign up will be those who are more costly. Does HHS have plans on what to do if only those who are more costly sign up and premiums rise for everybody?

SEBELIUS: I think, sir, that's what we're trying to do to make sure that...

(CROSSTALK)

CASSIDY: But if only the costly sign up, do you have plans? If you accept that...

SEBELIUS: That's the importance of the individual mandate that you've just outlined. Getting rid of pre-existing conditions, making sure that people can come in...

CASSIDY: But if only the most costly sign up, do you have backup plans?

SEBELIUS: We will encourage others to sign up. It's why there is a penalty in place and why...

CASSIDY: Is this to assume that there are no backup plans? I don't mean to be rude, but...

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Yarmuth.

YARMUTH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Madam Secretary, nice to see you. I come to this hearing with a little bit different perspective. Kentucky is doing a great job with our exchange. As of this morning we had 350,000 people who have explored the Web site, 59,000 have started applications, 31,000 are now fully enrolled in new coverage, and 5,000 just in the last week.

And I think very importantly, more than 400 businesses have begun applying for their employees as well. So, yes, the idea that somehow this is going to be bad for businesses is not borne out in Kentucky.

Would it be safe to say that if 36 states had done what Kentucky and New York and California have done instead of 14 that the rollout would have been much smoother and the Web site would have been much easier to construct?

SEBELIUS: Well, I don't think there's any question that the -- you know, in January of 2013 we knew how many states were not running their own Web site, in I think mid-February we learned about partnerships. So it was not until that point that we learned that 36 states would actually be coming through the Web site.

Having said that, we should have anticipated, we should have planned better. We should have tested better. I don't think that's any excuse, but we clearly are running a very different vehicle for enrollment than we thought we were going to run in March of 2010.

YARMUTH: Right. On the subject of cancellation of policies, isn't it true that, first of all, the federal government can't require insurance companies to sell insurance?

SEBELIUS: That they can't...

YARMUTH: The federal government can't require insurance companies to sell insurance?

SEBELIUS: Yes, that's true.

YARMUTH: And in fact, insurance companies all over the country are making very difficult decisions now about where they want to participate and where they don't. And in some markets they're actually trying to get out of the market, canceling people because they want to play in other markets and so forth.

They're all making the decisions now...

SEBELIUS: Well, and we know we have more insurers, 25 percent more insurers in the individual market than we did prior to the law being passed.

YARMUTH: Right. So there a lot of dynamics going on here that are not necessarily an indication that the president misled anybody. They're business decisions being made all over now.

SEBELIUS: Well, in cancellation of policies, again, that one- year contract notice is a routine in the individual market. It has been in place for years. And for a lot of people, their policies now -- they are being canceled because they're being notified you can no longer be medically underwritten.

We can't charge you more because you're a woman. We won't ever have the kind of limitation on what your policy can pay out or charge you exorbitant out of pocket rates. Those policies will cease to be offered in the marketplace.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Guthrie?

GUTHRIE: Thank you, Madam Secretary, for being here. And last week Mr. Lau from Serco was here. I know the president has talked about the alternatives to the Web site as phone-calling or using a paper application.

And what he said, and I think you've said it with the phone, they take the paper applications but they enter them into the same Web portal. So I know you get around the issue of getting on and getting logged off.

But also -- but there's still issues with data within the Web portal. As you said, you can't even get reliable data who is even signed up.

So he also said because of the surge in paper applications, it's like six to eight weeks to process. So if November 30th is when this will be ready, that they can use, and even if you do it now, eight weeks you're getting close to January 1st, and somebody does lose their insurance so they're signing up for this, and they get to January 1st, even though you have a March 31st open enrollment, what happens to these? Is there a contingency plan for these people to continue their insurance?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I think that we have improvements every day on the speed of the site. Serco was giving you early snapshots of difficulty of accessing the site. I think that's greatly improved.

GUTHRIE: Well, they said just processing the paper, actually.

SEBELIUS: Well, I understand. But it is the site for -- they put the application into the site and get a determination. That's part of what the process is. So the site is part of the portal all the way through. This is an integrated insurance vehicle. And so that will improve.

And we -- again, with four months of continuous service, which is far longer than most people had, some of these cancellation numbers, Mr. Garrity (ph), again, pointed this out from Florida Blue Cross, but it's true of everyone else, these are not January 1st numbers. They are year-long numbers.

So over the course of 2014 when an individual's policy is due to expire, that individual...

(CROSSTALK)

GUTHRIE: ... but somebody could expire January 1st and not be able to get coverage if the Web site -- and the vendor said they needed months to test. They would have liked to have months and months to test. That's what they said.

So if we're going to get to November -- even if it works November 30th...

SEBELIUS: Well, I would say we're testing as we go. There is beta testing going on right now. That's why we are fixing and how we can identify things. People are getting through every day and we now know a lot more than we...

(CROSSTALK)

GUTHRIE: ... but the paper process, if it does take even four weeks, then it's November 30th and people's cancel on January 1st, there needs to be a contingency for that person.

SEBELIUS: Well, again, typical insurance is two to four weeks of signup. They will have two full months of signup.

UPTON: Gentleman's time has expired.

Ms. Schakowsky?

SCHAKOWSKY: Thank you, Madam Secretary, for bringing to millions of Americans access to affordable, comprehensive health care coverage that's going to be there when they need it.

I want to thank you especially as a woman. Women can no longer -- being a woman can no longer be considered being a preexisting condition. Women can no longer be charged more than a man for the same coverage. Women have access to comprehensive benefits like prescription drugs and free preventive screenings and free contraceptive coverage and maternity care, which is often left out of coverage. And the days of complicated pregnancy or diabetes or domestic violence being a preexisting condition, those days are over.

You know, I want to say to my colleagues after a three-and-a-half year campaign to repeal, to discredit, to even shut down the government over Obamacare, I want to say, get over it.

We all agree that there are problems but these are problems that I see being fixed. And so I want to ask one -- oh, and I want to say that what we did under Medicare Part D can be an example of how we can work together.

And in fact, Chairman Upton and I both sent a letter asking for more money for community based groups to help implement the program and make it work. We can work together.

So if you could just briefly say how are the navigators -- how important are they in making this system work for the American people? SEBELIUS: Well, what we know, Congresswoman, is that a lot of people are not web savvy and are not frustrated by the website because they don't have a computer. They don't want to use a computer, they don't trust a computer. They need a live human being to ask questions, get questions answered, talk about the plan, talk about insurance.

So the navigators play a hugely important role. We have about 2,500 trained navigators on the ground right now. We have thousands more community assisters who are trained and ready to go, about 45,000 agents and brokers have gone through specific Affordable Care Act training.

But those individuals, working with their clients, customers and in the case of navigators and community assisters, just the public at large, they are not paid by a company. They are not collecting a fee. They just want to help people get coverage; they are hugely important.

UPTON: Gentlelady's time -- Mr. Olson.

OLSON: I thank the chair.

And welcome, Madam Secretary.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you.

OLSON: I would like to open with a quote from an American icon -- I'll hold up a poster. It says, "If the user is having a problem, it's our problem."

I'm glad to hear you raised this philosophy during your testimony today, ma'am.

Obamacare was signed into law 1,256 days ago. And since then, there's been user problem after user problem after user problem.

Regarding healthcare.gov, your deputy administrator for consumer information, Gary Cohen, testified one month ago, where we are sitting, that -- and this I quote, "CMS has worked hard to test the infrastructure that will allow Americans to enroll in coverage confidently and simply and securely," end quote.

Yet according to "Forbes" and "The Wall Street Journal," you told them that you needed five years of construction and one year of testing. The program has crashed and burned at least three times and the user is still having problems.

(Inaudible) up here, ma'am?

It's been down the whole time you've been testifying. The system is down at this moment. My question, ma'am, is very simple.

When did you know these changes were going down? A month, a day, a quarter?

And did you tell the president what you knew? SEBELIUS: Sir, I was informed that we were ready to launch on October 1st. The contractors, who we had as our private partners told us and told this committee that they had never suggested the delay, and that is accurate. Our CMS team felt we were ready to go.

I told the president that we were ready to go.

Clearly I was wrong. We were wrong. I -- we knew that in any big, new, complicated system, there would be problems; no one ever imagined the volume of issues and problems that we've had. And we must fix it.

OLSON: Yes, ma'am. But credible journalists said you knew you needed six years to get this program...

SEBELIUS: Sir, I -- that quote has been repeated. I can guarantee you I would have never stated that because the law was passed in March of 2010. I chose the open enrollment date. I don't know where that quote comes from, but that is not from me.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

Mr. Barrow?

BARROW: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thanks for attending today, Madam Secretary. I suspect that deep down most people on this committee support the concept of reforming insurance market so that more people have access to better insurance coverage. We have disagreements about the means used to get to those ends which is ultimately why I voted against the Affordable Care Act.

It seems that every day we're hearing of something new going wrong. I'm concerned that these short-term enrollment problems could become long-term insurance market problems. My constituents already losing confidence the federal government's ability to pull this thing off and I think the only way to begin to restore their trust is to delay the individual mandate penalties until we're sure the system is going to work. It's not fair to penalize consumers when their non-compliance is not their fault. We also need to take the time to make sure additional fits and starts won't cause larger problems. Right now I'm less concerned about who's to blame and more concerned about what went wrong and how to fix it and how we're going to ensure it doesn't happen again.

Nearly all of our constituents want and need health insurance. It would be a huge mistake if we're so blinded by our love or our hatred for Obamacare that we miss the opportunities to address its flaws.

Now to the subject of technical problems becoming market problems, can problems of folks getting into the system snowball into risk pool problems where those who choose not to enroll can actually affect the costs of those who do choose to enroll? SEBELIUS: Certainly a risk pool needs a balanced market. So you need people who are older and sicker to be balanced with people who are younger and healthier, that's how a pool works.

BARROW: At what point are we going to see a problem having the risk pool if the tech problems cause -- affect the folks who are entering?

What are we going to look for? What are we going to use to decide something needs to be done?

SEBELIUS: Well, again, sir, we will be monitoring during the six months of open enrollment as will our insurance partners who is coming into the pool; that's why we want to give this committee and others reliable, informed data about not only who it is but what the demographics are and where they live. That's part of our...

BARROW: If things aren't better by the end of this next month, at what point are we going to start thinking about further delays in posing penalties?

SEBELIUS: Well, again, I think that having a defined open enrollment period is one of the ways that you then make an assessment if you have a pool that works or not. You cannot have an unlimited open enrollment period with any insurance company because that really doesn't work.

BARROW: Thank you.

UPTON: Mr. McKinley.

MCKINLEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Last week -- last week the CGI representative at Campbell said that she had met her contract obligations and met specifications and she said the only problem she had was with pace. But the pace wasn't part of the specification.

Do you -- and we asked her, what you were -- you would testify to, did -- she said you would testify that she did complete her contract in accordance with the specifications.

Would you?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I don't think until the product is working the way it's designed to work that anybody has finished their job. And that's really my interest.

MCKINLEY: I'm so sorry, with time, you know, they've shortened our time with it.

So, if she hasn't met -- she hasn't met their specifications but yet we're still using her, so is the American taxpayer still paying the money to fix the problems that she didn't do -- her company didn't do in the first...

SEBELIUS: None of our contractors have been paid the amount...

MCKINLEY: Will she be paid for this work into the future as we go to correct this problem?

SEBELIUS: We will make that determination as the work goes forward. I would tell you sir that as we learn what needs to be fixed, how long it takes, we'll know more about...

(CROSSTALK)

MCKINLEY: I'm very sorry about the timeframe, but cut it down.

Who owns the software now, that now that we've -- this has been developed with taxpayer money to develop the software to do this...

SEBELIUS: It is owned by the Centers for Medicaid and Medicare Services.

MCKINLEY: So it's all owned by us? OK.

Will they be able to use it by a license with -- for other clients?

SEBELIUS: Not to my knowledge. I think it is...

MCKINLEY: Maybe (inaudible)...

SEBELIUS: ... specifically designed for the marketplace with these products in mind.

MCKINLEY: Then last questions are trying to...

SEBELIUS: And the clients are the American public.

MCKINLEY: ... that under IV and V, and she testified that she thought that was something we should have done. Under HHS, you recommend or the HHS recommends that for software development, that they should have an independent verification and validation program.

But it wasn't used in this case.

Can you share with us in the time that's gone why we didn't use IV and V on something as crucial...

SEBELIUS: Again, I don't think that's accurate, sir. At every point along the way there is independent testing.

MCKINLEY: Independent?

SEBELIUS: Yes and outside...

MCKINLEY: You recommended verification and validation not someone within your staff?

SEBELIUS: Pardon me? There is a level of company self-attested testing. There is a level of CMS testing and then there is an independent test on each piece of the contracting.

(CROSSTALK)

MCKINLEY: (OFF-MIKE) acknowledged that it wasn't done independently, and that's what the...

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Gentleman's time...

MCKINLEY: It needs to be done independently, people who do not have...

UPTON: ... has expired.

SEBELIUS: No, it -- I'll get you the information, but there are three levels of testing, one of them is independent for every piece of this contracting, yes.

UPTON: Ms. Castor.

CASTOR: Good morning.

When open enrollment began a few weeks ago the people back home in Florida who are helping neighbors sort through the new options for coverage, the navigators, were taken aback by how grateful people are to have new pathway to the doctor's office and the care they need.

Affordable options.

The -- they are no longer being discriminated against because they had cancer, and diabetes or asthma. They are very grateful. They said -- they said to me directly, it's like they found water in the desert.

Right now they are surprisingly -- they said it's taking time, because people want to sort through all of these options before they finally sign up at the end of the 26-week enrollment period. So we must fix the marketplace. We must to meet their expectations and we have high expectations for you and the administration.

But I think it's important to point out the Affordable Care Act is more than just a website. It -- despite all the obstruction by Republicans in my home state of Florida, nationally, the -- even going so far as to shut down the government, millions of Americans are already benefiting and there are benefits that are not tied to healthcare.gov.

Some Madam Secretary, let's clarify what's working despite healthcare.gov.

Is it correct to say many of the improvements that the ACA makes to employer coverage and Medicare were the vast majority of Americans receive their coverage are not dependent on healthcare.gov.

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

CASTOR: And -- so the delays and problems with healthcare.gov do not affect the millions of individuals thanks to the ACA who no longer have to worry about lifetime monetary caps on their coverage that previously sent them to bankruptcy?

SEBELIUS: That's absolutely true. And I think the quote that the president was quoted recently saying, "If you have health care, you can -- you don't have to sign up for the new marketplace," was referring to the large portion -- the 95 percent of insured Americans who plans are solid and stay in place and move forward.

CASTOR: And I understand the frustration with the website. What I don't know why people are not similarly outraged by the lack of Medicaid coverage in many of our states.

Do you find that hypocritical?

(LAUGHTER)

SEBELIUS: Well, I think it's very troubling that millions of low income working Americans will still have no affordable option if states don't take advantage of the expansion program leaving states bearing the cost of uncompensated care, families bearing the cost of parents who can't take care of their kids, workers not able to go to work and people still accessing care through emergency room doors, the most expensive, least effective kind of care they could get.

UPTON: Gentlelady's time has expired.

Mr. Gardner?

GARDNER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And thank you, , Secretary Sebelius, for being here. Here's my letter. This is the letter my family got canceling our insurance. We chose to have our own private policy back in Colorado so we could be in the same boat as everyone of my constituents. And yet my insurance policy has been canceled. The White House website says if you like your health plan you have, you can keep it.

Did I hear it wrong?

SEBELIUS: Again, sir, I don't know how long you've had your policy...

GARDNER: Why aren't you losing your insurance?

SEBELIUS: Pardon me?

GARDNER: Why aren't you losing your health insurance?

SEBELIUS: Because I'm part of the federal employees...

GARDNER: Why aren't you in the exchange? You're in charge of this law, correct, why aren't you in the exchange?

SEBELIUS: Because I'm part of the federal employee health benefit plan.

GARDNER: Why aren't you in the -- why won't you go into the exchange? You're a part of this law. You're literally in charge of this law. Should you be any different than all of the other Americans out there losing their health insurance?

SEBELIUS: I'm part of the 95 percent with affordable available health care coverage.

GARDNER: You're part of a plan that most Americans aren't (sic) available to them. Why will you not agree...

SEBELIUS: I'm not eligible for the exchange, because I have coverage in...

GARDNER: You can decide to drop your coverage of your employer. You have the choice to decide not to choose...

SEBELIUS: That the not true, sir.

GARDNER: I chose not to go...

SEBELIUS: Members of Congress are now part of the exchange thanks to an amendment that was added by Congress, but I'm not eligible.

GARDNER: Madam Secretary, with all due respect...

SEBELIUS: If I have affordable coverage in my workplace, I'm not eligible to go into the marketplace, that's part of the law.

GARDNER: Madam Secretary, I would encourage you to be just like the American people and enter the exchange and agree to find a way...

(APPLAUSE)

SEBELIUS: It's illegal.

GARDNER: .. and I would like to show you an advertisement that's going on in Colorado right now.

This is an advertisement that a board member of the Colorado exchange has put forward, do you agree with this kind of advertising for Obamacare?

SEBELIUS: I can't see it. And again...

GARDNER: It's a college student doing a keg stand.

SEBELIUS: If the Colorado exchange did that...

GARDNER: Do you approve of this kind of advertising?

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: ... they are a state based marketplace.

GARDNER: Do you approve of this kind of advertising?

SEBELIUS: I don't see it. I don't know what it is, and I did not approve it. This is a state based marketplace...

GARDNER: That's a pretty big font. That's a pretty big picture of a keg and you can't see it?

SEBELIUS: Do I approve of it? I've...

GARDNER: You have the ability to opt out, by the way, as a federal employee. You could take the insurance. So I just...

SEBELIUS: If I have available employer based coverage...

GARDNER: I would also like to submit a waiver for my district from Obamacare and hope you consider waiving Obamacare for the Fourth Congressional District.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

(UNKNOWN): Does your policy cover -- never mind.

(LAUGHTER)

UPTON: Mr. Matheson?

MATHESON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And, Madam Secretary, thanks for your time.

I just want to ask on the issue of the fixes to healthcare.gov, we've had a lot of conversation about that today and we've talked about confidence levels for being ready by a certain time. But, I think one question that a lot of us have is, can you define what the magnitude of the problem is? Is there a scale or metric by which we can understand how bad this is today, and how we're going to get to where we go to have it fixed?

SEBELIUS: Well, again, sir, I've been informed that the problems are in -- the reports I've seen are really in two areas.

They are in the performance area, which is speed and reliability. It's too slow and doesn't have reliable transfers and in functionality, there are parts of the system that don't make accurate transfers.

So we have done an extensive assessment. They are prioritized, as I indicated earlier. One of the priorities is the enrollment features, which pass individual information to the companies where they want to enroll. That is not reliable at this point. The companies are not getting accurate data. So it's an example of the kind of thing we know we need to fix.

MATHESON: And is there a way to -- if you set up metrics figure out if we're making progress in terms of fixing those issues with speed and performance and functionality.

SEBELIUS: Again, with the team and Jeff Zients at the head of it, reporting to Marilyn, there are definitely a comprehensive set of issues going forward that will be measured and accelerated.

MATHESON: Do you have target dates along the way if you want to meet the November 30th time -- assume it's functional of what you want -- do you have target or metrics along the way to make sure you're on the path?

SEBELIUS: My understanding is, yes, there are sort of groups of targets that fixes that can be loaded together. It isn't one at a time. So they don't take days, but they are try being to determine with a specific path, one of the charges that QSSI has, really looking at the umbrella of what needs to be fixed, prioritizing them, figuring out what destabilizes if something else is fixed, how they can be grouped together. And that report will be in later next week.

UPTON: Gentleman's time is expired.

Mr. Pompeo?

POMPEO: Great, thank you.

Thank you for coming, , Secretary Sebelius.

I would like to talk about Kansas a little bit today.

Much like with some of my colleagues have made references to the "Wizard of Oz", I don't think anybody not from Kansas should be able to do Oz allegories. But, my story -- the way I think about it, is those folks worked awful hard to go down the yellow brick road. At the end of the day, when they got there and pulled back the curtain, they found there was nothing they didn't already have.

And as we pull back the curtain on the Affordable Care Act, I think people are finding it's not exactly what they're gonna have worked so hard to find their way too as well.

I want to talk about two stories. There's this commitment, if you like your plan you can keep it. I have a letter I'll submit for the record, from Mr. Breeto (ph) in Kansas. You might know him. I saw him the other night in Benton.

He got the following letter from Blue Cross Blue Shield that says, "Because your current plan does not offer the benefits standard specified you'll be discontinued on December 31st," and this says good news. And then there's a group of folks, Pizza Hut -- you know the company from Kansas, franchisees founded there -- lots of folks have now taken employees, families who are working there, and they've gone from having full-time jobs to part-time jobs. So they aren't able to keep the health care plan they had either and the one they wanted.

POMPEO: What do you tell -- why -- why were the plans that these folks had good enough when you were the insurance commissioner in Kansas and when you were -- Kansas as governor, but those plans today aren't good enough for those hard-working Kansas families?

SEBELIUS: Sir, I would tell you, in the roles I had the honor of serving of in Kansas, I worked every day to try and eliminate some of the discriminatory features of the insurance industry that finally, with the Affordable Care Act, are gone. My successor and elected insurance Republican commissioner Sandy Praeger and I worked on a whole series of plans to expand coverage.

So I did work on these issues. We were not able to necessarily...

(CROSSTALK)

POMPEO: So you -- you -- to use your words, you say these were -- I think you said "lousy" plans. And Ms. Tavenner said "not true insurance." Do you think that the plans that were offered when you were the insurance commissioner weren't true insurance?

SEBELIUS: In the individual market, the insurance commissioner in Kansas and virtually every place in the country does not have regulatory authority...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: ... over the plan. There's a lot...

(CROSSTALK)

POMPEO: ... a yes-or-no question: Were they true insurance plans when you were the insurance commissioner?

SEBELIUS: A lot of them are not true insurance plans, no.

POMPEO: Thank you. I yield back.

UPTON: Gentleman from Vermont, Mr. Welch.

WELCH: Thank you.

I'm gonna try to just summarize quickly what I've been hearing. Number one, the website must be fixed. You've been very forthright, and you're gonna fix it. Number two, I'm hearing a tone change. We've had a real battle about health care. We had a battle in this Congress. It was passed. The president signed it. The Supreme Court affirmed it -- a really brutal battle. There was an election where the American people affirmed it. And then the last-gasp effort was the shutdown and the threat of debt default.

But what I'm hearing today is that there are problems and people want to fix 'em because all of us represent people who are gonna win or lose depending on how effectively this is rolled out.

Third, there's some significant question about existing insurance policies, what the president said and so on. But let's acknowledge something: A lot of insurance companies were ripping off innocent American people by promising them insurance until they got sick, and then it got canceled because they, quote, "had a pre-existing condition," that wasn't, quote, "disclosed." That's gotta end.

The challenge for us going forward is to make health care affordable.

So Madam Secretary, my question is, is there any indication that there's been a slowing of premium increases as a result of the Affordable Care Act? Because unless we can keep those premium increases down -- they can't rise faster than the rate of inflation, wages and profits -- all of us are gonna lose.

SEBELIUS: Well, I would say, the trends in the private market over the last three and a half years are that cost increases have slowed down, are rising at a lower rate than the decades before. And in fact, in this individual market, the old individual market, the typical increase was 16 percent year in and year out rate increase. And often that came with additional medical underwriting. So it gives a sense of how the costs were.

We know that Medicare costs are down. We know that Medicaid costs actually had a decrease per capita last year, not an increase per capita, and underlying health care costs are down.

These rates in the new marketplace have come in about 16 percent lower on average than was projected -- not by us but by the Congressional Budget Office.

And we know that in many of these markets, they're much more competitive. I believe in market competitiveness. That actually drives down rates. The states where the most companies are participating have the lowest rates. And new companies have come in significantly below the old monopoly companies that often dominated this individual marketplace.

So we're on a pathway. Are we there? No. But you're absolutely right, affordable coverage, at the end of the day, for everybody is the goal.

WELCH: OK. I yield back.

Thank you, Madam Secretary.

UPTON: Madam Secretary, I'm trying to make sure that you're out of here by 12:30 before we start the second round of questions.

(LAUGHTER)

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: Mr. Kinzinger?

SEBELIUS: That was a joke, right?

(LAUGHTER)

KINZINGER: I see -- I see sheer panic.

Madam Secretary, thank you for being here.

You stated earlier to Mr. Harper that you give the president regular updates on the marketplace. The president stated that he knew nothing about the status and functionality of the marketplace. How often, and what were the subjects of those updates?

SEBELIUS: Well, I think there were a series of regular meetings with the president, with some of our federal partners, with offices of the White House from the OMB to others on a monthly basis giving reports on policy and where we were going. None of those, I would say, involved (ph) detailed operational discussions. That wasn't the level. It was, are we coming together, do we have companies...

KINZINGER: Sure.

SEBELIUS: ... do we have plans.

KINZINGER: And I understand that. I mean, obviously, when it comes to the president of the United States, certain level of details you have to see at kind of a 10,000 foot, 20,000 foot overview. But in terms of the actual functionality, whether it's the website or the marketplace, he was legitimately caught off guard on October...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Well, I assured him, and -- that we were ready to go. Everyone knew with a big plan that there were likely to be some problems. No one...

KINZINGER: OK.

SEBELIUS: ... anticipated this level of problem (ph).

KINZINGER: And just second -- a quick question. Where is HHS getting the money to pay for these fixes? Is it coming from other HHS accounts? Have you used your transfer authority to move money from non-ACA programs to pay for the cost of implementing the president's health care program? And if so, from which programs have you drawn money to help with the fix that's not ACA-related?
SEBELIUS: Well, as you know, Congressman, it's been two years since we've had a budget at HHS. And we also have not had at the president's requested implementation budget authorized by the Congress. Each of those years we have used not only resources internally but I do have legal transfer authority that I've used and a non-recurring expense fund. We will get you all the details of that...

(CROSSTALK)

KINZINGER: Great. Thank you. So the answer is yes, though, there is some non-ACA money being transferred and used for the implementation of...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: There is money that is specifically designed for either outreach and education, so the health centers have hired education and outreach people as part of their outreach for health personnel. I would say it's -- it's definitely a related cause to get expanded health care.

KINZINGER: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

UPTON: Mr. Sarbanes?

SARBANES: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Madam Secretary, for being here.

My understanding is that a lot of the -- the companies, insurers that have been offering plans in the individual market, the ones who are sending out these notices, are actually repositioning themselves in the health insurance exchange to offer alternative plans. Is that correct?

SEBELIUS: Yes.

SARBANES: And in addition to -- to those insurers who've been in the individual market (inaudible) have a lot of other companies and insurers providing plans in the health insurance market?

SEBELIUS: That is true.

SARBANES: So the way I look at this is -- you know, I went to buy Oriole tickets awhile back when the season was still under way, and I was standing in line. And I got up to the ticket window and they closed the window. But I didn't have to go home because they opened another window a few feet away.

So essentially what's happening is people are coming up on the renewal period. They're getting up to the window of the individual market. They're being told, well, that window's closed but if you go right down the line here there's another window that's open. And by the way, when you get there, you'll get better coverage potentially at reduced premiums. And if you go down to window 3 there's some subsidies that may also be available to you.

So this notion that people are being turned away from an affordable product that provides good, quality care is preposterous. And in fact they're being steered to a place where they can get good, quality coverage, in many instances much better than the coverage that they had before, at an affordable rate that is supported by the subsidies that can be available to many, many people. This is -- this is what's so promising about the Affordable Care Act.

And so I think it's important for people to understand that that window's not being shut. They're just being steered someplace else where they can get a good opportunity.

SEBELIUS: And I think the first option for those companies is to say, 'We'd like to keep you here, and here are the plans we're offering.' But to be fair, customers will now have an opportunity to look across a landscape, which they couldn't before. They will have entry into those other windows, which many of them didn't have before with a pre-existing condition.

And as you say, about 50 percent of this market will have financial help in purchasing health insurance, which none of them had before.

UPTON: Gentleman's time expired.

Mr. Griffith?

GRIFFITH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Earlier in your testimony here today you said a couple times, "plans we enjoy but then," as you noticed with Mr. Gardner's eloquent testimony, that we're not going to be in the same plan that you're in after January 1.

I was one of those who thought it was a good idea as a part of a proposal that was floating around the halls here in Congress that the president and Cabinet secretaries ought to also be in the marketplace and not have a special federal plan that -- that you will have after January 1, but we will not. The president, while that was being discussed, issued a veto threat.

Did you discuss the veto threat with the president before he made it? And have you discussed it with him since then? Yes or no on the first?

SEBELIUS: No, sir.

GRIFFITH: No.

And then I would have to ask you, relating back to the contractors involved in this, CGI told us that the Spanish Web site was ready to go, that they thought everything was ready, just as they did with the regular site. And, obviously, that didn't prove out. But that they were told not to implement it.

Likewise, the shop-and-browse section was ready to go.

Do you think that they were misleading this committee when they made those comments?

SEBELIUS: I think what they believed is that that product independent of the entire operational site was ready and tested. What -- a determination was made -- I was involved with the Spanish Web site and the Medicaid transfers to say, let's minimize the risk for the whole site, let's load a week later.

GRIFFITH: But that raises the next question up, because one of the -- of the other contractors, QSSI, I believe it was, indicated to us that -- that part of the problem was that, once you took away the ability to browse, everybody had to go through the business of setting up an account, and you stopped -- or CMS stopped one of the browsing options as well, and that that actually contributed to the logjam and contributed to the problems.

So, isn't it -- is he correct on that, that not allowing people just to look without having to sign up, wouldn't that have made it easier for the American people?

SEBELIUS: In hindsight, I think that probably would have been advantageous, I can tell you that the reason the decision was made going forward was to minimize risk, that didn't work so well.

But adding additional features that didn't involve people actually wanting to get to what they would independently pay and what they would qualify for and what the plans were, seemed to be things that could be added down the road. It was wrong.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Bilirakis?

BILIRAKIS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate it very much,

Thank you, Madam Secretary, for testifying today.

Madam Secretary, over the weekend, the New York Times wrote the following, "Project managers at the Department of Health and Human Services assured the White House that any remaining problems could be worked out once the Web site went live. But other senior officials predicted serious trouble and advised delaying the rollout."

Can you confirm if this is true? Did any senior department official predict serious problems? And did any senior department officials advise delaying the rollout of the exchanges or parts of the exchanges on October 1st? Could you...

SEBELIUS: I can tell you that no senior official reporting to me ever advised me that we should delay. You heard from the contractors on the 24th that none of them advised a delay. We have testing that did not advise a delay. So not -- not to my knowledge.

BILIRAKIS: Did they indicate to you that there were serious problems?

SEBELIUS: They indicated to me that we would always have risks, because this system is brand-new and no one has operated a system like this before to any degree.

So, we always knew that there would be the possibility that some things would go wrong. No one indicated that this could possibly go this wrong.

BILIRAKIS: Can you name some of these officials that gave you the advice, that there were serious problems?

SEBELIUS: Again, I -- we had series of meetings with teams from CMS. I was always advised that there is always a risk with a new product and a new site, but never suggested that we delay the launch of October 1st, nor did our contracting partners ever suggest that to us.

BILIRAKIS: Thank you, Madam Secretary.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Appreciate it. I yield back.

UPTON: Mr. Johnson?

JOHNSON: Madam Secretary, thank you for being here with us today. CMS was the integrator of the Web site prior to and leading up to the 1 October rollout...

SEBELIUS: That's correct.

JOHNSON: Correct?

You've testified you've now hired an outside company to serve as the integrator...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: One of the contractors has taken on an additional role...

JOHNSON: Who is that company?

SEBELIUS: QSSI.

JOHNSON: QSSI.

SEBELIUS: Who built the hub.

JOHNSON: OK.

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

JOHNSON: This is the same company that told our committee last week that they were not only the developer of the hub and the pipeline, but also an independent tester of the system.

SEBELIUS: Yes.

JOHNSON: You've acknowledged in your testimony today that inadequate testing played a significant role in this failed launch, so aren't you concerned that QSSI has lost its ability to be an objective independent arbitrator in addressing the problems that plague the system now? Because they're part of the tester, part of the developer, part of the problem.

SEBELIUS: No, I haven't lost my -- my confidence in them. I think the testing that they did is validating the pieces of the equipment. What we've said since the launch is that we did not do adequate end-to-end testing.

JOHNSON: OK.

SEBELIUS: That was not the QSSI responsibility.

JOHNSON: All right. And in this new role as integrator, are you going to be paying QSSI more than they were to be paid under their original contract? I -- I would expect with this expanded role they're going to get paid more, right?

SEBELIUS: That discussion is under way in terms of what the role will entail, what the outlines are, yes, sir.

JOHNSON: OK. Well, hard-working American taxpayers have already paid for this implementation once. Do you think it's fair to ask taxpayers to pay more so that QSSI can now attempt to do something that Administrator Tavenner and her CMS team were unable to do right the first time?

SEBELIUS: Well, sir, I think the American taxpayers expect us to get the site up and running. As I told you earlier...

JOHNSON: Oh, I'm certain that they did. They expected it the first time.

SEBELIUS: I understand, and so did I. We have not expended the funds that have been encumbered for the contracts. We have not -- and we will monitor every dime we spend from here on in, and re-audit things that are going forward.

JOHNSON: Well, with that, Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

UPTON: The gentleman yields back.

Mr. Long?

LONG: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you, Secretary, for being here today and giving your testimony.

Earlier today, you said that "I'm responsible for the implementation of the Affordable Care Act." I've heard you referred to, and maybe yourself, as the point person for the rollout, the architect of implementing Affordable Care Act. So you are kind of the president's point person, are you not, for this rollout?

SEBELIUS: Yes, sir.

LONG: I -- earlier, you were asked, and there's a lot of things striking about the rollout of this and about the Affordable Care Act altogether. But the thing that's most striking to me is that when we have the point person for the rollout here, and you're not going in to the exchange.

Now, I've heard you say that, and you got some advice from the folks behind you, but I'm asking you today: Can you tell the American public, if your advisers behind you, that if they happen to have given you some wrong information, if it is possible for you to go into the exchange like all these millions of Americans that are going with the exchanges, will you commit to forego your government insurance plan that you're on now and join us in the pool? Come on in. The water's fine. All the congressmen, all of our staff have to go into the exchanges.

We have to go into the D.C. exchanges. And I will say that I tried to get on the website. I was successful during the hearing earlier, and I got to the D.C. exchange, which is where I have to buy from, I got part way through. And then when it got to the point to enter my Social Security number, I could not bring myself to do that, from what I've heard from people like John McAfee and folks about the security.

Will you tell, if your advisers are wrong, and it is possible for you -- I'm not saying it is -- but if it is, if it's possible for you to forego your government program you have now? Will you tell the American public that, "Yes, I will go into the exchanges next year like everyone else"?

SEBELIUS: Sir, the way the law is written... LONG: It's a yes or no -- I'm -- let's say that you're wrong on that. Yes or no, if -- if you're wrong, will you? Yes or no?

SEBELIUS: But I don't want to give misinformation to the American public...

LONG: You what?

SEBELIUS: ... who may be -- I don't want to give misinformation. If you have affordable coverage...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: I want you to go home and research it. If -- if you're wrong...

SEBELIUS: ... if you have affordable coverage...

LONG: ... will you go into the exchanges?

SEBELIUS: I -- if I'm...

LONG: If you can, will you? That's a yes or no. If you can, will you?

SEBELIUS: I will take a look at it. I don't have any idea...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: That's not an answer. That's not a yes or no.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

LONG: You're the architect of the whole program and you won't go into it with the rest of the American public.

SEBELIUS: I did not say that, sir. I think it's illegal for me to...

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: If it's not illegal. If it's legal, will you go in?

(CROSSTALK)

WAXMAN: Mr. Chairman? Mr. Chairman?

(CROSSTALK)

LONG: Come on in, the water's fine.

UPTON: The gentleman's time has expired.

WAXMAN: I have a unanimous consent request. I'd like to -- Madam Secretary, I'd like you to answer for the record. If you were able to do what the gentleman just suggested or follow the recommendation of Cory Gardner, our colleague from Colorado, and went into the bought -- to buy an individual policy, would you be able to find one that would protect you from cheap shots? Or do you think that has to be mandated for coverage?

(LAUGHTER)

I'll leave the record open for your response.

UPTON: Yeah, we'll wait for that response to come back.

SEBELIUS: I would gladly join the exchange if I didn't have affordable coverage in my workplace. I would gladly join it. And the D.C. market is an independent state-based market, even though D.C. is not a state. We do not run the D.C. market in the federal marketplace.

UPTON: The gentlelady from North Carolina, Ms. Ellmers?

ELLMERS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I have a couple of questions. Thank you for being with us today, Madam Secretary.

I'd like to go to the issue that has been raised by my colleagues on the left here about accurate information. Number one, I've heard the issue of Medicare Part D brought up many, many times. Although my colleagues all voted no against it initially, now they're extolling the virtues of Medicare Part D.

Is Medicare Part D a mandate or is it voluntary?

SEBELIUS: It is voluntary.

ELLMERS: It is a voluntary program.

SEBELIUS: Yes.

ELLMERS: That's the first accurate -- piece of accurate information I would like to get.

You know, we're asking or we're actually forcing millions of Americans to go to find a health care premium in some way, whether it's to go to the exchange or whether they are to be insured.

ELLMERS: Many of my constituents are reaching out to me, those with individual policies, and they are saying to me that my -- my rates are going up 400 percent; my rates are going up 127 percent. These are my constituents.

Now, you know, we're talking about open enrollment, but it's forcing the issue, is it not, that if an American does not have health care coverage, they are essentially breaking the law. Is that not correct?

SEBELIUS: If someone can afford coverage and has that option and chooses not to buy coverage, they will pay a fee on their (inaudible) next year's tax.

(CROSSTALK)

ELLMERS: And it is a law, so therefore they are breaking the law.

(CROSSTALK)

ELLMERS: OK. You also brought up the issue when you were in Kansas, that you fought against discriminatory -- discriminatory issues. Now, I, you know, as far as the essential health benefits, correct me if I'm wrong, do men not have to buy maternity coverage?

SEBELIUS: Policies will cover maternity coverage for the young and healthy.

ELLMERS: Including men.

SEBELIUS: Under 30-year-olds will have a choice also of a catastrophic plan which has no maternity coverage.

ELLMERS: The catastrophic, but the men are required to purchase maternity...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Well, an insurance policy has a series of benefits whether you use them or not. And one of the benefits will be maternity coverage, mental health coverage...

(CROSSTALK)

ELLMERS: And that is why the health care premiums are increasing because we're forcing them to buy things that they will never need.

Thank you, Madam Chairman.

SEBELIUS: The individual policies cover families. Men often do need maternity coverage for their spouses and for their families. Yes.

ELLMERS: Single male, age 32, does not need maternity coverage. To the best of your knowledge...

(CROSSTALK)

ELLMERS: ... has a man ever delivered a baby?

UPTON: The gentlelady's time has expired.

(LAUGHTER)

The gentlelady, Ms. Cathy McMorris Rodgers?

MCMORRIS RODGERS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And Madam Secretary, you know, although we were told repeatedly that if you liked your health insurance plan, you'd be able to keep it. We're now being told by the government that they have determined many existing plans to be lousy, sub-par.

In reality, this law is becoming quickly less about helping Americans purchase affordable coverage and more about compelling millions of Americans into a struggling Medicaid program.

In my home state of Washington, 90 percent of enrollees will be in Medicaid; 16,000 of them coming into a program that they were already eligible for; Colorado, 89 percent; Kentucky, two-thirds; Maryland, 97 percent. And this is -- these are states that are already struggling with their budgets, wondering how they're going to cover Medicaid, which is, as we all know, for the most vulnerable population.

So isn't it true that in states like Washington, they're going to have new, unexpected costs associated with a dramatic influx into Medicaid?

SEBELIUS: Well, Congresswoman, the Medicaid expansion provision of the Affordable Care Act is...

MCMORRIS RODGERS: Could you -- are states going to face new costs...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Federal government pays 100 percent of the costs of newly insured for the first three years, and gradually reduces...

(CROSSTALK) MCMORRIS RODGERS: These are existing -- these were people that were already eligible. And we know that two out of three doctors don't accept new Medicaid patients. We know that current provider rates are going to drop at the end of 2014. So isn't it true that existing Medicare -- Medicaid enrollees are going to further compete for scarce resources in these states?

SEBELIUS: If the citizens of Washington who are signing up were eligible for Medicaid, they certainly will be entitled to enroll in Medicaid now. The newly insured will be fully paid for. The doctors have additional...

(CROSSTALK)

MCMORRIS RODGERS: I'm concerned that the most vulnerable in this country are going to lack access to the care that they think they're going to receive. And I know time is short...

(CROSSTALK)

SEBELIUS: Well, I think that's absolutely true. And in states that are choosing not to expand Medicaid, it's particularly dire. So I would love to work with you on that...

(CROSSTALK)

MCMORRIS: It's existing Medicaid. Finally, I just wanted to inform the secretary, you told us several hours ago when the hearing started, that the website was down. If you look at the screen several hours later, healthcare.gov is still down. You promised the system would be ready on October 1st. You're clearly wrong.

So before I leave you today, I would just impress upon you this is more than a broken website. This is a broken law. Millions of Americans are getting notices their plans are being canceled.

(CROSSTALK)

UPTON: The gentlelady's time is expired.

I just -- I would do a couple of things here. First, I'm going to ask unanimous consent that the written opening statements for any member on the committee be introduced into the record. And without objection, the documents will be there.

I also would ask unanimous consent to put the document binder and other documents presented to the secretary during questioning into the record. Without objection, so ordered.

Let me just say in conclusion, we do look forward to having you back in December to get an update on where we are. And we'll work with your schedule to find a right time and date early that -- that week.

I want you to know we're going to want real numbers. You'll have them by then. Is that right, in terms of the signup? You'll have them in the next couple of weeks.

SEBELIUS: That's correct. We'll have them by mid-November.

UPTON: We look forward to getting those done.

We appreciate -- we really do appreciate your time this morning to take questions. I apologize to all the members who we had to shorten the time, but those things happen when we have this much interest. And we look forward to continuing to get an update and look for your continued work.

WAXMAN: Mr. Chairman?

UPTON: Yes?

WAXMAN: From our side of the aisle, we want to work with you. And I would hope on the other side of the aisle, they would take that same approach. Let's do something constructive, not just negative attacks against a bill that I think is going to be a God-send for millions of Americans.

Thank you for being here.

SEBELIUS: Thank you.

UPTON: Thank you.

The hearing is adjourned.

LUJAN QUESTIONS HHS SECRETARY SEBELIUS ON AFFORDABLE CARE ACT

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 892 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District and a member of the Energy and Commerce Committee participated in a hearing today in which Health and Human Services Secretary Kathleen Sebelius testified on the Affordable Care Act. Below is a transcript of Lujan's exchange with the Secretary, in which they discussed important consumer protections under the law and their commitment to preventing and combating fraud.

Lujan: Madam Secretary, I was intrigued by a line of questioning by Congressman [Gene] Green asking questions about the individual marketplace. How volatile was the individual marketplace before the Affordable Care Act became law?

Sebelius: I would say it wasn't a marketplace at all. It was unprotected, unregulated, and people were really on their own.

Lujan: Madam Secretary, the Kaiser Family Foundation reports that over 50 percent churn - out of individuals that have coverage in the individual market - churn out of coverage every year. They lose coverage, they are priced out, or drop it. Is that consistent with what you are aware of?

Sebelius: That is an accurate snapshot. About a third of the people are in for about 6 months and over half are in for a year or less.

Lujan: So individuals that were in the individual marketplace before the passage of the Affordable Care Act did not have the same protections as those that were in group coverage?

Sebelius: That's true.

Lujan: And would those individuals in the individual marketplace sometimes have higher copays?

Sebelius: Higher copays, unlimited out-of-pocket costs for often coverage that was medically underwritten or excluded whatever medical condition they had in the first place.

Lujan: So these were typically one-year contracts. If they use the plan because they got sick or in a car accident or a victim of domestic violence, sometimes they would be thrown off their plan or their rates would go up?

Sebelius: Yes.

Lujan: I think that's important to note, Madam Secretary. And I'm intrigued, as well, that my understanding is last month HHS conducted an analysis that found that nearly 6 out of 10 uninsured Americans getting coverage through the marketplace will pay less than $100 per month. Is that correct?

Sebelius: They will have a plan available for less than $100 if that's their choice, yes.

Lujan: And that number would be even higher - would be better - if more states chose the option of using federal funds to expand Medicaid to cover their low-income population?

Sebelius: Very definitely. That's just a marketplace snapshot. Those are people who will be in the marketplace.

Lujan: Madam Secretary, I don't think that I've heard anyone from the other side of the aisle today, my Republican colleagues, ask you, "How can Congress work with you and support you in fixing this website and fixing this problem." I hope that we all agree we want this website fixed. I would yield to anyone that would disagree. Seeing no one accepting that, I am glad to hear that we agree with this. Now Madam Secretary, what can Congress do to work with you to fix this website?

Sebelius: Well, I'm not sure that there is hands-on work that you can do; maybe we have some technical expertise. But I would say getting accurate information to constituents is helpful, letting people know that they can check out the facts in the law, that they may be entitled to some financial support, that cancelation of policies means that the policy they had may not exist but they have a lot of choices of new policies and a law that now says they must be insured in a new policy - that they don't have to be insured by their company at a higher price.

Lujan: I appreciate that Madam Secretary. Going back to the individual marketplace, Madam Secretary, did this Congress in previous years before the Affordable Care Act make it illegal for health insurance companies to raise rates on someone after they submitted a claim for going to the hospital or becoming sick or getting rid of pre-existing conditions.

Sebelius: No sir.

Lujan: Madam Secretary, one last note here. It seems that we've received some horrible news that there are bad actors already taking place - fraudulent websites that imitate the health care exchange or misleading seniors into disclosing their personal information. I've signed onto a letter to you, led by my colleague Representative Raul Ruiz out of California, to request that you prioritize fraud prevention efforts. What has the administration done to prevent these fraudulent acts and protect personal information?

Sebelius: I can tell you, Congressman, that the President felt very strongly that that needed to be part of our outreach effort, which is why the Attorney General and I convened representatives of state Attorneys General, Insurance Commissioners, the U.S. Attorneys, and the Justice Department, and the Federal Trade Commission - which has jurisdiction - to make sure that we first got out ahead some of this, developing consumer outreach. No one should ever give personal health information because personal health information is not needed for these policies any longer. That is as red flag. We want to make sure that people turn over potential fraudulent acts. We have put training in place for navigators. We have our law enforcement folks doing outreach.

New Mexico Dems: New Mexico's Congressional Democrats Welcome President's Disaster Declaration for September Floods

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 673 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, Congressman Ben Ray Lujan and Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham announced that President Obama has declared a major disaster for the state of New Mexico and Santa Clara Pueblo for the severe storms and flooding from September 9-22.

The declaration means the president has ordered federal aid to help state and local recovery efforts. The assistance will be available on a cost-sharing basis for damage to public infrastructure in Catron,

Chaves, Cibola, Colfax, Eddy, Guadalupe, Los Alamos, McKinley, Mora, Sandoval, San Miguel, Santa Fe, Sierra, Socorro, and Torrance counties. Federal funding will also be made available on a cost-sharing basis to assist with hazard mitigation statewide. A similar declaration was made for Santa Clara Pueblo, which made its own request for public assistance.

New Mexico's lawmakers on Oct. 22 jointly urged the president to respond quickly to separate requests for disaster assistance for the state of New Mexico and Santa Clara Pueblo. Historic, record-breaking rain across New Mexico during the September storms caused catastrophic flooding and damage in about two-thirds of the state.

"I want to thank the president for responding to our requests on behalf of the state and Santa Clara Pueblo," said Senator Udall, who toured storm damage in hard-hit Catron County last week. "This assistance is badly needed in communities that sustained severe damage to roads, bridges, dams and other structures. I saw the damage firsthand, and I appreciate this quick action to assist the state and Santa Clara Pueblo. I'm going to keep working to ensure the federal government fulfills its obligations to help with restoration in New Mexico's communities."

"I am pleased that President Obama has taken action and quickly responded to our requests for federal disaster assistance for the state and Santa Clara Pueblo," Senator Heinrich said. "Last month's severe storms and devastating floods caused community evacuations, landslides, and damaged critical infrastructure around the state. I will continue to work with my colleagues and the president to ensure that every community across New Mexico affected by severe flooding receives the assistance they need to rebuild and recover."

"I am pleased the President acted to make a disaster declaration for the State of New Mexico and Santa Clara Pueblo. This important declaration will make New Mexico and Santa Clara Pueblo eligible for vital funds to assist with critical repairs in the wake of severe storms and flooding that impacted communities across our state, as well as efforts to prepare for future emergencies," Congressman Lujan said.

"This declaration will provide federal resources to supplement the efforts of those on the ground who have been working day and night to recover and rebuild following September's devastating storms," Congresswoman Lujan Grisham said. "I'm proud to have worked with my colleagues in New Mexico's congressional delegation to help secure this important aid."

Across the state, flooding and landslides washed out roads and bridges, and several communities in Catron, Eddy and Sierra counties were completely isolated. Water control facilities in numerous counties were damaged, including many historic acequias, as well as drinking water systems in McKinley and Cibola counties. Significant damage also occurred on federal properties, among them the Los Alamos National Lab site and the Catwalk Trail in the Gila National Forest, which was washed out.

The Santa Clara Pueblo, which is downstream of land damaged in the 2011 Las Conchas Fire, has experienced severe flooding caused by runoff over the burn scar on multiple occasions in the years following the fire. Rains in July and again September 13-16 exacerbated the damage. The Pueblo lost water control facilities in the Santa Clara Canyon, and roads, bridges and homes were damaged.

Lujan Questions HHS Secretary Sebelius on Affordable Care Act

New Mexico Delegation Welcomes President's Disaster Declaration for September Floods

LENGTH: 729 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of the Senator Martin Heinrich, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Today, U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham announced that President Obama has declared a major disaster for the state of New Mexico and Santa Clara Pueblo for the severe storms and flooding from Sept. 9-22.

The declaration means the president has ordered federal aid to help state and local recovery efforts. "Last month's severe storms and devastating floods caused community evacuations, landslides, and damaged critical infrastructure around the state. I will continue to work with my colleagues and the president to ensure that every community across New Mexico affected by severe flooding receives the assistance they need to rebuild and recover."

"Since the first days of the flooding, my office has been actively working with affected communities," said Pearce. "Today's declaration opens up key resources to help New Mexico recover and move forward. My office is continuing to offer support to communities and individuals impacted by the flooding, and I remain committed to assisting in any way I can."

"I am pleased the President acted to make a disaster declaration for the State of New Mexico and Santa Clara Pueblo. This important declaration will make New Mexico and Santa Clara Pueblo eligible for vital funds to assist with critical repairs in the wake of severe storms and flooding that impacted communities across our state, as well as efforts to prepare for future emergencies," Luján said.

UDALL, HEINRICH, LUJAN CELEBRATE RESTORED ACCESS TO HISTORICAL CEMETERY FOR SAN JOAQUIN DEL RIO DE CHAMA LAND GRANT HEIR;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 946 words

SANTA FE, NM - U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and Congressman Ben Ray Lujan celebrated the restored access to the San Joaquin del Rio de Chama Land Grant's cemetery. On Saturday, October 26, Lujan along with staff from the two senators' offices joined the heirs to the land grant to mark the determination of the boundary for the cemetery that had inadvertently been considered part of Chama River Canyon Wildness Area since 1978.

"The history and culture of San Joaquin del Rio de Chama Land Grant are an important part of our state's heritage, and the land grant's cemetery was never intended to be a part of the Chama River Canyon Wilderness. I was proud to help facilitate an administrative agreement between the San Joaquin del Rio de Chama Land Grant heirs and the Forest Service, and I'm pleased that we were able to find a common-sense solution that respects and honors the land grant's history, culture and traditions," Senator Udall said. "This weekend, work on a path to the cemetery was begun, marking a historic moment for the San Joaquin del Rio de Chama Land Grant and the broader community. The gathering celebrated our collaboration, and it demonstrated what good can come when the federal government and our communities form partnerships and work for a common solution. I hope to continue to work with land grant communities and federal agencies to find sound solutions to historic conflicts."

"The San Joaquin del Rio de Chama Land Grant has a long and storied history in northern New Mexico and I am encouraged by this homegrown, collaborative effort to ensure that the community can better access the cemetery," said Senator Heinrich. "I am grateful to the members of the San Joaquin del Rio de Chama Land Grant, the U.S. Forest Service, and the local conservation community for working together to find this innovative solution."

"I am so pleased that years of hard work and cooperation have paid off as the heirs to the land grant will now be able to care for the cemetery and have increased access to land that has been a part of their history and heritage," said Congressman Lujan. "This was an historic moment that honors not only the past history of the San Joaquin del Rio de Chama Land Grant, but the present and future as well. The land grant heirs represent an important piece of the fabric of New Mexico and their culture and traditions are part of what make New Mexico such a special place. This was a collaborative effort and an example of what we can achieve when we all work together."

The San Joaquin del Rio de Chama Land Grant, the U.S. Forest Service, and the Wilderness Society also hailed the restored access of the cemetery to the land grant.

"Saturday was an historic day in the history of the land grant, as so many people came together to celebrate and contribute to the effort to construct a trail that will enable greater access to the cemetery," said Leonard Martinez, President of the San Joaquin del Rio de Chama Land Grant Association. "The widened path will allow the elderly of the merced to climb to the cemetery where their ancestors were buried over a century ago."

"The collaborative effort that took place to come to this win-win situation was unprecedented. The Forest Service looks forward to working with this and other land grants in the future on projects that help honor their rich history and traditions," said Maria Garcia, Forest Supervisor, Santa Fe National Forest.

"The Wilderness Society was proud to support this effort to clarify the status of the cemetery for the descendants of the San Joaquin del Rio de Chama Land Grant," said Michael Casaus, New Mexico State Director of The Wilderness Society. "This collaboration proves that when we focus on our shared values, we can work together to find solutions that result in protections for our land, culture and way of life."

The San Joaquin del Rio de Chama Land Grant is made up of descendants of the 39 original heirs to whom the land grant was given in 1806 by the Spanish Crown. The land grant is recognized as a political subdivision by the State of New Mexico. In 2011, Rep. Lujan began working with the land grant in an effort to seek increased access to its traditional cemetery that, at the time, was assumed to lie inside of the Chama River Canyon Wilderness Area bordering the boundaries of the historic land grant. Senators Udall and Heinrich later joined the effort, providing critical assistance that resulted in successfully restoring access to the cemetery for the land grant heirs.

For more than three decades, the land grant could not make necessary changes and improvements to maintain the cemetery's old graves and religious sites, and did not have motorized access. As a result of discussions with the congressional offices, the land grant heirs, and the U.S. Forest Service, a review of the maps outlining the wilderness boundary was conducted, and it was discovered that the wilderness boundary was never fully completed and surveyed. As a result, the cemetery was improperly included in the wilderness area. After realizing the mapping error, the Forest Service agreed that the wilderness boundaries should exclude the cemetery from the area without the need for congressional legislation that would have slowed the process. On Saturday, the land grant heirs marked their expanded access to the cemetery and began work to establish a new path to the cemetery for the families of those who established the settlement generations ago.

NM delegation applauds push for immigration law; Members optimistic about compromise

BYLINE: Michael Coleman Journal Washington Bureau

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. A4

LENGTH: 493 words

WASHINGTON - President Barack Obama's call Thursday for a renewed congressional push to overhaul the nation's immigration laws drew strong support from New Mexico's congressional delegation, including its only Republican.

"He (Obama) said, 'Let's do it now ... and let's do it in a bipartisan fashion,' and he's right," said Rep. Steve Pearce, a New Mexico Republican who represents the state's border with Mexico. "We cannot afford to wait. We can act now on the aspects of immigration reform we can all agree on. Let's fix our legal immigration system so that it doesn't take years to get an answer. Let's find effective ways to secure the border. Let's provide answers for the millions living here in fear and confusion."

Pearce is among House Republicans who would prefer a series of smaller legislative fixes instead of the comprehensive approachObama is seeking.

Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M. and a vice chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, also said the time is ripe to pass immigration reform. But he said it is up to House Republicans to make it happen.

"The Senate has passed a bill, House Democrats have introduced a bipartisan bill, and now it is up to Republican leaders in the House to give us a vote," Luján said. "This legislation is good for our economy, good for our families and good for our security. "

Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., said New Mexico would benefit significantly if Congress could move an immigration overhaul bill to the president's desk.

"In a border state like ours, we know how much we need meaningful reform to secure the border and keep our communities safe, bring the millions of undocumented people already living here out of the shadows, and provide a tough but fair path to earned citizenship that includes learning English and paying back taxes," Udall said. "Is it doable? Yes, I believe the House has a bipartisan majority in favor of comprehensive reform, and it can pass if House leaders are willing to put aside partisan politics."

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., also said she's optimistic about a compromise.

"Passingcomprehensive immigration reform is one of (Obama's) top priorities, and the same is true for many in Congress - both Democrats and Republicans," she said. "I am confident that the votes exist in the House of Representatives to pass this bill today - all that's left is for Speaker (of the House John) Boehner to allow a vote."

Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., said that the Senate has passed a reform bill and that now it's time for the Republican-controlled House to do the same.

"When it comes to fixing our nation's immigration system, the Senate has shown that compromise and bipartisanship are possible," Heinrich said. "Despite our differences, this is an issue on which both parties can come together and find common ground. With bipartisan support building in Congress and a president who is eager to solve the immigration problem, there is no reason we should not get this done this year."

New Mexico Dems: Congressman Ben Ray Lujan Backs Water Resources Bill that Enables Army Corps Projects

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 400 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District voted this week in support of H.R. 3080, the Water Resources Reform and Development Act (http://www.gpo.gov/fdsys/pkg/BILLS-113hr3080ih/pdf/BILLS-113hr3080ih.pdf). The bipartisan legislation authorizes funding for the Army Corps of Engineers for improvements to America's ports, waterways, and projects tied to flood protection and environmental restoration.

"While I would have preferred a bill that reflected the Senate-passed version that better allows the Army Corps of Engineers to properly manage our critical habitat, assess flood damage caused by the destruction of wildfires, and meet the vital needs of water infrastructure in New Mexico, this legislation provides the House with an opportunity to move forward toward a conference committee with the Senate," Congressman Lujan said. "Moving through the regular order to address the differences between the bills will enable Congress to produce legislation that will authorize important improvements to New Mexico's dams, rivers, and water infrastructure. I will encourage the conference committee to support the Senate language that addresses critical priorities for New Mexico."

Lujan offered several amendments to improve the House legislation that were not made in order by the Republican-led Rules Committee, and he will continue to advocate for vital programs such as the Rio Grande Environmental Management Program.

"One aspect that was left out of this bill that would have been addressed by one of my amendments is the extension of the Rio Grande Environmental Management Program," Lujan added. "The Rio Grande watershed is the fifth largest in North America, covering the states of Colorado, New Mexico, and Texas. My amendment would have extended the life of the project to 2024 and allowed the Army Corps of Engineers to assess flood damage reduction measures for floods in the aftermath of wildfires - fires that have turned our watershed and Rio Grande black with soot and debris. Assessing the damage done by fires is critical for us to understand how to deal with future challenges. I am hopeful that when the House and Senate works out the differences on this bill that the reauthorization of this important program will be included."

Lujan Grisham seeks services for vets; Legislation covers assisted living

BYLINE: Michael Coleman Journal Washington Bureau

SECTION: METRO & NEW MEXICO; Pg. C2

LENGTH: 462 words

WASHINGTON - Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., introduced bipartisan legislation Wednesday that would make assisted living services available to thousands more American veterans.

The Veterans Affairs administration's Independent Living Program serves severely disabled veterans who may not be able to work immediately and need additional rehabilitation to enable them to live more independently. The program's short-term focus is helping veterans to participate in family and community life, but it also aims to increase their ability to possibly return to work in the longer term.

The national cap for enrollment in the program is set at 2,700 veterans each year. Program participants can receive the assistance for two years, with a six-month extension granted in some cases. Lujan Grisham said she wants to remove the annual enrollment cap entirely.

"They created an arbitrary cap," the congresswoman said in a Journal interview. "I'm interested in removing the cap and allowing for them to serve, frankly, as many veterans as we can."

It's unclear how many additional veterans would qualify for the program nationally or in New Mexico, but Lujan Grisham said she expects the number of participants in New Mexico could grow by at least 25 percent.

A similar bill was introduced in Congress in 2009 by Sen. Daniel Akaka, D-Hawaii. The bill passed the Senate but stalled in the House.

A Congressional Budget Office report found that the bill would cost $181million over 10 years. Lujan Grisham said that's a bargain compared to the cost of treating sick and wounded soldiers indefinitely through traditional VA programs or even Medicaid. She said the program also helps make life more manageable for family members of veterans who need the services.

"It's a great support to families and caregivers who, without access to independent living center services, are sort of left on their own with their disabled family member and can't navigate that because there are no services that they are immediately eligible for," she said. "This stuff works it changes everybody's life."

Services provided by the program include access to assistive technology such as wheelchairs or electronic devices, specialized medical, health, and/or rehabilitation services, services to address any personal and/or family adjustment issues, independent living skills training, and connection with community-based support services.

Currently, two Republicans - Rep. Kevin Yoder, R-Kan., and Rep. Reid Ribble, R-Wisc. - have co-sponsored the legislation.

"This bill isn't about party politics; this bill is about helping those veterans who have sacrificed the most," Ribble said in an email to the Journal.

Fourteen Democrats, including Rep. Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico, are co-sponsors of the legislation.

New Mexico Dems: New Mexico's Congressional Democrats Request Disaster Declaration for September Floods

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 536 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, Congressman Ben Ray Lujan and Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham announced they have sent two joint, bipartisan letters to President Obama, urging him to respond quickly to separate requests for disaster assistance for the state of New Mexico and Santa Clara Pueblo.

The state and the Pueblo are asking the federal government for help with hazard mitigation and to repair public infrastructure damaged between Sept. 9 and Sept. 22. During that time, historic, record-breaking rain across New Mexico - which followed severe storms and floods in July - caused catastrophic flooding and damage in about two-thirds of the state. Two people were killed and numerous others evacuated during the rainstorms, and the Red Cross opened shelters in several counties.

Across the state, flooding and landslides washed out roads and bridges, and several communities in Catron, Eddy and Sierra counties were completely isolated. Water control facilities in numerous counties were damaged, including many historic acequias, as well as drinking water systems in McKinley and Cibola counties. Significant damage also occurred on federal facilities, among them the Los Alamos National Lab site and the Gila National Forest's Catwalk Trail, which was completely destroyed.

So far, 42 percent of the state's counties have already declared disasters or emergencies, and more are anticipated. The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) has spent the last several weeks evaluating the scope of the damage.

"In light of the ongoing losses and possible long-term impacts from this extreme weather, we would request your expedited attention to the State of New Mexico's request for disaster designation and assistance," the delegation wrote. "The result of the September storms and flooding has been community evacuations, public infrastructure damage, landslides, and damaged homes throughout the state.... We appreciate this quick action to assist the state."

The lawmakers also urged prompt action for Santa Clara Pueblo, which made a separate disaster request. The Pueblo, which is downstream of land damaged in the 2011 Las Conchas Fire, has experienced severe flooding caused by runoff over the burn scar for several years. Rains in July and again Sept. 13-16 exacerbated the damage. The Pueblo lost water control facilities in the Santa Clara Canyon, and roads, bridges and homes were damaged.

"All of the safety infrastructure built to deal with monsoonal rains causing flooding off of the 2011 Las Conchas Fire burn scar was destroyed as a result of severe rain and the associated flood event," the lawmakers wrote. "Four dams acting as the primary means to control water in Santa Clara Creek leading to the Pueblo's residential area were completely destroyed, and roads, bridges, and community facilities experienced significant damage.... In light of the ongoing losses and possible long-term impacts from these flooding events, we would request your expedited attention to the Santa Clara Pueblo's request for disaster designation and assistance."

New Mexico Dems: Congresswoman Lujan Grisham Introduces Bipartisan Bill to Support Disabled Veterans

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 596 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham (NM-01) has introduced the Veterans' Independent Living Enhancement Act, bipartisan legislation that would help disabled veterans live independently and participate in family and community life.

This bill removes the arbitrary cap on the number of veterans eligible to participate in the Independent Living Program, a part of the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs' Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (VR&E) Program. The Independent Living Program provides services to maximize independence in daily living for veterans who are too severely disabled to pursue employment.

The Independent Living Program has been highly successful. It began as a pilot program for 500 disabled veterans in 1980. In 2001, the program was extended and the cap increased to allow up to 2,500 veterans to enroll in the program each year. The cap was increased to 2,600 in 2008 and 2,700 in 2010. Today, that arbitrary cap remains while thousands of veterans wait for the opportunity to enter the program and get the services and support they need.

"Throughout the last 12 years of continuous war, our nation's brave men and woman have borne a heavy burden, and many of them have returned home with severe disabilities that make daily activities a challenge," Rep. Lujan Grisham said. "These heroes deserve the best possible care, yet there are still impediments that prevent service members from accessing programs they need to enter civilian life. It is our responsibility to remove those barriers and ensure veterans are able to transition from military service to successful rehabilitation and fulfilling lives. That's why I am honored to introduce the Veterans' Independent Living Enhancement Act today."

Numerous Veterans Service Organizations (VSOs) and health organizations have expressed support for the Veterans' Independent Living Enhancement Act. Iraq & Afghanistan Veterans of America (IAVA) Legislative Director Alex Nicholson said, "IAVA supports this strong bipartisan legislation which would help more disabled veterans get the care and services they need to live independent, successful, and fulfilling lives." The Disabled American Veterans added, "Thank you for introducing this legislation and for your continued support of America's wounded and injured veterans."

Easter Seals, an organization that helps people with disabilities, said, "Easter Seals is proud to support the Veterans' Independent Living Enhancement Act. This legislation would help to ensure eligible veterans with significant service-connected disabilities have access to independent living training and supports to help them live independently and participate fully in their communities."

Original Cosponsors: Reps. Matt Cartwright (PA-17), William Enyart (IL-12), Alcee Hastings (FL-20) Steven Horsford (NV-04), Shelia Jackson Lee (TX-18), Hakeem Jeffries (NY-08), Ann McLane Kuster (NH-02), Ben Ray Lujan (NM-03), Jim McGovern (MA-02), Gloria Negrete McLeod (CA-35), Beto O'Rourke (TX-16), Reid Ribble (WI-08) Adam Schiff (CA-28), Bobby Scott (VA-03), Niki Tsongas (MA-03), Kevin Yoder (KS-03)

Supporting Organizations: Disabled American Veterans; Vets First; Iraq & Afghanistan Veterans of America (IAVA); The America Military Retirees Association; AMVETS; Easter Seals; Mental Health America; American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME); Association of American Medical Colleges; United Spinal Association

"All of the safety infrastructure built to deal with monsoonal rains causing flooding off of the 2011 Las Conchas Fire burn scar was destroyed as a result of severe rain and the associated flood event," the lawmakers wrote. "Four dams acting as the primary means to control water in Santa Clara Creek leading to the Pueblo's residential area were completely destroyed, and roads, bridges, and community facilities experienced significant damage.... In light of the ongoing losses and possible long-term impacts from these flooding events, we would request your expedited attention to the Santa Clara Pueblo's request for disaster designation and assistance."

Rep. Lujan Grisham to introduce assisted living legislation for military veterans

BYLINE: Michael Coleman, JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: INSIDE THE BELTWAY

LENGTH: 436 words

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham will introduce bipartisan legislation today that would make assisted living services available to thousands more American veterans.

The Veterans Affairs administration's Independent Living Program serves severely disabled veterans who may not be able to work immediately and need additional rehabilitation to enable them to live more independently. The program's short-term focus is helping veterans to participate in family and community life, but it also aims to increase their ability to possibly return to work in the longer term.

The national cap for enrollment in the program is set at 2,700 veterans. Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., said she wants to remove the cap entirely.

"They created an arbitrary cap," the congresswoman said in a Journal interview. "I'm interested in removing the cap and allowing for them to serve, frankly as many veterans as we can."

It's unclear how many additional veterans would qualify for the program nationally or in New Mexico, but Lujan Grisham said she expects the number of participants in New Mexico could grow by at least 25 percent.

A similar bill was introduced in Congress in 2009 by Sen. Daniel Akaka, D-Hawaii. The bill passed the Senate but stalled in the House. A Congressional Budget Office report found that the bill would cost $181 million over 10 years. Lujan Grisham said that's a bargain compared to the cost of treating sick and wounded soldiers indefinitely through traditional VA programs or even Medicaid. She said the program also helps make life more manageable for family members of veterans who need the services.

"It's a great support to families and caregivers who, without access to independent living center services, are sort of left on their own with their disabled family member and can't navigate that because there are no services that they are immediately eligible for," she said. "This stuff works it changes everybody's life."

Services provided by the program include:

· Assistive technology

· Specialized medical, health, and/or rehabilitation services

· Services to address any personal and/or family adjustment issues

· Independent living skills training

· Connection with community-based support services

Currently, two Republicans - Rep. Kevin Yoder, R-Kan., and Reid Ribble, R-Wisc. - have co-sponsored the legislation.

"This bill isn't about party politics; this bill is about helping those veterans who have sacrificed the most," Ribble said in an email to the Journal.

Fourteen Democrats, including Rep. Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico, are also co-sponsors of the legislation.

Lujan Grisham Introduces Bipartisan Bill to Support Disabled Veterans;
Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 603 words

WASHINGTON, DC - U.S. Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham (NM-01) today introduced the Veterans' Independent Living Enhancement Act, bipartisan legislation that would help disabled veterans live independently and participate in family and community life.

This bill removes the arbitrary cap on the number of veterans eligible to participate in the Independent Living Program, a part of the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs' Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (VRandE) Program. The Independent Living Program provides services to maximize independence in daily living for veterans who are too severely disabled to pursue employment.

The Independent Living Program has been highly successful. It began as a pilot program for 500 disabled veterans in 1980. In 2001, the program was extended and the cap increased to allow up to 2,500 veterans to enroll in the program each year. The cap was increased to 2,600 in 2008 and 2,700 in 2010. Today, that arbitrary cap remains while thousands of veterans wait for the opportunity to enter the program and get the services and support they need.

"Throughout the last 12 years of continuous war, our nation's brave men and woman have borne a heavy burden, and many of them have returned home with severe disabilities that make daily activities a challenge," Rep. Lujan Grisham said. "These heroes deserve the best possible care, yet there are still impediments that prevent service members from accessing programs they need to enter civilian life. It is our responsibility to remove those barriers and ensure veterans are able to transition from military service to successful rehabilitation and fulfilling lives. That's why I am honored to introduce the Veterans' Independent Living Enhancement Act today."

Numerous Veterans Service Organizations (VSOs) and health organizations have expressed support for the Veterans' Independent Living Enhancement Act. Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America (IAVA) Legislative Director Alex Nicholson said, "IAVA supports this strong bipartisan legislation which would help more disabled veterans get the care and services they need to live independent, successful, and fulfilling lives." The Disabled American Veterans added, "Thank you for introducing this legislation and for your continued support of America's wounded and injured veterans."

Easter Seals, an organization that helps people with disabilities, said, "Easter Seals is proud to support the Veterans' Independent Living Enhancement Act. This legislation would help to ensure eligible veterans with significant service-connected disabilities have access to independent living training and supports to help them live independently and participate fully in their communities."

Original Cosponsors: Reps. Matt Cartwright (PA-17), William Enyart (IL-12), Alcee Hastings (FL-20) Steven Horsford (NV-04), Shelia Jackson Lee (TX-18), Hakeem Jeffries (NY-08), Ann McLane Kuster (NH-02), Ben Ray Lujan (NM-03), Jim McGovern (MA-02), Gloria Negrete McLeod (CA-35), Beto O'Rourke (TX-16), Reid Ribble (WI-08) Adam Schiff (CA-28), Bobby Scott (VA-03), Niki Tsongas (MA-03), Kevin Yoder (KS-03)

New Mexico Delegation Requests Disaster Declaration for September Floods; 'Quick action' urged to help state and Santa Clara Pueblo recover from widespread storm damage; Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 594 words

WASHINGTON, DC - Today, U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham announced they have sent two joint, bipartisan letters to President Obama, urging him to respond quickly to separate requests for disaster assistance for the state of New Mexico and Santa Clara Pueblo.

The state and the Pueblo are asking the federal government for help with hazard mitigation and to repair public infrastructure damaged between Sept. 9 and Sept. 22. During that time, historic, record-breaking rain across New Mexico - which followed severe storms and floods in July - caused catastrophic flooding and damage in about two-thirds of the state. Two people were killed and numerous others evacuated during the rainstorms, and the Red Cross opened shelters in several counties.

Across the state, flooding and landslides washed out roads and bridges, and several communities in Catron, Eddy and Sierra counties were completely isolated. Water control facilities in numerous counties were damaged, including many historic acequias, as well as drinking water systems in McKinley and Cibola counties. Significant damage also occurred on federal facilities, among them the Los Alamos National Lab site and the Gila National Forest's Catwalk Trail, which was completely destroyed.

So far, 42 percent of the state's counties have already declared disasters or emergencies, and more are anticipated. The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) has spent the last several weeks evaluating the scope of the damage.

"In light of the ongoing losses and possible long-term impacts from this extreme weather, we would request your expedited attention to the State of New Mexico's request for disaster designation and assistance," the delegation wrote. "The result of the September storms and flooding has been community evacuations, public infrastructure damage, landslides, and damaged homes throughout the state.... We appreciate this quick action to assist the state."

The lawmakers also urged prompt action for Santa Clara Pueblo, which made a separate disaster request. The Pueblo, which is downstream of land damaged in the 2011 Las Conchas Fire, has experienced severe flooding caused by runoff over the burn scar for several years. Rains in July and again Sept. 13-16 exacerbated the damage. The Pueblo lost water control facilities in the Santa Clara Canyon, and roads, bridges and homes were damaged.

"All of the safety infrastructure built to deal with monsoonal rains causing flooding off of the 2011 Las Conchas Fire burn scar was destroyed as a result of severe rain and the associated flood event," the lawmakers wrote. "Four dams acting as the primary means to control water in Santa Clara Creek leading to the Pueblo's residential area were completely destroyed, and roads, bridges, and community facilities experienced significant damage.... In light of the ongoing losses and possible long-term impacts from these flooding events, we would request your expedited attention to the Santa Clara Pueblo's request for disaster designation and assistance."

Los Alamos County was one of the counties appealing for relief from the government. The county estimated it had more than $5 million in damage.

Lujan Supports Water Resources Bill that Enables Army Corps Projects

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 388 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. (3rd CD), issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District voted today in support of H.R. 3080, the Water Resources Reform and Development Act. The bipartisan legislation authorizes funding for the Army Corps of Engineers for improvements to America's ports, waterways, and projects tied to flood protection and environmental restoration.

"While I would have preferred a bill that reflected the Senate-passed version that better allows the Army Corps of Engineers to properly manage our critical habitat, assess flood damage caused by the destruction of wildfires, and meet the vital needs of water infrastructure in New Mexico, this legislation provides the House with an opportunity to move forward toward a conference committee with the Senate," Congressman Lujan said. "Moving through the regular order to address the differences between the bills will enable Congress to produce legislation that will authorize important improvements to New Mexico's dams, rivers, and water infrastructure. I will encourage the conference committee to support the Senate language that addresses critical priorities for New Mexico."

Lujan offered several amendments to improve the House legislation that were not made in order by the Republican-led Rules Committee, and he will continue to advocate for vital programs such as the Rio Grande Environmental Management Program.

"One aspect that was left out of this bill that would have been addressed by one of my amendments is the extension of the Rio Grande Environmental Management Program," Lujan added. "The Rio Grande watershed is the fifth largest in North America, covering the states of Colorado, New Mexico, and Texas. My amendment would have extended the life of the project to 2024 and allowed the Army Corps of Engineers to assess flood damage reduction measures for floods in the aftermath of wildfires - fires that have turned our watershed and Rio Grande black with soot and debris. Assessing the damage done by fires is critical for us to understand how to deal with future challenges. I am hopeful that when the House and Senate works out the differences on this bill that the reauthorization of this important program will be included."

New Mexico Dems: Pass Immigration Reform Now

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 346 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

While the work of the nation has been stalled by the Republicans' government shutdown, most of the the critical work of the nation has been left unfinished--including immigration reform.

It's been more than 100 days since the U.S. Senate passed a bipartisan immigration reform bill. House Democrats, including New Mexico's Congressman Ben Ray Lujan and Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham, have sponsored similar legislation in Congress (http://www.gpo.gov/fdsys/pkg/BILLS-113hr15ih/pdf/BILLS-113hr15ih.pdf). With the end of the shutdown, it's time for the House of Representatives to get back to business and pass the immigration reform bill now.

President Obama agrees. In an interview with Univision, the President named immigration as his next priority, "Once that's done [the shutdown]... the day after, I'm going to be pushing to say, call a vote on immigration reform." Yesterday, in his statement on the end of the government shutdown, the President doubled down, saying, "We should finish the job of fixing our broken immigration system."

Immigration reform is long overdue, and enactment of the bill would be good for all Americans. According to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, enactment of the bipartisan comprehensive immigration reform bill would reduce the deficit by $850 billion. CBO also estimates that immigration reform would increase economic growth by 3.3 percent in 2023 and 5.4 percent in 2033.

That's one of the best things about immigration reform: It's going to make the economy a lot better. This video breaks down exactly how that works (http://youtu.be/mSYR6Z-RTT0)--how fixing our broken system will create jobs, boost wages, cut the deficit, and foster innovation. Not enough people are talking about this fact, so watch it, then share it (http://youtu.be/mSYR6Z-RTT0)! It's time for Congress to get back to work.

NM delegation glad shutdown over, hopes for better

BYLINE: Gary Gerew

LENGTH: 499 words

The members of New Mexico's Congressional delegation said they were pleased federal agencies were back in business today and that the threat of a national default had passed.

But they expressed concern that the deal reached Wednesday night may or may not denote a turning point in Republican-Democrat cooperation.

Under the legislation passed Wednesday, the shutdown will end and the government will be funded until Jan. 15. The debt ceiling will be lifted until February 7. House and Senate negotiators will form a conference committee aimed at hammering out a compromise on a budget plan by Dec. 13.

"While I would have preferred legislation that extends the debt limit for a longer period of time and that funds the government at a higher level, this represents a compromise that will finally end the government shutdown that has hurt families in New Mexico and protect the full faith and credit of our nation by ensuring we do not default for the first time in history," said Rep. Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District.

Rep. Steve Pearce from the Second District, and the delegation's sole Republican, voted against the agreement, but was pleased that it ended fears of further furloughs.

"The good news is that this challenging time for New Mexicans seems to be over," Pearce said. "The bad news is that the agreement does not end the double standard for Washington, nor does it change our nation's dangerous course of reckless spending. While I am happy that furloughed employees can go back to work, I will not be able to support tonight's legislation, which does nothing to address the problems we were elected to solve"

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham from the First District said she hopes the crisis has taught fellow members of Congress a lesson.

"The last few weeks have proven beyond a doubt that recklessly shutting down the government and sabotaging the economy is simply not a responsible way to govern," she said. "New Mexicans expect and deserve a Congress where Democrats and Republicans respect and value each other's ideas - even if they are vastly different - and want to work together."

Sen. Martin Heinrich echoed that sentiment. "Our economy desperately needs long-term stability," Heinrich said. "I hope that today's agreement, and the willingness shown by reasonable minds to work together, will mark the end of governing by manufactured crises and open the door to broader budget discussions and long-term solutions."

Sen. Tom Udall agreed. "I hope we've reached a turning point for Congress that will result in greater bipartisan cooperation," Udall said. "No matter who is in charge, no party should hold the country hostage to make a political point. I'm relieved to return to focusing on strengthening our country and our economy, and finding a sustainable, long-term solution to our nation's finances."

Fed workers could be back on job today; NM Democrats back funding bill

BYLINE: Michael Coleman Journal Washington Bureau

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. A2

LENGTH: 769 words

WASHINGTON - Democrats in New Mexico's congressional delegation voted Wednesday for a bill to re-open the federal government after a 16-day shutdown, while Rep. Steve Pearce, the delegation's lone Republican, opposed the legislation.

Votes in the U.S. House and Senate to end the shutdown came as thousands of workers at Los Alamos and Sandia national laboratories awaited furlough notices - notices that now will not come.

Federal workers already furloughed could be back on the job as soon as today.

"Now that the bill has passed the United States Senate and the House of Representatives, the president plans to sign it tonight and employees should expect to return to work in the morning," Sylvia Mathews Burwell, director of the Office of Management and Budget, said in a statement released by the White House Press Office late Wednesday.

"Employees should be checking the news and OPM's (Office of Personnel Management) website for further updates," the statement said.

The bill Congress approved Wednesday night would provide back pay for federal workers who were furloughed during the shutdown.

Pearce, of New Mexico's 2nd Congressional District, said he couldn't support the legislation Congress approved to re-open the government on Wednesday.

"The good news is this giant mess is over," Pearce said in a conference call with reporters. "The bad news is that we're doing nothing substantial. We really are doing nothing to lower the debt, to get spending under control, nothing about entitlements."

Pearce said he could have supported a bill to re-open government if it also barred members of Congress and their staffs from receiving federal assistance for their health care under the Affordable Care Act, or Obamacare. A bill under consideration Tuesday would have done so, but the measure never came to a vote.

"That was a disappointment," Pearce said.

Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., voiced relief that the impasse appeared to be over. He said House Republicans, who had refused to accept legislation that didn't postpone or de-fund Obamacare before backing down on Wednesday, hurt New Mexico.

"Obviously those tactics didn't work, but New Mexico pays a huge economic price for those irresponsible, completely reckless negotiating tactics," Heinrich said.

Heinrich said repeated Washington fiscal crises are hampering the U.S. economy.

"This economy wants to take off," Heinrich said. "There are a lot of positive signs in the economy that are being held back by this shutdown and brinksmanship over the debt ceiling. If we can take that out of the equation and show some predictability I think we would have an opportunity to get this economy moving in the right direction again."

Rep. Ben Ray Luján, like other New Mexico delegation Democrats, said he would have preferred a longer-term deal to keep the government open.

"This legislation, while not perfect, will ensure that New Mexico's national labs stay open, furloughed employees can get back on the job, and that services for the most vulnerable will no longer be delayed," Lujan said. "It puts an end to the political games that have gone on too long."

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., said a provision in the bill that will force bipartisan budget negotiations was a positive addition.

"This agreement puts us on a path to negotiate a longer-term budget that replaces sequestration's damaging cuts with a balanced approach to deficit reduction and that reflects the priorities that matter most to New Mexicans: creating good-paying jobs and growing the economy," she said. "The last few weeks have proven beyond a doubt that recklessly shutting down the government and sabotaging the economy is simply not a responsible way to govern.

Sen Tom Udall, D-N.M., voiced relief about the deal.

"Reason has finally prevailed in Congress, and we have a bipartisan agreement that will enable us to re-open the government, pay our bills and begin to restore the damage the shutdown caused to our economy," Udall said. "I hope that we've reached a turning point for Congress that will result in greater bipartisan cooperation. No matter who is in charge, no party should hold the country hostage to make a political point."

The deal comes as Sandia and Los Alamos national laboratories were on the verge of shutting their doors. Run by federal contractors, the nuclear weapons laboratories continued to operate using carryover funding. Los Alamos was preparing to shut down at the end of the day Friday if no agreement was reached, and Sandia was preparing to shut its doors at the end of the day Monday.

NM Democratic delegation: Government shutdown was painful, preventable

Government shutdown was painful, preventable, NM Democratic delegation says

SANTA FE >> All four Democrats in New Mexico's congressional delegation on Wednesday night planned to vote for a bill to reopen the federal government.

The state's only Republican in Congress, Rep. Steve Pearce of Hobbs, said he would oppose the measure because it would mean more borrowing and more deficit spending.

"Tonight, the House and Senate are expected to vote on an agreement to end the shutdown. The good news is that this challenging time for New Mexicans seems to be over. The bad news is that the agreement does not end the double standard for Washington, nor does it change our nation's dangerous course of reckless spending," Pearce said in a statement.

"While I am happy that furloughed employees can go back to work, I will not be able to support tonight's legislation, which does nothing to address the problems we were elected to solve."

U.S. Sen. Martin Heinrich said the bill ending the government shutdown offered a short-term solution that should have been achieved long ago without any disruption in government services.

In a telephone interview, Heinrich, D-Albuquerque, said nothing in the proposed deal was groundbreaking. He said each component was available previously, but House Republicans pressed for the shutdown as leverage to defund President Obama's health care law.

"New Mexico has paid a large price for this game of chicken. It was completely reckless" Heinrich said.

Standard & Poor's, financial ratings company, estimated Wednesday that said the shutdown had removed $24 billion from the U.S. economy in 16 days.

Heinrich said he hoped that the compromise would be a building block for cooperation between the House and Senate in agreeing on a budget.

Doing so would put Congress in a practical position to make the government function more smoothly, he said.

Even with a deal seemingly close at hand, Heinrich said there was no cause for celebration.

"I agree with the sentiment that there are no winners here," he said.

New Mexico's senior senator, Democrat Tom Udall, was more upbeat.

"Reason has finally prevailed in Congress, and we have a bipartisan agreement that will enable us to reopen the government, pay our bills and begin to restore the damage the shutdown caused to our economy. I'm also pleased the agreement includes a provision I fought for that will ensure retroactive pay for those federal workers in New Mexico and across the country who were furloughed through no fault of their own."

Udall said he hoped that Congress had reached a turning point that would lead to more bipartisan cooperation.

The compromise bill would reopen the government, fund it through Jan. 15 and raise the debt ceiling on federal borrowing until Feb. 7.

U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-Santa Fe, said the deal was imperfect, but essential.

"While I would have preferred legislation that extends the debt limit for a longer period and that funds the government at a higher level, this represents a compromise that will finally end the government shutdown that has hurt families in New Mexico," Lujan said.

He said the compromise would "protect the full faith and credit of our nation by ensuring we do not default for the first time in history."

Like Heinrich, Lujan said the shutdown was unnecessary and needlessly hurt people.

He said the compromise "puts an end to the political games that have gone on too long. It is deeply disappointing that, once again, manufactured crises have taken a toll on our economy and on the day-to-day lives of people in New Mexico who have had to go without a paycheck or the benefits they count on."

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-Albuquerque, said she was eager to end the shutdown.

"I look forward to voting for the Senate's bipartisan agreement that will reopen the government, put furloughed New Mexicans back to work, prevent furloughs at Sandia and Los Alamos national labs and avert a catastrophic debt default," she said.

She said the compromise would be valuable in another sense.

"This agreement puts us on a path to negotiate a longer-term budget that replaces sequestration's damaging cuts with a balanced approach to deficit reduction and that reflects the priorities that matter most to New Mexicans: creating good-paying jobs and growing the economy," Lujan Grisham said.

LUJAN VOTES TO END SHUTDOWN, AVOID GOVERNMENT DEFAULT, AND KEEP LABS OPEN

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, D.C

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District voted tonight for compromise legislation that will end the government shutdown, raise the debt ceiling so the government can pay its bills, and establishes a conference committee for the House and Senate to negotiate on a budget for the coming year.

"While I would have preferred legislation that extends the debt limit for a longer period of time and that funds the government at a higher level, this represents a compromise that will finally end the government shutdown that has hurt families in New Mexico and protect the full faith and credit of our nation by ensuring we do not default for the first time in history," Congressman Lujan said.

"This legislation, while not perfect, will ensure that New Mexico's national labs stay open, furloughed employees can get back on the job, and that services for the most vulnerable will no longer be delayed. It puts an end to the political games that have gone on too long," Lujan added. "It is deeply disappointing that once again, manufactured crises have taken a toll on our economy and on the day-to-day lives of people in New Mexico who have had to go without a paycheck or the benefits they count on. For too long, the extreme elements of one party let the pursuit of ideological gains trump common sense. I am hopeful that we can move forward, having learned a lesson that holding the country hostage over government funding and the threat of default is reckless and irresponsible. It is now time to get to work on a budget that addresses the arbitrary cuts of the sequester and puts our country on a path forward that will grow our economy and lead to job creation."

Lujan Votes to End Shutdown, Avoid Government Default, and Keep Labs Open

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. (3rd CD), issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District voted tonight for compromise legislation that will end the government shutdown, raise the debt ceiling so the government can pay its bills, and establishes a conference committee for the House and Senate to negotiate on a budget for the coming year.

"While I would have preferred legislation that extends the debt limit for a longer period of time and that funds the government at a higher level, this represents a compromise that will finally end the government shutdown that has hurt families in New Mexico and protect the full faith and credit of our nation by ensuring we do not default for the first time in history," Congressman Lujan said.

Under the legislation, the shutdown will end and the government will be funded until January 15. The debt ceiling will be lifted until February 7. House and Senate negotiators will form a conference committee aimed at hammering out a compromise on a budget plan by December 13.

"This legislation, while not perfect, will ensure that New Mexico's national labs stay open, furloughed employees can get back on the job, and that services for the most vulnerable will no longer be delayed. It puts an end to the political games that have gone on too long," Lujan added. Lujan and Energy and Commerce Committee Democrats Call for an End to Government Shutdown; Shutdown Causing Widespread Disruption; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 800 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District joined with Democratic members of the Energy and Commerce Committee today to send a letter to House Speaker John Boehner on the impact the Republicans' government shutdown is having on programs within the Committee's jurisdiction. The shutdown is causing widespread disruptions in federal programs relating to health, consumer and product safety, energy and the environment, and telecommunications.

In the letter the members write, "We urge you to immediately allow a vote on a clean bill to reopen the entire federal government. The Republican-led government shutdown is having serious negative impacts on our nation."

The full text of the letter is available below and online here http://democrats.energycommerce.house.gov/sites/default/files/documents/Boehner-Shutdown-Effects-2013-10-15.pdf.

October 15, 2013

The Honorable John Boehner

Speaker of the House

United States House of Representatives

H-232 The Capitol

Washington, D.C. 20515

Dear Speaker Boehner:

We urge you to immediately allow a vote on a clean bill to reopen the entire federal government. The Republican-led government shutdown is having serious negative impacts on our nation.

As members of the Energy and Commerce Committee, we have responsibility for federal programs relating to health, consumer and product safety, energy and the environment, and telecommunications. In all of these areas, the shutdown is causing widespread disruption.

Here are just a few examples:

* The shutdown's impact on food safety. The Food and Drug Administration cannot "support the majority of its food safety, nutrition, and cosmetics activities." The agency has ceased "safety activities such as routine establishment inspections, some compliance and enforcement activities, monitoring of imports, notification programs (e.g., food contact substances, infant formula), and the majority of the laboratory research necessary to inform public health decision-making."

* The shutdown's impact on public health and medical research. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention is able to provide only "minimal support" to protect public health in other areas and has halted key programs. The National Institutes of Health has ceased accepting new patients for clinical trials and has stopped action on grant applications and awards.

* The shutdown's impact on consumers and product safety. The Federal Trade Commission cannot investigate and prosecute perpetrators of fraudulent actions against U.S. citizens. The vehicle safety activities of the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration are entirely shut down, preventing agency officials from investigating highway crashes to determine if they are caused by auto defects. The Consumer Product Safety Commission is almost entirely shut down, leaving it unable to investigate potential consumer product hazards.

* The shutdown's impact on the energy and the environment. The Environmental Protection Agency has halted most Superfund cleanups and furloughed virtually all of its civil enforcement staff. The Chemical Safety Board has halted its investigation into the causes of the West, Texas fertilizer explosion and frozen its investigations into 14 other sites located in California, Washington, Utah, and Texas. The authority of the Department of Homeland Security to enforce the Chemical Facility

Antiterrorism Standards (CFATS) program, which protects the nation from terrorist attacks on chemical facilities, has expired.

* The shutdown's impact on spectrum supply and funding for first responder communications network. The Federal Communications Commission (FCC) may be forced to postpone the first spectrum auction for mobile broadband in six years scheduled for January 2014. Neither the National Telecommunications Information Administration nor the FCC is able to work with federal, regional, and local agencies to investigate possible communications system failures for first responders during the shooting at the Navy Yard last month.

These are just a few examples of the broad impacts the Republican government shutdown is having on our nation's federal programs relating to health, consumer and product safety, energy and the environment, and telecommunications.

We urge you to end the government shutdown and allow the federal government to resume full operations.

Sincerely,

Henry A. Waxman Bobby L. Rush

Lujan: Piecemeal Funding Bill Hurts Native American Communities;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 261 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement after voting against piecemeal legislation last night that locks in sequestration funding levels on tribal programs and fails to restore many critical services for Native American communities.

"This piecemeal approach to fund the government fails to meet our trust responsibility to our Native American brothers and sisters. Not one tribe or tribal organization supports this course of action because it would lock in sequestration cuts that are devastating tribal programs.

"Navajo Nation President Ben Shelly called this approach 'insulting' and said tribal nations want a comprehensive resolution as well as an end to the sequester. By taking piecemeal steps to fund our government, this bill fails to restore many critical services that are important to tribal communities, and in fact, makes the problems facing Indian Country worse, not better. With this bill, Republicans have ignored the role that other federal departments play in providing services to tribal communities. Tribes rely on services from the Department of Housing, the Department of Justice, and many other parts of our federal government, which are not covered through this piecemeal legislation.

"It is time to act on a clean continuing resolution that reopens the entire federal government and then get to work on a solution that undoes the deep cuts of the sequester."

New Mexico's congressional offices open for business

BYLINE: Michael Coleman, JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: INSIDE THE BELTWAY

LENGTH: 502 words

The federal government shutdown remains in effect with no apparent solution at the ready, but New Mexico's congressional offices in Washington and in New Mexico are open for business.

When the shutdown began on Oct. 1, Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich both closed each of their six offices, including the ones in Washington, and furloughed about 75 percent of their staffs. But as of today, the offices are once-again fully staffed and open for business.

"Senator Udall is working hard to find consensus so we can re-open the government," said Udall spokeswoman Jennifer Talhelm. "He believes it is unconscionable that important federal agencies have had to shut their doors because of dysfunction in Washington. The House has passed a bill unanimously to pay federal workers furloughed through no fault of their own, and Senator Udall is a strong supporter of the bill. Negotiations in the Senate on the bill have been positive, and Tom believes it has a strong chance of passing the Senate and being signed into law. With that in mind, he believes that his staff should be working and helping New Mexicans to the best of their abilities, especially while other federal offices are unable to. "

Whitney Potter, spokeswoman for Heinrich said legislation to restore pay to federal employees has passed the House and stands a good chance of passage in the Senate, which factored into his decision to bring his full staff back on the job. Congressional staffers are working but will not get paid unless Congress writes that into law.

"Though the offices will be open, the federal government will still be shutdown, which means there will be limitations on office operations," Potter said. "Having all staff return to work will provide needed help to the senator as he fulfills his responsibilities in D.C. and in New Mexico and continues his work to reopen the government.

"Senator Heinrich is a co-sponsor of the Federal Employee Retroactive Pay Fairness Act, which is identical to the bill that passed the House last weekend. The Senate has yet to take up the legislation, but negotiations to do so are both ongoing and constructive. While the government shutdown continues and a resolution remains elusive, the events surrounding retroactive pay for all federal workers that transpired recently helped lead to the decision to open the Senator's offices.

"Given that this continues to be a fluid situation, scenarios exist where we could close the offices and have some staff go back into furlough status once again," Potter added.

New Mexico's three U.S. House offices also are staffed and open for business this week. Sen. Steve Pearce initially furloughed his entire staff but brought most of them back on last week and re-opened his district offices and Washington. Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham had planned to implement rotating furloughs for her staff, but is now fully staffed with all offices open. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., has kept his staff working and offices open since the beginning of the shutdown.

Funding cuts loom at labs; Reductions possible even if a shutdown is averted

BYLINE: Copyright © 2013 Albuquerque Journal By John Fleck Journal Staff Writer

SECTION: FRONT PAGE; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 899 words

Beyond the federal government shutdown, Congress is lurching toward what could be substantial budget cuts for nuclear weapons work at New Mexico's nuclear weapons laboratories.

The budget problems extend past the near-term question of a shutdown at Los Alamos and Sandia national laboratories, which are both preparing to mothball their operations and send most of their nearly 20,000 employees home by the end of next week

While near-term attention is focused on whether Congress will act in time to prevent lab shutdowns, Los Alamos and Sandia face a longer-term problem that could reduce federal nuclear weapons spending in New Mexico by hundreds of millions of dollars in the coming year, even if the shutdowns are avoided.

That is because longer-term spending plans for small agencies like the National Nuclear Security Administration have largely been relegated to budgeting on autopilot.

Those autopilot measures, a combination of "continuing resolutions" to fund work at last year's levels and the automatic "sequester" cuts approved in a 2011 budget deal, would lead to significant cuts for the National Nuclear Security Administration's nuclear weapons budget.

One such bill, passed Friday by the House, would cut the weapons budget 8 percent, according to an analysis by the non-partisan Congressional Budget Office. If those cuts are applied evenly across the agency for the next 12 months, they would translate to a $240 million reduction in federal spending in New Mexico over the next 12 months.

Ironically, the congressional gridlock could soon accomplish what arms control activists have repeatedly failed to do, curbing the rapid growth of the U.S. nuclear weapons budget. The result could force the labs and the National Nuclear Security Administration to seriously consider steps nuclear weapons opponents have long advocated, including less emphasis on large nuclear weapon design and remanufacturing projects and multibillion dollar buildings to do the work, said Greg Mello of the Albuquerque-based Los Alamos Study Group. "They're going to have to change their paradigm," Mello said.

While Friday's bill, part of a House Republican strategy to reopen the government one agency at a time, appears to be dead in the Senate, similar approaches to settling the spending arguments have already won general support from both Republicans and Democrats in both houses of Congress. The cuts, if they go into effect, would wipe out budget increases pushed by the Obama administration, often with congressional objection, as part of a bargain to win support for a 2010 arms control deal with the Russians.

Members of Congress and the Obama administration have in recent years overridden the budget autopilot and protected the weapons program from the cuts sweeping the federal government, allowing steady increases in recent years to fund what defense officials say are needed upgrades to our nuclear arsenal, and the laboratory infrastructure and personnel needed to carry out the work.

A similar intervention now would be needed to prevent the cuts. But the administration and Congress have shown little willingness to support continued increases this time around, said Tom Collina, research director at the Arms Control Association, a Washington, D.C., think tank.

Work upgrading the nation's B61 nuclear bombs, much of it done at Sandia, is especially vulnerable, Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., told reporters in a telephone news conference last month. "The future of the B61 program, which keeps our nuclear weapons stockpile safe and protects our national security, depends on gettingadditional money," Udall said.

To fund the B61 and other work it says is necessary to maintain the U.S. arsenal, the Obama administration asked Congress for $7.9 billion for the National Nuclear Security Administration's nuclear weapons work in fiscal year 2014. But Congress, unable to come to agreement on a 2014 spending plan, is on a path to instead approve some sort of "continuing resolution," a path of least resistance that simply continues spending at last year's levels.

Compounding the difficulties, all current versions of the continuing resolution legislation, including the one passed Friday by the House, would then impose automatic cuts on last year's number as part of the "sequester" budget-cutting deal Congress and the White House agreed to in the summer of 2011. Those cuts were at the time viewed as so draconian that they would force the warring political parties to come to some sort of broad budget deal, but that so far has not happened.

Friday's temporary spending bill for the National Nuclear Security Administration passed the House 248-176, with New Mexico's congressional delegation splitting along party lines. Rep. Steve Pearce, a Republican from southern New Mexico, voted "yes," issuing a statement saying the bill "is key to the security of our nation, and assures that the hard-working employees of Los Alamos and Sandia National Labs will continue to have jobs."

Democratic Reps. Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham, whose districts include Los Alamos and Sandia, respectively, voted against it. Lujan, in a floor speech Friday, said the NNSA budget is critical to New Mexico, but he pointed to the fact that the bill would actually cut lab budgets. He called the bill a "shame and a sham."

LENGTH: 386 words

Oct. 12--Dueling news releases by members of New Mexico's congressional delegation on Friday typified the partisan fight to shape public perceptions of who is responsible for negative consequences of the ongoing partial government shutdown.

Southern New Mexico Congressman Steve Pearce, the only Republican in the state's delegation, issued a statement trumpeting his vote for a House bill that "provides critical funding to our nation's labs, including Sandia and Los Alamos" and "assures that the hard-working employees at Sandia and Los Alamos will continue to have jobs."

However, Democrats in Congress, including Northern New Mexico's Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham of Albuquerque and Sen. Tom Udall, issued statements that characterized the legislation, H.J. Res. 76, as the latest example of the Republican-controlled House passing piecemeal bills that the president has said he would veto while he pushes for legislation to fully fund the government.

The New Mexico Democrats also said the proposal to provide partial funding to the National Nuclear Security Administration would actually represent a major cut in funding for the national laboratories.

In remarks on the House floor, Lujan, who along with Lujan Grisham voted against the bill, called it a "Republican charade" and an attempt at "picking winners and losers" with regard to worker furloughs.

Los Alamos National Laboratory, a major player in Northern New Mexico's economy, has warned that thousands of employees will be sent home at the end of the day Friday, Oct. 18, if the budget impasse in Washington, D.C., continues through next week.

However, Udall expressed optimism that a deal may be in the works: "There are indications that the House Republicans are moving past this piecemeal strategy and are working on a realistic plan to re-open the government. I hope that is true. In the meantime, the Senate has twice passed a bill to fund the NNSA, Veterans Affairs, national parks, the military and everything else -- in the form of a clean bill to fund the entire government. I'm willing to work with anyone to get the whole government back up and running."

LUJAN SIGNS PETITION TO FORCE A VOTE THAT WOULD END GOVERNMENT SHUTDOWN

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 268 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District announced today that he has signed a petition to reopen the government. This effort launched by House Democrats would force an up or down vote on a clean continuing resolution which would end the government shutdown when a majority of the House, 218 members, sign on to the petition.

Despite the fact that 200 hundred Democrats have said they would compromise on the clean continuing resolution passed by the Senate and more than 20 Republicans have said they too would vote for the bill, Speaker John Boehner has repeatedly refused to allow a vote. The discharge petition would allow an up or down vote on a clean continuing resolution, providing funding through November 15 at a level requested by Speaker Boehner.

"For nearly two weeks, I have called on Speaker Boehner to allow a vote on a clean bill that will end the government shutdown, put New Mexicans back to work, and make sure that our communities receive the vital services that for too long have been delayed," Congressman Lujan said. "These calls have fallen on deaf ears as Speaker Boehner has ignored the impact that the shutdown is having on families across the country. As the shutdown has dragged on, we've heard more and more moderate Republicans who are fed up with the extreme elements of their party that have caused this shutdown. It is time for them to stand up, back up their words with action, and join Democrats in this effort to force a vote on legislation that will reopen the government."

Members of the N.M. Delegation Working to Protect Federal & Lab Workers Hurt by Shutdown

LENGTH: 995 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of the Senator Martin Heinrich, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham are working to ensure that federal workers in New Mexico are not financially hurt in the long-term by the federal government shutdown.

New Mexico is home to roughly 27,000 federal workers, and Sandia National Laboratories (SNL) and Los Alamos National Laboratory (LANL) employ an additional 18,000 New Mexicans.

All four lawmakers are strong supporters of the Federal Employee Retroactive Pay Fairness Act to ensure federal employees, furloughed through no fault of their own during the government shutdown, will be paid when the government reopens. Luján and Lujan Grisham voted for the bill, which passed unanimously in the U.S. House of Representatives on Saturday. In the Senate, Udall and Heinrich are cosponsors of the same measure. All four lawmakers also supported a bill, which has been signed into law, ensuring members of the military will be paid during the shutdown.

Additionally, the N.M. lawmakers sent a letter to Department of Energy (DOE) Secretary Ernest Moniz, urging him to ensure employees at New Mexico's national laboratories are compensated if they are furloughed as a result of the government shutdown.

In their letter to Moniz, the lawmakers note that although workers at SNL and LANL are contract employees, "they are subject to much of the same uncertainties as their colleagues in the federal workforce."

"Congress clearly intends that those workers who provide such vital services for our nation should be insulated from the effects of a protracted shutdown," the lawmakers wrote.

"The Department of Energy can certify to the labs that it is an 'allowable cost' for them to use their appropriated dollars to compensate their employees for back pay due to any furloughs caused by a shutdown," the lawmakers continued. "Due to the tremendous economic uncertainty currently faced by the laboratories' workforce, we urge you to certify as soon as possible that back pay will be allowable upon the restoration of government functions. The employees of our nation's national laboratories deserve to know that they will be fully compensated for their service to our nation."

Sandia officials announced today that they will be forced to begin to shut down and furlough much of the lab's workforce by Oct. 21 if the budget impasse is not resolved. LANL officials also have told employees that the lab has a limited ability to stay open in the government shutdown.

Udall and Heinrich both voted for a clean funding compromise bill, which has twice passed the Senate. If the House of Representatives were to pass this bill, the president would sign it and the government would reopen, preventing thousands of lab employees from being furloughed. Luján and Lujan Grisham have signed a letter to Speaker John Boehner calling on him to immediately allow a vote on the Senate-passed clean funding compromise.

The following is the text of the lawmakers' letter to Moniz:

Secretary Moniz:

We write today to call your attention to the many New Mexicans who work at Los Alamos and Sandia National Laboratories who have been adversely affected by the continuing budget impasse in Congress and the resulting shutdown. As you know, these labs are essential to our nation's national security as well as its scientific and research capabilities. Their workforce is comprised of many of the smartest scientists, engineers, and researchers in our country, all of whom have devoted their careers to serving and protecting our nation.

This government shut down risks betraying these men and women who have made personal sacrifices for our collective security and technological advancement. While lab employees work for the contractors who manage the labs, they are subject to much of the same uncertainty as their colleagues in the federal workforce. While neither of the New Mexico NNSA laboratories have yet announced a need to furlough their workforce, a number of my constituents have written to our offices or contacted us directly to share the stress of potentially being furloughed from the labs and missing out on a needed paycheck.

The House of Representatives has passed H.R. 3223, the Federal Employee Retroactive Pay Fairness Act, which would compensate all federal employees who would not otherwise receive their full salaries due to the shutdown. President Obama has declared that he supports the legislation and his office writes,

"Federal workers keep the Nation safe and secure and provide vital services that support the economic security of American families. The Administration appreciates that the Congress is acting promptly to move this bipartisan legislation and looks forward to the bill's swift passage."

The overwhelming bipartisan support for this legislation demonstrates the clear Congressional desire that the federal workforce should not be adversely impacted by the shutdown nor should they shoulder the burden of its resulting uncertainty. While the employees of New Mexico's national laboratories are not included within the bill's specific terms, Congress clearly intends that those workers who provide such vital services for our nation should be insulated from the effects of a protracted shutdown.

It is our understanding that the Department of Energy can certify to the labs that it is an "allowable cost" for them to use their appropriated dollars to compensate their employees for back pay due to any furloughs caused by a shutdown. Due to the tremendous economic uncertainty currently faced by the laboratories' workforce, we urge you to certify as soon as possible that back pay will be allowable upon the restoration of government functions. The employees of our nation's national laboratories deserve to know that they will be fully compensated for their service to our nation.

U.S. House approves bill to fund NM's national laboratories

BYLINE: Michael Coleman, JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: INSIDE THE BELTWAY

LENGTH: 617 words

The U.S. House voted 248-176 Friday to approve funding for weapons programs at the National Nuclear Security Administration and New Mexico's national laboratories through mid-December, but the bill's fate in the Democratic-controlled Senate is uncertain at best.

Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., voted for the spending bill. Reps. Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham voted against it. The GOP-led house has passed a series of partial government funding bills in recent days, but Senate Democrats have opposed that approach, arguing that Congress shouldn't pick and choose which federal agencies have their budgets restored.

Meanwhile, the government shutdown is its 12th day with no clear path to a legislative agreeement. Pearce said he had lobbied this week to get the NNSA bill to the House floor.

"Today's vote to fund the NNSA is key to the security of our nation, and assures that the hard-working employees of Los Alamos and Sandia National Labs will continue to have jobs," said Pearce. "Our contractors and employees at Sandia and Los Alamos provide a vital service to our nation, which must continue without interruption - this legislation ensures that."

"With Los Alamos and Sandia announcing furloughs in the near future, I urge the Senate to quickly act on this legislation, not only for the thousands of New Mexico jobs it saves, but also for the security this bill provides," Pearce added.

Los Alamos and Sandia National Labs receive roughly half of their yearly operating budgets from the NNSA's budget. Both labs are preparing to furlough employees on Oct. 21 if the federal budget impasse is not resolved.

In a floor speech Friday, Lujan said the NNSA budget is critical to New Mexico, but he said the bill approved Friday would actually cut lab budgets because it retains sequester-level funding. He called the bill approved Friday a "shame and a sham."

"This bill denies these national security labs the funding they need as it locks in the deep cuts of sequester for two more months.

"There is not a member of this body, Democrat or Republican, that says they likethe sequester, but my Republican colleagues refuse to lift it. And they say they want to keep the government open, but they place conditions on it.

"This piecemeal approach in this bill to the Department of Energy and the NNSA is picking winners and losers with employees that are going to be furloughed. This is a shame and it's a sham. This Republican charade that is going to go home to my state of New Mexico and direct the directors of the lab to tell employees who is going to go home without a paycheck and who will not, because there is still not assurance that the Secretary of Energy, through the Department of Energy, will make these employees whole through an allowable cost that will be accepted. Enough is enough."

Lujan Grisham sounded a similar theme.

"To serve their critical national security mission, New Mexico's national laboratories require the certainty and stability of a full funding bill," she said in a statement. "Unfortunately, House Republicans' piecemeal approach falls short. In fact, this bill would actually cut Sandia National Labs' funding by 46 percent.

"In addition, with nearly all of Sandia's employees and many of Los Alamos's employees facing furloughs, the drastic cuts in this bill guarantee that a large number of those dedicated employees would be unable to continue working.

"New Mexico's national labs need and deserve to be made whole again. The best way to do that is to immediately pass the Senate's short-term government funding compromise that would reopen the entire federal government until November 15 while we work together on a long-term budget solution."

House passes bill to fund Sandia, Los Alamos labs

BYLINE: Dan Mayfield

LENGTH: 341 words

The U.S. House of Representatives voted 248-176 Friday morning to temporarily fund the National Nuclear Security Administration, the agency that oversees Sandia and Los Alamos National Laboratories.

The House vote on Friday morning would temporarily fund the agency through Dec. 15. The funding bill will go next to the U.S. Senate for a vote, which could be scheduled as early as today.

Democrats in the Senate have defeated similar bills proposed by the House this week.

"As this shutdown drags on and New Mexicans continue to suffer, House Republicans find time to hold votes to restore funding for a select group of government functions, instead of holding the one vote that would reopen the entire government. Rather than picking winners and losers, House Republicans should allow a vote on the Senate-passed funding bill to end the shutdown once and for all," Said Sen. Martin Heinrich on Friday.

"Today's vote to fund the NNSA is key to the security of our nation, and assures that the hardworking employees of Los Alamos and Sandia National Labs will continue to have jobs," said Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., in a statement. "Our contractors and employees at Sandia and Los Alamos provide a vital service to our nation, which must continue without interruption - this legislation ensures that."

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M, and Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., both voted against the measure to fund the agency without reopening the rest of the government.

"To serve their critical national security mission, New Mexico's national laboratories require the certainty and stability of a full funding bill," Lujan Grisham said in a statement. "Unfortunately, House Republicans' piecemeal approach falls short. In fact, this bill would actually cut Sandia National Labs' funding by 46 percent."

Los Alamos and Sandia National Labs get about half their annual operating budgets from the NNSA.

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District spoke today on the House floor on the importance of swiftly passing a clean funding bill that will end the government shutdown, fund the national laboratories, and ensure that lab employees are not furloughed. NNSA bill passes House, dies in Senate

SECTION: LOCAL NEWS

LENGTH: 468 words

The House of Representatives voted 248-176 to provide funds for nuclear arms research and security including the National Nuclear Security Administration despite the shutdown. It was the latest GOP bill aimed at reviving popular programs during the shutdown and the latest to die in the Senate, where Senate majority leader Harry Reid has rejected bills that fall short of fully reopening the government.

The New Mexico delegation voted along party lines with Republican Steve Pearce voting for it and Democrats Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham voting against it.

"Today's vote to fund the NNSA is key to the security of our nation, and assures that the hard-working employees of Los Alamos and Sandia National Labs will continue to have jobs," Pearce said.

"Our contractors and employees at Sandia and Los Alamos provide a vital service to our nation, which must continue without interruption - this legislation ensures that."

"I thank Chairman Frelinghuysen and Leader Cantor for working with me to bring this legislation to the House floor," Pearce continued. "With Los Alamos and Sandia announcing furloughs in the near future, I urge the Senate to quickly act on this legislation, not only for the thousands of New Mexico jobs it saves, but also for the security this bill provides."

DOE urged to repay workers if NM labs shut down

BYLINE: Gary Gerew

LENGTH: 261 words

Four members of New Mexico's Congressional delegation have sent a letter to Department of Energy Secretary Ernest Moniz urging him to ensure employees at the state's national laboratories are compensated if they are furloughed as a result of the government shutdown.

The letter was sent Tuesday evening after it was announced that Sandia National Laboratories and Los Alamos National Laboratory had told workers to prepare for furloughs by Oct. 21 if a funding deal wasn't worked out by the federal government.

The letter was signed by Sen. Tom Udall, Sen. Martin Heinrich and Reps. Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham.

In their letter to Moniz, the lawmakers note that although workers at SNL and LANL are contract employees, "they are subject to much of the same uncertainties as their colleagues in the federal workforce."

"The Department of Energy can certify to the labs that it is an 'allowable cost' for them to use their appropriated dollars to compensate their employees for back pay due to any furloughs caused by a shutdown," the four wrote. "Due to the tremendous economic uncertainty currently faced by the laboratories' workforce, we urge you to certify as soon as possible that back pay will be allowable upon the restoration of government functions. The employees of our nation's national laboratories deserve to know that they will be fully compensated for their service to our nation."

Sandia to shut down Oct. 21; Sandia shut-down Oct. 21

LENGTH: 585 words

Sandia National Laboratory officials announced Tuesday that they will be forced to begin to shut down and furlough much of the lab's workforce by Oct. 21 if the budget impasse is not resolved.

Los Alamos National Laboratory officials, meanwhile, have told employees that the lab has a limited ability to stay open in the government shutdown.

LANL released the following statement Tuesday.

"The Administration strongly believes that Congress can quickly come to a resolution to fund the work necessary to American people. This lapse in appropriations has serious impacts on the Department's ability to carry out its mission, including at Los Alamos National Laboratory (LANL). While the Department was able to fund some continued activity for a short period following September 30, 2013, the continued lapse in appropriations is having a significant impact on Departmental operations," the statement said.

"LANL has now reached the point where we need to begin standing down certain operations where there is no longer funding available to maintain full operations. Protecting Special Nuclear Material, national security information, workers, the public and the environment remains an essential function."

LANL also announced it was suspending TRU-Waste shipments to the Waste Isolation Pilot Plant in Carlsbad beginning Monday.

The New Mexico Congressional delegation, meanwhile, is working to ensure that federal workers in New Mexico are not financially hurt in the long-term by the federal government shutdown.

New Mexico is home to roughly 27,000 federal workers, and Sandia National Laboratories and LANL employ an additional 18,000 New Mexicans.

All four lawmakers are strong supporters of the Federal Employee Retroactive Pay Fairness Act to ensure federal employees, furloughed through no fault of their own during the government shutdown, will be paid when the government reopens. Reps. Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham voted for the bill, which passed unanimously in the U.S. House of Representatives on Saturday. In the Senate, Udall and Heinrich are co-sponsors of the same measure. All four lawmakers, including Senators Martin Heinrich and Tom Udall also supported a bill, which has been signed into law; ensuring members of the military will be paid during the shutdown.

Additionally, the N.M. lawmakers sent a letter to Department of Energy (DOE) Secretary Ernest Moniz, urging him to ensure employees at New Mexico's national laboratories are compensated if they are furloughed as a result of the government shutdown.

In their letter to Moniz, the lawmakers note that although workers at SNL and LANL are contract employees, "they are subject to much of the same uncertainties as their colleagues in the federal workforce."

"Congress clearly intends that those workers who provide such vital services for our nation should be insulated from the effects of a protracted shutdown," the lawmakers wrote.

"The Department of Energy can certify to the labs that it is an 'allowable cost' for them to use their appropriated dollars to compensate their employees for back pay due to any furloughs caused by a shutdown," the lawmakers continued. "Due to the tremendous economic uncertainty currently faced by the laboratories' workforce, we urge you to certify as soon as possible that back pay will be allowable upon the restoration of government functions. Farm bill limbo all too familiar

BYLINE: Christina Calloway, The Portales News-Tribune, N.M.

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 558 words

Oct. 09--New Mexico farmers are in limbo as they await movement on a farm bill during the federal government shutdown, according to a New Mexico Farm Bureau official, a position they are all too familiar with.

Agricultural producers say they are in need of the bill because it includes disaster assistance programs but the bill failed to make Congress' floor last year, causing the existing farm bill to be extended.

Once again, New Mexico Farm and Livestock Bureau Vice President Matt Rush said farmers fear the bill won't get any traction, especially with the partial government shutdown in effect.

"We know that the farm bill isn't going anywhere," Rush said. "We were supposed to go to Washington D.C. this week and we had meetings with the American Farm Bureau and our Congressional delegation, but until they get past this budget block, absolutely nothing will happen."

The future of insurance for farmers is a nebulous one, according to Rush. If there isn't a farm bill complete by the end of the year, the current farm bill will revert back to an outdated 1940's version.

"Everyone in agriculture is completely left in limbo, all of our crop insurance is done through the feds," Rush said.

Rush adds even if producers are able to jump the shutdown hurdle, he believes that the farm bill the House passed in July prior to the shutdown has its share of problems because SNAP, a federal food assistance program tied to the farm bill, was cut by $40 billion.

He said it's unlikely the Senate would pass that version.

"I understand what they're trying to do but at the same time there are so few people in production and agriculture that the reason they put (SNAP in the bill) is to get it passed," Rush said. "If you think about it from the standpoint of farmers and ranchers, that's the one reason they tie nutritional programs to it. Now (ag producers) are 1.5 percent of the population. If you're a politician, (ag producers) are not a big priority and we're seeing that now."

U.S. Congressman Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., said the House farm bill not only removed provisions to fund nutrition programs, but did nothing to support New Mexico's dairy producers.

"The Republican-passed bill stripped out the Dairy Stabilization Program, a key component to dairy policy reform that would have helped producers across New Mexico," Lujan said.

He opposed the deep cuts to the food assistance program, calling them damaging to New Mexico families.

"The next step in the legislative process is for the House and the Senate to go to conference committee to work out the differences between the legislation passed in both chambers," Lujan said. "Right now in (Washington D.C.), ending the government shutdown and avoiding a default on the nation's debt are the top priorities, making the fate of the farm bill unclear."

Rush sees that the divide on the nutritional program will be a problem but he's hoping both houses can compromise so that ag producers can continue to produce food for the nation.

"It's the importance of groups like ours because we're trying to keep this in front of elected officials," Rush said. "We've been full in this country so long that no one knows where the food comes from anymore."

Kirkpatrick, Lujan condemn House GOP piecemeal games with Head Start, Impact Aid that is critical to tribes; Rep. Ann Kirkpatrick (D-AZ) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 315 words

WASHINGTON - U.S. Reps. Ann Kirkpatrick, D-Ariz., and Ben Ray Lujan, D-NM, offered the following statements on House Republicans' piecemeal bills for Head Start and Impact Aid. Kirkpatrick and Lujan each represent part of the Navajo Nation, which is the largest land-based tribe in the United States, and they are members of the Congressional Native American Caucus.

Rep. Ann Kirkpatrick, Arizona District One:

"If House leaders were genuinely concerned about Impact Aid and Head Start, they would allow a vote to reopen the government. Piecemeal games only prolong the shutdown rather than solve it. Schools on tribal land have already taken a massive hit with sequestration cuts to Impact Aid and Head Start. And sequestration has cut many other programs, such as the Violence Against Women Act, that help the 12 Native American tribes in Arizona's District One. Congress should stop picking winners and losers - this is not a game. Speaker Boehner, let the House vote on a clean funding bill so we can restart our government."

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, New Mexico District Three:

"It's time for House Republicans to stop playing political games and allow a vote on a clean funding bill that will reopen the government. Their cynical piecemeal approach picks winners and losers while failing to fund all of the areas that are critical to families in Indian Country. Voting on short-term funding for Impact Aid and Head Start ignore the fact that sequester cuts to vital education programs have seriously harmed Native American students. Rather than take steps to end the shutdown and find a solution that ends the sequester, House Republicans continue to bend to the extreme elements in their party, leaving tribal communities to pay the price."

NM Delegation Working to Protect Federal and Lab Workers Hurt by Shutdown;
Urges DOE to compensate national lab employees for back pay if furloughed because of shutdown;
Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 996 words

WASHINGTON - U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham are working to ensure that federal workers in New Mexico are not financially hurt in the long-term by the federal government shutdown.

New Mexico is home to roughly 27,000 federal workers, and Sandia National Laboratories (SNL) and Los Alamos National Laboratory (LANL) employ an additional 18,000 New Mexicans.

All four lawmakers are strong supporters of the Federal Employee Retroactive Pay Fairness Act to ensure federal employees, furloughed through no fault of their own during the government shutdown, will be paid when the government reopens. Lujan and Lujan Grisham voted for the bill, which passed unanimously in the U.S. House of Representatives on Saturday. In the Senate, Udall and Heinrich are cosponsors of the same measure. All four lawmakers also supported a bill, which has been signed into law, ensuring members of the military will be paid during the shutdown.

Additionally, the NM lawmakers sent a letter to Department of Energy (DOE) Secretary Ernest Moniz, urging him to ensure employees at New Mexico's national laboratories are compensated if they are furloughed as a result of the government shutdown.

In their letter to Moniz, the lawmakers note that although workers at SNL and LANL are contract employees, "they are subject to much of the same uncertainties as their colleagues in the federal workforce."

"Congress clearly intends that those workers who provide such vital services for our nation should be insulated from the effects of a protracted shutdown," the lawmakers wrote.

"The Department of Energy can certify to the labs that it is an 'allowable cost' for them to use their appropriated dollars to compensate their employees for back pay due to any furloughs caused by a shutdown," the lawmakers continued. "Due to the tremendous economic uncertainty currently faced by the laboratories' workforce, we urge you to certify as soon as possible that back pay will be allowable upon the restoration of government functions. The employees of our nation's national laboratories deserve to know that they will be fully compensated for their service to our nation."

Sandia officials announced today that they will be forced to begin to shut down and furlough much of the lab's workforce by Oct. 21 if the budget impasse is not resolved. LANL officials also have told employees that the lab has a limited ability to stay open in the government shutdown.

Udall and Heinrich both voted for a clean funding compromise bill, which has twice passed the Senate. If the House of Representatives were to pass this bill, the president would sign it and the government would reopen, preventing thousands of lab employees from being furloughed. Lujan and Lujan Grisham have signed a letter to Speaker John Boehner calling on him to immediately allow a vote on the Senate-passed clean funding compromise.

The following is the text of the lawmakers' letter to Moniz:

Secretary Moniz:

We write today to call your attention to the many New Mexicans who work at Los Alamos and Sandia National Laboratories who have been adversely affected by the continuing budget impasse in Congress and the resulting shutdown. As you know, these labs are essential to our nation's national security as well as its scientific and research capabilities. Their workforce is comprised of many of the smartest scientists, engineers, and researchers in our country, all of whom have devoted their careers to serving and protecting our nation.

This government shut down risks betraying these men and women who have made personal sacrifices for our collective security and technological advancement. While lab employees work for the contractors who manage the labs, they are subject to much of the same uncertainty as their colleagues in the federal workforce. While neither of the New Mexico NNSA laboratories have yet announced a need to furlough their workforce, a number of my constituents have written to our offices or contacted us directly to share the stress of potentially being furloughed from the labs and missing out on a needed paycheck.

The House of Representatives has passed H.R. 3223, the Federal Employee Retroactive Pay Fairness Act, which would compensate all federal employees who would not otherwise receive their full salaries due to the shutdown. President Obama has declared that he supports the legislation and his office writes,

"Federal workers keep the Nation safe and secure and provide vital services that support the economic security of American families. The Administration appreciates that the Congress is acting promptly to move this bipartisan legislation and looks forward to the bill's swift passage."

The overwhelming bipartisan support for this legislation demonstrates the clear Congressional desire that the federal workforce should not be adversely impacted by the shutdown nor should they shoulder the burden of its resulting uncertainty. While the employees of New Mexico's national laboratories are not included within the bill's specific terms, Congress clearly intends that those workers who provide such vital services for our nation should be insulated from the effects of a protracted shutdown.

It is our understanding that the Department of Energy can certify to the labs that it is an "allowable cost" for them to use their appropriated dollars to compensate their employees for back pay due to any furloughs caused by a shutdown. Due to the tremendous economic uncertainty currently faced by the laboratories' workforce, we urge you to certify as soon as possible that back pay will be allowable upon the restoration of government functions. The employees of our nation's national laboratories deserve to know that they will be fully compensated for their service to our nation.

Lujan supports backpay law for furloughed workers

SECTION: LOCAL NEWS

LENGTH: 260 words

Rep. Ben Ray Luján (D-N.M.) spoke Saturday on the House floor in support of H.R. 3223, legislation that ensures furloughed federal employees retroactively receive their pay.

During his remarks, Luján highlighted that it is the intent of Congress to also support contract employees at the national laboratories.

In addition, he submitted into the Congressional Record a letter he is sending Department of Energy Secretary Ernest Moniz to emphasize that fact.

"This bill ensures that furloughed employees will be made whole. It is also important for contract employees who work at our national labs.

"It is clear that Congress intends to insulate those workers who provide vital services to our nation from the effects of the shutdown. In the past, DOE has sought to treat lab employees the same as federal employees. This legislation sets the precedent for how those employees will be treated.

"We are sending the message that DOE should certify back pay for lab employees as an allowable cost, so they will be made whole if they are furloughed."

In the letter to Moniz, Lujan expressed how important the labs were to the nation's security.

"Their workforce is comprised of many of the smartest scientists, engineers, and researchers in our country, all of whom have devoted their careers to serving and protecting our nation," he wrote.

"This government shut down risks betraying these men and women.

" While lab employees work for the contractors who manage the labs, they are subject to much of the same uncertainty as their colleagues in the federal workforce.

It is my understanding that the Department of Energy can certify to the labs that it is an "allowable cost" for them to use their appropriated dollars to compensate their employees for back pay due to any furloughs caused by a shutdown. Due to the tremendous economic uncertainty currently faced by the laboratories' workforce, I urge you to certify as soon as possible that back pay will be allowable upon the restoration of government functions. The employees of our nation's national laboratories deserve to know that they will be fully compensated for their service to our nation.

NM delegation was safe during car chase, shooting; Sen. Udall says police officers yelled, 'Get in your offices'

BYLINE: Michael Coleman Journal Washington Bureau

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. A3

LENGTH: 317 words

WASHINGTON - Sen. Tom Udall was on his way to a meeting Thursday afternoon when he heard shots ring out through the windows of the Hart Senate Office Building.

The New Mexico Democrat told the Journal after the shooting that U.S. Capitol police officers immediately started barking orders at about eight people standing near the security checkpoint in the Hart Building.

"There were about eight of us around there, and they said, 'Get in your offices! Get in your offices!" Udall said.

"We were headed over to the hearing in the adjacent Dirksen Office Building," Udall said. "We were probably four feet from the guard station, and then you could hear this (noise) and it was gunshots. The guards got really alerted. We went back into our office and locked the office and waited for instructions from security people.

"But (before returning to the office) I heard those sounds and looked out into the street and there was what looked like a Capitol Police car with its sirens on in some kind of a chase right in front of our building."

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., was in her office on the other side of the Capitol complex with staff at the time of the incident, as was Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M. Members and staff who were in their offices were directed to "shelter in place," which means to lock the doors, gather in a secure place and don't come out.

Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., said he was in the U.S. Capitol at the time of the shooting.

Sen. Martin Heinrich was also in his office at the time of the incident.

"The senator and the few staffers who are working today quickly followed procedure, locking the doors and gathering in the designated secure place in the office, while the police worked quickly to secure the area," according to a statement released by Heinrich's office. "Unaccounted-for staff were contacted and told to stay away from the building. Everyone is safe and accounted for."

Lujan: It's Time for House Republicans to End the Political Games, Allow a Vote to End the Shutdown; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 383 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement on the government shutdown and House Republicans' refusal to allow a vote on the Senate-passed Continuing Resolution.

"Enough is enough. New Mexico families are hurting as workers have been off the job for days and critical services have been delayed. It is long past time for Congress to act to end the government shutdown and make sure that the employees who have been furloughed through no fault of their own are made whole. It is long past time to make sure that our veterans, seniors, and all those who count on the benefits they have earned, receive what they deserve.

"There is only one way that Congress can end this shutdown today, and that is if Speaker John Boehner would stop appeasing the Tea Party wing of his party, stop holding the government hostage to end the Affordable Care Act, and bring up the compromise bill that has passed the Senate and would get bipartisan support in the House. That legislation contains a spending level that most House Democrats don't like, including me. But Democrats are willing to compromise and accept a lower funding level in the short term to put an end to the shutdown.

"Some Tea Party Republicans don't seem to know what they're even fighting for. Republican Representative Marlin Stutzman recently said, 'We're not going to be disrespected. We have to get something out of this. And I don't know what that even is.' How about opening the government and helping our communities?

"The political games need to stop. The piecemeal attempts to pit different groups against each other need to stop. Funding one piece of one department, as many of these Republicans bills do, will not get all our workers back on the job or ensure that New Mexicans have access to all the services they need.

"Every day, we hear more moderate Republicans speak out against the extreme elements in their party. I encourage them to stand with House Democrats who are ready to end the Tea Party shutdown, demand a vote on the one piece of legislation that can put a stop to this, and help the many New Mexicans and Americans who are hurting right now."

Journal D.C. correspondent: NM delegation safe after Capitol shooting

BYLINE: Michael Coleman, JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: INSIDE THE BELTWAY

LENGTH: 451 words

Members of New Mexico's U.S. House delegation were either in their offices or in the U.S. Capitol Thursday when shots were fired - except Sen. Tom Udall who outside his office near a security checkpoint in the Hart Building and heard the gunshots.

The U.S. Capitol has re-opened and members and staff have resumed their normal operations. A U.S. Capitol police officer was injured in the incident.

Udall told me in a telephone interview that he was headed to a Foreign Relations subcommittee hearing he was supposed to chair on nominees for ambassadorships in Latin America when he heard the gunshots outside his office at the Hart Senate Building.

"We were headed over to" the hearing in the adjacent Dirksen Office Building, Udall said. "We exited the front entrance and you walk out toward Constitution Avenue toward the guard station and you head through a narrow corridor to Dirksen. We were probably four feet from the guard station and then you could hear this (noise) and it was gunshots. The guards got really alerted. There were about eight of us around there, and they said, 'Get in your offices! Get in your offices.'

"We went back into our office and locked the office and waited for instructions from security people," Udall continued. "But (before returning to the office) I heard those sounds and looked out into the street and there was what looked like a Capitol police car with its sirens on in some kind of a chase right in front of our building."

"I had walked that same route 20 minutes earlier," Udall added. "I had left the Capitol to come back and pick up my materials and prepare for the hearing, and I came right in that entrance right about 2 o'clock."

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., was in her office with staff at the time of the incident, as was Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M. A staffer for Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., tells me Luján was in the U.S. Capitol at the time of the shooting.

Sen. Martin Heinric was in his office at the time of the incident. His office issued the following statement:

"Senator Heinrich was in his office in the Hart Senate Building when the gunshots were reported. The Senator and the few staffers who are working today quickly followed procedure, locking the doors and gathering in designated secure place in the office, while the police worked quickly to secure the area. Unaccounted for staff were contacted and told to stay away from the building. Everyone is safe and accounted for.

Here's a quote from Heinrich himself:

"On behalf of everyone in my office, I want to thank the Capitol Police and our first responders for the risks that they take everyday to keep us safe. My thoughts and prayers are with the injured officer and his family."

AMENDMENT MAY END A GOOD DEAL FOR ARIZ.

SECTION: OPINIONS; Pg. B9

LENGTH: 287 words

The effort to open a copper mine near Superior ran into two large roadblocks.

The first was the government shutdown. That will pass.

The second was an innocuous-sounding amendment that could scuttle the entire project.

Resolution Copper wants to swap 5,344 acres of land around Arizona for 2,422 acres of ore-rich federal land. The swap requires congressional action, and it appeared to be headed for House approval until Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., offered an amendment to allow the secretary of Interior to remove any areas he considers sacred or cultural.

Such vague wording delegates an incredible amount of discretion, allowing an administration official to unilaterally stop a deal. It could set a precedent enabling Indian tribes to stop public works and other projects around the country with the signature of a sympathetic Interior secretary.

It's much too arbitrary, particularly because there are any number of laws on the books that require formal consultation between the government and Indian tribes to identify sites for protection. The Resolution land-swap bill requires that work be done before the exchange takes place.

It also brings the 110-acre Apache Leap, a tract of particular sacred interest to the San Carlos Apache Tribe, under federal protection.

If protection of sacred sites in the Resolution exchange is the only purpose, the Lujan amendment is superfluous. It can only be described as a poison pill.

This land exchange would protect environmentally sensitive land currently owned by Resolution. It is expected to generate 3,700 jobs and $61billion in economic activity. And it protects the sacred site of Apache Leap.

The House should reject Lujan's amendment and advance a bill that does so much good.

Lujan Cosponsors Comprehensive Immigration Reform Bill; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 420 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District and First Vice Chair of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus announced that he is an original cosponsor of a comprehensive immigration reform bill that was introduced in the House of Representatives yesterday.

"It is clear that we need to fix our broken immigration system and pass comprehensive reform that is good for our economy, good for our families, and good for our security. This legislation is tough but fair and reflects the contributions immigrants make to our community every day," Congressman Lujan said. "There is a growing coalition - from the high tech sector to the law enforcement, from the agricultural sector to the faith community - demanding reform and it is long past time that House Republicans get serious about immigration reform and allow a vote on this legislation that should earn bipartisan support. Americans have been coming together on this issue and it's time for the House to act."

The House bill is comprised of elements that have all garnered bipartisan support. It contains provisions of the comprehensive immigration reform bill that passed the Senate in June by a bipartisan vote of 68 to 32, with one important change. The House bill replaces border security provisions that were added in the Corker-Hoeven amendment with the bipartisan provisions of the McCaul-Thompson border security bill that was passed out of the House Homeland Security Committee with unanimous support in May.

"Throughout the immigration debate, I have had the opportunity to speak with DREAMers in New Mexico and Washington, D.C. who represent the promise of America. Brought here by no fault of their own to the only home they have known, so many have worked hard with the goal of building a better life for themselves, their families, and their communities," Lujan added. "Their determination and enduring spirit are an inspiration and an example of just how important it is for Congress to pass comprehensive immigration reform that provides them with an opportunity to succeed and make our country stronger."

According to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, enactment of the bipartisan Senate-passed comprehensive immigration reform bill would reduce the deficit by $850 billion. CBO also estimates that the Senate-passed bill would increase economic growth by 3.3 percent in 2023 and 5.4 percent in 2033.

Luj án scolds Republicans over shutdown

BYLINE: Richard Reyes; biz@gallupindependent.com, STAFF WRITER

GALLUP - U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., is deeply disappointed that House Republicans continued efforts to undermine the Affordable Care Act, also known as Obamacare, and forced the government shutdown, according to a news release from his Washington office.

Luján released a statement Tuesday in which he scolds Republicans and expresses support for the Affordable Care Act, which he refers to as the law of the land, explaining it was upheld by the Supreme Court and accepted by the American people.

"It is clear that House Republicans would rather see the government shut down, New Mexico workers furloughed, and services halted and delayed for many in our communities than allow millions of Americans access to affordable health care," Luján stated.

He said Congressional Democrats have called for a conference committee to move the budget process forward, but House Republicans refused. Luján calls on them to stop playing games and pass a clean bill to fund the government.

"The longer the Tea Party shutdown lasts, the longer the people of New Mexico will pay the price and the greater toll it will take on our economy," he stated.

In the meantime, Luján encourages uninsured residents to sign up for coverage through the New Mexico Health Insurance Exchange that opened Tuesday.

Individuals can start signing up immediately for coverage that will go into effect Jan. 1. In order to guarantee coverage by Jan. 1, the deadline to sign up is Dec. 1. Small businesses with less than 50 employees can start comparing plans immediately and can sign up beginning Nov. 1. "Through the exchange, individuals without insurance, or those who want to find a better option, will be able to compare plans side-by-side and find out if they qualify for tax credits to help them afford the costs of health insurance," Luján stated. "Since the Affordable Care Act became law, people across New Mexico have already benefited from it, with many of the benefits still to come as they are phased in. Now all Americans with pre-existing conditions can get affordable coverage even if they change jobs or lose a job."

New Mexicans can sign up through the exchange, also called a marketplace, online or by phone.

New Mexico Dems: House Republicans Continue to Play Political Games with Government Funding

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 646 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

Stung by public outrage expressed by the general public and sinking poll numbers, caused by their manufactured shut down crisis, House Republicans tried and failed to pass three partial funding bills into the U.S. House of Representatives. New Mexico's Democrats responded by demanding that Republicans stop playing games and pass a clean funding bill which would reopen the government.

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after House Republicans again refused to allow a vote on the Senate-passed continuing resolution, and instead brought the three bills to the floor to fund only select parts of the government:

"There is a clear path forward that would swiftly end the government shutdown. It would ensure that our veterans have the resources they deserve, get furloughed New Mexico workers back on the job, and make our public lands available for all. Unfortunately, rather than allow a vote on a clean continuing resolution that could gain bipartisan support, the House Republican leaders and members of the Tea Party are continuing to play political games.

"Bringing up piecemeal bills to fund various aspects of the government while leaving other areas to remain shuttered is no way to responsibly govern. Many in the Tea Party have talked about their desire to defund and get rid of certain government agencies and federal departments. A piecemeal approach gives them that opportunity to deny funding for any area - from health care to education - that they oppose.

"The bills brought up tonight would continue to leave New Mexico's workers furloughed. The Republican bills included funding for national parks, but left out vital funding for the Bureau of Land Management and the U.S. Forest Service. Proper management of our National Forests and public lands are critical after recent fires and flooding. Adding insult to injury, with New Mexico in the middle of hunting season, sportsmen would continue to lose access to public land, and communities would continue to lose vital business.

"In addition, the Republican bill to fund the VA for six weeks is a step backward. If House Republicans were serious about giving our veterans the resources they need, they wouldn't support a short-term bill at sequester levels, but would instead go to conference on the veterans' appropriations bill and send a full-year funding bill to the President. Earlier this year the House passed, with my support, legislation to fund the VA for a full year - and not at the lower sequester level House Republicans proposed this evening."

Commenting on the ongoing Republican government shut down, and the Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham of New Mexico's First District, a member of the House Budget Committee, released the following statement:

"Since House Republicans shut down the government, and they have yet to offer a single reasonable, responsible proposal to end the shutdown. While I want nothing more than to provide relief to everyone in New Mexico and across the nation suffering from House Republicans' irresponsibility, a piecemeal approach is not the answer. The only answer is a clean continuing resolution.

"It is absolutely unacceptable that House Republicans attempted to use veterans as a pawn in order to continue their government shutdown. In fact, the House has already passed a year-long veterans' appropriations bill, which I voted for, that would provide a higher level of funding for the VA than the temporary fix proposed by House Republicans this evening. If House Republicans truly wanted to protect vital services for veterans, they would allow a vote on the Senate-passed clean continuing resolution so we could end this reckless government shutdown tonight."

NM representatives agree: Shutdown is other party's fault

BYLINE: Gary Gerew

LENGTH: 632 words

Members of New Mexico's Congressional delegation wasted no time in pointing fingers in blaming their opposing parties for the shutdown of the federal government.

"A small minority of extremists in the Republican party is now holding the entire country hostage over a law that has cleared the Congress and the Supreme Court, and survived a presidential election. Insisting on a government shutdown to prove a point isn't leadership, it's a temper tantrum, and the American people are rightly disgusted," said Sen. Tom Udall (D-N.M.). "In New Mexico, the impacts of a shutdown will be felt immediately as our civilian employees are sent home from military installations, national parks and forests close to tourists, and countless other services are halted. If the shutdown lasts several days or weeks, the impacts will ripple through our state's economy, hurting thousands of people in communities from Lordsburg to Los Alamos. The House could end this stalemate at any time. If there were a vote in the House on the bill that has twice cleared the Senate, it would pass in the House. I urge House Republicans to pass the Senate bill so we can focus on our priorities: rebuilding our economy and getting the American people back to work."

Rep. Steve Pearce, the state's lone Republican in Congress, also called on residents to contact their representatives. Only he wants the Senate to pass the House bill.

"I have always believed that Congress should be held to the same standards as everyone else," Pearce said. "As a result, I have made the difficult decision that my staff will be furloughed. And, though the Constitution requires that members of Congress must be paid, I will pay back to the U.S. Treasury the salary I am paid during the shutdown. I had hoped that a shutdown could be avoided: I encourage all New Mexicans to contact their senators and urge them to pass the House Continuing Resolution and end the shutdown."

Sen. Martin Heinrich (D-N.M.) was brief but also found the Republicans to be at fault.

"Closing down the government strikes at the heart of New Mexico's economy and our middle-class families," Heinrich said. "And that was the decision Republicans made tonight."

Rep. Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District, said he didn't see why Republicans continue to tie the spending bill to the Affordable Care Act.

"I am deeply disappointed that House Republicans' continued efforts to undermine the Affordable Care Act have forced a government shutdown," Luján said. "The Affordable Care Act is the law of the land - upheld by the Supreme Court and accepted by the American people in the last election. It is clear that House Republicans would rather see the government shut down, New Mexico workers furloughed, and services halted and delayed for many in our communities than allow millions of Americans access to affordable health care."

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham of New Mexico's First District, also blamed House Republicans.

"Make no mistake, House Republicans have shut down the government," Lujan Grisham said. "The Senate repeatedly sent the House a clean funding bill to keep the government open while we work on the significant fiscal issues facing our country. The choice House Republicans faced was simple: pass the Senate's commonsense continuing resolution, or cave into the extremist faction of their party and shut down the government.

"Now, many of New Mexico's 27,000 federal civilian employees will be forced to stay home without pay, vital services for veterans and seniors are at risk, and our economic recovery hangs in the balance."

New Mexico was keeping a close eye on Washington, D.C., on Monday, preparing for a federal government shutdown that, starting today, could close national parks and lead to furloughs and pay freezes for federal employees in the state.

At Carlsbad Caverns National Park, one of the state's 11 national parks or monuments, employees were planning to show up for work this morning - and then be sent home in the case of a government shutdown.

All roads to the iconic caverns in southeastern New Mexico, along with the park's visitor center, would be closed to the public in the case of a shutdown.

"When it is resolved, we would return to work the next day," said Valerie Gohlke, a National Park Service public affairs officer at Carlsbad Caverns.

As Congress debated possible last-minute deals that could end a budget impasse, state budget officials in Santa Fe were hoping to minimize disruptions to state services.

Highway workers, Medicaid administrators and other state employees funded by federal dollars will stay on the job - with their pay uninterrupted - at least through Dec. 31, officials in Gov. Susa-na Martinez's administration said Monday.

A total of 1,804 state government jobs are paid entirely with federal funds, and budget analysts were looking at ways to temporarily pay salaries for those positions.

Overall, they were confident that state agencies, "could carry forward by using appropriations that would get them through the end of the calendar year," Finance and Administration Secretary Tom Clifford said.

In addition, Senate Finance Committee Chairman John Arthur Smith, a Deming Democrat, pointed out that lawmakers set aside $17 million in this year's state budget to offset possible federal funding gaps.

A shutdown could also slow the federal judicial system in New Mexico, as civil lawsuits would be largely put on hold and court secretaries, receptionists and translators might be temporarily out of work.

However, criminal cases would still proceed, though possibly at a slower pace, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

New Mexico's congressional delegation braced for a government shutdown in widely divergent ways. All members will remain on the job, but their staffs face different fates. Republican Rep. Steve Pearce plans to shut all of his offices and furlough all his staff during the shutdown while Democratic Rep. Ben Ray Lujánplans to keep all staff working and all offices open.

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, a Democrat, is putting her staff on a rotating furlough schedule, with the number of people furloughed depending on the length of the shutdown. Lujan Grisham's Albuquerque and Washington, D.C., offices will remain open to constituents.

Lujan Grisham also announced she will donate any pay she receives during the shutdown to a charity that helps military veterans avoid homelessness. Pearce said he would reimburse the federal Treasury for the amount of any pay he receives during the shutdown.

Sens. Martin Heinrich and Tom Udall, both Democrats, are furloughing 32 and 31 employees, respectively, and closing all offices in the state and in D.C., but all meetings previously scheduled for their D.C. offices will happen as planned. Both senators are keeping a skeleton crew of staffers on duty during the shutdown.

Meanwhile, about 20,000 workers at Sandia and Los Alamos national laboratories, the state's two largest federally funded employers, have been instructed to report to work today even if the federal government shuts down.

Independent contractors run the labs for the government, and in both cases they have carry-over funding left from previous years' budgets to keep working for at least a short period of time, management of both labs said last week in memos distributed to their staffs.

The shutdown could also affect paychecks for roughly 2,100 Pentagon-funded civilian employees at Kirtland Air Force Base in Albuquerque. Workers at White Sands Missile Range and Holloman Air Force Base near Alamogordo could feel a similar pinch.

House Republicans Continue to Play Political Games with Government Funding;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 387 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after House Republicans again refused to allow a vote on the Senate-passed continuing resolution, and instead brought three bills to the floor to fund select parts of the government.

"There is a clear path forward that would swiftly end the government shutdown. It would ensure that our veterans have the resources they deserve, get furloughed New Mexico workers back on the job, and make our public lands available for all. Unfortunately, rather than allow a vote on a clean continuing resolution that could gain bipartisan support, the House Republican leaders and members of the Tea Party are continuing to play political games.

"Bringing up piecemeal bills to fund various aspects of the government while leaving other areas to remain shuttered is no way to responsibly govern. Many in the Tea Party have talked about their desire to defund and get rid of certain government agencies and federal departments. A piecemeal approach gives them that opportunity to deny funding for any area - from health care to education - that they oppose.

"The bills brought up tonight would continue to leave New Mexico's workers furloughed. The Republican bills included funding for national parks, but left out vital funding for the Bureau of Land Management and the U.S. Forest Service. Proper management of our National Forests and public lands are critical after recent fires and flooding. Adding insult to injury, with New Mexico in the middle of hunting season, sportsmen would continue to lose access to public land, and communities would continue to lose vital business.

"In addition, the Republican bill to fund the VA for six weeks is a step backward. If House Republicans were serious about giving our veterans the resources they need, they wouldn't support a short-term bill at sequester levels, but would instead go to conference on the veterans' appropriations bill and send a full-year funding bill to the President. Earlier this year the House passed, with my support, legislation to fund the VA for a full year - and not at the lower sequester level House Republicans proposed this evening."

Lujan Encourages Uninsured New Mexicans to Sign Up for Health Care on the New Exchange; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 300 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District encourages uninsured New Mexicans, those with insurance who are seeking a more affordable plan, and small businesses with less than 50 employees to sign up for coverage through the new health care exchange that opened today. As of October 1, individuals can sign up for health insurance that will begin on January 1, 2014. Small businesses can start comparing plans today and can sign up beginning November 1.

New Mexicans can sign up through the exchange, also called a marketplace, online at www.bewellnm.com or by calling 1-855-99-NMHIX (66449). They have until December 1 to sign up to guarantee coverage on January 1.

"Today, a key component of the Affordable Care Act begins, as New Mexico's health care exchange comes online, offering tens of thousands of our friends, family, and neighbors an easy way to make informed choices about the quality health care plan that is right for them," Congressman Lujan said.

"Through the exchange, individuals without insurance, or those who want to find a better option, will be able to compare plans side-by-side and find out if they qualify for tax credits to help them afford the costs of health insurance."

"Since the Affordable Care Act became law, people across New Mexico have already benefited from it, with many of the benefits still to come as they are phased in," Lujan added. "Now all Americans with pre-existing conditions can get affordable coverage even if they change jobs or lose a job. I encourage New Mexicans to go to www.bewellnm.com today to compare plans, find out how much of a subsidy they are eligible for, and sign up for health insurance."

Lujan Statement on Government Shutdown; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 213 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement on the government shutdown.

"I am deeply disappointed that House Republicans' continued efforts to undermine the Affordable Care Act have forced a government shutdown. The Affordable Care Act is the law of the land - upheld by the Supreme Court and accepted by the American people in the last election.

"It is clear that House Republicans would rather see the government shut down, New Mexico workers furloughed, and services halted and delayed for many in our communities than allow millions of Americans access to affordable health care.

"For months, Congressional Democrats have called for a conference committee to move the budget process forward. House Republicans refused, instead wasting time while the clock ticked closer to a government shutdown. It's time for House Republicans to stop playing games, stop trying to undermine the Affordable Care Act, and pass a clean bill that funds the government. The longer the Tea Party shutdown lasts, the longer the people of New Mexico will pay the price and the greater toll it will take on our economy."
